Introduction and Disclaimer

Hello everyone. It’s been a little while, ne?

This story has been simmering on my pen drive for a lot of months now. It was in mental cogitation throughout the writing of the Fourth Maki and yet with various things going on in my real life, it’s moved a lot more slowly than any of its predecessors. As some of you who’ve read and reviewed my stuff before know, I am back at university full time now (studying Japanese, amongst which I am also studying the Classical language). It’s pretty busy, and so am I. For that reason, my writing has slowed down. This story is not yet finished, though I would like it to be.

*Therefore I am taking a gamble and posting it here in the hope that doing so might spur me on to write the rest.
Currently it exists in about twenty or so chapters.*

My internet at university is very unreliable and I am not home every weekend so updates may not be as regular as they have been throughout Meifu’s Gate. Please forgive me for this. I will do my best to provide a good story with a completed ending, but it is likely to take a little bit of time since I have essays to plan and write and an entire new grammatical structure to learn ;).

So, onto the story. We last saw Juushirou and Shunsui as they graduated and went on to their new lives as Captains of the Gotei.

Though I sent Juu to Seventh District, I haven’t chosen to write about his time there. This story is set approximately 20-25 years after their graduation, and Thirteenth Division have returned to Inner Seireitei, which now has the basic structure of what we know as Seireitei proper in Canon, a place where the squads all have their own specific headquarters. There are still Clans and there are therefore still eight Districts with distinct land of their own. There is also Rukongai and this story will introduce the basis for the development of modern Rukongai, beginning with the first three districts, the two canon ones known as Junrin'an (1) and Hokutan (3), plus one of my own naming, Nakaken (2). Rukongai is quite a wide space, but not all of it is clearly mapped out by the Gotei — as will become clear.

Several of the characters from Meifu will be reprised in this story. Some will be focused on more than others. There are also new characters, some of whom provide ancestors for future canon characters of some significance. For those unsatisfied with how Keitarou's story tied off last time, this will bring him and his fanaticism back into the frame.

The finale of the last story mapped out the fate of the Team Stupid characters, including the deaths of some of them. I will reassure readers that none of those deaths occur within this story. That is not to say that death will not occur, though. On the contrary, it will, and probably in some quantity. However, it is not my intention to slaughter Team Stupid's members just yet. As a payoff, though, it's true to say that not all of them have as primary a role as in the other stories.

At the time of writing this, the primary focal point of the story is Juushirou's Thirteenth Division, therefore the role played by Shunsui — though considerable — is maybe shadowed by his friend's to date. I can't be sure yet how that will pan out in the long run, as Thirteenth Division itself is strategically important to the development of the plot in many different ways.

Fans of Shunsui, please don't tar and feather me for this. I love him just as much as ever, but characters must do as the plot sees fit, and that is all.

The title of the story, "Sukuse" is an old Japanese word often used in the context of literary and pseudo-historic figures talking about events being a result of ties or karma from a previous existence. Since the souls in Seireitei exist on a cycle of rebirth, death and balance, I thought it appropriate to use as a title for this story. This is not Meifu's Gate, because the boys are no longer students. This is a Gotei Thirteen story — but one set in the early days far flung from canon and therefore far more recognisable to readers familiar with the Meifu world.

Prologue: Murettai Several Years Earlier

There were fierce winter winds the night the stranger came to Murettai Village.

Wrapped in a heavy, dark cloak, his face mostly obscured from both sight and weather, the man made his way along the central trackway, pausing from time to time to ask questions of residents and occasionally slipping a coin between his gloved fingers into their dirt-stained, calloused palms. His cloak hid his attire from view completely, but it was whispered among the villagers that he must be a member of one of the Clan families, for despite a limp when he walked, there was something in his bearing that told of a quietly assumed self-confidence. Although there were no retainers at his heels, he did not seem like the kind of person who would be easily taken off guard.

He reached the end house in the village as the moon drifted behind a cloud, creating an odd, hazy glow about the place. Was it an omen? Some of the younger members of the village thought so, even as he raised his velvet-covered fingers to knock at the door. Why had he come here, at such an hour, alone — and to visit the house of the sickly widow, whose life was ebbing away little by little as each day passed?

Some theorised that he was the ghost of the woman's dead husband, coming to claim her soul, and for this reason, none of the village folk strayed out of doors for long, fearing that watching his actions might bring bad luck down on their own heads. They had plenty of their own concerns to deal with — if a stranger came to call on the widow, so be it. It was her concern. Her sons were with her, were they not? They could surely handle matters themselves. It was not for them to interfere, whether he be an earthly or a spiritual visitor.

On the stranger's part, he cared nothing for whether his appearance had garnered attention. On the contrary, it amused him to be once more viewed with fear and awe and a faint smile traced across his lips as he pressed his covered knuckles once more to the hard wooden divide. Had they been able to see his expression, the villagers would surely not have been put any more at ease, for though humour showed in his face, his mud-slurried eyes were clouded, the dim light that glittered there cold and hard.

For Ketsui, younger son of the widow Irie, the visit had come completely out of the blue. When he had heard the knock at the door, he had fully expected it to be his family's close friend Kirio, returning from her errand to the herbalist with fresh remedies to help his mother's pain. The woman was sleeping now, a peaceful, dreamless sleep thanks to the last of the soporific concoction from the previous trip, but Ketsui was adult enough to know that it would not last forever. So even in this bitter wind, the girl had set out, bent on collecting the potion in person to prevent any delay. Hikifune Kirio was that kind of person, and so when Ketsui had moved to open the door, he had fully expected to see her on the other side, herbs in hand.

But it had not been Kirio. It had been a man who would change the fates of his family forever.

He was tall and lean, even despite the heavy fabrics that swaddled his body, and Ketsui stared at him for a moment, completely thrown off guard. The stranger, for his part, seemed equally startled, his cloak slipping from his face for a moment and utter surprise flooding his preoccupied brown eyes.

A moment of silence went between them, then,

“Daisuke?” The word dropped from the stranger’s lips, barely more than a whisper as two gloved hands came up to grasp Ketsui by the shoulders, disbelief in his tones.

Daisuke.

Ketsui’s brows knitted, and he carefully detached himself, bowing his head respectfully towards the visitor.

“I’m sorry, sir. I think you’ve made a mistake,” he said politely. “There is nobody by that name here.”

“Nobody by...” The stranger faltered, wetting dry lips as he stared at the boy, almost as though he struggling to understand what he was seeing. Then, as if a curtain had been lifted from his gaze, his eyes lit up with comprehension and he nodded, that faint, humourless smile once more touching his lips.

“Of course not,” he agreed, the faintest note of genuine sadness in his tones. “It was a long time ago — there would be nobody by that name here now. I saw with my own eyes...”

He took a deep breath, then,

“Ketsui-kun, I presume?”

Ketsui was taken aback, staring at the stranger afresh. Who was this man? How had he known his father’s name, and spoken it so freely? And more, how had he known his own name? Had he asked in the village? But no... that surely couldn’t be, for there was something in those eyes that reached out to Ketsui’s childhood memories, teasing and tweaking as though begging to be remembered.

At his silence, the stranger’s smile widened.

“You don’t remember.”

It was a statement, not a question. “Indeed, why should you remember? You were just a boy — very young, perhaps not even six the last time I saw you. The last time... with your father and mother...”

far from this place in another world.”

At this, Ketsui’s face drained of all colour, and he swallowed hard.

“K.Keitarou-dono?” he whispered. “Aizen... Keitarou... dono?”

At the sound of his name, true pleasure leapt into the man’s gaze and he nodded, slipping his hands down to clasp Ketsui’s warmly in his velvety grip.

“Indeed, even after so long,” he murmured. “It has been too long, Ketsui... you are all grown up, and I imagine your brother too — both of you must be full grown and sons to be proud of now, in this peaceful place. I came to see you — you and your poor mother, who I understand is in ill health?”

“She... probably will not live long,” Ketsui bit his lip, eying his companion with a mixture of emotions. “It has not been easy on her, since Father... since we came here, though she has always worked very hard and done her best for us. Now it’s our duty to support her — so Tenichi-nii and I are both at her side when she needs us the most.”

“Yes. Daisuke would have approved of that,” before Ketsui knew what was happening, Keitarou had entered the house fully, closing the door behind him with a soft click, “and you truly... you resemble him so greatly, for a moment I was completely thrown. You are a handsome young man, Ketsui-kun — but it brings me most pleasure to know that you hold your father’s likeness in your face.”

“Mother has said so too,” Ketsui agreed slowly. “Many times she’s said it’s both her joy and her sorrow to look at me, and know that Father is still at least partly with her. But even so — after so long... we did not expect...”

“A visit by a wanted fugitive may not be one welcomed by most families,” there was a rueful, self-effacing note in the visitor’s tones and he nodded his head, leaning up against the wall as his clever gaze ran over Ketsui’s features once more. “I understand your consternation — you do not need to fear me by voicing it. I trust that if there is one place in Seireitei that will not betray me to my enemies, it would be here. I have not come to do you or your mother any harm, Ketsui. I’ve simply come out of family concern, to thank her and give her my wishes before she passes from this place to the next.”

“Why... why now?” Ketsui had not expected Keitarou to be so frank, yet somehow his companion’s words did little to reassure him. “How could you know of Mother’s health, and why...”

“That was coincidence,” Keitarou admitted. “There have been many times I’ve thought to come to you, but the risk associated with my doing so has always made me shy away. Daisuke did not want you put in danger... I didn’t think his soul would forgive me if I led trouble to his family’s door.”

He smiled, a smile somehow out of place on the face of a wanted traitor, yet a genuine, warm smile all the same, and Ketsui found his wariness fading into confusion. Was this really the man that all of Seireitei had been hunting down? Was this kinsman of his truly the mastermind behind the assassinations of Endou Shouichi and the Kuchiki Clan’s beloved heir, the one who had struck and slain before disappearing back into the shadows without a trace? The stories about him were exaggerated beyond belief if it were true, for local stories made Keitarou out to be a monster of immortality. Yet Ketsui’s memories painted a different picture, and as he stood there, tracing his gaze across the shadowed features of his cousin’s face, he recalled with startling clarity one afternoon when, covered in dust and soot from his laboratory experiments, Keitarou had shown up at their home unannounced, bringing sweet treats for him and his brother as a new year celebration.

He closed his eyes briefly, forcing the recollection away. The man he remembered hazily as a kindly uncle figure was the most hated man in all Seireitei, and it would not do to confuse nostalgia with the truth.

“But now, you don’t worry about that?” he asked, opening his eyes to meet Keitarou’s gaze once more. “Mother is very ill, and in no state to defend herself if Eighth District sent soldiers here in search of you.”

“Yes, but when I learned she was so ill, I knew it was my last chance to see her,” Keitarou acknowledged. He laughed, seeing the doubt etched on the young man’s features, and he lifted a gloved hand, resting it lightly against Ketsui’s shoulder.

“You find it hard to believe, but your father was like my brother, and your mother therefore my much beloved sister,” he murmured. “You and Tenichi were nephews in all but name, and I was fond of you. Besides, there is no immediate danger. I assure you that I have done all I could to cover my tracks coming here, and I shall do the same again when I leave.”

“It seems an unnecessary risk,” Ketsui reflected. “Even if it’s as you say — and I admit, I remember the kindness you always showed my brother and I, even though I was so very young when we parted. It’s been all these years and Mother has never expected to make contact with you. Now she is about to leave this world... even affection for her can't save her from this disease."

"You are my kinsfolk, and Daisuke would have wanted me to reach out to you," Keitarou said simply. "I have just delayed it from fear of bringing you harm. If Irie's health is failing, though, I can delay my coming no longer. There are no powerful Clansfolk in this area to hold your hands nor provide expert health care to make her comfortable, are there? Therefore for kin — for Daisuke's kin — it's my duty to do as I can. I am no healer, but I am a scientist — and I bring something which I believe will ease her pain."

He slid his hand into the sleeve of his heavy clothing, producing a small ceramic vial. He held it out to Ketsui, who took it, gazing at it quizzically.

"It is up to you whether or not you trust me enough to use it," Keitarou seemed to understand what was going through the young boy's mind. "I have simply brought it to you — the rest is up to you."

"What's this about, Ketsui?"

At that moment Tenichi stepped into the hallway, thick auburn hair pulled back in a long tail down his back. He was half a head taller than his brother, broader and more of a warrior to look at, and Ketsui saw Keitarou's gaze flit immediately to the boy's attire and the sheathed blade that he wore at his waist. Was it imagination, Ketsui wondered, or had a fleeting flicker of darkness entered those muddy eyes as the scientist had regarded his cousin's oldest son?

But unlike Ketsui, Tenichi did not look like an Urahara. Unlike Ketsui, Tenichi's genes followed his mother's side of the family far more closely — and Ketsui imagined there were no ancient, sleeping ghosts in this encounter.

There was a brief pause, then Keitarou bowed his head, pulling back the hood of his cloak as he did so to reveal a tail of sandy brown hair tied neatly at the nape of his neck with a simple, white length of ribbon. Though Ketsui's memories of the man were faint, he was struck by the fact this stranger had barely aged since their last meeting — whilst he had grown from a child to a young a man capable of making his own decisions, Keitarou had seemingly been frozen in time. He was aging but not aging — in the same way that Ketsui knew other shinigami had aged yet not aged over the course of passing years.

"I have come as a kinsman to enquire after your mother and to greet you both after so long," Keitarou said quietly now, and at the sight of him, Tenichi's eyes widened with disbelief.

"Keitarou-dono," he murmured, and Keitarou chuckled.

"You remember more quickly than your brother does. I see," he murmured. "Well, so much to the good. Perhaps then you're less surprised to see me — or no, from your expression, would you be more surprised? Perhaps dressed in the attire of the Gotei of Seireitei, you aren't quite sure how to meet my gaze after so long?"

Tenichi bristled for a moment, then,

"I am a shinigami," he said quietly, "with the Gotei Thirteen, so that I can protect the people of Seireitei like we were protected when we were children. For that reason, both Ketsui and I have trained at Genryuusai-sensei's Academy. For that reason, we both intend to bear blades and hunt Hollows for Soul Society. Father died fighting for what he believed in. Both Ketsui and I intend to follow his lead."

"I see," Keitarou shifted his body more comfortably against the wall panelling, eying them pensively one at a time. "Your father would be glad to hear such words, but I wonder if even you remember what those things he believed in so strongly were, Tenichi-kun. To see you've both survived, grown and become strong brings me joy in his place — but even so, I can tell from your eyes that you know nothing of the fight that led you to be in this impoverished place. You don't know how much Daisuke suffered for your freedom — how much we all suffered so that you might have a future at all."

"Father sent us away so that we wouldn't become embroiled in his activities. He sent us away to keep us safe," Tenichi said stolidly. "Mother has told us many a time that Father wanted us to live and to do so in freedom. He wanted us to make our own choices about this world — thanks to him, both Ketsui and I have done so."

His eyes narrowed, flitting to the vial in Ketsui's hand.

"Why did you come here?" he demanded. "Your being here can only be viewed as trouble for us and for Mother."

"I came to see Irie, after so long," Keitarou repeated. "I brought medicine to ease her suffering, which I have already given to your brother. I also came because I heard that the both of you were currently here in the village too. I was curious to see you with my own eyes, and to see how well you remembered Daisuke. Having seen Ketsui's face, I can believe that neither of you would easily forget him."

He crossed the floor, resting his hand on Tenichi's shoulder.

“Ketsui has his appearance, but despite his name, maybe you are the one with his resolve,” he reflected. “Your eyes are different in colour, but the emotion I see there is the same. You’re driven to fight for something you believe in — even if it kills you. Whether I agree with your resolve or not, those are good emotions to have.”

“Keitarou-dono, you’re believed to be dead by most people in Seireitei,” Ketsui said softly. “Those who don’t believe you died are still people who would like to hunt you down. Even as a student at the Academy, I’ve heard of it. I’ve never said anything about our kinship, but I’ve heard it spoken of even in the halls and between classes. Your name is synonymous with chaos and destruction in most sectors of Seireitei. They say you murdered a head of the Endou Clan, conspired to bring down the Kuchiki by assassinating the heir, and a multitude of other acts that make you considered a felon beyond forgiveness. Your being are alive and here is dangerous... even if you covered your tracks, your presence in Eighth District could bring harm to both you and to us, especially to Mother.”

“Do you see me as your enemy?” Keitarou was surprised. “I did my everything to protect you and ensure you had a chance to live like you do now. District Seven was a place so full of pain and corruption — Daisuke and I both wanted a better future for you. A better world. A better chance. Even so, you see me as someone who comes to bring you harm?”

“Then...” Ketsui faltered, and Keitarou smiled.

“Daisuke sent you away knowing that he would die for his cause. Our cause,” he said quietly, his tones edged with something more intense as he began to speak about the distant past. “As your mother has rightly taught you, he loved you so much, and didn’t want you to be dragged into the mire by his decisions. He knew he would be slain by the despot madman who ruled in District Seven, and so it came to be. The man who I brought to Hades — the former head of the Endou Clan you spoke of — was the man whose own weapon cut down your father. In the first instance I took the burden of outlaw on my shoulders because of my loyalty to my kinsman, by avenging your father in your place. Knowing that, how can you consider me anything but your ally?”

“The man who...” Tenichi’s face paled, and Keitarou nodded.

“Irie has never told you the truth... perhaps she never knew it, completely,” he reflected, “but Daisuke died at the direct hands of Endou Shouichi, tortured to within an inch of his life and then slaughtered cruelly by the ice blade of his zanpakutou, Hijirobaya. I witnessed it, so I know there is no falseness in my account. For that act, I sought revenge. Our people had been oppressed and illtreated for a century before that — for their freedom Daisuke fought and died, and to uphold that ideal, I fought and killed the man who had so oppressed us. I took Daisuke's body, gave him proper burial and promised him never to give up on the cause we had believed in so strongly. I wanted — and I still want now — for those displaced by corrupt laws to once again have a right to speak. The difference is that it is an injustice that touches more than just exiled Urahara. In my time in the shadows, I have learned this all too clearly.”

“Father was killed by an Endou?” Tenichi whispered, and Ketsui bit his lip, knowing his brother was thinking of Seireitei and the Captains of the Gotei. “By a kinsman of the Seventh Captain... that was why...?”

“Your father was a true and brave man who martyred himself for the freedom of his kin. Freedom you have lived in since then,” Keitarou said simply, “as I still live. Since they have stopped looking for me so actively, I have come to see with my own eyes that he did not die in vain. He did not. You are both sons in whom I'm sure he could have had pride. Irie has done well with you — both of you. Shinigami from the Districts — truly a great thing.”

“Do you mean that?” Ketsui looked doubtful, and Keitarou laughed, nodding his head.

“I have spent almost all of my life in the Districts or shadows, without protection of my own Clan, even if I was born that way,” he said frankly. “I have ultimate faith in the individual fighting power of people even if they lack money or friends in high places. This world is still the world of the Clans, but little by little that is changing. You both being accepted and trained as proper shinigami is proof of it. A change is coming — a change which I support with heart and soul. It's a change whereby the ordinary people are not simply trampled underfoot but that everyone born in Seireitei might have the same opportunity to make a difference.”

He shrugged his shoulders.

“Those who fear change would call me dangerous,” he added dismissively. “They would label me an outlaw and a rebel and a person who commits unspeakable crimes. Less is said of the crimes committed by those who hold all the power, however. The suffering in Rukongai, those who starve or perish trying to scramble into Seireitei for even one mouthful of proper food are never spoken about in polite society. The poor in Seireitei — you know full well that it is not easy to live hand-to-mouth when everything you had is taken by a Clansman on the wrong side of justice. I have blooded my hands, yes. I won't deny it. But I am not simply a callous, destructive murderer. My ambition is as it was when your father still lived — to remove the oppression of those who cause such widespread suffering, and open up Seireitei to the ones who truly deserve to govern it."

He eyed Tenichi thoughtfully.

"Tell me, who is your Captain? You are a recruit, correct? To which division?"

"Thirteenth. Under Ukitake Juushirou-taichou," Tenichi was surprised by the sudden change in topic, and to Ketsui's astonishment, pleasure flooded Keitarou's features.

"Ah. Then such things can truly happen," he whispered, more than half talking to himself. "If that one, in whom I had so many high hopes can raise to such a level, then times are really changing. Perhaps now is the right time, after soon we will finish what Daisuke and I began, and bring everything down to the same level."

He clapped his hands down on Tenichi's shoulders again, eying him firmly.

"For your father's sake, remain strong and fight for those beliefs of yours," he said evenly. "As a shinigami of the Gotei or descendant of the Urahara exiles, the same rules apply. I will not tell you what path to choose, nor what side to take in the battles ahead. This is your future, and Daisuke would want you to make your own decisions about right and wrong. Still, think carefully on all I've told you tonight. You are of an age now to draw that sword and fight for the things you believe in — doing so helps to shape what this world will become."

He laughed.

"Your Captain can probably advise you of those things more successfully than me," he reflected ruefully. "I am gratified to know that he has continued to be the catalyst for change I felt sure he would be, even so many years since our last unfortunate encounter."

"You... know my Captain?"

"Long, long ago," Keitarou dismissed this with a flick of his hand. "His beliefs and mine collided and then parted in a brief moment, you might say. Ah, well. He was your age then, Tenichi-kun. Young men are impetuous and full of ideals. Once I thought we might fight alongside one another, but he was too easily seduced by Clan power, and so our acquaintance ended.”

He sighed.

“Our family were given the gift and the curse of crafting the future of this place,” he murmured. “Whether the Clans realise it or not yet, our bloodline will eventually be triumphant in our goals. Perhaps, when that time comes, we will no longer see brave people like Irie in such abandoned places, waiting to breathe their last. Think about it... both of you. What do you want your future to be? The choices you make now will matter more and more as you go on, so make sure they are right from the start.”

He bowed his head, pulling his cloak up once more to cover your face.

“Carry my best wishes to your mother,” he added. “I trust my remedy will do her some good. It appears I will not be able to speak to her myself, as it seems you have another guest approaching, but if at least you can tell her I came by, that will have to suffice.”

“Another...?” Ketsui stared, and Tenichi frowned.

“It’s only Kirio coming back with Mother’s proper medicine,” he said frankly. “She’s a trusted friend, Keitarou-dono, and no reason for you to curtail the length of your visit.”

“Kirio... huh?” A faint, fleeting recollection seemed to cross Keitarou’s features, and he smiled, shaking his head. “No. I have outstayed my welcome. I am glad to have seen you both again, though... very glad. I hope... that it won’t be the last time we meet. I feel there is still something this scattered, trampled family can do to change this world, if we so choose.”

With that he was gone, slipping into a shunpo step so swift and exact that Ketsui’s raw skills had trouble processing the speed of his action. For a moment there was silence, then Tenichi sighed.

“Do you think that was really... true?” Ketsui murmured, and Tenichi nodded.

“About Father? Yes. Mother’s never told us, but yes. That was Keitarou-dono, Ketsui. For certain, it was. And as he spoke to us about Father... it was in his eyes. What Keitarou-dono said... about Father’s death... was true.”

“Then...” Ketsui bit his lip. “Father was killed and Keitarou-dono’s been living as he has since then because he avenged that death?”

“A lot of death and devastation happened then, and since,” Tenichi spoke quietly. “Right now, don’t think about it too much. We don’t have anything to back up what he told us except the word of an outlaw. When Mother wakes... we’ll talk to her too, and find out what she knew about any of this. And then... when I go back to Seireitei, maybe I’ll speak to Taichou... since Keitarou-dono talked about him too, and...”

“No..I don’t think we should,” Ketsui shook his head hastily. “Keitarou-dono is our kinsman, and for our sakes and Mother’s we can’t draw attention to him so easily. If any of this is false, or if they think we’re protecting a felon — we shouldn’t do anything, Tenichi. The past is the past. The future is what he said — ours to create. We’re shinigami — you’re in a squad, I’m in training. That’s what we both decided to do with our lives, so that’s what we should focus on now.”

Tenichi was silent for a moment, then,

“I wonder if that’s true,” he murmured softly. “I really wonder if it is.”

With that he turned on his heel, heading back down the narrow, low-ceilinged hallway to their mother’s sick room.

Ketsui remained behind, a faint sense of unease in the pit of his stomach.

Like a ghost had reared up from the grave and had touched his skin, he felt certain that Keitarou’s appearance had not been by chance. Had he made a promise to Daisuke to come here? Did he want something more from them than just to see their faces? It had sounded as though he wanted to lure them to his cause — but was there even a cause any more?

Keitarou-dono probably did avenge father’s murder. Father probably was murdered by the Endou because even I remember that the Endou mistreated the Urahara exiles.

He reached up to touch his fair hair.

This made me a target for people until we came here, so I wouldn’t ever forget that that was the case. That side of it... probably is true. And yet...

He sighed.

Father sent us away. Mother brought us here so we could live in freedom — even if we were poor. We have. We did. And now we have a future. I can learn to be a shinigami without fear of my family’s past turning folk against me. Father wanted us to be that way — I’m sure he did. Whatever he intended to do — or died doing — he sent us away so we wouldn’t be tainted by it. Surely... that’s the reason. Surely... he’d want us to look forward, not back?

“Why the troubled face, Ketsui-kun?” Kirio’s voice startled him and he turned, offering her a pensive glance.

“Is Irie-san all right?” Kirio’s green eyes were full of concern, and he forced himself to smile, nodding his head.

“We had an unexpected visitor, but they’ve gone now,” he said quietly, sliding the vial of unknown medicine deep into the sleeve of his white hakamashita. “Mother’s still sleeping — you’re back in plenty of time.”

“People in the village were talking about a stranger,” Kirio’s gaze burned with curiosity. “Was that the visitor? Was it someone you know?”

“I don’t really know the answer to that,” Ketsui admitted, “so let’s not talk about it any more. For the time being, Mother is our main concern... and right now, that’s all I want to think of.”

2. Inner Seireitei

Chapter One: Inner Seireitei

“From behind!”

The yell cut through the smoky haze of the burning village, followed by a sweep of a silver blade as it cleaved the smouldering beam in two. Immediately beneath it, the children screamed and huddled together in their terror as a huge shadow loomed out of the thick air, one hand clutched around the sword’s hilt whilst the other reached up above them, meaty fingers clamping themselves around the wood and throwing it bodily out of the way. Sky and air swirled overhead as suddenly there was nothing between the children and the clouds, and the monster bore down on them, sheathing his weapon and gathering the youngsters up in his arms as though they were little more than kittens who had been trapped inside an old log.

“Kayashima!” he roared, somehow managing to sound deafening despite the persistent crackle of the flames and the thundering, echoing cry of the creature who had thrown this place into such disarray. “Kayashima, dammit, where are you?”

“Here, Fukutaichou!” A young shinigami of no more than twenty one appeared suddenly at his right hand, his skin darkened by soot and ash and his face smeared with tears from where the fire had caused his eyes to sting and water. He made no complaint, however, and at the sight of him, the broad, bulky individual thrust the terrified children his way.

“Take these two and get them to safety. Find their mother, if you can — there’s nobody else in this house and it’s going to come down anyhow.”

“Yes, sir!” The youngster did not hesitate, taking charge of the two little ones and disappearing with them into shunpo as he took them across to safety. The tall man sighed, getting to his feet and stifling a cough as the air around him became once more heavy and thick with the acrid blackness of burning wood.

Above it all was the eerie shriek of the Hollow — the reason behind the village’s destruction.

He stepped back out into the main street, his fingers closing once more around the hilt of his zanpakutou as he regarded the scene. He had brought four officers with him — Kayashima, the youngster, who his Captain had insisted on sending to give him true experience out in the field. He was better off seeing to the salvaged residents for the time being, the Vice Captain decided — no sense in putting him in unnecessary danger when there were three others of better experience ready and willing to fight.

The other two officers were engaging the beast now — the slight, yet determined form of Sixth Seat Hikifune Kirio on the left, and the fair haired ragamuffin that was Tenth Seat Kotetsu Ketsui on the right. As the Vice Captain gazed up at the monster he pursed his lips, drawing his own zanpakutou from his sheath but making no attempt to enter the fray.

Let them do it, if they can, Enishi.

His Captain's words echoed once more in his head.

This Hollow is of a high level — a tricky creature with the ability to fire cero, even if not at a very high strength. Certainly there will be danger and devastation to the people in the immediate vicinity. I want to make sure nobody in that village dies — so if need be, let Kirio and Ketsui handle taking down the beast.

“What if they can't handle it?” Enishi had asked, consternation in his eyes, and the Captain had smiled, shaking his head slightly.

“Then you'll be there, as Vice Captain, to make sure that they come home safely too,” he had said said pragmatically. “I have ultimate faith in all of you — save the villagers, take out the Hollow and come back in one piece. If I didn't believe in you, I wouldn't send you — so believe in them too. If you don't, how will they move forward? If nobody had believed in us, we wouldn't be where we are now.”

Enishi reflected on the words once again, a smile touching his own lips.

It was just like him, he mused ruefully, to think that way and have no doubts in the orders he was giving. That was the kind of Captain he was... the kind of Captain Enishi had wanted more than any other to serve.

His gaze flitted briefly around the now abandoned centre of the village, making sure that they had managed to extract the last of the residents safely. Some had suffered bruises and cuts, many had become dizzy from smoke and fear yet Enishi had been thorough and though their homes were in disarray, their lives had all been saved. There would doubtless be some form of support or compensation paid them to help them rebuild — Enishi knew from past experience that every time his squad had been deployed to help a village like this one, an appeal claim had been sent in the very next day. His Captain had the highest percentage of support claims paid out in the whole of the Gotei — Enishi had long since decided that this was because those processing such things had found it easier to agree with the demands than to try and fight them.

That was Ukitake Juushirou's talent as Captain of the Thirteenth Division.

He did not generally take 'no' for an answer, especially when it was to do with the safety and survival of people from the Districts.

A whoop from the battleground ahead made him glance up suddenly, just in time to see Kirio's zanpakuto shear neatly through the hollow's white mask. As it screamed and glittered in its dying throes, Ketsui surged forward, slashing and chopping at its legs to prevent its sharp claws from spasming up towards the girl's unprotected lower body. They worked well as a team, Enishi reflected, as he watched the beast shimmer and dissipate into fragments of shadowy light. That was another of the ethics Ukitake-taichou had carved into the foundations of Thirteenth Division, though. If you weren't willing to work as a team, you might as well not be a part of the division at all.

"We got him!" Ketsui let out another yell, raising his hand in a high five which Kirio laughingly met, leaping nimbly over the still smouldering ruins of a nearby hut to slap her palm against his.

"We did," she agreed, landing gracefully on the blackened ground. "Well, Fukutaichou? What did you think of our team play?"

"I think that Ukitake-taichou will be happy to have you back in one piece," Enishi grinned. "Good work, you two. Kayashima and I were able to get all of the villagers to safety and he's watching over them a safe distance away — downwind from the fire."

He gazed around him, then,

"Though there's not much fire left now, since there's nothing much remaining that can burn," he said regretfully. "This wasn't a powerful Hollow in terms of its attack potential, but it still did enough damage here, that's for sure. Before we go back, we ought to at least see that a temporary shelter is erected for those who have nowhere else to go. When we've done that, we'll head back and report — but Ukitake-taichou will simply send us out again if we don't do it right away."

“I would have wanted to anyhow,” Ketsui’s expression became serious and he shrugged his shoulders. “This village isn’t that different from the one we used to live in before my mother died — and before that, when we were refugees... things were much harder. To lose everything is devastating, even if you keep your life — so if we can help them, I think we should.”

“I agree with Ketsui,” Kirio nodded. “There’s water flowing near here — a river or a spring or some such thing. If I can find the exact location, I can send a Hell Butterfly back to get people to help bring water, and we can see to sending out food provisions when we return to Inner Seireitei. Knowing Taichou, he’s probably already thought about that in advance and we won’t have to wait long for that to be deployed.”

“Yes, true,” Enishi agreed. “All right. You do that — and Ketsui, you come with me. There were frightened children among the hurt — you’ve been one of them, so you’ll probably understand their feelings better than I’m able, no matter how hard I try. We’ll try and construct some kind of makeshift shelter for the meantime — at least it isn’t the dead of winter, so hopefully nobody will freeze.”

“The Hollow is gone, though, at least,” Ketsui said softly. “That’s the main thing. That’s why we came here — they won’t be in immediate danger of their lives now.”

“No,” Enishi nodded, “but it bothers me too, you know. Even as a Clansman, I don’t like to see it — folk thrown out of their homes and into chaos because of those creatures and their rampaging. If we could rid Soul Society of them altogether it would be a good thing — but we’d need a hell of a lot more shinigami than we have now to manage that and think about cleansing the Real World fully.”

“If they stopped killing each other over petty trifles in the Real World, we wouldn’t have such a problem with Hollows,” Kirio muttered. “At least, that’s what I’ve heard said. Apparently people in the Real World are always having fights and battles and killing one another over land. Because of that, people die and their dissatisfied souls become Hollows. It’s a vicious cycle.”

“No different from this world, then,” Ketsui said pragmatically. “Maybe we should stop fighting and killing each other over here, because then the Real World would have no souls to be reborn from and they’d have to stop their wars.”

Enishi laughed.

“That sounds like the Captain’s logic, but it’s true enough,” he agreed. “Though Seireitei’s been nice and quiet for a couple of decades together, there’s really no perfect world without fighting, Hikifune. If there was, we’d none of us be needed, would we? But as it is, we are, and so we should attend our duties and go back to report. I don’t suppose we have time to hang about for long periods discussing things like this — probably as soon as we return there’ll be another assignment.”

“Taichou was going to speak to the Captains this morning, wasn’t he?” As Kirio darted off down towards the river, Ketsui fell into step with his superior officer, sending him a quizzical glance. “He said something about needing to look more into the current wave of Hollow appearances in this part of Seireitei and the way in which squads are handling the problem. He looked concerned about it — does that mean that it’s unusual for there to be so many Hollows gathered in this region?”

“Mm. Something like that,” Enishi agreed. “This is Kyouraku land — District Eight — traditionally a very quiet area for Hollow activity. When Thirteenth first came into being and we spent most of our time stalking around Seventh, well, that was different. There was so much violence there that there were Hollows coming out of every orifice, and we had our work cut out for us in more ways than one. This is different, though — and made worse by the fact Seireitei passed the law to remove limits on where each division could patrol. We were drafted in here because everyone else was already flat out with other incidents, if I understand it right. Whichever the case is, anyhow, Taichou said he wanted to speak to the Captains about how things were going down. He’s got some concerns, and you know he’ll not sit back until he’s addressed them with someone in a position of higher authority.”

He sighed, shrugging his shoulders,

“Tisn’t like there aren’t grounds for concern, though,” he admitted. “Although there always have been Hollows in Seireitei, I’ve not known it to be so widespread as this. Even when the Taichou and I were students in District One, the Hollows we encountered were only occasional ones. Now I think of it, though, there have been a lot of Hollow incidents in the last year or so, all over Soul Society. All of them a little unusual — all of them capable of Cero and yet none of them particularly distinctive in terms of reiatsu, making it hard to know where they’re going to hit until they do.”

He rubbed his brow thoughtfully.

“I’m repeating what the Taichou said, but it stuck with me all the same. Apparently, unlike most Hollows, they don't seem to attack with the intention of targeting those with highest reiatsu. It's all beyond me a little, this science stuff — but I doknow that Hollows take down the ones with the highest spirit power and consume them to fuel their own energy. Yet this hasn't happened in any of the recent cases. The Hollows have simply attacked to cause chaos and fear among the populace — if Hollows can think enough to make a decision like that. Not one villager has been killed by a Hollow since it began — but countless villages have been destroyed and people have died in the resulting devastation.”

“I heard from my brother that one of the recruits in Seventh Division lost his life in one of those battles, too,” Ketsui looked grave. “He took it pretty hard, since it was one of the juniors he was supervising himself. There was nothing to be done about it, though, and the order came through too late for reinforcements to be on scene right away. Ten-nii said that the Hollow tossed the kid up like a rag doll with his claws, but then discarded him and didn't even try to consume his spirit power. It was as though the creature didn't care that he was a shinigami. It just wanted to kill something, so it killed.”

“I've heard similar things too,” Enishi sighed, “and I'm not happy with it, because it makes the Gotei look like they can't cope. People get scared if they think the shinigami can't keep the Hollows at bay, so I'm glad we've managed to get rid of this one today. Doubtless more will surface, but a mission completed with no lives lost is always a bonus and a victory for any officer, whatever his rank.”

“That's why we become Shinigami, isn't it?” Ketsui's eyes were suddenly thoughtful, and Enishi nodded.

“To defend the people who can't defend themselves. To give them a way to fight back,” he agreed. “S'why I did it, I suppose — though I can't say I'd thought much on the subject when I first joined the Academy. That place focuses you — teaches you stuff beyond the skills of a fighter. I realised by the time I graduated that I didn't care what rank I held or which squad I belonged to, but that I wanted to use whatever skills I had to protect the people who weren't strong like me.”

“Mm,” Ketsui pursed his lips. “I think... that's how I feel too. And that I want to give back to Soul Society as well. Since my kinsfolk...”

He trailed off, and Enishi sighed.

“Taichou told you about that,” he said reprovingly. “He told you and he told Tenichi both the same when you recruited with the Thirteenth, and the secret's stayed with us, except for young Kirio, of course. Ukitake... uh... Taichou believes the sins of the past aren't visited on the future, and so do I. You're both your own shinigami — your decisions are yours and that's all you need to take responsibility for. You're a fine shinigami — hell, Tenichi's one as well. I was sorry to see him go to Seventh, even if they did need his sword skills there more than we needed them at the time. You're both great examples of what the Academy is about — so you shouldn't dwell on the past. Nobody's passing judgement on you for things you had nothing to do with, and even if everyone did know about it, I doubt anyone would care. Nobody looks at the Urahara with suspicion, do they? There's no reason for them to do so with you, either."

"I know," Ketsui's expression cleared slightly and he smiled. "I like Thirteenth, because you and the Captain think like that. Ten-nii had his own reasons for going to Seventh, so he moved — but I think I'd be happy fighting in this squad until I died, to be honest. I don't ever feel, when I'm deployed by Thirteenth, that I'm anything but Kotetsu Ketsui, Tenth Seated Officer of this squad. I like it that way, and I don't mind if my rank isn't as lofty as Ten-nii might one day reach. When Mother died, I kind of promised myself to put the past in the past and live for the future she and Father worked hard to give us. They wanted us to be free and alive and because of them I am. So that I've had the chances I have... I'm glad, Fukutaichou. I didn't mean it to sound otherwise. Just when there are other people suffering, I want to do more to help them. And so I'll keep working hard."

"That's no bad thing," Enishi assured him as they reached the edge of the clearing where Kayashima and the huddled, grimy villagers were awaiting them. "It keeps your blade sharp, if you work hard for what you believe in. Tenichi's doing it too, even in a different squad — when he left, he said he had things he believed in doing and wanted to achieve them as quickly as possible. You both have learnt from that past and used it to move forwards — nobody can complain about that."

"Fukutaichou! Ketsui-san!" At the sight of them Kayashima got to his feet, relief in his expression as he greeted them. "Is the Hollow gone? I thought I sensed it, but..."

"Kirio-nee and I sliced it into bits," Ketsui nodded. "What about the villagers? Are any of them in need of Fourth Squad?"

"Mm... no serious injuries," Kayashima shook his head. "Just... most of them are scared and upset and don't know what will happen to them now. It's hard to get them to talk, and they flinch away from me when I come near them, as though they think I'm going to hurt them somehow."

"I can understand their confusion," Ketsui said gravely, and Enishi cast a glance around the assembled group, noting the wary, fearful expressions in the eyes of many of the people. They truly had lost everything — perhaps even hope, and his heart tweaked slightly as he strode towards them.

Despite his gorilla-like size and his imposing presence, Enishi was known among the Gotei for his big-heartedness and his warm, friendly compassion. Although the villagers shrank back slightly at his approach, as he paused in the centre one of the young children he had saved from the fire darted forwards, reaching across to grab the leg of his hakamain thick, sooty fingers.

"Thank you for saving me, ojisan," she said, in a piping, reedy voice, and Enishi grinned at her gesture, bending down to ruffle her hair playfully. She was no taller than his knee, for Enishi stood at well over six feet and the child was probably no older than three, yet she beamed, looking up at him with hopeful, eager eyes.

"That's what we came here to do," he told her gently, "and we've got rid of the Hollow, so you needn't be afraid. But right now, your village is in a mess, so one of my officers has gone to arrange for water to be brought here, and the rest of us will try and build a temporary shelter for you until proper aid can come. We'll return and report as quickly as we can — you won't be forgotten about, and we will make sure nobody goes hungry. For now, though, just sit tight. We'll do what we can and then send further help."

"At least it doesn't look like it's about to rain," Ketsui offered the gathered people a smile. "We should be able to find dry materials with which to build something before it does."

"You have some ideas on doing that, Ketsui-san?" Kayashima stared at him in surprise, and Ketsui nodded.

"I come from a village just like the one that burnt down," he agreed, "and before that, my brother, mother and I spent a lot of time travelling and making do as we went along. Even as a kid I got quite good at pulling tree branches together and making makeshift rain-shelters so we didn't end up with pneumonia."

"You're not from one of the Clans?" Now an older man stepped forward, his beard grizzled and grey yet not quite snowy with age and wear. He was clearly a figure of some seniority in the village, for all eyes shifted to him as he spoke, a sudden sense of expectation in their gazes. Ketsui hesitated for a moment, unsure how to answer, and Enishi clapped a heavy paw down on his shoulder.

“Ketsui understands far better than me what it’s like to be robbed of your homes and your security,” he said gravely. “There’s no need to fear him — or any of us — because we were sent to help you and help you we will.”

“But... shinigami...” The man faltered, and Kayashima frowned.

“Shinigami aren’t something to be scared of,” he snapped. “We’re the ones who just saved you from the Hollow, in case you didn’t notice — we’re the good guys!”

Ketsui shook his head.

“No, it’s perfectly natural to be afraid of them. Of us,” he corrected. “We’re strong, we fight with unknown magics and we carry swords that are by nature weapons intended for killing. It’s a survival skill to fear anyone in that position — but Fukutaichou is right,”

He turned his attention to the wary villagers.

“We came here as members of Thirteenth Squad and we came to help you. Please don’t be scared of us. We don’t mean you any harm.”

“Since we just risked our lives taking out that monster for them, I’m surprised they’d think otherwise,” Kayashima muttered, clearly put out.

“But the Hollow destroyed their village first, and we didn’t manage to prevent that,” Ketsui said reasonably. “These people have lost pretty much everything in a short space of time, and it’s natural for them to be unsettled about it. We have warm barracks to go back to, but these people don’t even know where they’ll sleep tonight, because we couldn’t stop the Hollow setting their village alight.”

The village elder shuffled forward, bowing his head slightly in Ketsui’s direction at these words.

“We’re sorry to doubt so easily,” He murmured, “but you see, we’ve heard... several stories in recent weeks about shinigami who have killed Hollows yet left the village-folk stranded — or in one or two cases, simply told them to get out of the way or they’ll be cut down too. Those kinds of things come to our ears from fleeing refugees hunting for shelter among us — therefore when the Hollow came here too...”

“Shinigami who said those things?” Kayashima looked startled. “Fukutaichou, is that...?”

“Nobody in the Gotei with any pride or respect in his rank would hold that attitude,” anger sparked in Enishi’s usually kind dark eyes.

“I heard it said myself, though,” A young woman disentangled herself from the crowd, pulling her tattered cloak more tightly around her body as if making a defence against the Shinigami’s indignation and as she did so, the young girl ran towards her, reaching grimy fingers up to grab hold of the woman’s hand. “I came from one of those villages where several of us were robbed of our homes by one of those monsters. Shinigami appeared and slew the beast — but they hounded us at the same time, and some of us were beaten for getting in their way. They were dressed as you are — in the robes of a shinigami of the Gotei. It is not a rumour. It is truth.”

Enishi groaned.

“You’d think in this day and age, with so many District shinigami among the squads, that hit and run attitude would be a thing of the past,” he said wearily, addressing the village elder with an apologetic look. “I can’t explain or justify those things, but I can promise you nobody from my division would ever treat anyone in that way, no matter how urgent the situation. Taichou wouldn’t stand for it. He’d whip the shihakushou off our back with his bare swords if he thought we conducted ourselves like that out in the field. Hell, I’d do it myself, if it comes to that.”

“Whichever squad it was should be ashamed of themselves,” Ketsui said frankly, “but Fukutaichou is right. Our Captain was born in the Districts, just like me and just like you. He cares more than anyone in the Gotei about helping the people unsettled by Hollows, and he definitely does the most he can to resolve things for them after the Hollow is defeated. Most of the members in our Division were born in the Districts, and even those who weren’t, like Houjou-fukutaichou, believe in protecting District people.”

“We’d do better by proving that with actions, rather than words,” Enishi decided. “For now, setting up shelter is our first priority. We’re few in number this time round, so if any villagers who can help out do so, we’ll be done twice as quickly. Ketsui, I’m putting you in charge of organisation — Kayashima, you’ll be responsible for helping to gather any materials together. When Kirio gets back to us, she can oversee the operation, as the highest ranking officer here.”

“What about you, Fukutaichou?” Kayashima asked curiously, and Enishi frowned.

“I’m going to send my own Hell Butterfly back to Soul Society,” he said frankly. “Based on what that girl just said, I’ve some choice words to send back to base, and several of them shouldn’t be voiced in front of women and children.”

He clapped the young recruit on the back.

“I’ll be back as soon as I can,” he promised, “You get started and I’ll haul in to help when I’ve let base know exactly what these people need.”

“My officers have returned from four more dispatches bearing the same report from the field. The Hollows have been defeated, homes and livelihoods have been destroyed and members of our Gotei squads are not doing their Seireitei-sworn duty in making sure those left behind are adequately provided for! The nights can still be cold, and there are exposed areas in some of those valleys, yet time and time again we hear the same thing filtered down to our officers. Shinigami come, kill the Hollows — sometimes they cause greater devastation themselves than the Hollows do, releasing their swords in a combat situation where such a move is clearly ludicrous — then they leave, abandoning the residents to their fate.

“If it was just once or twice, then maybe it could be seen as an accidental oversight, but with Hollow incidents increasing, more and more people look likely to be cast out with no shelter or support after suffering one of these raids. Maybe we’re still limited in numbers given the wide area of land we’re covering, but this is not what the divisions were set up to do! If we aren’t going to take care of the people we’re here to protect, why are we here in the first place?”

“A lot of us could ask you that question on a very direct and personal level, Ukitake,”

His neighbouring officer snorted, sending the speaker a derisive glance. “I don’t recall the members of this Gotei voting on appointing District riffraff to lead in the Divisions, let alone treat us to a diatribe that really has very little bearing on our jobs at all. If you want to patch up peasant homes, be my guest. Doubtless they’re all like kin to you anyway. I entreat you, however, to re-read the terms by which we all accept the haori. We are here to protect the balance of Seireitei by destroying Hollows. At no point did any one of us take an oath to scabble around in the dust building makeshift shelters for common folk as I've heard members of the Thirteenth Squad are wont sometimes to do."

"The Districts are a permanent part of the Gotei now," a tall, dark haired lady whose haori was marked with a bold character 'four' put in quietly, her eyes conveying a firmness that her gentle tones belied. "We are much indebted to them, in fact, for providing us with such a wide pool of talent from which to select our officers."

"I didn't say a thing about that, either, Unohana-taichou," the original protester insisted. "I'm simply pointing out to Ukitake that there are things which are expected of Gotei officers and things which are not. He obviously has personal connections to these... whatever you want to call them, but the fact of the matter is that Thirteenth Division are squandering valuable Gotei resources on rehousing these individuals. Should we really be responsible for compensating peasants whose lives we've saved? Without our intervention, they would be dead — isn't their survival recompense enough in such a situation?"

"I have no particular personal connection to any District families in District Eight," Ukitake Juushirou spoke stiffly, his words calm yet his eyes flashing with indignant pride at the fake courtesy in his colleague's tones. "I think, however, there are duties which are written into our agreements with the Council and ones which are simply common sense. The Eleventh Division Captain has clearly mistaken the two — either that or he is entirely lacking in compassion."

"Compassion?" The Eleventh Division Captain clicked his tongue disparagingly against the roof of his mouth. "What are we, missionaries or soldiers, for heaven's sake?"

"Fourth Division consider themselves both, Minachi-dono," Unohana Retsu spoke in soft, even tones, but the warning in her words was more than clear. "Besides, I don't believe that to be the material point here. Ukitake-dono has rightly raised a concern which I in turn share. I believe there is a significant disparity between how squads are acting when in the field and it is right that we discuss it further."

"It might help, Unohana-taichou, if we had a full complement of Captains with whom to discuss it."

As a dark glower crossed Minachi Atsushi's features, the room's final inhabitant raised his hand, offering his companions a lazy smile. "This isn't much of a Captain's meeting when most of the Captains have played hooky — do you think maybe we ought to continue this debate when there are more people present and correct?"

"That can't be helped, Kyouraku-dono," Retsu sighed, spreading her hands helplessly. "The Council of Elders are also meeting today, and therefore many of the central Gotei members are tied up with that. I alone abstained because I felt that Ukitake-dono's submission ought to be heard and minuted by one of us, but there was really no way to ask my colleagues to do the same. Today they are reviewing the progress of a particular project, and as it is I have had to send a trusted kinsman in my place."

"Even if that's so, we're still missing the Captains from Ninth and Twelfth," Juushirou reflected with a sigh, "as well as the Tenth. Hakubei-dono is still patrolling on the far borders of Third District at the moment, so I didn't expect him to be back in time, but in terms of the others... I suppose not everyone thinks there's much value in protecting District livelihoods. Still... a Captain's meeting is..."

"A Captain's meeting summoned on the request of a District Shinigami is unlikely to inspire high attendance," Atsushi said crushingly.

"And yet you're here, Atsushi-dono," Kyouraku Shunsui reflected lightly, reaching across to pat his comrade on the shoulder. "In the circumstances, I feel I ought to commend you for making such a sacrifice of time. Unless, of course, you merely came to try and belittle J... Ukitake's submission. I can't imagine that the Captain of a division such as Eleventh would do such a cheap thing, however, so I really think we ought to applaud you."

"Kyouraku..." Atsushi's eyes narrowed, and Shunsui shot him a benign smile.

"In the meantime, the issue remains," he added evenly. "It won't have escaped anyone's notice that Eighth District is still Kyouraku land, and my brother has also heard rumours of this haphazard style of dealing with battle aftermath. This isn't a new thing, of course, but it's become all the worse since squads stopped being associated only with the Clan land from which most of the members came. I don't say I agree with the old system — divisions have been far too partisan for a long time, and I was as much in favour of that as anyone when the Council first started mooting the idea of a more varied jurisdiction. Trouble is, though, some shinigami just don't care. And, if they don't care, well, things like this happen."

He gestured to Juushirou, who nodded his head with a sigh.

"I didn't know there was a meeting of the Council today," he admitted, “and I’m sorry for my timing as a result. I was just so cross when I received Enishi’s report, and I wanted something done about it as soon as possible. I realise that maybe demanding things of Captains is not my place — I’m not a member of the Council of Elders, and I can’t give orders to those who hold the same or higher rank as I do. I just don’t like hearing about ravaged villages and decimated crops. With Seireitei spending so much time and effort focusing on improving Rukongai, it seems a shame that we can’t do the same thing here, right in front of our noses.”

“Kyouraku-dono’s points are all valid ones,” she acknowledged. “I will take this forward to the Council and see whether or not they can hand down some kind of directive to shinigami as to what provision they should or should not be making. It will be difficult, however. I fear that there will be support and opposition at that level, just as there is at this. Finances are somewhat stretched in certain areas, and, well, the Spiritless Zone is taking up a good amount of Council expenditure at the current time.”

“The Spiritless Zone,” Shunsui’s eyes became thoughtful, and he nodded his head. “That’s what the Council are meeting about today, isn’t it? My brother mentioned something...”

“Council matters shouldn’t be discussed so openly at Captain’s meetings, Kyouraku-dono,” Retsu said reprovingly. “For the time being, we should return our attentions to Ukitake-dono’s submission. The matter of shinigami conduct in the Districts, and what should be done about it. Aside from my taking it forth to the Council, I’m not sure if...”

“Sorry I’m late!”

Before Retsu could finish her sentence, the door burst open, and a figure stumbled in, an anxious glitter in her pale eyes as she gaze around at the half-empty room. Her hair, a bright yellow blond was sticking out around her head like a halo, and black smudges across her face and hands indicated that she had most likely been working with something explosive — possibly even highly dangerous. Her haori, once pristine white was now a murky grey colour, charcoal singed around the edges and with a rent through the back that left a large strip of fabric trailing behind her folornly in the dust. This was Sekime Mareiko, Twelfth Division’s Captain — though a less likely looking candidate for Captancy of anything could not possibly have presented itself. Mareiko was both extremely gifted and extremely scatterbrained — a combination which caused Shunsui no end of amusement whenever the two should meet.

“Did I miss the meeting? Is everyone gone? I was working on something and lost track of time. If Aoi hadn’t knocked on my door, I swear, I would’ve never realise what the time was!”

“...Sekime-dono,” Atsushi’s brows twitched together in disbelief, “what on earth happened to your haori? This might be a meeting summoned by a District pedant, but even given that that’s the case...”

“My haori?”

The young woman’s eyes widened and she turned, spinning around on the spot as though trying to view the back of her tattered white robe. “What about it? Is there something stuck on it? Atsushi-kun, could you help me get it off? I’m sure I can’t reach if there is, but I don’t see... ah!”

As she turned, her foot caught in the torn piece of fabric that hung loose from the white coat, and she almost tumbled headlong.

“Woah there, girl,” Shunsui was the first to react, catching her deftly and righting her on her feet. “What Atsushi-dono means is that your haori looks a little, erm, less white today than it usually does. Your work before the meeting — might it have something to do with kidou testing?”

“Thank you, Kyouraku-dono,” The Twelfth Captain shot him an embarrassed smile, reaching up to tuck a wisp of scarecrow blond hair behind her ear. “You’re very on the ball today. It was exactly that. How did you know?”

“Just a hunch from your choice of meeting apparel,” Shunsui told her playfully. “I thought for a moment you might be following my example and flouting the rules of Gotei convention by wearing a haori in a different shade to a Captain’s meeting — but then I remembered the huge mound of books that I almost tripped over the last time I came to your barracks, and put two and two together.”

“It’s really all very exciting,” the girl’s cheeks flushed with pleasure, her eyes shining at the memory of her research. “I’m beginning to find that combining two Kidou spells into one and then controlling reiatsu to a particular level gives a user...”

“Sekime-dono, this is a Captain’s meeting,” Retsu interjected quietly. “Whilst your Kidou research is extremely valuable and of great interest to each and every one of us, for the time being we have another issue on the agenda. I wonder if you might be able to put your work aside for a brief instant?”

“Oh! Yes, yes of course,” hastily Mareiko smoothed down her wild hair, having very little effect on the overall haystack, nodding her head eagerly. “I’m sorry to have interrupted, Unohana-taichou.”

“We were trying to resolve what to do about squads who don’t make provision for people they’ve unhoused,” Juushirou explained briefly. “I see it as a problem, Minachi-dono doesn’t believe it is, and Unohana-taichou was offering to take it before the Council. I’m not sure that’s a solution, though. The Council of Elders is a different entity from the Gotei in a lot of respects. Even though many of our Captains serve on both, a matter such as this one ought to be settled by the Gotei, surely? If we can’t do even that by ourselves, we’re very useless beings indeed.”

“No comment,” Atsushi muttered, and Shunsui grimaced in the Eleventh Captain’s direction.

“For my part, I don’t suppose Eighth squad have been derelicting in that regard,” he said pensively. “Sora-chan is quite quick off the mark with everything like that. I daresay she’s not as efficient as yours seem to be, J... Ukitake, but nonetheless, I’m fairly sure some of the big pile of paperwork she had me sign last night was to do with things of this nature. You can take it as read that mine’s a vote to make sure all squads do the same. It can be a bare minimum, but even if Council funds are tight at the moment, the Gotei’s coffers aren’t so shabby. We’re most of us from Clan backgrounds and there’s a considerable amount of private wealth invested in individual squads. If Thirteenth can get away with so many petitions for relocation or rebuilding, there’s no excuse for the others to fall behind. Besides, fostering good relationships with the District people is good PR. It doesn’t do to tick off a social class of people who outnumber you. First rule of basic survival, Atsushi-kun — there’s strength in numbers.”

“Strength and numbers are not the same,” Atsushi said archly, shaking his head. “There are a lot of them, I’ll grant you, but the percentage of them who are of any value or potential threat to the Gotei is minimal. Conversely, you might argue that if we were to provide them with too many handouts, they could become bored and use their free time to generate resistance. If they have to rebuild their farmsteads and rehouse their children, they will be far too occupied to raise any kind of rebellion against the Council or against the Gotei. Idle hands make restless minds — is that not the case?”

His gaze flitted to Mareiko at this juncture, who blinked, apparently missing his implication completely.

“Sekime-dono, what do you think?” Juushirou asked quizzically, and Mareiko frowned, pursing her lips.

“On the contrary, I think it is?” The vague look had gone from the young woman’s eyes at Atsushi’s comment, and she shook her head. “No, it must be. We’re here to purify Hollows. If we get to them too late to stop them destroying things then we are responsible, aren’t we? Our job is to purify them — if we’re tardy, then well, of course the fault is with us.”

“I give up,” Atsushi groaned. “I came here today because I hoped I’d get a sensible perspective on a ridiculous request, but instead I have the Gotei’s laziest Captain and a scarecrow in a charcoal haori telling me that Ukitake’s ludicrous suggestions have foundation. Unohana-taichou, I realise that Fourth Squad have a particular interest in helping all the less fortunates in this world, but surely you aren’t going to side with them as well?”

“I believe that, for the time being, there has been enough concern raised for us to bring the matter to a full Captain’s meeting,” Retsu said matter-of-factly. “As a representative of the Council of Elders, I will also mention it at that level if we are unable to reach a consensus among Gotei leaders as to what should be done. Ukitake-dono, your plea is noted and will be carried forward. This meeting is dismissed.”

“He really only came to cause an obstruction, didn’t he?”

As they trailed out of the meeting room and onto the streets of Inner Seireitei, Shunsui fell into step with Juushirou, casting him a resigned glance. “There’s no other good reason why Atsushi-kun would’ve chosen to come to a meeting you asked for unless he wanted to push his blade in metaphorically and twist it around a bit. I’m sorry, Juu. You came with a valid point, and his overall attitude sucked.”

“I know, but I’m used to it,” Juushirou ran his fingers through his lank white hair, offering his friend a rueful grin. “He’s hated me since I poached Enishi away from Eleventh as my Vice Captain, and my being District just adds insult to injury. You put him neatly in his place, though, and besides, I got what I wanted. I didn’t expect the idea to be passed through today, with so few Captains present — but I did think I might have a chance of getting it put on a full agenda if I tackled it like this.”

“Meaning that you fibbed. Naughty boy,” Shunsui tut-tutted, arching an eyebrow in his friends direction. “You knew full well the Council were meeting today, didn’t you?”

Juushirou’s grin widened.

“I’m not completely stupid, you know,” he said frankly. “You don’t spend so much time surrounded by duplicitous Clansfolk without learning a native trick or two. Of course I knew. If I’d have made a submission to anyone else at any other time, it would probably have been trampled under other people’s paperwork. Giving it to Unohana-taichou means it will at least get a full airing, and that’s all I wanted. I can take any amount of abuse from Minachi and those like him if the end result is still a more positive one for the District folk in Outer Seireitei.”

“I’m not sure whether I ought to be proud of you or worried that spending so much time in Clan company has made you devious,” Shunsui clapped a warm hand down on his friend’s shoulder, letting out an amused chuckle. “Though in seriousness, I’m glad for the Districts that they have you to speak for them. What Thirteenth Division is doing in Eighth District hasn’t gone unnoticed. Nisama wanted me to thank you for your Division’s efforts — and I’m sure it’s been the same in other places, as well.”

“I try my best, but you have to remember, I have a lot of District members, too,” Juushirou reminded him. “My squad was formed originally as a place for District shinigami to go. Even now, it has the highest quantity of District-born shinigami in all of the Gotei Thirteen. True, your squad took on a few, and there are others scattered here and there, but the bulk of them remain in Thirteenth Division because other squad Captains aren’t sure about dealing with them. Most of the Captains are tolerant of the idea, but not all the Vice Captains are and as for the seated officers...”

“Prejudice is a hard demon to tame,” Shunsui reflected pensively, “but you might be the one who’ll do it, if you keep on at them hard enough. You’re idealistic enough for ten Captains, when you get something fixed in your head.”

“It isn’t just about being idealistic,” Juushirou shook his head, a shadow entering his hazel gaze. “People don’t talk about it any more, but it doesn’t mean that it’s forgotten. I don’t want it remembered, if at all possible... I want to keep Seireitei as peaceful as it’s been in recent years.”

“Pardon me?” Shunsui looked blank, and Juushirou grimaced.

“Keitarou,” he murmured, lowering his voice, and Shunsui’s eyes narrowed.

“Yes,” he agreed grimly. “I was afraid you meant that, only I was hoping you didn’t. I’m sure you’re right — he’s there, watching and waiting for his chance to strike back. It’s been a long time, but I find it hard to believe he’s given up and the longer the lull, the more time he has to prepare a surprise attack. The Clans are foolish if they think the coast is clear and they can ignore the danger. The wider implications of being kind to District people might only be apparent in a time of crisis and it’s a crisis we all want to avert... but it doesn’t hurt to lay reassuring groundwork, just in case.”

“The Council is so focused on the Spiritless Zone that they’ve forgotten about Outer Seireitei,” Shunsui sighed. “We never thought it would be easy, did we, if you were made a Captain in the way you were, but even so, by now I had hoped...”

“Working in Seventh District and dealing with raw abuse on a daily basis was easy in comparison to seeing innocent people bereft of everything and those who could help them standing by and refusing to do so,” Juushirou rubbed his brow absently. “In Seventh, I knew what to expect and I wasn’t afraid to face it. I had Enishi and Hirata to back me up, and Shikibu Naoko as well, of course. Between their Clan influence and my bullheadedness we pulled through and as a result, people like Kotetsu Tenichi are now able to transfer to join Seventh without risk of reprisal, even though he’s born as District as I am. Maybe working there with them gave me a false impression of being able to do the same on a wider scale — but it’s that old lesson again. You can’t change people, not really, and you will never be accepted by everyone you meet.”

“More fool them, then,” Shunsui said categorically. “In any case, this round of the battle was your win. In the next round, you’ll have to be prepared to bring on the big guns if necessary, though — you’ve thought about that, I suppose?”

“I already have the provisional backing of three Captains,” Juushirou said dismissively. “If you include me, that makes four. I need three more and it’s a carried vote. I’m not worried about it, Shunsui. I’ll speak to Shirogane-dono when I have a moment, see if he can mention it to Guren-sama, and I’m pretty sure Hirata will take our part, given the precedent of aid in Seventh. That will leave one more to find, and when Hakubei-dono's back from the Third border, I expect that he'll be it."

"Hrm," Shunsui's eyes became slits. "Do you want me to send Sora to discuss it with him? It might be a quicker persuasion, if it's his sister who's doing the convincing."

"If you don't mind, that would help," Juushirou agreed. "I'd be hopeful of Shihouin Midori siding with us, and I'll send Enishi to speak to his kin in First if I have to, but it doesn't hurt to have all bases covered and I'd rather not get Genryuusai-sensei involved if I can avoid it."

He sighed heavily.

"To be truthful, I originally wanted to address the problem of the Hollows themselves, but there weren't enough people present to make it worthwhile doing," he admitted. "When I realised that, I decided to change my tack and focus on the other matter instead. I'm sure I'm not the only one who's noticed an increase in our workload, though, particularly in the last couple of months. I've not had a chance to be out in the field much myself, so I'm relying on what Enishi or Naoko have told me, but their impressions are that Hollows are appearing more by design than by accident. I realise that sounds at odds with everything we know about Hollows, but the way in which they're attacking..."

He shrugged helplessly.

"Naoko came back to camp yesterday saying that the Hollow they'd taken out had waited for them to appear before launching any major attack on the village," he continued. "She said it was as though they'd been left there as bait to lure out a shinigami squad, and then destroyed the village, so as it looked like the shinigami were to blame. Naoko being Naoko, the Hollow didn't get much chance to think about killing anything, but how she described its behaviour concerned me. Enishi's said similar things about them, too — they act as though they can discriminate what and when they are attacking. I know it sounds insane, and I'm not sure quite how to put that before the rest of the Gotei, but Shunsui, even so..."

"Your Vice Captain and your Third Seat are both people whose opinions I'd trust," Shunsui rubbed his chin ruefully. "Naoko-chan in particular has become a very sharp individual, and that sword of hers may be one of the nastiest in Seireitei, but it's one of the best for picking up spiritual information. No, if that's what they've told you, I'd be inclined to believe it. I see what you mean about the rest of the Captains, though. They might consider it to be excuses by your subordinates if they looked at the information in the wrong way.”

He shrugged.

“I’ve not been in the field either,” he owned, “and for once it hasn’t been because I’m lazy. I’ve been in and out of Inner Seireitei, but not fighting Hollows. My brother wanted my input on something he was taking to Council about the Spiritless Zone, and whenever I’m dragged back home, Haru-kun uses it as an excuse to draw blades and fight with me. He seems to think that if he can beat me he’ll have proven himself as the most powerful member of the Kyouraku... and being that he’s heir to the Clan, it’s not really in my power to refuse him.”

“His spirit power is still unsettled, I take it?” Juushirou paused, eying his friend keenly, and Shunsui nodded.

“Yeah. Oh, he has it, at least, in part,” he reflected, “but nothing like the level needed to do what we’re doing day after day. He’s quite ticked off about it, I think, deep down — he’s got a layabout Uncle who drinks and sleeps more hours in the day than he trains and yet he still can’t take a sword from me.”

Juushirou chuckled.

“I can understand his frustration,” he teased lightly, “but perhaps it’s no bad thing for Eighth Squad and Eighth District’s leadership to part into two distinct strains. Tokutarou-sama is a statesman but he’s not a shinigami. You, on the other hand...”

“I’m barely either, but I can muddle along with my zanpakutou and flap my haori where need be,” Shunsui agreed good-naturedly. “No, I agree with you. You can absolutely have too many responsibilities... as today’s Captain’s meeting proves.”

“Yes...” Juushirou clicked his tongue against his teeth absently. “I wonder whether that way of running things will be able to last long-term. With squads becoming more demanding, it must be hard to juggle everything.”

“Agreed,” Shunsui inclined his head. “Oh well. For the time being, all we can do is tackle the hurdles right in front of us, and hope for the best. Whether we worry or we don’t, there’s been no activity of any kind from anyone fitting Keitarou’s description, and Hirata has more or less given up on finding his missing sister. Whilst we can’t assume they died, we also can’t waste resources chasing after them when so many District people are suffering and there’s so much work going on in Rukongai.”

“The Spiritless Zone...” Juushirou’s expression became pensive, and Shunsui shot him a grin, patting him reassuringly on the back.

“I’m sure your hime hasn’t forgotten you, even if she is surrounded by desperate plus souls on a daily basis,” he said lightly. “Mitsuki’s not that kind of girl, and I’m sure that no matter how warm and friendly her squad mates are, she won’t stray. You shouldn’t look like that, Juu — in Shinigami years, a little over twenty is nothing.”

“You can say that so easily,” Juushirou grimaced. “I haven’t any idea what she’s facing, out there. It’s cruel, you know, expecting her to be recalled and then discovering her patrol is going to be the one patrol staying in Rukongai to manage the Spiritless Zone because they have the least conflicting reiatsu and therefore are the only safe option. It might be another decade or two now before I get to see Mitsuki again — and even if things have changed between us, I miss having her around. She promised at the very least we’d stay friends, and it’s hard to do that when you can’t even send a message.”

“It’s something else that we can’t do anything about,” Shunsui said gravely. “Listen, Juushirou. I know how you feel — believe me, I do — but the both of you decided on pursuing your individual dreams and it’s what you’ve done. Don’t say you regret it now, do you? Think of all the people you’ve helped since you took the haori. Was that worthless?”

“No, and I still believe I did the right thing. We both did,” Juushirou responded evenly. “It’s just hard when those dreams have to take place in entirely segregated locations. It’s fine, Shunsui. I’m fine. Really. Just all this talk about the Spiritless Zone makes me wonder what’s happening over the Sekkiseki divide. Are they all all right? Are they succeeding? We get such fleeting reports that it’s hard to be sure.”

“The spirit levels in Rukongai have become so dangerous, Plus souls are being contaminated on a daily basis,” Shunsui said grimly. “The Spiritless Zone may not be a permanent solution, nor the most ideal, but if it helps to steady that anomaly, then it’s a good thing. This world isn’t out of danger, balance-wise. Plus souls should not be in such close proximity to marauding Hollows, not to mention spiritual radiation spilling out from our battles here and in the Real World. The seals the Urahara are working on to limit the power of people like us when we cross into the Real World aren't yet perfect, and the Senkaimon are still little more than floodgates when it comes to leaking spiritual energy. If it's true that that pollution is contributing to the number of Hollow transformations among Plus souls, then drastic action was necessary. Mitsuki's at the forefront of saving those souls, isn't she?"

"She is." Despite himself, Juushirou smiled. "You're right. I'm just being nostalgic. It'll pass."

He glanced up at the sky.

"It's getting late. I need to get back to Thirteenth's base, and hear Naoko's report."

"Naoko-chan?" Shunsui looked curious, and Juushirou nodded.

"After Enishi and the others destroyed that Hollow yesterday, I sent her out to scout the perimeters of the District to see if she could find where the Hollow had come from," he agreed. "Call me paranoid, but I'm suspicious about this and I can't wait for the Council to order a full investigation, not if it's putting people's lives at risk. Scouting for Hollow activity is within my remit as Captain, so I decided to send Naoko out with Dokusou Houshi to see what she could see. As zanpakutou go, hers is better than a tracker dog for stray reiryoku."

"I see," Shunsui rubbed his chin. "You're going through Council channels, but you're pursuing your own as well?"

"Mm," Juushirou's hazel eyes darkened. "I can't explain it, but I just have a bad feeling about it. All of it... feels wrong somehow. I sent Naoko because of everyone, I thought she would be the best placed to check whether my worst suspicions have any basis."

"Keitarou, you mean?" Shunsui frowned, and Juushirou nodded.

"Naoko and I have both been manipulated by him and his sword, and we're both very aware therefore of what Chudokuga's reiryoku feels like," he said softly. "I'm not sure if that sword can manipulate Hollows like it can shinigami, but even as an outside chance, it's something worth looking into. Keep this to yourself though, Shunsui. I told Naoko to report direct to me about it, and nobody else — I don't want Enishi troubling about this kind of intrigue when he's got so much on his plate with training and leading clean-up missions. His skills are better put to helping the District people — but Naoko doesn't let go of something once she has a hold on it, and I trust that sense of hers in a situation like this."

Shunsui eyed him for a moment, then he nodded his head.

"I'll come with you, if I may," he said frankly. "I'd like to hear Naoko-chan's report too, if you don't mind."

"If you like," Juushirou agreed, a flicker of relief in his hazel gaze. "It might be good having your take on it, too."

"I see," Shunsui looked pensive. "This isn't a first mission, is it? What you said about the Hollows and Enishi and Naoko's reports... you've been keeping track of this for some time, haven't you?"

"A while," Juushirou acknowledged, his cheeks reddening sheepishly. "I didn't want to worry you by telling you I was looking for Keitarou, but I think it's something I need to fully rule out before I'm satisfied. It's perfectly possible that the increase in Hollows and their activity might be explained away by something else, but..."

"You needn't say anything else," Shunsui said grimly. "I'll come with you to Thirteenth, you can feed me, and I'll hear Naoko-chan's report with you. I don't promise I can add anything, but it might give me things to think about."

"Taichou!"

As the two men approached the Thirteenth Division's barracks, a young woman hurried up to them, her tail of thick auburn hair pulled back from her face by a white ribbon and her attire the simple black and white of an on duty shinigami. She paused a foot or two away from the pair, briskly bowing her head towards Juushirou before raising her gaze quizzically to Shunsui's. "I'm sorry, I thought I was reporting to you alone? Why is Kyouraku-dono here?"

"I invited myself, Naoko-chan," Shunsui offered her a blithe smile, bowing his head playfully towards her. "I missed your pretty smile, so decided to come gatecrash your meeting. Do you mind my company that much? I'm shattered!"

"You never change, do you?" The girl's greenish eyes glittered with irritation, then she sighed, her gaze flitting to Juushirou's.

"Taichou? What do you want me to do?"

"Shunsui knows where you've been, and why," Juushirou said evenly. "If you don't mind, Naoko, I'd like him to hear your report too. It might be that he can add to it."

"I see," Naoko's sharp features took on a look of comprehension, and she nodded. "In that case, I have no objections. If it's Kyouraku-dono, I suppose he knows as much as anyone about... the thing you've sent me to investigate."

“I should hope so,” Shunsui said soberly. “All teasing aside, Naoko, I want to help. I have just as many horrible memories of certain past events as you both do — and I understand the reasons for Juushirou acting how he is. That being the case, I hope for once you’ll ignore my idiocy and allow me into the loop. I hope that Juushirou is wrong — but on the off-chance that he’s not, the more prepared we are, the better.”

“Yes,” Naoko’s greenish eyes clouded, and she inclined her head.

“Let’s go inside,” Juushirou stepped forward, pulling back the divide that led to the Thirteenth Division’s Inner Seireitei barracks. They were more sparsely furnished than those belonging to any of the other, Clan-sponsored divisions, but they had a unique, homely atmosphere all the same, and for the District Captain, the frills and trimmings that other Captains liked to adorn their chambers with seemed an unnecessary expense. As a result, the building was simply but comfortably appointed. As the smallest Gotei squad, Thirteenth Division’s barracks housed seventeen seated officers and four recruits, which, along with Captain and Vice Captain gave the squad an overall population of twenty three. In comparison to Shunsui’s Eighth Division, which now numbered a thriving thirty six, it should have been a quieter place, but the mutual trust and friendship Juushirou had built between his members meant that whether they were training, doing chores or preparing for a Council inspection, merry banter could generally be heard drifting between the hallways.

“When I come here, I realise that when you used to say you’d make your squad your family, you really meant it,” Shunsui said ruefully. “Thirteenth Division has a nice atmosphere — I can’t imagine that it’ll remain the smallest squad for much longer.”

“Thirteenth Division has no Clan rivalries or unnecessary parades of status or wealth,” Naoko said shortly, casting him a long-suffering glance. “Everyone starts off the same, so there’s never any conflict of position.”

“You and Enishi are both Clan, though,” Shunsui pointed out, and Naoko shook her head impatiently.

“I left the Unohana a long time ago, so I count the same as any other District shinigami,” she said briskly. “As for Houjou-fukutaichou, he’s always been the type to either ignore or not notice Clan convention, so he fits better here than he would’ve done in First. We’re a District squad, Kyouraku-dono, and that’s how we prefer it.”

“I see,” Shunsui let out a low whistle, offering her an approving grin. "Well said. I see Juu's dream has fully seeped into you, and so it should. You make an impressive sight, Naoko-chan, and all the more so knowing you earned it through your own hard work, not your connections. Dare I say it makes you all the prettier, seeing that resolution in your eyes?"

"Until you said the last part, I almost thought that was a compliment," Naoko sighed, shaking her head in resignation. "Sometimes, you know, it's very hard remembering to call you Captain when you still act as foolishly as when we were schoolmates."

"In private quarters like this, there's no need for you to call me so formally. No subordinates are here to see us," Shunsui assured her. "Unless your Captain objects, of course?"

He cast Juushirou a glance, and his friend grimaced, shaking his head.

"We came here for business, not banter," he reminded them, leading the pair of them through the barracks towards the rear door. Beyond this was a long pine walkway suspended over a thriving koi pond, and, when Juushirou had first seen it, he had fallen in love with the location at once. As a result, he had instructed the building of his Captain's quarters to be here, surrounded by the lapping waves of the lake's surface, and consequently there was now a small, simple structure at the very end of what was almost a pier.

Known as Juushirou's "Ugendou", it had soon become his home from home, being both a place of convalescence when he was ill, and a place of strategy when he was fit. No matter what the time of day or night, members of Thirteenth Division knew their Captain's door was always open, and even in the throes of fever, he never turned anyone away.

It was empty now, and as the trio made themselves comfortable on the cushions that littered the floor, Juushirou sighed, letting out his breath in a rush.

"Well?" he asked softly, his expression troubled as he met Naoko's gaze. "What have you to report to me, Naoko?"

Naoko did not respond straight away, then she slowly shook her head.

"I didn't pick up any trace of a reiatsu Dokusou Houshi knew," she said softly. "I don't think Chudokuga was active in the region where Fukutaichou met with that Hollow yesterday, nor could I find any trace of its presence in the vicinity Atsudan and I took down the creature that threatened the other village. In short, the result of the investigation was negative.”

“Negative, huh?” Juushirou rubbed his chin, and Shunsui’s eyes narrowed thoughtfully.

“Despite that, Naoko-chan, you seem remarkably preoccupied,” he observed. “If there’s no sign of Chudokuga, that means that you can’t connect the Hollow activity with Aizen Keitarou, doesn’t it? If that’s the case, surely it’s good news? You should be relieved — why aren’t you?”

Naoko shot Shunsui a startled look, then she bit her lip, nodding her head.

“I didn’t detect any trace of Chudokuga, or any other zanpakutou, so far as I’m aware,” she agreed carefully. “I can’t, however, dismiss those two incidents as unfortunately timed coincidences.”

“What do you mean?” Juushirou eyed Naoko in consternation, and Naoko sighed.

“It wasn’t easy to read the scene where Fukutaichou fought,” she said quietly. “There was a lot of released reiatsu there from Kirio and Ketsui’s attacks. That said...”

“There was something else?” Shunsui asked sharply, and Naoko hesitated, then slowly lowered her head in agreement.

“It was faint and fleeting, as though it was nothing more than imagination,” she agreed. “I wasn’t sure, so I released Dokusou Houshi and my sword confirmed it. Kirio’s reiatsu is still at the scene, and so is Ketsui-kun’s. There’s a trace of the Hollow... and... something else. Something unfamiliar, but something that... shouldn’t have been there.”

“In short, foreign reiatsu?” Shunsui tapped his fingers idly on the tatami-mat floor. “You didn’t recognise it?”

“No,” Naoko agreed, ‘and nor did my sword. It was really only the most fleeting trace of it, so I couldn’t process it properly. I’m sorry, Taichou,’ she turned to Juushirou. “I feel like I’ve come back with an inadequate report.”

“You’ve done the best you could, and probably better than anyone else would have in that situation,” Juushirou shook his head, though his own brow was creased with concern. “It could be coincidence, I suppose, or something left over from a previous encounter, but...”

“It was right there at the same location, and Dokusou Houshi was certain it hadn't been there any longer than twenty four hours — about the same length of time since Fukutaichou encountered the Hollow,” Naoko shook her head. “I’m sure it’s not a coincidence, but I can’t prove it. It was just... too convenient.”

“Someone trying to hide their reiatsu, perhaps?” Shunsui suggested, and Naoko shrugged.

“Perhaps,” she said uneasily. “I don’t know. It’s hard to explain — I haven’t felt anything like it before. It didn’t feel like a zanpakutou’s release, but it seemed like a rush of spiritual energy from something or someone.”

“But it was too feeble to properly analyse?” Juushirou questioned.

“Yes,” Naoko sighed. “At least, it was too polluted to get a clear reading from. It was meshed with the reiatsu belonging to the Hollow and the blades that eventually took the creature down. It was a strong Hollow, Taichou. Above average, and perfectly capable of killing a few District people, if it had wanted to. Now I’ve sensed it’s spirit power, I’m all the more confused. It was attacking the village, but it didn’t have any killing spirit. And then, this weird reiatsu was there too... almost as though...”

“Someone had tamed a Hollow and was giving it distinct orders not to kill District people?” Shunsui asked quietly. Naoko nodded.

“Is that possible, without a sword like Chudokuga?” Juushirou looked blank. “Shunsui, your sword uses manipulation — is that something Katen Kyoukotsu could do?”

“Are you trying to frame me?” Shunsui demanded lightly. “No, I don’t think so. It’s not the same kind of manipulation as Chudokuga’s blade has. Keitarou’s the only person who has a weapon like that, and I think we’d have heard something about it if one of the Gotei was capable of releasing that kind of attack.”

“It wasn’t a zanpakutou. Dokusou Houshi was quite sure it wasn’t a zanpakutou,” Naoko said firmly. “He wants me to tell you that, Taichou. Whatever that reiatsu was, it was someone’s raw ability, and nothing to do with a blade. He’s certain it wasn’t Chudokuga, and I agree with him. I don’t know what it was, or why someone would be playing puppets with Hollows, but I’m pretty certain it wasn’t Aizen Keitarou controlling that monster.”

“A Hollow attacked a village, did a lot of damage, but did not kill a single resident,” Shunsui said slowly. “At the scene, a foreign reiatsu is detected, and that reiatsu is somehow meshed with the Hollow's. It could be a coincidental meshing of residue, but it might not be. It wasn't the reiatsu associated with a released zanpakutou — I'm sure Dokusou Houshi would recognise a fellow sword's spiritual footprint, so I'm inclined to believe your zanpakutou's right, Naoko. If that's true, though, that means..."

"Someone used bare reiatsu to control the Hollow, made it fight but denatured its killing instinct, so it just created chaos?" Juushirou looked incredulous, and Shunsui shrugged.

"Someone wanted to leave living witnesses," he said pragmatically.

"But why, for goodness' sake?"

"Maybe for the exact result we're looking to ourselves," Shunsui mused. "Perhaps they wanted to draw attention to it, and to the Districts. Maybe they wanted someone to go plead their case before the Gotei and the Council, to improve things for the people living there?"

"You're saying this is a District rogue acting for the sake of his or her people, and nothing to do with Keitarou at all?" Naoko was taken aback, and Shunsui shrugged.

"We know nothing about anything," he said heavily. "It's just a hypothesis, but if such a District vigilante does exist, we ought to try and find them and persuade them to find a different way to express their feelings."

"I'll teach them to do that," Naoko's eyes darkened. "Whether they're acting with the Districts in mind or not, they're doing damage and causing panic and homelessness. It has to stop — so if there is someone acting out like that, we'll find them and stop them, Taichou. That's a promise."

Juushirou nodded.

"Do so," he agreed gravely. "Take Atsudane and Ketsui with you, Naoko — go to the Districts and see what you can find out about anyone with unusual spirit power who seems to have a dislike for Shinigami."

"Consider it done," Naoko was already on her feet. "Ketsui has a way with getting people to trust him, so if there's something to find out, we'll track it down."

It had grown quiet, now.

As the sun began to set over the southernmost edge of Eighth District, the young man leant lazily back against the trunk of an aging elm tree, surveying the changing colours of the sky with a sigh of contentment. Standing here, he reflected, it was like he was looking out across an artist's pallet, with the warm reds and ambers of the sunset against the rich greens and soft petal blue and lavender of the Kyouraku landscape. During the day, there was no time to sit and absorb Seireitei in this vein, but in the evening, when his work was over, he looked forward to his few moments of peace and pleasure underneath the darkening horizon.

The word slipped from his lips, half wistful, half joyful as little by little the night began to encroach across the District.

“If I had known coming to Seireitei would be like this, I would have volunteered to come much sooner.”

He reached up to stretch his arms, clasping his fingers around the lower branch of the elm and pulling himself nimbly up into the branches, curling his body securely among the leaves as he took a better view of his surroundings. Although the light was starting to die away, it was a clear night, and before long he knew the moon would be gleaming down over him, the stars acting like tiny nightlights to guide him back home. Soon, he knew, he would have to leave this place, for his job was done and he had no reason to prolong his stay — and yet he lingered, unwilling to leave the pure air and the peaceful countryside sooner than he must.

Rukongai really is the end of all existence.

He sighed, sinking back against the wood and closing his eyes as a cool evening breeze teased at stray wisps of his sleek black hair.

If possible, I would prefer to end things here sooner, rather than later. Making this place resemble that one would be unforgivable, even if this is the Shinigami's land. Surely it would be better to steal it away from them, than burn it and destroy it and leave it a wasteland. It seems such a waste, ravaging such a beautiful skyline for the sake of politics and pride.

He let out his breath in a rush, remembering the last time he had raised such a point of view at home.

I've spent too long in Rukongai to understand, huh? I suppose that's true.

“So here you are.”

He had come silently, and despite himself, the young man started, almost tumbling out of his tree in surprise. There was a soft chuckle from the grass below, and the man shifted his position, peering down through the leavy foliage to make out the speaker in the gloom.

He was wrapped in a heavy cloak, the hood raised to all but obscure his face, and only the tips of his fingers emerged from the long sleeves of his hakamashita. If he were to stand completely still, the man reflected, his companion might be mistaken for a dead tree or even just a shadow in the gloom, for there was nothing distinctive about his appearance, nor did he give off any significant aura to announce his presence.

If I wasn't me, probably I wouldn't even be aware of him. He knows that, and even knowing that, he still managed to catch me off guard. I ought to be more careful.

"I thought you might have got distracted by a pretty District girl again?"

There was light humour in the stranger's tone, but the young man knew that there would be no flicker of amusement in the other's pale brown eyes.

"I didn't expect to have to come fetch you this evening, Katsura-kun."

"I'm sorry."

Despite himself, the young man called Katsura bowed his head, dropping down between the tree branches onto the grass below.

"I didn't mean to be late... I just stopped to watch the sunset. District Eight is really very pretty at night, and I thought it would be a shame to miss it."

"I suppose there aren't many peaceful places for you to sit and observe the world, are there?"

A shapeless arm came up to rest against Katsura's shoulders, and for the first time the young man saw the glitter of eyes beneath the cowl of the cloak. "Sending you here is a risk and a worry for me, you know that. Maybe you'll choose to stay here. Perhaps you'll let your naivety bewitch you into believing this is a good place to be. I worry about those things, Katsura. I worry, and so I came to find you."

"A good place to be..."

Katsura pressed his lips together, turning to glance back towards the horizon, where the beautiful colours of moments before were now shrouded in the black of night. Slowly he shook his head.

“The beauty is here only for a fleeting moment,” he said quietly. “I wanted to see it, just for that moment. Now it’s gone — swallowed up by the darkness, and it doesn’t hold any interest for me any more. It was just a brief whim of mine, that’s all. I’m coming back... I never intended otherwise.”

“Then we should go,” the figure responded evenly. “The Senkaimon isn’t far from here, and there are those who are anxiously awaiting your report. Staying here longer than necessary is not safe, and you should know better by now. You are an unknown here, true enough, which is why I took the risk of sending you — but that doesn’t mean it’s safe. Believe it or not, I worry for your safety as much as for the success of what we try to do. Keep that in mind too before you engage in your own whims, Katsura-kun. It’s not the world you want it to be, and you must not let yourself get seduced by it, not even for a moment.”

Katsura sighed, nodding his head in resignation.

“I understand. I’m sorry. I’ll be more careful in future.”

“Good,” his companion seemed pleased, and Katsura could almost discern relief in the hooded man’s words. “If that’s so, then we’ll say no more of it and move on. What of your tasks? Did you manage to carry out each satisfactorily?”

“As easily as breathing in and out,” Katsura feigned a yawn, patting his hand over his mouth. “Hollows really are stupid creatures, aren’t they?”

“They pose you no particular competition, that’s for sure,” now his companion was amused, and Katsura knew he had the hooded figure’s approval. “I suppose the shinigami came and took care of them all?”

“They did, exactly as you said they would,” Katsura agreed. “I couldn’t watch them do it, of course, but I read the vibes they left behind. They’re remarkably efficient, some of them... though do we really need to destroy villages to get our point across?”

“In order to create an army, Katsura, you first need to create dissent,” the other man said wisely, pulling something small and silver-bladed from his belt and plunging it into what appeared to be empty dark sky. The atmosphere shuddered then divided, revealing a passage blacker than the night itself, and the hooded man gave his younger companion’s sleeve a little tug, leading him into the tunnel as the sky closed behind them. “The people here are half scared, half complacent about the way the world currently is. They want change, but do not know how to get it, and lack the motivation to join together to make it happen. They are naive, just as you are — they see only the good, and don't realise the bad lurking beneath the surface. When they observe how little the Clans that rule them are able or willing to protect them, then we gain in strength. Some things cannot be rushed to fruition — sometimes the slow path yields a better crop."

Katsura shot his companion a sidelong glance, stifling a sigh.

There he goes again, talking about things I don't understand and bringing out metaphors that make no sense to anybody but himself. I'm sure what we're doing has a point, but it would be nice if he'd just come out and say what it was.

"Katsura-kun?" The other man reached up to push back the hood of his cloak, casting his companion a quizzical look, and Katsura shot him a sheepish smile.

He might not read minds, but he reads people all the same. I should be more careful — he doesn't miss a trick, and I can't open him up the way I can most others.

Out loud he said,

"I suppose it's part of my being naive, but I don't understand how making those people scared and homeless will make it easier for us to take control of Seireitei. Even if the people do get cross, won't they be cross at us?"

"People are remarkably easy to manipulate, and very willing to believe what they see without looking to the inner workings for the truth," his companion said frankly. "Let me worry about those things, all right? Your job is to continue as you have been."

He pursed his lips.

"How many shinigami have become victims to your Hollow rampages?"

"Shinigami? I wouldn't know," Katsura was surprised. "I haven't been counting things like that — why?"

"And District people?"

"None, of course," Katsura snorted. "I told you, I wasn't going to kill people that might one day be our neighbours. It would be too weird. Shinigami are one thing, maybe — they're the enemy, aren't they? If this is a war, and if they've done all the things you say they have, that's a whole other matter. I'm not going to kill folk who just live quietly minding their own business, though. I'll take the Hollows and I'll make them rip apart buildings and forests, but I won't sacrifice people that don't need to be sacrificed."

"You really are still far too naive for your age," his companion sighed, but nodded his head. "Very well. For now, I'll humour your idealism and let it go. There's no need to cause unnecessary death, and so for the time being you can have your way."

He slashed the silver blade across the atmosphere once more, reopening the gateway into the ramshackle backstreets of Rukongai's seventeenth District. Katsura stepped reluctantly out into the cool air, shivering involuntarily as a sharp wind blew through the gaps between the settlements, whistling and howling between the split rafters.

"It must be nice, living in Seireitei," he murmured, and his companion offered him a slight smile.

"One day, you'll be able to judge that for yourself," he said firmly. "One day, when we return Seireitei to the people and are able to live there in peace."

Author's Note

Characters in this fic.

Hikifune Kirio is, of course, a canon character but about whom we know practically nothing. This story rendition of her may yet be contradicted by canon in the not so distant future. Ketsui and Tenichiboth made an appearance as children in Third Chronicle, along with their ill-fated father Daisuke and their resolute mother Irie. They will appear more in this story and Kotetsu Isane and Kiyone we know from canon are descended from this line.

Many of the others are OCs, both new and those from Meifu's Gate. Hopefully they will be received with as much love and understanding here as they were throughout Meifu. If you haven't already waded through Meifu's Gate's installments, you might find yourself missing on bits of the backstory to some of the characters introduced in these first few chapters.

The last thing I'm going to do is put huge long biographies of each into the text, since it disrupts the flow of the story and is known as "information dumping", a big writing no-no. Besides, it'd take me a few chapters to summarise everything that happened through Meifu's Gate, so you'll forgive me I hope for not rehashing the old ground. A bunch of the OCs in this are Ukitake and Kyouraku's Academy classmates or peers from Meifu, so shouldn't need heavy introductions for most readers who are familiar with my Academy fiction.

I shall endeavour to use the AN to introduce/reintroduce a few of the more significant ones as the story goes on, so as people aren't confused.

3. The Spiritless Zone

Chapter Two: The Spiritless Zone

The tension in Rukongai was definitely increasing.

The young woman stood at the edge of the ramshackle settlement, a troubled expression on her fair features as she gazed down into the valley below. The day before yesterday, there had been a Hollow raid in this part of the Spiritless Zone, and it had been all she and her companions could do to shelter the frightened people as the monsters raged and ravaged through their few paltry possessions. The whole area had been razed to the ground with many left dead or dying, and as she surveyed the still smouldering site, something lurched inside her chest. They were gone, but she could still hear them. The dead were as ghosts on the wind, but their scattered spirits were lost and confused in this impoverished place.

Even the three protected regions that the Council were working so hard to maintain were still far more dangerous a place than the Real World. This time it had been a village in Hokutan which had suffered the worst of the raid, but only a week before it had been a shack settlement on the border that ran between Nakaken and Junrin'an, in which twelve souls had been killed and a further seven seriously maimed. Tonight the shinigami would stay here, waiting and watching for signs of further danger, but despite the faintly smouldering ruins of the Plus soul's village, the Hokutan skyline was still.

The young woman sighed, turning on her heel and making her way slowly back towards the makeshift refugee camp that had been erected for the survivors of the village. There had not been many — perhaps ten or fifteen at best, and as she and her companions had treated them, the shinigami had been struck by one thing in particular. Though they were of all ages, large and small, these souls had something in common.

Each of them had a distinct spiritual soulprint of their own.

“Mitsuki, the squad captain has been waiting for you.”

The familiar tones of her comrade and colleague, Aomori Seri pulled the shinigami back to the present and she bowed her head in acknowledgement of the message, shooting Seri a faint smile.

“I’m sorry. I was dwelling far too much on what’s already happened, instead of what needs to be done,” she said apologetically, falling into step with her companion as they both made their way back to the heart of the survivors’ camp. “It’s a bad habit of mine... I just can’t help wondering whether, if we’d arrived here more quickly...”

“We came as quickly as we could,” Seri’s own expression became grave. “It’s not like we dallied en route, it’s just that these attacks are becoming more and more frequent, and the target zones are spread far apart. The Buchou is worried about it too, you know. We’re few, really, considering the scale of what’s been going on here, and last night he was talking seriously about sending to Seireitei for back-up. Tragedies like this village really shouldn’t be allowed to happen — but we’re only so many and we can’t be in two places at once.”

“That’s true,” Mitsuki sighed, resting her hand against the wooden beam that supported the makeshift shelter tent in place. “I’m sorry, Seri. I know that our priority is the ones left behind... I just haven’t let go of the ones we lost yet.”

“You sense them, don’t you?” Seri eyed her keenly, and Mitsuki nodded.

“I can’t help it,” she agreed resignedly. “My senses are all too keenly attuned to people in pain, even if those people have already passed over the line.”

“They’re Plus souls,” Seri reminded her. “There’s no earthly reason for you to pick up anything from them at all, alive or dead. They exist, but they’re not like us... we can only protect them so long as they have awareness, we can’t do anything for the ones who are already scattered. This is the Spiritless Zone, Mitsuki — are you sure you’re not just letting your emotions take control of your imagination?”

“Maybe,” Mitsuki acknowledged, glancing up at the sky and taking in its odd, brassy appearance. “I’ve never liked watching anyone die, so maybe you’re right. I want to save everyone, even though I know we can’t. It takes its toll, after a while — no matter how many years I stay here, I never get used to the poverty and the suffering that the people face.”

She offered her companion a smile, giving her a little shove towards the tent opening.

“In the meantime, the Buchou is waiting for you,” she added. “Whatever he has to say, you shouldn’t make him late by lingering here. He’s been in a short enough temper lately... I’d run along and report to him before he finds things to add to his list.”

“All right,” Mitsuki held up her hands in mock surrender. “I understand, and I’m going. Is he really in that bad a mood?”

“With your senses, I’m surprised you haven’t picked up on it,” Seri said frankly. “Try focusing a little on the living for a while, and let the ghosts of the departed go... okay?”

Mitsuki shot her comrade a grimace, but made no further rejoinder. Instead she pushed back the flap of the tent, ducking inside and bowing her head respectfully towards the small shelter’s lone inhabitant.

Though he was the squad captain and essentially in charge of all of Fourth Division’s operations in Rukongai, at first glance Unohana Madeki seemed nothing more than another Rukongai citizen, robed as he was in the rough fabrics of the district and with his long dark hair tied back by a simple piece of scrappy ribbon. The son of an important member of the Unohana Clan, Madeki had sacrificed his creature comforts to take charge of this mission in the field, and as Mitsuki gazed at him from beneath lowered lashes she knew that no matter how much she was bothered by the recent events, he was twice as concerned. Even now he was hunched over his makeshift desk, scribing something with a worn out brush on a piece of recycled parchment. His body was tight with tension and strain, and Mitsuki was sure that he had not even heard her approach, so intent was he on writing his report.

“You wanted to see me, sir?” she asked softly, and Madeki glanced up from his work, letting out a heavy sigh and setting his brush aside.

“Edogawa,” he murmured, and Mitsuki was half-sure she heard relief in his words. “Good. I was afraid you’d made an expedition down to look for survivors in the dead village, and I would have to wait for you to return.”

“I may have thought about it,” Mitsuki admitted, her cheeks colouring red as she realised how well her superior knew her. “I keep sensing spiritual signals from there, as though there are still people calling for help. I know we dealt with everything yesterday and there were no signs of life anywhere when we left, but even so...”

“You feel them too, huh?” Madeki’s question was soft, and Mitsuki started, staring at her companion in surprise.

“Sir?”

“I had thought you might, though you’re the only one that would,” Madeki ran his fingers through his tangled dark hair, loosening the dirty ribbon in his agitation. “Your senses are far more sensitive than most of the squad’s — I dare say they’re better than mine on the odd occasion. That’s why I called you here — I wanted to have your perspective. You’ve felt spirits from the razed village too, then? Spirits belonging to those who were destroyed, as though they still lived?”

“Yes... something like that,” Mitsuki agreed slowly. “I didn’t really understand it, but it’s as though they... had some lingering presence in this world. But this is the Spiritless Zone, isn’t it? There’s just no way...”

“I’m starting to wonder about that,” Madeki shook his head, gesturing for her to sit down. “What I’m going to say to you is between us, Edogawa, and I’m trusting you simply because you’re the only other person who might be sensitive enough to pick this out. I want your perspective as much as anything, I suppose, on what you think might be the cause.”

“I... hadn’t thought that far along, sir,” Mitsuki admitted. “It did seem strange to me, because the majority of people we’ve been treating are spiritless Plus souls and without any kind of reiatsu to identify them.”

“Most, but not all?”

“I...”

“Edogawa, tell me plainly what your impression of yesterday’s settlement was?”

“My impression, sir?”

Madeki’s eyes narrowed and he nodded his head.

“Did you notice anything... unusual about the people we rescued from that attack?”

Mitsuki’s brows knitted together, and hesitantly she lowered her head in agreement.

“Yes, sir. I confess that I did.”

“And your chief observation of them would be what?”

“Of the fifteen people we took from that village alive, sir, every one of them has some discernable level of spiritual ability.”

“Reiatsu?”

“Yes, sir.”

“I... am not sure of that. Perhaps not,” Mitsuki was taken aback. “They’re fleeting impressions, but doubtless real. Too faint, maybe, for anyone else to really notice them, but I... I really thought...”

She trailed off, and Madeki sighed, reaching across for a folded, creased piece of dirty parchment and tossing it in her direction. Obediently Mitsuki took it, smoothing it out against the rough ground and casting her gaze across it. It was a map, she realised, crudely drawn but recognisable as the region of Rukongai where she and her companions had been dispatched. Several areas were marked with a cross, and she frowned, raising her gaze to her captain.

“Sir?”

“The areas on that map are all villages we’ve intervened in at times of crisis in the last two weeks alone,” Madeki said quietly. “Four in Junrin’an, two in Nakaken, now one in Hokutan. Every single one of them has been different in every way... except one. The survivors have discernable reiatsu, too faint to belong to Seireitei’s people, but too vivid to be normal for this area. I’ve checked again the brief that Retsu-sama sent us here with, and this region of Rukongai is fiercely protected space. The people here are all Plus souls from the Real World and the fortifications that surround the three mapped regions are made from Sekkiseki, preventing any leak of stray spiritual energy into this area. The barriers filter out impurities, preventing any but the Plus souls from entering into protected space. The Hollows should not be here, and the people shouldn’t be contaminated, and yet, somehow, they are.”

He sighed.

“Each of us has a temporary seal placed on our own powers while we work here, in order that we only help and don’t harm,” he added. “Although it’s still a Urahara prototype, it seemed to work when there were more of us based here, and so I don’t want to think that this has anything to do with our presence. That said, I can’t be entirely sure.”

“I thought the Council already looked into that?” Mitsuki pursed her lips. “Urahara Nagesu-sama did a lot of research into this when the Spiritless Zone was still being discussed, didn’t he? I thought healers’ reiatsu was considered non-reactive and therefore unlikely to pollute the atmosphere? Wasn’t the sealing of excess spirit power simply a precautionary tactic? Surely... surely we can't be the reason for this?"

"I was under that impression too, but this is the first time the hypothesis has really been put to the test," Madeki admitted. "Nagesu-sama was quite clear that most spiritual emissions could prove extremely dangerous to pure Plus souls, and even though there were so many tests done before we were allowed to come here, it's just possible that something was overlooked. We have been here for a long time, and we are using spirit power to combat the dangers — maybe even our reiryoku has corruptive potential, if we use it to heal people enough. Whatever the answer, though, one thing is for certain. People who did not come here with spirit power and who have no discernable means of obtaining it are now giving off fleeting but genuine evidence of reiatsu."

"Do you think it could be us?" Mitsuki whitened, handing the map back, and Madeki shrugged.

"For that, you'll need to ask the Urahara," he said acidly. "In fact, that is what I'm doing — I'm writing a report right now which I intend on sending back to Seireitei as soon as it's completed. Whatever is happening here suggests at the very least the Sekkiseki barrier has suffered some level of damage, and if it is our presence that's causing this imbalance, we may be required to pull back whilst the scientists investigate."

"What about the people being attacked, though?" Mitsuki looked horrified. "If we pull out... unless... sir, do you think we're the reason places are being attacked, too?"

"Since the attacks happen before we reach a place, I don't think so. We're reacting to reports, and the attacks are not anticipating our movements, although the two are becoming hopelessly intertwined," Madeki groaned, rubbing his brow. "Hollows are generally without clear psychological aims or intentions, so I find it unlikely that they're planning an attack before it happens at all. The increase in attacks and the rise in reiatsu signatures, however, that's a different problem. I suppose you realise that there are far more Hollows here in Rukongai now than there used to be, and they're even able to penetrate the Spiritless Zone. They're only doing so for one reason — they detect reiatsu here, and are coming to devour it."

"That means that villages like the one yesterday are sitting targets," Mitsuki said unevenly. "Sir, their only defence is us, in that case. Even if they are showing abnormal levels of spiritual energy, isn't our job to protect them regardless? Surely we need to be sending for more shinigami to come here, not thinking of pulling out completely? Isn't that why we were left here, as a holding squad in case of further danger?"

"That's for Seireitei to decide, not us," Madeki said heavily. "I've written already to Retsu-sama with my fears, and have not yet had a reply. It is concerning, though. The Spiritless Zone is the one part of Rukongai that's supposed to be sealed and secure — the whole point of its inception was to keep out Hollows and make a safe location for Plus souls to dwell. All of the Clans have been united in trying to make this project a reality, and yet something is still going wrong. If stray reiatsu is corrupting those souls... it concerns me about the long term consequences. Spirits infused with alien reiatsu are vulnerable and unstable, and many Plus souls have been killed in recent weeks. If some of those spirits on the wind that you and I have been hearing are actually souls in the first stages of turning Hollow, everything that the Council has worked for in stabilising the balance of spirit particles between the worlds might prove in vain. For that reason, if we are part of the cause of this... we should pull out. Our jobs are as guardians of the Spiritless Zone, nothing more. It might seem drastic in the short term, but in the long term... we have to consider the whole picture, not just what's in front of us. If we jeopardise this now, there may never be another chance like it."

Mitsuki chewed on her lip, remembering the frightened tears of the young children she had ferried back to the camp late the night before.

"It's hard to ignore what's right in front of us, sir," she said quietly. "How soon will you know what we're supposed to do?"

"I hope Retsu-sama will respond shortly to my appeal for help," Madeki admitted. "In the meantime, all we cando is keep doing what we've been sent here to do. Those who live must be helped and then relocated to one of the regions outside of the Spiritless Zone, given our findings, and we must be alert for any other approaching threats. I'm going to send a group of shinigami out as a scout party to check the level of Hollow activity to the south, towards the Sekkiseki divide between Junrin'an and the territory that lies beyond. More attacks have happened in Junrin'an than anywhere so far, so that seems the most likely source of the leak. That's my other reason for bringing you here, Edogawa — with your spiritual precision, I want you to lead the group."

"Me, sir?" Mitsuki's eyes widened. "Not Seri or one of the others? I have far less experience, really, and..."

"You have the sharpest senses in the squad — possibly in the whole Fourth Division, barring Retsu-sama herself,” Madeki said evenly. “If we were back in Seireitei now, I have no doubt that you would be ranking at a fourth or fifth seat level, and it’s not uncommon to delegate leadership responsibilities to the shinigami holding those ranks. Besides, as your squad captain, I’ve made that choice. If anything goes wrong, the blame lies with me, not you — I’ll be the one answering to Retsu-sama.”

“I won’t let that happen,” Mitsuki assured him. “I’ll do my best, sir, if you really think I’m the right choice.”

“I do,” Madeki agreed evenly. “I want you to take Aomori as your second, since she’s good in the field and her combat skills are better than yours — no good sending out a party of people with no sword capabilities, just in case. You can choose two others yourself — no more than that. It’ll leave seven shinigami here with me to do what we can — that should be plenty, though. You’ll report back to me directly in three days from now, by which time I hope to have answers from both Retsu-sama and the Urahara on our best course of action.”

“As soon as you can muster your companions,” Madeki agreed. “There’s no time to be wasted, since we’ve no way of tracking the Hollows before they attack. Be careful, Edogawa — I’ll see you in three days.”

“Yes, sir,” Mitsuki bowed again, withdrawing from the tent and stepping back out into the Rukongai sunshine.

The Spiritless Zone is already under threat.

She frowned, biting her lip as she considered the implications of those words.

It’s the first time all eight Clans have worked together without question in order to bolster and stabilise the future of this world. By sealing off an area of designated Rukongai land and securing it for Plus souls alone, there were hopes that the numbers of Hollowfications might actually decrease. If the souls were located in time, sent to Soul Society and encapsulated in a safe, spirit-free environment, they could never become Hollows. If that happened, when their souls broke down and dissipated into the ether, they would simply be part of Soul Society and not something tainted or dangerous. If there are less Hollows, there are less souls being devoured. And, if there are less Hollows in the Real World, there is less chance of the balance being badly upset by other, intervening forces.

Her lips thinned.

Buchou never mentions them, but I know Retsu-sama was concerned about the actions of the living humans in the Real World. I don't know whether it's really true that some of them have begun to find other ways to destroy Hollows, but if they managed to do so in great numbers, the balance of Soul Society might yet falter. The Urahara worked so hard to find a better way of purifying souls so that they didn't have to be destroyed. If that's all been in vain... but the more Hollows that invade Soul Society, the more shinigami are pulled back here to deal with them. That means less deployments to the Real World... and less chance of Hollows being purified. I understand that the Real World people want to fight back — but if they knew they were damaging their world as well as ours by interfering.

Still, those things aren't within my power to change at present, and I can't do everything myself. For now the only thing I can do is find Seri and some others and follow the Buchou's orders. If we do that, maybe we'll be able to prevent another village being destroyed — and sometimes the important things have to be done in small steps.

She made her way to the heart of the makeshift settlement, where the biggest tarpaulin was stretched over an area of muddy ground, providing living, sleeping and eating quarters for the fifteen village survivors. As she had surmised, Seri was among them, carefully checking their bandaged limbs and heads for any sign of infection. At the far end of the shelter, one of the lesser ranking division members was already beginning to spoon the thick, nutritious soup into bowls, handing them out among the survivors, and Mitsuki watched for a moment as each claimed their ration, taking in the way in which they downed the pasty liquid. Some were more eager than others, she noted absently... a sure sign that reiatsu was burgeoning inside of them and, perhaps, growing in strength.

She sighed, rubbing her temples.

“Mitsuki!” Seri finished re-tying the strapping on the leg of a young girl of six or seven, casting her comrade a warm smile. “What did Buchou have to say about everything? You look like he savaged you — was it that bad?”

“No, but he has given me... well, us... an assignment,” Mitsuki came across to join her, offering the scared child a gentle grin as she did so. “Well? Are you feeling any better? I know it's cold and windy here, and not as snug as your own home, but your colour's a lot better than yesterday.”

“I... I think so,” the girl looked startled, gazing up at the shinigami with wide, frightened eyes, and Seri patted her lightly on the head.

“Go get your share of lunch,” she advised. “Don’t let them push you back because you’re not as quick on your feet right now. The quicker you get well, the sooner we can find somewhere safer for you and your companions to stay — so eat up and don’t look so worried. Mitsuki’s on your side — more than anyone else, most likely.”

The child gawped at Seri, then back at Mitsuki, wriggling down off the pile of logs she had been perching on and limping off towards the food queue. Watching her go, Seri let out a heavy sigh.

“The Council ought to be able to prevent this,” she said pensively. “That one was lucky — she and the girl she was sheltering with both escaped with minor bruises and her ankle is only sprained. They’re scared, though, and I can’t blame them. They’ve no way to fight back.”

“Rukongai is the most dangerous part of Seireitei, even now,” Mitsuki agreed grimly. “The Council are trying, Seri — but it’s a hard problem to fix. Plus souls have no defences — that’s how they are.”

“And Hollows should not be able to follow them here,” Seri sighed. “Oh, I know. It’s not as though it’s anyone’s fault, exactly. Just, seeing them like this...”

She shrugged, offering her friend a rueful smile.

“Well? You said we had an assignment?”

“Mm,” Mitsuki nodded, quickly filling her companion in on what Madeki had said. At her words, Seri’s eyes became thoughtful.

“Recon? Is he sure about that?” she asked doubtfully. “It isn’t as though the Hollows put up warning flares before they strike, and if we’re separated when they do...”

“I know, but Buchou’s worried about a bunch of stuff, and he wants us to check things out,” Mitsuki responded. “Probably, he’s right. There are a cluster of villages to the south of our original camp in Junrin’an, and none of them have been attacked by Hollows, yet. If we can get there quickly, we might even help the people improve their defences. It won’t matter much in the final analysis, but if it buys a little time and saves a few lives...”

“I suppose so,” Seri sighed, getting to her feet. “All right. An order is an order, so I suppose that’s that. He looked pretty frazzled last night, to be honest, so I’m not totally surprised. We’ll do our best, and that's all we can do — right?"

"That's right," Mitsuki agreed, nodding her head. "Hopefully when we get back, there'll be news of reinforcements and a wider spread of protection for the Spiritless Zone... but we'll see what the Council come up with."

"The trouble with dispatching people here is the problem of sealing spirit power. Only certain types of people are allowed to go, so it might take longer than that to get clearance," Seri said wisely. "Healers are one thing — we don't pollute the atmosphere in the way some of those combat shinigami too. Can you imagine the devastation if they were to send some thugs with fire power to fight these Hollows? We're managing as best we can with the skills we have but at the very least our spirit power isn't toxic to other creatures. I dread to think what would happen if some of the others were allowed into the Spiritless Zone... it could make things much worse."

"Yes, it could," Mitsuki conceded, "but defeating Hollows isn't exactly Fourth Division's strongest skill. You're not bad with your sword — far better than I am, it has to be said — but we're not trained as combat fighters in the same way. Other divisions might be quicker at quelling the problem, leaving us free to worry about the damage."

"I've seen the way some of those squads work," Seri snorted. "I know you're a Kuchiki, Mitsuki, and that Sixth Squad has some claim on your loyalties because of your kinsfolk there, but I'm sorry, I'm not a fan. I've always been glad I was born in District Four and I never had to fuss about perfecting fighting techniques beyond base necessity. We do all right, and believe me, we could do much worse. Whilst I've no problem with Retsu-sama sending us some more people to help bolster our work, I really hope the whole of Seireitei isn't about to descend on the Spiritless Zone."

"If they did, it would rather defeat the object of the project," Mitsuki sighed. "It would probably spell the end of it, in fact, if that kind of thing had to happen."

"Agreed," Seri grasped her loosely by the arm, "so we'll go and complete our mission and hope to prevent it. An order is an order, and we'd better obey it. Decide who we're taking with us and we'll split — the sooner we've done our surveying, the sooner we can report back!"

"What exactly are we looking for, Shikibu-san?"

Ketsui scrambled over a clutch of uneven rocks, pulling his slim body onto the narrow ledge and settling himself more firmly against the dark stone. "Everything here seems quiet and I can't pick up any sense of Hollows in this area. Why are we heading down towards these villages? Has there been some report of danger from Inner Seireitei?"

"It hardly looks that way," Atsudane Makoto, Thirteenth Division's fifth seated officer shook his head, his shock of messy dark hair flopping over his forehead as he did so. "It's like you say, Ketsui-kun. There's nothing here. If Seireitei got a report of danger in this vicinity, it must've been some points off the scale."

"An order is an order, and we'll carry it out properly," Naoko said acerbically, dropping down between them and resting a hand on the shoulder of each. "Taichou sent us here, so here we are. That's as much as you both need to bother about it. We'll do what we came to do, and then we'll go back and report. You do remember that part of basic training, I trust?"

"Yes, but Shikibu-san, it would help if we knew what we were supposed to be finding here," Ketsui said earnestly, turning quizzical pale eyes on his superior officer. "Taichou wouldn't send us anywhere without good reason, so there must be something in this area. That being the case..."

"As far as I know, there are no Hollows actively here at present," Naoko shook her head impatiently. "We're not here to hunt anything down. We're here to ask some questions of the local residents hereabouts."

"Questions?" Atsudane paused, sending his companion a disappointed look. "You mean we came all this way to talk? I was sure that when Taichou dispatched us it meant we were going into another Hollow eradication mission — are you saying it's not that at all?"

"If you cleared out your ears and listened to me more carefully, you'd realise that," was Naoko's scathing reply. "Now pay attention. What I'm going to tell you is secure information and not to be repeated back at barracks. It's need to know data and anything we discover here is also to be disclosed only to Ukitake-taichou. Understood? No gossiping about it in the mess hall — Atsudane, that's for you in particular."

"I don't gossip!" Atsudane looked wounded. "You make me sound like a chatty schoolgirl!"

"Most of the girls in our squad would be offended by comments like that," Naoko shot him a withering glance. "Or maybe I made a mistake and it wasn't you I heard holding forth to some of the recruits about how you and I slashed down that Hollow the other day...?"

"Well, I might've shared some experiences with them," Atsudane coloured, shrugging his shoulders. "That's what senpai do though, isn't it? We're meant to be teaching them stuff, so I didn't think there was any harm in answering their questions."

"This isn't the kind of mission that needs public scrutiny... certainly not embellishment," Naoko said firmly. "Ketsui, that goes for you too — though I don't suppose you need to be warned."

"Hey!" Atsudane objected indignantly. "I rank higher than he does — why are you railing at me and not at him? Ketsui-kun's far more inexperienced than I am in missions! Surely he's the one who needs to be warned far more than I do!"

"Ketsui-kun isn't given to disclosing unnecessary information to his juniors... or his seniors," Naoko said briskly. "Nor is he given to embellishing his adventures in lower Seireitei to crowds of adoring recruits. You're a good shinigami, Makoto, but sometimes you lack discipline when it comes to keeping things to yourself. Ketsui might not have your experience, but he can keep a secret."

"Fine," Atsudane sighed, folding his arms disgruntledly across his chest. "I got the message. This is top secret."

"What are we here to talk to the locals about, Shikibu-san?" Ketsui eyed his superior quizzically. "If it's that important that it needs to be kept secret, should Makoto-san and I be here at all?"

"Taichou told me to take the pair of you, and I'm not questioning his orders," Naoko sighed, sinking down onto the stone. "Atsudane's one of the quickest thinkers in the division, even if he is a touch sweet on his own ability, and we don't know if it might become a combat situation. You've proven you can use your sword in high pressure conditions, but the reason you're here most of all is because you're far better at forming bonds with District villagers than any of us. You've lived among them and you understand... even Atsudane, with all his District roots, has never lived in a village like the ones hereabouts."

"That's true, for what it's worth," Atsudane's eyes roved thoughtfully across the roofs of the ramshackle settlement. "My family were never this level of District poor. Even among District people, there's a wide difference in living conditions... probably to people like those, I'd look like a bocchama."

"Nothing could be further from the truth, trust me," Naoko responded acidly. “Even so, though, Ketsui understands this level of living far more than you or I do. I don’t mean that as a slight to your background, Ketsui-kun — but you know that I’m not incorrect.”

“No, it’s as you say,” Ketsui’s pale eyes clouded, and he nodded his head. “Mother, Oniisan and I were refugees. We had nothing at all to begin with... I understand that feeling only too well. If I can help in any way, Shikibu-san, I promise that I will.”

“We still haven’t discovered what Taichou wants us to ask these people, though, Naoko-san,” Atsudane pointed out. “If we’re not hunting Hollows, we’re surely not asking these people about them?”

Naoko was silent for a moment, then she sighed.

“It’s just my instinct, but I thought this would be the best place to start,” she admitted. “As you said, Makoto, among the Districts there are families who are reasonably off and families who are not. The Clans don’t always notice those at the bottom of the poverty ladder — before I became part of Thirteenth Division, I admit, there was a lot I didn’t understand about such people and it has been a learning curve for me, breaking my Clan assumptions and seeing people and places in a new way. If it was that way for me, I am sure there are many forgotten among the lowest classes, and surely those who struggle are the ones who most need help?”

“That’s true,” Ketsui nodded his head. “When we left District Seven, we had aid from the Kyouraku and, thanks to them, we were able to move on and start a new life. They didn’t pay for us to live on their land, though, and we had to work very hard to make ends meet even when we were granted sanctuary.”

“In Seventh District, some of those left behind lived in worse conditions than even that,” Naoko said gravely. “The scars were deep among those people and probably, they remain deep now among some of the most neglected. Resentment breeds in those places... resentment against the rich people who don’t seem to lift a finger to help them.”

“You think these people are rebels against Soul Society?” Makoto’s eyes widened. “Isn’t that a leap? They might be poor, but suspecting them of plotting an uprising...”

“I’m not saying that at all,” Naoko said impatiently, shaking her head. “These people are poor, downtrodden and pathetic. Their daily lives are a fight to eat, feed one another and simply stay alive. These people have no time to be plotting things like rebellion — though there is doubtless much the Clans could and should do to help them, even here in Eighth. No, I didn't mean that at all."

"Then...?"

"If someone in the Districts wanted to create dissent against the ruling classes, this is the kind of neighbourhood he or she would target," Naoko said succinctly, getting to her feet and pulling her companions up with her. "Whether with Hollows or with sugared words, they're bound to be the kind of place a rebel would hone in on. Places like this are poorly defended and if a Hollow attacked, there would be the maximum devastation, since the houses are insubstantially built. That being the case..."

"You think that someone planned the Hollow attacks we've been fighting off lately?" Consternation flickered into Ketsui's pale eyes, and he turned his gaze on the villages as if seeing them anew. Naoko shrugged.

"Taichou thinks that we ought to investigate the possibility, though there's no clear evidence of it," she said carefully. "If something is going on, though, people like this will hear about it more quickly than people in more affluent areas. That's where you come in in particular, Ketsui — I confess, I don't have the patience for dealing with gentle interrogation, not when lives might be at stake and there are a thousand other things we should be doing to protect them."

"Understood," Ketsui's gaze hardened and he nodded his head. "If that's what Taichou wants us to do, I'm in. Are you coming, Makoto-san?"

"I suppose I am," Makoto grinned, nodding his head. "I think Taichou might be overthinking the problem, but I'll humour him since there's no harm in being safe."

"I hope you're right," Naoko watched the two shinigami slip down over the rocks and onto the path that led towards the nearest village, letting out a heavy sigh.

There was something in that boy's aura then, Naoko. Did you notice it?

As she prepared to follow them, the thin, sour voice of her zanpakutouspirit made her pause, her brows knitting together as she felt the swirl of something sinister sweeping through her senses.

Boy? Which boy?

The fair haired one. Ketsui. He tensed up when talking about the possibility of someone controlling Hollows.

Dokusou Houshi's voice was disapproving.

You didn't notice it? I might have known.

My mind was on other things.

Naoko pressed her lips together thoughtfully.

Well? What are you trying to tell me? You can't think Ketsui is involved in any of this business. I know his reiatsu and so does Taichou — besides...

That boy has a connection to the devil and we both know it, Naoko.

Dokusou Houshi's voice was uncompromising, his words cutting through her thoughts like the edge of a blade.

His thoughts are in the same place yours are, only unlike yours, they're surrounded by fear and uncertainty.

Fear and uncertainty?

Naoko's gaze rested on the disappearing figure of her division's Tenth Seat, her eyes taking in his demeanour carefully. Was he more tense than usual? Perhaps there was an extra urgency in his step, something fragmented in his aura that she couldn't quite place.

Ketsui's a member of my Division, Houshi-sama. I trust him, and so does Taichou. It's not for us to taint him based on distant kinsfolk... he and his brother have never given anyone any cause for alarm.

I wasn't making any accusations to the contrary, Naoko.

The spirit's voice was acerbic.

Still, watch that boy. I don't think he has the nature to hurt anyone, nor do I think him involved in a plot against Soul Society. Without your saying so, however, his thoughts have gone to that missing kinsman whose name is still considered unspoken in so many parts of Seireitei. More, you said yourself that he isn't one who shares secrets. That includes his own, as well you should know. Ketsui is a shinigami, and, probably, he is loyal. That doesn't mean he is ignorant of the things you and Ukitake are so familiar with. Bear it in mind. Watch that boy.

Fine, I'll keep an eye on him.

Naoko sighed, shrugging her shoulders in defeat.

It wasn't his reiatsu though, Houshi-sama, and I know his sword and his spirit power. So do you. Whoever was responsible for controlling that Hollow, it wasn't someone like Ketsui-kun. I'd stake my life and my reputation on that fact.

You're fond of the young one, aren't you?

He's a good shinigami, and a Third Seat should look out for the younger members of her squad, should she not?

Naoko was defensive, and the sword's spirit chuckled, his pale face flitting briefly across her senses.

You trained him when he first came to Thirteenth Division, so of course you would be fond of him. It stands to reason that you'd believe in him, even to the point of blinding yourself as to his true identity. Whether you like it or not, Naoko, he is as much a reject of Clan stock as you are, and from far more sinister blood. Neither one of you can escape your heritage — Ketsui might not go looking for trouble, but that doesn't mean it won't come looking for him.

I see. So that's what you mean.

Naoko rubbed her chin thoughtfully.

I suppose it's possible that, if they knew of Ketsui's kinship to that devil of a man, and maybe his brother's as well, rebels might come looking for them to stir up old wounds. You don't want me to suspect him, but to protect him... correct?

Protect him, by all means, but watch him all the same.

The spirit's voice was noncommittal.

Blood ties can prove strong ones, and if this incident connects to that individual...

You think it does?

We need to do more work to prove that it is. Without proof, speculation is a waste of time.

There was a ripple of energy across Naoko's thoughts, and then the presence of her zanpakutou's spirit was gone, fading back into the haze of mist from which he had come.

"Shikibu-san? Are you coming?"

Ketsui's call jerked the Third Seat back to her senses and she nodded, hurrying to join her two companions.

"I was just making sure the coast was clear," she lied as she reached them. "Since Hollows appear where Shinigami are, it seemed better to be safe than sorry."

"There's nothing ill on the wind here, though," Atsudane objected.

“Under cover of darkness, we should be fine.”

“Let’s hope the people are in a talking mood, then,” Naoko said with a sigh. “All right, both of you. Let’s go.”

Evening.

In the small wooden hut, a solitary figure sat quietly behind an uneven wooden desk, pieces of aging, worn parchment scattered across the wood like fragments of a patchwork quilt. The flame of a kidou lamp flickered dimly in the darkness, casting only the minimum amount of light across the work surface, but despite this, the brush in the figure’s hand did not stop moving, the swift, even strokes of ink across the page like gathering insects swarming across the coarse surface.

To one side lay a bowl, still half-full of a thick soup but discarded, as though whatever the individual was studying was more appetising than putting food between his lips. Against the wall were piles of paper notebooks, each one roughly pulled together with pieces of recycled rope into distinct volumes, their titles scratched across the wooden cover by the blunted edge of a rusting blade.

It was hardly a living environment, for there was nothing more than a moth-eaten blanket to suggest that this chamber could be anyone’s quarters, yet despite that, this was the place he called home. From morning to night, this was his haven and his retreat, and the books marked his life’s work, carefully and painstakingly pieced back together from broken scraps into something resembling coherence.

The cloth divide that hung across the doorway of the hut was tossed back at that instant, revealing a young man, and at the sound of his voice, the figure reluctantly lowered his brush, raising muddy eyes to the dark brown ones of his apprehensive companion. For a moment there was silence between them, then the older of the two opened his lips, one word dropping from them into the quiet of the night.

“And?”

“It’s as you expected. They’re starting to investigate beyond just taking down the Hollows.” Taking this reaction as an invitation to enter, the young man stepped into the room proper, allowing the cloth to fall closed once more behind him. In his hand he held a folded piece of parchment, and at the sight of it the figure raised an eyebrow, stretching out a hand to take it.

“From the usual channels?”

“Yes,” the young man clicked his tongue idly against his teeth. “It just arrived, and I said I’d bring it back here to you. That ape Kurotsuchi brought it back through the gate — I thought I should claim it from him before he decided that the contents were for everyone’s eyes, not just yours.”

“Yet you know its contents? Did you happen to read it in his place?” The older man glanced at the message, turning it over and examining the seal with his careful, meticulous gaze. “No, you haven’t opened this.”

His eyes narrowed, and he raised his head once more to scrutinise the young man’s impassive expression. “I see. It’s like that, is it?”

There was no reply, and the older man chuckled, using a grubby fingernail to split the seal in two. Carefully he unfolded the sheet, scanning over the contents with a thoughtful gaze.

“A Council meeting might be convened to discuss this? How interesting. And the one who raised the question was Ukitake Juushirou? I’m almost proud of him, seeing through the layers of deceit. Still, if he should happen to associate it with me, it would be troublesome.”

“That’s why you have a man on the inside, isn’t it?” the young man asked off-handedly, and his companion nodded.

“One, but one may not be enough,” he said reflectively. “You said that Kurotsuchi had brought the message? He’s been skulking around Seireitei, has he?”

“So it would seem.” Clear dislike flickered across the young man’s features. “Why? Do you want to see him before he skulks off somewhere else on another whim of his own?”

“Yes... I’d rather like him to work on a whim of mine,” the other tapped the sheet of parchment with the index finger of his left hand. “Would you send him in to speak to me?”

“If you like,” the youngster shrugged his shoulders, then ducked back out of the chamber, leaving his companion once more alone. A few moments later the curtain rippled again, then a shadowy figure emerged from beneath it, vivid eyes peering intently around the chamber as though looking for something of value which, in a quieter moment, he might manage to spirit away to his own dwelling. He was a small, unimpressive man, his host reflected, lifting a hand to indicate for his visitor to come properly into the hut. He was the kind of individual that most souls would pass without a second glance, and it was exactly that nondescript veneer that made him such a useful, powerful weapon if properly deployed. He had greedy fingers and a mind narrow to the point of obsession when it came to his outlook, but both of those things could be controlled with subtle manipulation, promises and threats.

The voice was low and somewhat husky, and the man called Keitarou nodded, watching his companion kneel before him with a mixture of contempt and amusement.

“I did. I heard you had brought this message,” he tapped the parchment, “and I realised that I had a job for you.”

“A job, sir?”

“Yes,” Keitarou’s eyes became like slits, boring into the pale ones of his companion. “It seems that Seireitei are beginning to get a hint of our operation here. That concerns me.”

“Only the vaguest of whiffs, sir,” his companion was dismissive, his eyes burning bright with curiosity all the same. “They know nothing of the things you’ve planned, and have only begun discussing vagaries, not confirmed facts. There seems little risk of them discovering your involvement or your true location — not while they bicker among themselves for supremacy within their corrupt Council of Elders.”

“Ah yes. Clans are always so concerned with status and appearance,” Keitarou sounded weary, but the amusement in his gaze became derision as a memory flitted across his thoughts. “Even so, though, it pays to be steps ahead of the opposition, just in case they decide to become opposition in the days or weeks to come. They are many, Masaya, and we are as yet few. Whilst I have confidence in the weapons at my disposal, it is still too soon. If we were to be discovered before things really got moving... it could be catastrophic for all concerned.”

Masaya’s beady eyes darted quickly to the entrance of the hut, then he lowered his voice.

“The exact contents of the message isn’t important,” Keitarou dismissed this with a flick of his hand, sensing the disappointment that filled his companion’s aura at his casual response. It was not in his nature to disclose details to those who did not need to know them, although, he reflected ruefully, Masaya hardly had anyone to whom he could disclose any secrets, even if he wanted to. On the contrary, Keitarou kept his secrets from Masaya because Masaya’s entire existence was focused on Keitarou’s will — and if he was not vigilant, a careless word could see quite the wrong moves being put into play. To most in the Rukon, Masaya was greedy, inquisitive, insolent and nosy — but to Keitarou he was as devoted and loyal as a samurai to his lord — with all the negative and positive connotations such a bond could bring.

Well, all scientific experiments carried risks, and for the most part, the bad outweighed the good. Masaya had proven extremely useful so far — his abilities invaluable to Keitarou’s growing cause.

“All you need to know is that some shinigami are beginning to make forays beyond their usual remits, and doubt has been raised within the Gotei as to whether the influx of Hollows is a natural occurrence,” Keitarou continued now. We cannot, of course, stop acting. If we did that, the people who have already turned to our cause might forget their grievances against Clan and Council and go back to their former lackadaisical ways of life. I thought that I had taken all the precautions necessary when I courted the favour of someone on the other side of the fence, but I am beginning to think one will not be enough.”

“If you would tell me your contact in the Gotei, sir, I would go myself and instruct him on the best way to obtain clear and concise data,” Masaya’s expression looked hopeful, the hunter’s intent dancing across his featureless face and reminding Keitarou briefly of the man that he had once been. “I could go and return within the night, and nobody would detect me. In fact...”

“That will not be necessary,” Keitarou shook his head, half wondering whether, if he disclosed that information, he would next hear that that contact’s throat had been slit. Masaya was jealously possessive of his role in Keitarou’s revolution — and there was no sense in taking unnecessary risks. “The contact I have is working well enough, but they are not placed in the right areas, nor are they close enough to the most dangerous people. They do not have your skills, Masaya, and so I can rely on them far less. For most of Seireitei, I am just a name — but for a few, I am more than that, and those few must be distracted away from looking for me.”

“Ridiculous,” Masaya snorted. “Could a Gotei shinigami really have the intellect to find you, Keitarou-sama? Of course not. None of them believe you’re even alive, let alone...”

“I never take such things for granted,” Keitarou interrupted him briskly. “There are those among the Gotei who have met and spoken with me before.”

He frowned, his fingers moving absently to his shoulder.

“Indeed, even drawn blood from me,” he admitted. “There are vipers with shrewd minds and sharp tongues lurking in that den of overindulgence and pomposity and I would be remiss if I did not take them into consideration before I acted. No, my contact works hard, but one is no longer enough. I need to look further afield... and recruit again.”

He gestured to Masaya.

“That is where you come in,” he added frankly. “There are few people who can cross over into Seireitei without being detected, and you are one of the few. Your skills are useful to me — that’s why I saved your life ten years ago and put you back together, piece by piece, using the skills at my disposal. Your native power and my skill as a scientist have made you a formidable tool for spying and information gathering, and your willingness to serve pleases me. I would trust this mission to no other, so please listen well, Masaya. You must not deviate from my plan in even one respect, or all may be lost.”

“I understand, sir,” Masaya’s eyes widened with anticipation, reminding Keitarou of a weasel or a stoat poised to invade a juicy nest of young mice. “I, Masaya, am your loyal servant so long as my body has life. I will act exactly as you instruct me, and will not fail to succeed.”

“I’ve no doubts of that,” Keitarou told him calmly.

“What is it you wish me to do?”

“Before I go into that, Masaya, tell me something.” Keitarou’s lips pursed thoughtfully. “Is Katsura still within Rukongai’s borders?”

“Katsura-sama?” Masaya looked startled at the sudden change of topic, but nodded his head, bowing low before his companion. “Yes, sir. He has not yet left for a fresh raid on Seireitei — I believe he was waiting on Lady Eiraki this evening.”

“Good,” Keitarou looked approving. “My contact included some additional information I would like him to hear. When I have finished outlining your mission, you will send him to me, understood? I have somewhere I need him to go, and unfortunately it is not a place I can easily go myself.”

Masaya’s eyes became calculating, and he jerked his head in a nod of acceptance.

“As you wish, sir,” he agreed readily. “I will tell Katsura-sama of your wishes directly I leave this place.”

“Then let me explain to you what I want you to do,” Keitarou settled himself more comfortably on his cushions, absently rubbing his hand against his aching leg as the rheumatics of an old injury twinged in protest at his long hours sitting still. “It is very important you heed me exactly. If we are to neutralise the threat that Seireitei poses, we need to work hard... and to anticipate their every move before they have even thought of it.”

Author’s Note

If there’s anyone here who still doesn’t know who Keitarou is, where have you been? xD Yep, the demon is back!

For those who don’t know the ‘past’ that exists between Keitarou and the people of Seireitei, in briefest terms, he is an exile whose father was killed by Seireitei and a scientific genius who wants revenge on the Clans. His family name is Aizen, and he is Sousuke’s ancestor. Another ancestor of Sousuke’s will appear during this story. If you’ve read Mirror, Flower, Water, Moon, you’ll know to look out for him... but if you haven’t, it really doesn’t matter at all ;).

Kurotsuchi Masaya is a new character for this story and is intended as an ancestor of our beloved (?) Mayuri. More about him — and Katsura, and the other young man — later in the story.

Also, don’t please have too many expectations of this quick an upload every week. The only reason this one is going up now is because right now my university net is working, and I already had this chapter readied for upload.

My laptop and FFnet have had a few arguments converting word to FF format, so if any of the sentences run together or seem oddly formatted with spaces missing, please don’t send me lots of reviews about it it’s because FFnet doesn’t like docx files and so I have to convert, sometimes it messes up the format.

4. Heaven's First

Chapter Three: Heaven's First

It was turning into a nice evening.

Kirio hummed a tune to herself, pushing back the sliding door and stepping into the Thirteenth Division gymnasium, pausing to cast a cursitory eye over the chamber's smooth wooden surface. Earlier in the day, she knew, two of the recruits had been assigned to sweeping and polishing the planking, and as she picked her way carefully across the wood, she found herself scanning their work for any sign of slacking or oversight.

It was a tradition of Juushirou's, she mused pensively, pausing to open the sword cupboard and gazing into the darkness beyond for the tool that she wanted. Recruits to Thirteenth Division were always tested with a mixture of menial tasks and hard sparring, and a faint smile of nostalgia crossed her features as she remembered her own such initiation, some several years before.

I didn't understand it, then. I wasn't sure how polishing floors and replacing paper panels would help me in any way become a better shinigami or control my spirit power more easily. I didn't understand anything at all back then — I was such a kid.

She pulled two of the asauchi from their holders, holding them up to the light to examine the blades for signs of damage and wear.

"Looks like the kids have done a good job, for once."

A voice from behind startled her and she jumped, one asauchi slipping through her fingers to the floor below with a clatter. Indignant, she spun around, meeting the interloper's amused expression with a dark one of her own.

"What are you trying to do, scare me half to death?" she demanded, bending to pick up the blade and examining the floor for any sign of damage. "You really are an idiot, Tenichi — what if that had scratched the floor?"

"Then you'd have had to explain to Ukitake-taichou why you were clumsy with his swords," Kotetsu Tenichi said unrepentantly, crossing the floor towards her and taking the weapon from her hands, turning it over. "Doesn't look like this is in too bad shape, though. You worry too much.”

“I am still working, you know,” Kirio snatched back the sword, shoving it with some force back into its holder and repeating the motion with the second. “I’m meant to be checking and sharpening the weapons with the most wear, and you’re getting in my way. What are you even doing here, anyway? This isn’t your kennel now — or had you forgotten that little fact?”

“So cold!” Tenichi adopted a wounded expression, but there was still a glitter of humour in his vivid eyes. “Is that any way to speak to your classmate and close friend? I came by to visit, of course. Why else? I had some time to kill, so I thought I’d come and kill it with familiar faces.”

“Mmhhh,” Kirio pursed her lips, gazing up at her companion with a grimace. “You mean, you thought you’d come and annoy me, as ever. You might be ranking up in Seventh now, Tenichi-kun, but you haven’t changed even the slightest bit since you were here. You ought to watch that — you’ll get yourself into trouble, and Endou-taichou isn’t as lenient as Ukitake-taichou when it comes to mischief.”

“No kidding,” Tenichi ran his fingers through his thick reddish gold hair. “Though it’s not really Endou-taichou that’s the problem, or, really, the Fukutaichou. It’s Kikyue-dono that I’m keenest to keep out of the way of — she’s worse than the pair of them put together, if you know what I mean.”

“That sounds suspiciously like you ran away here to hide from her,” Kirio said darkly. “Taichou will only send you back if he sees you, you know. We’re plenty busy with our own things here, and it doesn’t look good if members of other divisions are swanning around our barracks letting themselves into secure areas.”

“I know my way around Thirteenth Division in my sleep,” Tenichi said flippantly. “Don’t be like that Kirio-chan. I didn’t come to cause you any trouble. I actually came to see Ketsui, rather than you — but since I don’t sense his reiatsu anywhere around, I thought you’d be as good a distraction whilst I waited as any other.”

“A distraction, huh?” Kirio snorted. “I ought to slap you silly for that. You really haven’t changed the tiniest bit — unlike your brother, I hasten to add. Ketsui’s out at the moment with Naoko-san and Atsudane-san, on some kind of recon mission for the Taichou. I don’t know where they went, before you ask me — I’m not Ketsui’s minder, and he’s a grown man in his own right now. He doesn’t need you to watch over him like an anxious nursemaid any more.”

“You really are cross with me, aren’t you?” Tenichi eyed her pensively. “Am I really that unwelcome a presence around these parts now I’ve transferred? I know Thirteenth has a family spirit, but surely you’re not still cross with me for going?”

“Did I hit the nail on the head?” he asked curiously. “I didn’t think I meant that much to you, Kirio-chan — did I miscalculate your opinion of me?”

“No...” Kirio shook her head, closing the cupboard door and grabbing him by the arm, dragging him across the gymnasium towards the back door that led out onto the grasslands which divided Thirteenth Division from the central Council compound. “It’s not that. I was just thinking about when we were recruits here earlier, and you surprised me... nothing more than that.”

“Well, if you say so,” Tenichi shrugged, allowing himself to be hauled away from the wood-panel building. “I don’t think Ukitake-tai would mind as much as you think, though, if I came by to visit. He did tell me I was always welcome, and even though you say I don’t have to watch out for Ketsui any more... well, I always have, and always will. There isn’t anyone else, you know that — you said yourself that you’re not Ketsui’s minder, and I wouldn’t ask you to be. Since Kaasan died, there’s only been him and me. Even though we’re in different divisions now, I want to make sure he’s doing okay.”

“You heard about the fight with the Hollow, then, I suppose?” Kirio dropped down on the grass, pulling her companion down with her. “I should have known. You’d sense Ketsui’s zanpakutou mile away... you came to make sure he didn’t take injury, didn’t you?”

“I suppose I did,” Tenichi admitted, looking sheepish. “He’d yell at me, I’m pretty sure — as you say, he’s grown up and he doesn’t need me to protect him any more. It’s an old habit that dies hard, though — and to tell the truth, the idea of him in danger still scares me far too much. You can call me a silly, flustery older brother if you like, but it doesn’t make it any different.”

“I sort of envy it, and always have,” Kirio admitted, leaning back on her elbows and gazing up at the stars overhead. “My sister and brother disappeared to goodness knows where and left me to fend for myself. If I hadn’t been taken in by the Hikifune family, I would’ve probably starved to death, or been eaten by a Hollow, or something horrible like that. You always had Irie-san, and Ketsui, too. Even when it was hard, you stuck together. I envied that a lot, you know.”

She sighed.

“My adoptive family care about me, but they are scared of my spirit power, and don’t know how to handle it,” she added resignedly. “The Academy taught me to manage it, but as a shinigami, I’ve put a wedge between myself and them. They like to know I’m doing all right..but as far as family goes, I suppose there’s nobody looking out for me like you’re looking out for Ketsui.”

“You’re wrong,” Tenichi gestured towards the division barracks. “You have a whole division full of people looking out for you. That’s something Thirteenth has that isn’t easily duplicated elsewhere — trust me.”

“Is Seventh really that bad?” Kirio looked surprised, and Tenichi grimaced, shrugging his shoulders.

“It isn’t bad,” he said cautiously. “It’s different, and that’s all. True, there’s not the same prejudice against District people that there are in some squads, thanks to the time Ukitake-tai spent in Seventh District, and Endou-taichou isn’t particularly unfair. Kikyue-dono is a demon in wolf’s clothing, and that’s no exaggeration — but on the whole, now I’ve got the bit between my teeth, it’s all right. It doesn’t compare to here, of course, but I never expected it to.”

“I thought you were the one who wanted to go to Seventh?” Kirio looked confused. “Surely Taichou didn’t push you out?”

“No, I chose it,” Tenichi agreed. “I came from Seventh, remember? Just like you, originally, I was born in Seventh District. Besides, it’s what you said about Ketsui, too. If I’m here, I’m always watching him far more than my own duty. Taichou spoke to me about it a couple of times, and Fukutaichou too. It’s only gonna put one of us in danger, if we’re in the same squad. I’m stronger than Ketsui, and older, so it’s obvious that I should be the one to go somewhere else. I can cope on my own, but Ketsui takes longer to adjust to new surroundings. That’s the real reason why.”

“Mm,” Tenichi cast her a faint smile. “It’s something of a weight off my mind to go into a fight knowing that I can give my all and not worry that my little brother is somewhere around, blade drawn, and possibly in danger. Seventh and Thirteenth patrol different areas, so this way Ketsui and I can just be brothers. We don’t have to be battle partners, too.”

“Maybe you have grown up more than I thought,” Kirio reflected. “What about Seventh District, though? You’re there a lot, these days, and no offence, but I would’ve thought you’d not want to go there at all. You and I both remember horrible things there much more clearly than Ketsui, and though Endou-taichou has helped change that, the memories don’t go away that quickly. Why would you choose Seventh to go to, with the background we have? It confused me then and it still confuses me now.”

“Mm,” Tenichi paused for a moment, and Kirio saw his eyes cloud over. “You want to know the truth?”

“That’s why I’m asking,” Kirio agreed. “Well? Why Seventh?”

“I want to find Father,” Tenichi offered her a crooked smile. “I know he’s there, somewhere, and I’d like to know where.”

“Father? Daisuke-san?” Kirio was taken aback. “But he’s dead... isn’t he? Your father... he died before you and I even met?”

“He did,” Tenichi clenched his fists, nodding his head. “I never knew where or how, not really... but I thought that, now I’m grown up, I ought to go and pay my respects to him. Thanks to his actions, Ketsui and I grew up free and safe from all the bad things in Seventh. Father wasn’t so lucky — I at least want to find his grave and thank him for the sacrifice he made for us.”

“Does Ketsui know that?” Kirio asked, and Tenichi shook his head.

“Ketsui doesn’t remember Father like I do,” he said simply. “It would simply burden him more, bringing the past into the present. This is something I want to do, and being in Seventh Division allows me to patrol the areas where I might find him. Even if it takes my whole career, I’ll track him down. That’s my hidden motive — well? Is it a shameful one, or do you approve?”

“Daisuke-san would probably be proud of both of you,” Kirio said softly. “Unlike my kin, yours loved you. I don’t think it’s a shameful thing at all — I think Daisuke-san would be very happy to be visited by his son.”

She got to her feet, hauling her friend up with her.

“Meanwhile, you ought to go back to base before Kikyue-dono realises you’ve slipped out,” she advised lightly. “Otherwise you might find yourself scattered on the breeze before you get to hunt Daisuke-san’s resting place down. I’ll tell Ketsui you called by, but you can rest assured that he's fine. He fought well against the Hollow and we both took it down with no real problems. He's capable of fighting his own battles, now. You needn't worry about him so much."

"You are watching out for him, despite what you said," Tenichi eyed her keenly, and Kirio reddened, shrugging her shoulders.

"Maybe a little," she acknowledged. "It's a different kind of relationship, though. I'm his senpai — we're not blood relatives so it's not the same."

"I'll trust him to you, then, for now," Tenichi reflected. "Pass my regards on to the Taichou and Fukutaichou when you see them, all right? I'll do as you say and head back — if the swords don't get checked, you'll get disciplined too, won't you?"

"I suppose so," Kirio cast a guilty glance back in the direction of the barracks, and Tenichi grinned.

"I'll see you soon, then, no doubt," he told her, offering her a wink. "Take care and make sure Ketsui does the same, all right? I'm counting on you."

With that he was gone, slipping into shunpo like a ghost into the evening mist, and Kirio let out a heavy sigh, turning back towards the barracks and the waiting asauchi.

"Of course we miss you, Tenichi-kun," she murmured absently to herself, pushing back the sliding door and stepping into the training chamber, hurrying across the wood to continue her inspection of the blades. "But if you're going to find Daisuke-san, then I suppose that's all right. Irie-san would want you to do that, too. She never got to visit Daisuke-san's grave, and I know it hurt her — if you did it for her, maybe she'd be more able to rest in peace."

"Very touching. Very touching indeed."

As Tenichi made his way back towards the Seventh Division barracks, a voice from the darkness made him pause, his brow creasing in consternation as he turned to look for the speaker.

"You won't see me, so you needn't try and blow both of our covers by looking for me," the voice scolded him, and though he could see nobody, from the darkness he felt a sudden, sharp tap of something against the back of his neck. Instinctively he froze, recognising the ice cold sensation of a blade point, and a soft chuckle came from out of the black.

The words were so soft, Tenichi could barely make them out against the evening breeze, but from the race of reiatsu that surged suddenly through his body, he knew that he was not alone.

“Don’t speak. Don’t move. Pretend nothing is happening,” the voice continued softly, and Tenichi felt a slight scratch of metal against his skin. “You can hear me, and that’s enough. You don’t need to see me — you wouldn’t remember my face, even if I did show it to you. It’s better for both of us if you don’t turn around... I don’t want anyone’s attention to be drawn out here.”

“Who are you?” A faint hiss escaped Tenichi’s lips, and suddenly the pressure of the blade became firmer against his neck.

“I told you not to speak!”

From the darkness, something long and thin uncoiled itself, wrapping its considerable length around his throat and tugging slightly, causing him to cough.

“I don’t want to hurt you, so long as you don’t move. I have my orders not to bring you back dead,” the voice continued, calm and even. “You can’t even imagine what I might be capable of, so it would be better that you didn’t even try to fight me. I’m not the kind of enemy you can take down.”

For a moment, Tenichi considered calling his assailant’s bluff, his fingers glimmering briefly with Kidou energy.

“I wouldn’t, if I were you.”

The voice was no more than the hiss of a snake, and Tenichi felt the invader coil more tightly around his throat. “Just because I need you alive doesn’t mean I can’t do damage to you if it gets my job done more quickly.”

“Who are you? What do you want?” Tenichi’s words were hoarse, anger glittering in his eyes, and a deep, throaty chuckle came out of the darkness.

“One who does the bidding of someone you’d do better not to cross,” came the cryptic answer. “It’s best not to ask too many questions. He has sent for you — that’s all you need to know.”

“He? Who?”

Tenichi felt a little pull at his throat as the creature uncoiled itself, but before he could react, two thin hands clamped themselves around his wrists, and the shinigami felt the ominous click of bracelets fastening themselves against his skin. Frustrated, he tried to pull free, but he knew it was a futile effort. In the gloom, he could not see his assailant beyond the long, pale fingers and heavy black sleeves — but he knew that the bands on his arms were spirit draining cuffs, and he was now helpless to defend himself with his sword or with Kidou.

Inwardly he berated himself for not having taken the risk to attack, but it was too late now.

“Come with me,” his companion repeated, his voice gentle yet somehow Tenichi knew it was not a request.

“Where are we going?” he asked quietly, knowing it was probably a futile question, but voicing it anyway.

There was no answer, and the ghoulish figure tugged on his wrists, pulling him headlong into a sea of darkness.

Seri leant back on her hands, gazing up at the darkening sky that spread out like a great black blanket over the Spiritless Zone, its surface peppered with the tiniest of white specks. The moon was nowhere in evidence that evening, as it was the night of the new moon, yet with the flickering light of their campfire and the brave glittering of the stars, it was far from gloomy. “Mitsuki, stop looking so fretful. We’ve been on the hoof for almost a day, now, and we’ve encountered nothing strange on our travels. Buchou was probably just covering all bases — it doesn’t mean there’s something there for us to find.”

“Seri, you shouldn’t be so insensitive,” another member of the group Mitsuki had selected to accompany her across the Zone put in reproachfully. “This is Mitsuki’s first time in command of a mission — of course she’s going to worry about it. She’s got us old hands to back her up, but she’s the one who’s got to report back to Buchou when we return to base camp.”

Mitsuki stirred from her reverie, shaking her head slightly to indicate she had heard their conversation. “I do have to report to Buchou, but it isn’t that I’m worried about what he’ll say if we don’t find anything. On the contrary, I’m hoping we don’t... but I’m certain he wouldn’t have sent us out here if it was that simple. I can’t help thinking whatever it is is just beneath the surface — and if we don't find it soon, more people might get hurt."

"You're taking it very seriously, though," the final member of the group, a young woman of about Seri's height put in from where she had been stoking the fire. "We can't find something that isn't there to find. True, the last raid on the Plus souls' homes was brutal, but there's been no evidence of a repeat, and..."

"Those souls were tainted, Haseyo," Mitsuki interrupted softly. "They were corrupted somehow — maybe by the Hollow, maybe by something else. That 'something else' is what we're looking to find. If we can't find it — there's a good chance that Seireitei might consider us to be the contaminant and remove us from here altogether."

"Leaving the people of the Spiritless Zone without protection," Seri sighed, stretching her hands over her head. "When you say it like that, Mitsuki-chan, it makes sense. What's decided by the Council is out of our hands, though. Retsu-sama will make decisions and recall us or leave us based on what she learns from the report Buchou already sent back to base. We can't do much about it now except follow orders and check all the other possible alternatives. Look on the bright side. Right now, nobody is being hurt, right? Right now, if Rukongai is peaceful, that means everything is fine."

"I wonder about that," Mitsuki rested her chin in her hands. "It seems quiet and restful, but for some reason I can't help being on edge."

"Tomorrow we'll be practically on the borders of the Spiritless Zone," Kazuki observed, spreading the map out beside the campfire and using the flames as light to see their course through the charted territory. "It's funny, isn't it? With all of the attacks we dealt with here in Junrin'an, none of the Hollow raids have happened so close to the edge of the Zone. You'd think that, if something was leaking in through the Sekkiseki barrier, they'd be the first places hit."

"The same is true in the North," Haseyo reflected pensively. "None of the border shanties in Hokutan have been hit, but that one further in was pretty much wasted. It's still a wide stretch of land to consider, but I suppose that does indicate something inside the Spiritless Zone is the key, rather than an outside force."

"The question is, do we count as an inside force or an outside one?" Mitsuki wondered aloud, pausing to glance at Kazuki's map. "We've been here for some time now, so we could be considered either."

"More likely it's something else," Seri reflected. "Maybe it's a failing with the shinigami sending souls through to Rukongai from the Real World. Perhaps they're tainting them with their swords when they bury the souls."

"If that was the case, wouldn't the barrier around the Spiritless Zone prevent them from slipping through?" Haseyo asked. "I thought that was the point of making it so strong — they didn't want anything like that slipping in and turning Hollow."

"Then where do the souls go who are tainted?" Kazuki looked confused. "I mean, if what Seri said is right, and careless shinigami are using konsou without paying due care to their own spirit levels, what happens to the poor, unfortunate soul that they happen to mess up on? Where do they go? If not within the Spiritless Zone, where?"

"I don't think that's happening, Kazuki," Haseyo said matter-of-factly. "We're all trained far too hard and for far too long about the dangers of incorrect konsou. Goodness knows that the souls coming here are plentiful enough — it's unlikely that any would miss the net."

"What about the ones who are now tainted, though?" Mitsuki rested her chin in her hands. "Buchou talks about them being relocated or evacuated, but where too? Inside the Spiritless Zone is too unsafe, for them and for the other souls they're mixing with. That means outside — I hope the Gotei have devised an action plan for dealing with Pluses tainted by no fault of their own."

"You think it's infectious?" Kazuki asked, and Mitsuki shrugged.

"We don't know enough about the causes or reasons for it to assume it is or it isn't," she pointed out. "In a worst case scenario, it could be like an epidemic, if we left it unchecked, and then there would be no point in having a Spiritless Zone at all. That said, though..."

"No doubt the Council have thought about that," Seri mused. "They've been pretty quick with things like that so far. Maybe there's another area cordoned off in readiness for little accidents of nature such as those. We wouldn't need to know about it, since it's outside our brief. We patrol the Spiritless Zone... maybe that's the real reason for recalling so many of the Fourth squads from this area. Perhaps they've sent our comrades to police those sectors whilst we stick it out here... it's more than likely, thinking about it, because we're the division best suited for this kind of work and even the most moderate combat shinigami would probably do a Plus soul more harm than good."

stabilises and becomes a safe space for Plus souls to exist,” Haseyo agreed. “It would be strange if they hadn’t thought out that side of things, too. We all know there were corrupted souls in this area before they started building barriers and so on — that’s one reason why so many Hollows were lurking in this area and why they were lured to feed on the unprotected population. It will just take time to eradicate the problems, that’s all. This is only the beginning of the project, really. It might take years to iron everything out, and decades or even centuries before they can expand the Spiritless Zone into more areas of Rukongai.”

“I’d still like to know if we’re the reason those souls have to be evacuated,” Mitsuki murmured. “Even if the Gotei are providing for them, they’re being uprooted from what’s become their homes. It might seem stupid, but I can’t help being bothered about it. If they’re suffering because we’re here, then we ought to go back to Seireitei as soon as possible.”

She got to her feet, checking to make sure Yuuyugo was securely sealed in its scabbard before scooping up her cloak from the ground and wrapping it firmly around her shoulders.

“Mitsuki?” Seri looked startled, staring at her friend in some confusion. “Where are you going? It’s late now, and we ought to be sorting out who’s on night watch, not venturing off into the forest on our own!”

“I’m not going to go far,” Mitsuki assured them. “I’m restless at the moment and I won’t sleep or sit guard safely until I’ve got the jitters out of my system. Something is preying on my nerves tonight and I don’t want it to affect my judgement. I’ll be back shortly, I promise — in the meantime, Seri, Buchou would want me to leave you in charge.”

She smiled.

“Whatever you decide about the night watch rotation, I’ll go along with,” she added. “I’ll take what you give me, and leave it in your hands.”

“I suppose that counts as an order, so I guess I have no choice,” Seri grimaced, but nodded her head. “Okay. Make sure you’re not long, though. Perhaps the area is quiet now, but just in case there's the slightest possibility of danger, we ought to stick together as much as possible. Your sword is awesome when it comes to healing, but she's not much cop in a battle situation and I don't want to take you back to base in chunks."

"Understood," Mitsuki acknowledged, a rueful grin relieving some of the tension that had blighted her clever features. "Don't worry. I'll just patrol round and then head back here."

She patted Yuuyugo absently.

"Maybe I'm not good at combat," she added, "but Yuuyugo will keep me alert for danger, and I won't take any unnecessary risks."

With one last grin, she was gone into the darkness, moving swiftly with quick, deft flashsteps through the trees towards the river that snaked across the southern region of the Spiritless Zone. It had not always been such a fast-flowing river, she reflected, as she dropped out of shunpo at the water's edge, bending to trail her fingers through the glittering water. When Seireitei had begun to plan this project, a huge amount of work had been done to bring the meandering water source more directly through the centre, to provide sustenance for as many Plus souls as possible. As a result, what had once been little more than a twisting stream was now a good six feet across and deeper than human height in places. Bridges fashioned from brand new slats of Seireitei timber forded the river at intervals along its length, sturdy and secure in their foundations, and as Mitsuki crossed by way of one of these constructions, she reflected on how much hard work and faith had gone into creating this protected space.

It will all be for nothing if the reiatsu issue can't be resolved. Hollows are here now just as they were before, but with only us to take them down. Things are becoming ever more hectic, and there are only eleven or so of us stationed here to cover the entire area. I wonder how much longer we can call this a safe haven — even in the quiet areas, there's the scent of something uneasy on the breeze.

She rested her hands on the edge of the bridge, gazing out pensively across the landscape. In the gloom, she could just make out the uneven tops of what, to the Zone's residents, comprised houses, simple and unadorned yet functional all the same. The people who lived here lacked most of the comforts of Seireitei, but they had water and shelter and, at least for now, protection from the marauding beasts that tormented them in the Real World.

Plus souls don't belong in that world and they don't belong in ours.

They're trapped in limbo, waiting for the time their spirit matter disperses and spreads back into the ether to be reborn as a new life somewhere else.

She sighed, resting her chin in her hands.

To keep this world in balance, they're a vital part of the chain of rebirth — but although the Gotei and the Council are working flat out to reduce the amount of Hollow incursions in any part of Soul Society, plenty still remain. They're in the Real World, they're in Seireitei and, still, they're here. This feels very much like the calm before some kind of storm... irrational it might be, but I can't shake the feeling.

“Oneesan?”

The high, reedy voice startled her out of her reverie and she turned, making out the form of a young girl no older than some of the injured children she and her companions had helped to nurse in the ravaged areas of the Spiritless Zone to the north. This youngster was robed in the same thin, flimsy sack-cloth, wound round at her waist with a length of grubby ribbon, and in her hands she clutched a dirty piece of pottery, eying the shinigami with a mixture of confusion and hope. As she looked down at the child, Mitsuki was relieved to note that she detected no spiritual pulse of energy coming from the youngster's aura. Unlike the victims of the Hollow raid, this child was a pure Plus soul, one of the many who had benefited from the inception of the Spiritless Zone and one who was comfortable enough in her life to approach the strange shinigami without an inch of fear.

“Oneesan, will you help me?” the girl asked now, dark braid of hair falling over her shoulder as she gazed up at Mitsuki earnestly. “I need to gather water from the river for Obasan and I but it's running so quickly and I'm afraid I'll fall in. I don't know how to swim, and it's too deep for me here. One of the boys from my village got washed away in it just last month, and I don't want the river to eat me, too.”

She proffered the bowl, and Mitsuki smiled, reaching out to pat the young girl gently on the head.

“I don't see why not,” she agreed warmly. ‘Which is your village? The one on the far bank of the river? I see,’ as the girl bobbed her head in a nod. “The river does run very quickly here, it's true. All right, then. Lets see what I can do about getting you some water.”

The girl's eyes lit up as Mitsuki carefully took the bowl, skipping along behind the shinigami as though they had been lifelong friends and not brief acquaintances.

“My name is Yukio,” she offered cheerfully. “What's your name,

Oneesan?”

“Mitsuki,” Mitsuki replied frankly, stepping off the bridge and making sure her small companion navigated the slight dip in the wooden structure to land safely on the far bank. “You know, it can be dangerous to be out so late at night, and especially to talk to people you don’t know. Your Obasan might be worried about you — you ought to take care.”

“No, I knew you wouldn’t hurt me,” the girl spoke with complete confidence, her piping voice clear and bright in the quiet night air. “Obasan told me that if I saw someone dressed in black and white, I could ask them for help. They’re shinigami, she told me. I don’t know what that is, exactly, but she said that you’re here to help us. That’s true, isn’t it, Oneesan? That’s why I knew I could ask you.”

Despite herself, Mitsuki grinned.

“I’m glad you think that way,” she said sincerely. “Your Obasan is right, of course. We are here to look after all of you, as best we can. It’s hard, when there are so many people here, but we do our best.”

Yukio simply beamed, and Mitsuki got down onto her knees, steadying herself on the river bank before dipping the battered ceramic into the flowing river.

The chill of the rushing water made her start, almost loosing her grip on the precious vessel, but she managed to keep a hold of it, pulling it up onto the bank carefully so as not to spill more than the smallest amount.

“It’s heavy,” she observed, eying the child’s thin arms and spindly body pensively. “Shall I come with you, back to your house? You might drop it and that would be a waste, don’t you think?”

“I’m sure I could carry it,” the girl looked at the bowl, but Mitsuki made up her mind, shaking her head.

“I’m here to help you, remember?” she said lightly, ruffling the girl’s hair playfully and leaving glittering drops of cold water against the dusty dark waves. “That means that I should help you take this home. It isn’t as though it’s far — and I’d be happier knowing you got back to your village safe and sound.”

“All right, then,” Yukio agreed at length. “Obasan won’t mind, since you’re a shinigami. She wouldn’t mind me coming with you at all.”

“Your Obasan sounds very kind,” Mitsuki hauled the bowl back up into her arms, the young child trotting along merrily beside her as though this kind of encounter was an everyday occurrence to her. “Have you lived with her for long?”

She beamed.

“She gave me the name Yukio,” she added brightly. “I didn’t have a proper name before that, only ‘musume’, and stuff like that. Obasan had a little girl too, where she came from. She missed her, and I was on my own. She looks after me and I let her share my shelter. Yukio was her daughter’s name, so she called me that. It’s nice having a name, isn’t it? I don’t really know if I had a name before, but I can’t remember even if I do. Just, I like living with Obasan. It’s better than being on my own.”

“I’m sure it is,” Mitsuki nodded, pressing her lips together pensively as they mounted the small bank that divided the river’s land from the settlement boundaries. “It sounds like a happy ending for both of you. I’m glad.”

“Me too,” Yukio beamed, and Mitsuki was struck by the child’s genuine innocence. Despite how little she had, the child was happy and content with her lot.

Thanks to the Spiritless Zone. Thanks to the Council. Maybe, even, thanks to us.

This thought warmed Mitsuki’s doubting heart a little.

Perhaps we are making a positive contribution. Perhaps it isn’t us that’s making the Hollows come here. Maybe it’s some kind of other technical leak — something that can be fixed from outside, so we won’t have to be recalled.

Yukio’s Obasan was a plump lady who had left life in the Real World in middle age, her hair greying but still quite dark and a genuine, welcoming smile that dimpled her cheeks. She greeted Yukio fondly, thanked Mitsuki warmly for her help, and wished her a safe journey back to her base. As Mitsuki left the village, she found herself remembering the reasons she had come to Rukongai in the first instance.

We came here to help. This was my vocation — I left everything in Seireitei behind because I wanted to be a healer and work with people who needed me. The Kuchiki Clan, my friends, even Juushirou are all there, living their lives around each other, and I miss them all a lot. Still, I want to stay here, because this is where I can make the most difference. There are many, many healers in Seireitei, but now there are only eleven in the Spiritless Zone. We need to be here and we need to make it work. I shouldn't doubt in myself just because some unexplained things have happened. We'll overcome them, and we'll move forward. I'm sure Retsu-sama will find the answers to Buchou's questions and then we'll take the necessary steps to fix the problem once and for all.

A faint rustle from the bushes near the bridge alerted her to the fact that someone else was abroad that evening, and she turned, her eyes squinting in the darkness as she tried to make out her companion's location. It was hard, she recognised wryly, when your companions were mostly Plus souls, for even for one as sensitive as Mitsuki, picking out their presence was far more difficult without requisite amounts of spiritual reiatsu.

This person was different, though, she soon realised, for as he stepped out from the shadows and into clearer view, she picked up the faint, flickering presence of a spiritual identity, cloaked and concealed but not sealed away enough to fool her healer's senses.

She frowned, once more suddenly on her guard.

"Can I help you?"

She raised her voice, hearing her words echoing in the otherwise quiet valley, and her fingers strayed to Yuuyugo, even though she knew she would not be able to put up much of a fight. At her sudden tension, however, the other person laughed, raising his hands to indicate that he bore no weapons about his person.

"I'm sorry," he spoke in even, friendly tones, his quiet words carrying easily on the night wind. "I was just passing through, and heard voices. I thought there might be danger, and so I hid, in case the girl needed help."

"You thought she was in danger... because of me?" Mitsuki's brow creased, and the stranger shrugged.

"You have the sword," he said frankly.

"I'm a healer. I'm not here to hurt the villagers." Mitsuki was taken aback, and the stranger lowered his head in a sage nod.

"I know. I saw. It was kind of you, to go out of your way to help the child get water."

He paused, and though she could not see him clearly, Mitsuki had the impression that she was being scrutinised by the dark eyes that lingered beneath the hood of his cloak.

“I hadn’t seen a shinigami act like that before,” he admitted. “I’m sorry that I thought you might harm her.”

“No harm done,” Mitsuki sighed, letting out her breath in a rush. “I wish I could say that everyone viewed us as peacekeepers... unfortunately you’re not the only one to see our swords and feel fear.”

She frowned.

“Your aura is contaminated,” she added softly. “You’ve been in contact with something dangerous — you should be careful where you roam. If you came back with me...”

She trailed off, as her companion shook his head.

“I travel,” he said cryptically. “I belong nowhere, but I won’t bother you.”

“Even so, the Spiritless Zone is...”

Mitsuki began, but the stranger had already disappeared, melting into the bushes and the surrounding landscape as though he had never been there. Slightly chilled, Mitsuki glanced all around her, but try as she might she could no longer pick up any trace of his presence, nor see which way he had gone.

She frowned, the chill breeze blowing suddenly and briskly across the river making her remember her promise to her companions not to stray for too long. Whoever the young man was, she reflected, they would have to locate him another time — perhaps in daylight, when darkness would less hamper their progress. It bothered her that someone with a tainted aura was so far south of their base camp, in this pure, clean area of Plus souls — yet deep down Mitsuki knew that wasn’t what had struck her. There was something intangible about the man’s presence, as though he had been a ghost among dead souls, there but not quite real all the same.

Mitsuki, huh?

The words whispered across her thoughts unbidden, making her jump and swing around. It had sounded like his voice, but breathy and indistinct, and she dismissed the thought almost as soon as she had had it. She was tired, and her mind was full of many things, she scolded herself, turning back onto the path that led to the base camp. Maybe she had hallucinated the stranger completely — in her current state of mind, she wouldn’t rule out the possibility.

A soft chuckle brushed against her thoughts, as though trying to make a fool of her.

It was nice to meet you, Mitsuki-dono, she thought she heard a voice whisper, though she knew deep down it couldn't be any more than the rustle of the elm trees shifting and swaying on the night breeze.

With any luck, we'll soon meet again.

5. Savage Land

Chapter Four : Savage Land

Her name had been Mitsuki.

Katsura hopped deftly across the river, using the bridge only as a support as he leapt from stone to stone through one of the shallowest points of the racing water. He knew the whole of this area like the back of his hand, so used was he to slipping in and out of the Spiritless Zone's confines, but in all the times he had visited here, he had never encountered her before.

Pausing to skim a pebble or two across the racing surface of the water, Katsura reflected again on the chance encounter. He had hidden his presence instinctively at her approach, not wanting to give himself away to one he had assumed would be an enemy, but when he had spotted the young child skipping along alone towards the bridge, he had been unable to pull back entirely. Katsura had spent a lifetime around Rukongai's people, both those with and without spirit power, and so, although the girl was also a stranger to him, he still felt he had a duty to protect her from harm. The shinigami had come and had killed indiscriminately, had they not? The shinigami had caused pain and confusion and created divisions between families and peoples that were unnecessary and cruel. He had never thought anything of them other than as black avengers in grim uniforms the colour of death, so at the sight of the young woman with her sword clipped to her belt for all to see, he had been ready to launch in and save the day.

Shinigami are the enemy of Rukongai and District Seireitei.

He watched the pebble skip across the ripples before it disappeared beneath the surface, and frowned, chewing down on his lip as he considered this problem.

Shinigami hurt those weaker than them, abandon them and leave them in ruin to suffer and starve. Shinigami are the reason that everything is topsy turvy. Because of them, we live like we do. Because of the shinigami, we're cast out of Seireitei and forced to live like beggars and like thieves. Because of the shinigami...

His thoughts trailed off as he remembered once again Mitsuki's soft, gentle way of dealing with the young girl, how easily she had agreed to help the child and how she had gone out of her way to take the water back to the youngster's village in order to make sure both got home safely.

His brows furrowed in confusion.

No matter how he thought about it, she didn't seem like an enemy.

He sank down onto the riverbank, resting his chin in his hands as he considered.

Perhaps there are some shinigami we don't know about. Kind shinigami, who help the people here and don't hurt them. Maybe it's too easy to assume they're all lurking with ulterior motives and dark agendas. I've seen enough of them in Seireitei, attacking Hollows and abandoning villagers to rebuild their livelihoods as best they can. I've done my fair share of lifting timber for old ladies widowed by war and famine whilst the Gotei simply stand by and watch. I thought that was how things were everywhere... but maybe I was wrong.

He sighed, gazing up at the sky.

Mitsuki. He supposed her name meant 'beautiful moon', but his eyes scanned the sky in vain for any sign of the celestial satellite. It was a new moon tonight, then, he realised, a faint smile of irony touching his lips. The only moon on the horizon that evening had been the fair skinned, dark-haired healer who had come so unexpectedly across his path.

He closed his eyes, trying to get a fix on her location, but it was no good. She was too far out of his range to reach now — even when she had been standing before him, he had only been able to touch her thoughts with the vaguest hint of contact. She had a strong aura, he supposed — far more guarded and well trained than the Hollows whose actions he could dictate almost without trying.

Maybe I can't do that with shinigami. I've never really tried, so I don't know... perhaps there are limits to my powers after all.

He sighed, opening his eyes and resting his chin in his hands.

It's a pity. I never had any trouble persuading some of the District wenches that they'd like to come play with me after work on the village was done. Mind you, Seireitei women are one thing — even Rukongai ones would probably not register on his radar. He's always indulged me and he'd see it as just another one of my games. If I was to start chasing after female shinigami, though, I'm sure he'd have something to say about it. He has a bee in his bonnet about them — that's one path better off not followed.

He got to his feet, not bothering to brush the mud from his already grimy cloak.

I'm wasting time. Finding Hollows within the Spiritless Zone is a tricky business at the best of times. All these barriers and divides designed to keep spirit power out... it makes my job a whole lot more difficult than it ever is in Seireitei. I don't know what the point is of this, anyway. Controlling Hollows inside a place where only Plus souls are meant to be seems pretty meaningless to me. Surely we're only going to hurt people who can't fight back? We'd do much better wresting Seireitei away from the Shinigami by driving all our forces that way... but I guess I know better than to ask too many questions and make too many complaints.

He rubbed his temples.

I'd like to take a break, but I suppose there's no rest for the wicked. It'll only be my neck on the line if I don't have anything to report back when I return... and I won't be alone for much longer.

His eyes narrowed to near slits, and he gazed around him as if expecting to see someone materialise out of the night air.

I wonder whether she's already come through to this side. It's such a pain, not being able to read her movements. If Koku were here, maybe he'd be able to get a lock on her... but as it is it's just me, and I'll have to handle her as best I can — providing I even manage to find her.

He stifled a yawn, realising as he did so that he was almost asleep on his feet. He had been on the move since the same time the previous evening, and it was not as though there was anything to eat within the Spiritless Zone. It was a pity — he could have used a snack, if just to keep him going till first light. Still, there was no embargo on sleeping, and if he could not recharge his body one way, it would have to be the other. Almost instinctively he began looking around him for a safe place of shelter to spend the rest of the night.

It's some hours till the sun rises, yet. A short nap won't hurt, surely? Tomorrow I'll need every inch of my wits about me, if Sakaki really intends on crossing over to the Spiritless Zone a second time. I won't get a chance to close my eyes then, in case she slits my throat to wake me up. I suppose I ought to take advantage of the opportunity whilst I can.

Juushirou paused in the penning of a letter, turning to stare up at the young woman in surprise and consternation.

“Kikyue, why would you think that? Tenichi's a member of Seventh squad now — why would he have spent the night here?”

“I don't know, but I'm running out of places to look.” Endou Kikyue, third seat of the Seventh Division sighed, sinking back against the wall of the Ugendou with a look of frustration on her sharp features. "I'm sorry to trouble you like this, Ukitake-taichou. I didn't miss him at first light, and nobody mentioned his absence at breakfast in the mess hall. Some of our members were on dawn patrol with my brother, and so everyone assumed he was part of the group. When Souja-nii returned, though, there was no sign of him. I spoke to his bunk-mates and they all agreed none of them had seen him since last evening. There's no evidence he returned to Seventh at all yesterday — and I've had recruits searching the place high and low ever since."

"I see," Juushirou rubbed his chin, looking concerned. "That's surprising... I wouldn't have thought of Tenichi as the kind of lad who'd easily break division curfew and roam around Seireitei after hours without good cause."

"I wouldn't put anything past a young man pretty near his prime," Kikyue said categorically, folding her arms across his chest. "Only last week I had to go beyond Inner Seireitei's bounds to drag two of my lower seats from a brothel. Literally from the arms of the courtesans, if you please — as though they had no other cares in the world than to show off their swords and seek pleasure from fallen women."

Juushirou eyed the indignation in his companion's eyes, and hid his smile, amused despite himself at the image of her flying into one of the local houses of pleasure to retrieve her red-faced young recruits from the clutches of their paramours.

She was barely more than twenty one summers, and slenderly built, her height a good half head or more below Juushirou's own when the two stood face to face. She was not well muscled or, at first glance, a particularly strong individual, but one look at the glittering ferocity that burned in the depths of her pale blue eyes told anyone who happened to look her way that the soul within was strong.

She was dressed properly in the black and white of a squad shinigami, the crest of the Endou family hanging in a silvery pendant about her throat, and her thick dark hair tied back from her face in a long, strictly regimented braid. Stray wisps had pulled themselves free from it already, framing her face and softening her sharp, hawk-like features. The Endou were known as hunters, their sword spirits taking the form of various birds of prey, and, glancing at her now, with angry frustration bubbling in those silvery blue eyes, Juushirou felt certain he could see that predatorial spirit shining through. Though Third seat, Kikyue was as abrasive and caustic in her use of words and blade as her older brother was calm and reasoned, and, although it was Souja who was both Endou heir and Vice Captain of Seventh Squad, it was Kikyue whose temper most of the younger members feared. She had held her division rank since the tender age of fifteen, trained by her father's blade and, often, with Juushirou's guiding hand. Her skills had blossomed when she had been only ten or eleven, too quickly and violently for her to be educated as her brother had been at the great Spirit Academy that still dominated First District, and maybe it was that fact itself, Juushirou mused, that had always made Kikyue seem more of a lone hunter than a pack animal, keener to keep the rules than make friends.

Kikyue was still very young, younger, in fact, than the shinigami subordinate she had come to Thirteenth seeking, yet in some ways she had never really been a child at all. She acted on impulse, rarely seeing the inconvenience or discomfort caused by her directness, and, as he pondered on her now, Juushirou knew that she would have thought nothing at all of charging into a brothel to reclaim her members. In fact, he realised with humour, she probably would have dragged them still naked back through the streets if she had had to, without even stopping to consider her dignity or theirs at being seen in such a position.

Yes, as Clan hime went, Endou Kikyue was far from in the normal style.

"That must've been hard," he said now, in reference to her brothel visit, keeping his voice level and turning his gaze back to his letter so that she did not see the mirth in his hazel eyes. "I'm sure, though, that Tenichi isn't that kind of shinigami. In all the time he was with us here in Thirteenth, I never encountered any serious problems with him, either in terms of moral behaviour or discipline. If I had one thing to say about him it was that he was too conscientious — especially where Ketsui was concerned. Because of that, I recommended his transfer, but you already know that much. Otherwise, I can't account for his derelicting his duty. It's very unlike the young boy we trained."

"Please don't think I'm casting any slurs on your division, Ukitake-taichou," Kikyue bit her lip, eying the Captain earnestly, "but I know that Thirteenth has, er, a different way of regulating itself from some of the other squads. I have heard that you are a little more... shall we say... lenient on your subordinates than some places? Perhaps given that fact..."

"Kikyue-chan, your father and I are old school friends, and for that reason, I look on both you and your older brother as an honorary niece and nephew," his humour gone, Juushirou raised his gaze once more from his parchment. “That doesn’t mean that I’ll allow you to come in here and question the moral behaviour of my squad, nor the methods by which we train and maintain discipline. Tenichi is not the kind of young shinigami who frequents inns or brothels, and of that I am sure.”

“My apologies,” Kikyue reddened, bowing her head before the older man. “I didn’t mean... that wasn’t... I just want to find him, that’s all. Having him go to a brothel would be annoying and would call for discipline, of course — but at least it would be an explanation and one that could be quickly resolved.”

“You came to me to ask me if I knew of any such places he might have visited last night, didn’t you?” Juushirou finished his note with a flourish, setting his brush aside. “You’re really quite concerned about his absence, aren’t you, Kikyue-chan?”

“I am,” Kikyue groaned, sinking down onto the tatami-mat floor of the small, square building. “Truth is, his bunk-mates have said the same. Some of them have tried to lure him out after hours, but he’s never shown any interest in either sake or plying the favours of any woman. He’s diligent and dedicated, just as you said. That’s why it troubles me so much that he’s gone.”

“Have you spoken to Hirata and Souja about this?” Juushirou questioned, and Kikyue shook her head.

“Tenichi’s squad is part of my overall patrol. He’s my responsibility,” she said wearily. “If I had to pass it to my Captain or Vice Captain, it would be shameful.”

“They are your family. They’d want to help.”

“That makes it even more of a humiliation,” Kikyue admitted. “Souja-nii would never lose any of his men, and Father..”

She shook her head.

“Father is a true Endou, even though he governs Seventh District in a different way to any who went before him,” she said softly. “Most of the squad are afraid of him, even though he’s done nothing directly to cause it. It’s a healthy level of fear, Ukitake-taichou — a level that breeds obedience and respect. They’ve seen him unleash Tsumi no Fuuhi against Hollows they could not touch, and they’re all too aware of how easily he could shatter their lives just as sure as he shatters the creatures the darkness of this world spews our way. Troubling him about a matter of this nature would be inappropriate. Father would feel the need to become actively involved... which, if Tenichi was simply playing truant from barracks, would end in a far nastier punishment than anything I could dish out.”

“To you, his equal and childhood friend, of course not,” she said matter-of-factly. “Sougyo no Kotowari is stronger than Tsumi no Fuuhi will ever be, and besides, there isn’t a single soul in Seireitei who Father respects more than you, I don’t believe. Think of it from the point of view of those who rank way below him, though. Your members are doubtless not scared of you, because of how you treat each one of them like family. If Father did that, Seventh Division’s discipline would falter and collapse. The Endou are a Clan that necessitate governance by fear, and Father knows how to apply it. For that reason, he couldn’t shy away from treating a District member like Tenichi any differently than he would treat a member of his own kin in the same circumstance.”

“I see,” Juushirou rubbed his chin, acknowledging the truth of the young woman’s words to himself as he did so. “Very well, I understand your reasoning. I haven’t seen him here, Kikyue, but you’re welcome to go speak to Ketsui and Kirio, see if they know anything of him. Ketsui arrived late back at barracks last evening with Naoko and Makoto after completing an errand of mine, and I can’t imagine he would have had time to meet with his brother — but Kirio was here all night and she might know something.”

“Thank you,” Kikyue looked relieved, bowing her head towards her companion in gratitude. “I’m sorry if I was informal or implied insult on your squad, Juushirou-dono. I just want to find him as quickly as I can.”

“Of course you do,” Juushirou bestowed her with a warm smile, reaching over to pat her on the head as though she was still a small child of three or four and not a grown woman, the third seat of Seventh Division whose reputation across Seireitei was both fearsome and legendary. “Run along now, all right? Enishi will be taking the younger members for drill at present, but Kirio shouldn’t be involved in that and you can catch her before she has her turn with the recruits.”

“Yes, sir,” Kikyue bowed again then stood up, offering Juushirou a rare but genuine smile. “I’ll do that. Thank you again.”

She withdrew from the little chamber, and Juushirou sat back, pressing his lips together thoughtfully. As certain as he was that Tenichi would not have strayed into the local town like some division members might, Kikyue's words still lingered in his mind.

You wanted him to be so engaged, so you didn't have to consider something more sinister.

He furrowed his brow, tapping his fingers absently on the wood surface before him.

I wonder what you didn't ask me, in all that you did? There was something else, and you didn't voice it. A reason why you were so worried for Tenichi's safety... a secret tied to Seventh, perhaps? Something that you felt you couldn't disclose to a foreign Captain, no matter what?

He sealed his letter, turning it over to write the name of the recipient on the front. Getting to his feet, he smoothed down the heavy white haori that hung about his shoulders whenever he was on duty, padding across the matted floor towards the entrance in search of a handy recruit to use as a messenger. Although some divisions were beginning to test the extent of the Hell Butterfly's usage as messengers as well as Senkaimon guides, Juushirou was a traditional soul at heart, and he had far more confidence in the written word than the flitting whims of a scrap of spiritual energy. Many butterflies had become dazzled and distracted by the bright daylight of Inner Seireitei, so foreign was it from the dark claustrophobia of the Senkaimon tunnels, and Juushirou privately thought that there was still much work to be done before these small, soulless creatures could be relied on to convey any message of importance.

"Kayashima!"

As he reached the end of the wooden walkway, he caught sight of his young subordinate, who stopped at the sound of his name, turning to salute the Captain smartly. Juushirou chuckled at the boy's enthusiasm, inclining his head to acknowledge the respect and then holding out the letter.

"You're not currently engaged on any errands, are you, boy?" he asked genially, and Kayashima shook his head.

"No, sir. I've just finished drill with Fukutaichou, and was heading back to the dorm to change."

He glanced down at his attire ruefully, and Juushirou's own smile twitched wider at the dust that coated the hems and sleeves of the black garment. Enishi was a hard but fair taskmaster, physical and enthusiastic with his training regimes, and most recruits ended up flat on their face or their backs at some point during each session.

"I see," was all the Captain said now, however. "Well, when you've changed, I have an errand for you to run. You can't go running around Inner Seireitei looking like that, I quite agree, but I would like this to be delivered as soon as possible."

He twitched the letter, and Kayashima took it hesitantly, glancing at it and then back at his Captain.

"You want me to go to Twelfth Division, sir?"

There was a faint glimmer of apprehension in the boy's eyes, and Juushirou nodded wryly, understanding without asking the deep rooted suspicion most shinigami recruits had of venturing into their neighbour's domain. It wasn't uncommon for loud explosions to be heard from the Twelfth Division barracks at all times of day or night, and though Juushirou knew that his fellow Captain was fully engrossed in Kidou research for the good of Seireitei, to an unsuspecting recruit visiting to carry a message or a memo, it was often a case of dodging bits of falling wall or ceiling to carry out their errand.

"Yes please," he said now. "It's all right — you can hand the message to Michihashi-fukutaichou if you'd prefer — I'm sure Sekime-taichou wouldn't want to be disturbed if she's deep in her research again. It's only the answer to some questions she asked me a while back, relating to kidou properties and my experiences — it's nothing particularly confidential, so it should be fine to give it to Michihashi."

"Oh. Yes, sir," The relief on Kayashima's young features was palpable, and he nodded his head. "I'll see to it right away, sir. Thank you!"

Juushirou watched the youngster hasten off in the direction of the dorm, trailing dust behind him, and he laughed, folding his arms across his chest.

Even outside of Third division, the Urahara are a unique, eccentric bunch. I count us lucky that so many of them are on our side.

A shadow touched his humour as he remembered one Urahara who had quite clearly stated for the other side.

Considering Aizen's work and actions, we're very lucky indeed to have so many of that Clan working for Seireitei. Even if he is a genius, surely he can't prevail over so many hardworking individuals committed to making Soul Society successful and stable? Nagesu-dono has made so many important breakthroughs since he became Head of the Clan, and Sekime's work on Kidou has been invaluable — maybe we will, finally, find a way to form a specialised kidou division. If we could do that, it would bolster Seireitei's forces yet again. That can be no bad thing, surely?

He cast a glance back towards Ugendou, remembering the pile of paperwork that still awaited his attention, but after a moment's thought decided against it, turning instead towards the courtyard that led from the rear of Thirteenth Division's land to the gate which opened out onto the main concourse. Thirteenth's territory was smaller than most divisions, and some of the more uppity Clan Captains had referred to its appearance as 'shabby', but Juushirou saw no reason for unnecessary adornments. It was a military barracks, and that was all it should be.

As he stepped out beneath the wooden hanging that depicted the number thirteen in five concise, black slashes, he paused for a moment, then turned resolutely towards the path that led to the Seventh Division. Whilst Kikyue was occupied with her investigations within the Thirteenth, he had some questions of his own to ask.

"Juushirou-dono!"

As he approached the gates of his destination, a voice hailed him, and he raised his head, seeing a tall, slender figure ambling across the cobbles towards him. This was Souja, Kikyue's older brother, and a man less like his predatorial, sharp-tongued sister would be hard to find. Although both had the same dark hair and pale blue eyes, whilst Kikyue gave the impression of a hunter on the prowl, Souja's genial smile and warm gaze tended to put people easily off their guard. He was known among the Vice Captains for being one of the most cooperative and communicative of their rank, and for that reason, he was often a first choice when it came to choosing someone to lead a combined mission. Souja was not ostentatious in either behaviour or appearance, but his dedication to his duty, his family and his subordinates had made him both popular and well trusted among the lower ranks of his division. Eying him now, Juushirou knew that most recruits, on joining Seventh Division, hoped and prayed to be assigned to Souja's patrols rather than Kikyue's, for although Souja was both Vice Captain and heir, Kikyue was the disciplinarian and taskmaster. Privately Juushirou thought Seventh Division would run a lot more slowly if not for the hawkish young woman shoring up her brother's indulgences, but nevertheless the combination worked.

"Good morning, Souja," he greeted the young man now, reaching out a hand to clasp the Vice Captain's warmly in his own. "I'm sorry to come wandering this way so early, but I had a visit from your sister not so long ago... it put me in mind of something I'd like to speak to you or your Captain about, if at all possible."

"Father isn't here at the moment," Souja looked startled, leaning up against one of the ornately carved pillars that supported the archway into the Seventh division — a work of Clan ego, Juushirou thought, for it had been engraved heavily with the image of a hunting bird glaring out at the world beyond, one sharp talon curved protectively around the kanji for “seven”, whilst at its throat the badge of the Seventh District Clan. It had been here long before Hirata had assumed the haori, back in the days when his grandfather Shouichi had still stalked his prey across Soul Society, and Hirata had admitted to Juushirou that sometimes such an aggressive, arrogant frontage made him cringe. Still, tradition was tradition, and as Juushirou’s eyes strayed to the hawk-like bird, he acknowledged to himself that, at times, he had seen the same predatorial look in his friend’s eyes as he flew into battle.

“He had to attend the District. Something relating to the Endou council and them not being able to cross t-s or dot i-s without his assistance,” he said heavily, shaking his head as though weary of the whole thought of the wider Clan. “Grandfather is there, of course, but there are some things that they won’t pass without Father’s own particular brand of persuasion. Old habits die hard, that’s what he always says — and in the Endou, it seems they die very hard indeed.”

“Between you and me, I’m happy he didn’t take me back with him this time,” he admitted sheepishly. “Much as it would’ve been nice to spend a day or two with Mother and see my other sister, I have nothing to say to the Clan as a whole. I’m a shinigami, Juushirou-dono, and this is my fit. Every time Father goes back to the Clan to settle some dispute or other, I pray that he comes back unscathed, because Clan leadership is something I don’t want any time soon.”

“It would take a very silly individual to try and challenge your father, let alone attempt to kill him,” Juushirou said wisely, resting a hand on the young man’s shoulder and leading him inside the barracks. “Anyone familiar with Tsumi no Fuuhi knows that Hirata with his sword released isn’t someone you really want to cross. In any case, this isn’t the kind of discussion we ought to be having in the open like this. If Hirata isn’t here, I’ll have to take it to you instead. He did leave you in charge here, I suppose, when he flitted off home?”

“Probably that he trusts you to hold the fort while he’s gone,” Juushirou eyed the young man speculatively, and Souja shrugged.

“Because I’m a son,” he said matter-of-factly. “Kikyue is far better than I am with keeping everything in line. Still, that’s not important. You said you had something to address with me, Juushirou-dono? Would you like to come to my office and we can discuss it? It isn’t as grand as the Captain’s room, I admit, but I make a rule of not using Father’s quarters when he’s not here. I’m not Captain of this division, not even in an acting capacity, so I leave it locked and bolted when he’s gone.”

“Would he mind so much?” Juushirou was startled. “Surely, sometimes, there are things you need to access in his room when he’s away?”

“I make do as best I can without,” Souja shook his head. “You must have forgotten the way the Endou are, Juushirou-dono. If I were to use the Captain’s office freely when the real Captain was gone, there might begin rumours of dissent and rebellion. Who knows? Some who have grudges against Father’s way of running things might decide there was enough there to use me as a figurehead and rebel.”

“I hadn’t forgotten,” Juushirou rubbed his chin. “I spent some time in Seventh District — when you were first born, in fact, though you wouldn’t remember that far back, of course. I dealt with my fair share of assassination attempts during that time, and so did Hirata. Still, I’d had the impression that things had stabilised. Was I wrong?”

“No, they have. They’re pretty stable, for the Endou,” Souja grinned wryly. “Just, a clan full of hunters isn’t really a family you can take your eyes off for a moment. It’s better not to give them any leeway to doubt or jump to conclusions.”

He led the way across the courtyard, pulling back a door and gesturing for Juushirou to enter. He did so, following the young man through the halls towards the Vice Captain’s office. Occasionally they passed a member of Seventh Division, all of whom stopped to salute their adjutant and his visitor with a promptness born of fierce discipline. Souja waved them back to their duties with a flick of his wrist, and immediately they obeyed, scampering across the barracks and out of sight before he could change his mind. Juushirou watched them go thoughtfully, and Souja cast him a dry smile, opening the door of his office and allowing his companion to step inside.

“It isn’t me they fear. It’s Kikyue,” he said frankly. “Sometimes I think she’d be a more fearsome Captain than Father is, if you want the truth.”

His eyes narrowed.

“You said she was at Thirteenth this morning? She said nothing to me about leaving the barracks.”

“She came looking for one of yours... formerly one of mine,” Juushirou responded evenly, and Souja’s eyebrows shot up into his fringe.

“For Tenichi?” he asked, startled, and Juushirou nodded, gratefully sinking down onto the cushion his companion indicated.

“Apparently he didn’t return to barracks this morning,” he explained. “Kikyue didn’t want to bring it to you because she said it would be embarrassing to admit she’d lost one of her members, but the fact he’s missing concerns me more than a little. He’s not a careless individual — and I can’t imagine him slipping off through the toll gates and into Outer Seireitei to a brothel or anything like that. He’s not a heavy drinker, and I’ve never had cause to discipline him for that kind of behaviour, not since he was a recruit.”

“I see,” Souja’s expression became grave, and he nodded. “I understand. You’re right, Kikyue wouldn’t have come to me about something like that. Siblings we might be, but there is a certain amount of competition between us when it comes to matters of this nature. Still, it is concerning. I haven’t had as much to do with Tenichi as she has, but my impressions of him have been positive ones.”

He frowned.

“I thought she seemed overly keen to greet my patrol when we returned at dawn,” he added thoughtfully. “She didn’t tell me exactly why, but she was waiting for me at the gates and she seemed... agitated when we arrived.”

“I think she hoped Tenichi had been one of your patrol, though if he’s not usually, I think she was just being overly optimistic,” Juushirou sighed. “Souja, I’ll come to the point. Conscientious as Kikyue undoubtedly is, to come racing around Seireitei in search of a seated officer who — with all due respect — should be able to take care of himself after dark is a bit excessive. I understand that he’s one of her men, and she’s still young enough to take seriously any slight to her authority — but even so...”

He thinned his lips.

“I got the impression she was genuinely worried about his safety,” he admitted. “She wanted me to tell her that he’d probably gone to this or that inn or ryokan, even though it would mean a disciplinary hearing and punishment. It was as though she preferred that to... something else.”

“And you thought I might know what that something else was?” Souja asked. Juushirou nodded.

“That’s about the size of it,” he agreed. “I wondered what else might have happened to make her feel or act that way.”

Souja was silent for a moment, then he sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

“I imagine she worries he’s been snared by one of the extremist groups lurking in Seireitei,” he said at length, and Juushirou frowned, staring at him in consternation.

“Excuse me? One of the..what?”

“The subject hasn’t come up at a Captain’s meeting?” Now it was Souja’s turn to be surprised, and Juushirou shook his head.

“No. I’ve heard nothing of this,” he responded. “Tell me — what exactly do you mean?”

“It hasn’t really graced a Vice Captain session, either, come to think of it,” Souja rubbed his chin absently. “Just the odd casual conversation between officials. I first heard about it from the Vice Captain of the Eleventh — apparently two of their members were taken hostage on patrol a month or so ago, and held to ransom over the destruction of a particular village in the borderlands of District One. Eleventh tried to find them, but failed. In the end, the Captain of Eleventh was forced to meet the demands — that is, funding the repairs to the destroyed village. When that happened, the two members were released. Both were interrogated, but neither one remembered anything much. Both were kept shackled with spirit draining cuffs and had hoods over their heads the whole time. They saw no faces and felt no reiatsu. Nor could they identify where they were held. Eleventh had to drop it, but I understand the division was livid about it.”

“I see,” Juushirou’s eyes became slits. “That would account for why Minachi-taichou was so vitriolic about the Districts and helping them at the meeting we had the other day. The members were not harmed?”

“No, not at all,” Souja shook his head. “The Eleventh have a reputation for not paying repairs or helping the villagers, so none of us thought a lot about it at the time. Then there was a rumour that one of Ninth's recruits was also taken in the same manner."

"Ninth, too?" Juushirou looked perturbed. Souja nodded.

"They've done their best to keep it covered up, because it's embarrassing to say the least, so nobody from Ninth has raised it and it hasn't been officially confirmed. Nonetheless, I'm certain that it's a true report," he agreed. "The recruit — a young girl, I think — was returned only after demands for supplies to a region of District Three were met. It doesn't seem to correlate to Clan or location — if there is any connection, it's relating to the squad that was involved in destroying the settlement, even if they killed a Hollow whilst there."

"And now, Tenichi?" Juushirou asked. Souja shrugged.

"I'm sure it's what Kikyue probably thinks," he agreed sadly, "but she hasn't spoken to me, so I can't be sure."

"Seventh don't pay compensation to District settlements they damage?"

"On the contrary, Father is very vigilant about doing that," Souja responded. "He learned from you, and he's always said that a greater army of discontent resides in the Districts if their rights aren't observed than within the core of the Clans themselves."

"In that case, there's no reason for them to abduct one of yours," Juushirou pointed out.

"No, not that I'm aware of, but it's not impossible that these rebels, emboldened by success, have decided any shinigami is fair game," Souja sighed. "The Endou have regained wealth and status since Grandfather reopened the Sekkiseki mining trade and began to repair District Seven's economy. Anyone who knew that might think we were a good target — Tenichi is one of our higher ranking members, with good experience. He's not someone we'd want to lose, so they would probably think we'd pay up to release him."

"The others who were abducted were recruits, though?"

"No, the Eleventh division officers weren't, but they were low ranking," Souja scratched his head, trying to recall. "Tenichi would be the highest ranking officer taken so far, if that really is what happened."

"Could District rebels really overpower an Eighth seated officer?"

"You're District, originally. So are many of your squad," Souja pointed out sensibly. "Being District or untrained doesn't necessarily imply weakness.”

“No, but still...” Juushirou’s hazel eyes became troubled. “What is being done to root out these rebels?”

“Nothing, as far as I can tell. No personnel, and no official directive to follow,” Souja replied. “If it hasn’t been to a Captain’s meeting, it means the Captains of Ninth and Eleventh were too embarrassed to disclose it and therefore paid off the rebels to rescue their members and hush it up.”

“These are very savvy rebels, though,” Juushirou pointed out. “They have spirit draining technology, they don’t allow their locations or faces to be seen — and they know which squad carried out raids on which areas of Seireitei. Most District people who see a shinigami just assume we’re all the same. To know specifically which squad was responsible for a particular raid... and then impose punishment... suggests a level of understanding of how the Gotei works that you wouldn’t expect to find in your average District village.”

“An inside leak?” Souja looked horrified, and Juushirou shrugged.

“A lot of things are happening of late, and I like none of them,” he said wearily. “Hollow attacks are increasing. The Spiritless Zone is taking up the Council’s attention, and a lot of District people have been left homeless or abandoned by the work of shinigami, even when that work has been saving lives. Now you tell me the Districts are fighting back, albeit on a small and ultimately harmless level. So far no shinigami lives have been taken by these so called rebels, but that might change. If they are gaining in confidence... or if one of their captives was to see too much... who knows? It can’t be hushed up forever.”

“I will talk to Kikyue about Tenichi, when she returns,” Souja promised. “If one of our squad is missing, I won’t take it lightly. Seventh are not at fault for anything, so if he was taken by these rebels, it was with no motivation. Whilst the Endou could pay for repairs, just paying a demand isn’t enough. Besides, no demand has been received here, not yet. I’d know, if it had.”

“Within twenty-four hours,” Souja admitted. “We have a little time yet, I suppose, before one such message comes here.”

“Mm,” Juushirou was silent for a moment, then, carefully, he got to his feet. “Souja, if one such message does come, I would like to know about it, please. Eleventh and Ninth may be happy keeping this under the carpet, but Tenichi was one of my recruits, wherever he fights his battles now. If he is in danger, I'd like to make sure he's safely retrieved, and I'm not afraid to raise this with the Captains or the Council of Elders if need be. His brother is still my concern, and I wouldn't have Ketsui say I'd washed my hands of Tenichi just because he's now part of another squad."

"I agree," Souja's expression became one of relief. "I'll say the same to Kikyue, when I hear her report. There may be other cases, and I'll try and find out what I can. So far as I'm aware, this is the first time it's happened in Seventh, but there are a lot of Divisions we haven't reached out to yet."

"True," Juushirou bit his lip. "If the Districts are acting of their own accord, we need to nip it in the bud. It just underlines even more urgently how the Gotei needs to have a firm policy in place for compensation and rehousing... the last thing we want is an underground war beginning between those who wear the shihakushou and those we're sworn to protect!"

He was in a small, square room.

Tenichi opened his eyes, blinking against the sudden rawness of the bright sunlight that trickled in through the cracks between the wooden slats and beams that formed the ceiling above his head. There were no windows that he could see, yet the chill edge of the breeze told him that he was not below ground. Nor, with the exception of the spirit cuffs, did he appear to be in any way restrained. Obviously whoever had brought him here had trusted that he would be too lost and disorientated to try and escape on his own, lacking as he was the ability to properly defend himself. He reached down to his waist, discovering that the dark scabbard and the weapon it contained were no longer hanging there, but even as panic began to well up inside of him, he caught sight of the zanpakutou, propped up against the chamber wall.

I'm a ranked Gotei Shinigami, not a raw-necked recruit. I don't need spiritual power to slash my way to freedom, if need be. I trained long and hard with that sword, and whether I can hear its voice or not, I can make it cut just as sure as any other blade would. Surely whoever brought me here must know that. Why not take my zanpakutou from me?

His fingers went cautiously to his throat, touching the skin where that strange, rope-like tendril had fastened itself, threatening to cut off his breath. He could feel no wound or scarring, but the skin was tender to the touch and he felt sure that ugly purple bruises probably mottled his throat, an unpleasant reminder of the unexpected late night rendezvous.

But with whom?

He got slowly to his feet, listening all the time for any sounds of life or company. Outside, he was aware of the occasional pad of footsteps, and maybe the soft murmur of voices, but it was all too indistinct for him to settle on clearly, and at length he gave up, turning his attention instead to the chamber's one obvious route of exit.

It was fastened shut, barred, he suspected, from the outside with wood or metal. If it was the former, his sword might cut through it, the latter would be more of a challenge. Still, it was the only thing standing between him and freedom, and he had confidence in his sword skills to cut through a ramshackle wooden divide. What faced him outside was unknown, but he would rather know and be in danger than linger here not knowing or understanding the reason for his abduction.

The night before was a blank, and that troubled him more than he liked to admit. The sensation of falling into a deep, dark hole lingered with him, but try as he might he could not recall anything after that fact.

He inched across towards his discarded blade, trying to make as little sound as possible in order to make any guardsman standing watch outside believe he was still out cold. He would probably be outnumbered, so at the very least he needed the element of surprise if he was going to try and make a break for it. Inwardly he cursed his lack of spiritual awareness. It would be so much easier, he reflected ruefully, if he could pick out how many of them there were, and whether there was any sign or scent of the strange individual who had accosted him outside Thirteenth Division's barracks the previous evening.

He hesitated, debating his chances of making a clean break for it, and as he stood there, gaze fixed on the door, he heard the sound of a bar being pulled back. The next moment, the door he had been mentally negotiating slid back, and Tenichi found himself face to face with a young man of approximately his years or a little younger, dark hair pulled back lazily from his face in a haphazard tail and brown eyes, guarded and impassive, sizing him up from across the room.

Instinctively he tensed, trying to work out if this had been the man who had snared him.

The stranger seemed to know what Tenichi was thinking, for a faint, humourless smile twitched at the edges of his lips.

“I wouldn’t try to attack me,” he said quietly, and Tenichi knew at once from the voice that this was not the individual he had met the night before. “I’m only the messenger, I didn’t bring you here. You’re to come with me now.”

“Come with you?” Tenichi echoed, a derisive note in his normally genial tones. “And you think I’ll just follow you, without explanation or apology for being brought here against my will? Kidnap of a shinigami is a serious crime within Seireitei, you know, and...”

“We aren’t in Seireitei,” the young man seemed unbothered, bending to pick up Tenichi’s discarded sword and handing it to him without a moment of hesitation. “Here, this is yours. You shouldn’t leave it lying about.”

“You’re giving me my weapon?” Now Tenichi was suspicious, and the young man shrugged his shoulders.

“Why? Are you going to hurt me with it?” The question was almost mocking him. “I thought shinigami used their swords to purify souls in distress, not to attack people they know nothing about.”

Tenichi bristled, snatching the sheathed sword away from the stranger and reattaching the loop to his belt before his companion could change his mind.

“Who are you? Where is this? What am I doing here?” He demanded. “I want some answers — where are you taking me? Who are you taking me to?”

The stranger, who had been making his way back outside paused, turning to fix Tenichi with calm pale brown eyes.

“Don’t get me wrong, I don’t really care whether you’re here or not,” he said dismissively. “It’s nothing to do with me, I’m just running an errand here. If you come with me, I’ll take you to the person who really wants to see you. You might not like how you came here, but I don’t think he intends to hurt you.”

He gestured to the sword.

“You got to keep that. It generally means he likes you, so when he’s done with you, he’ll probably let you go.”

“And I’m supposed to just go along with this?”

“If you don’t, it’ll be a lot of hassle for everyone,” the stranger sighed, turning back towards the door and daylight. “Look, just take my advice and do as I say, all right? Really, it’ll all be much quicker and more painless for everyone if you do.”

Tenichi’s eyes narrowed and he strode across the chamber, grabbing the other man by the shoulder and forcibly pulling him around to face him. At this range, he realised, his companion was not as well built as he was, standing an inch or two shorter. His appearance was unremarkable, the straggly dark hair that flopped across his brow and down his back in a lazy tail had not been cut for some time, nor had the owner bothered to take particular care of it. He was shaven and clean, but his attire was rumpled, as though he had slept in it, and, Tenichi thought derisively, quite possibly swum in it as well. A knotted length of ugly grey fabric wound itself around his waist, pretending to be an obi, but miles from the smart white cloth that shinigami wore, and as he gazed his companion up and down, Tenichi realised with a jolt how much fortune he had had joining the Gotei.

But for that calling, he remembered grimly, he too might have cut so unimpressive a figure.

At his appraisal, the young man smiled, another humourless twitch of his lips which did not reach his eyes.

“Let’s go,” was all he said, however.

“I didn’t say I was going to come with you,” Tenichi protested, and the other man shrugged.

“You didn’t say you weren’t going to, either,” he pointed out sensibly. “You wanted answers to your questions, and this way you’ll get them. Everything will work itself out and I can go back to reading my book. It’s a nice day in Rukongai for once, and there are no screaming children by the stream — if it’s all the same to you, I’d like to get this over with so that I can go back to other things and get on with my day.”

Tenichi stared at his companion in disbelief, and the other man smirked, reaching up to remove the shinigami’s hand from his robe.

“Kurotsuchi brought you here,” he said off-handedly, leading the way outside and, against his better judgement, Tenichi found himself following. “His methods are unorthodox, and so is he. Probably he whacked you or dosed you with one of his concoctions to put you out, so you wouldn't struggle on the way — you look like the kind of person who'd put up a pretty good fight, if given a chance. You were like a corpse when I looked in on you last night, so if he did something odd to you, I apologise. He gets the job done, but he's not great at leaving good first impressions. If he abducted you, he probably didn't see any other way to bring you here. He isn't here right now, though, so if you're thinking of gutting him, forget it. He's already a gutless weed of a man most of the time, anyway — and catching him is more trouble than it's worth."

"If you think I'm going to be let go, should you be telling me that?" Tenichi challenged, and the man shrugged.

"I don't suppose it matters," he said casually. "You won't be telling anyone about it, when you go back."

"You really think that's the case?" Tenichi snorted, stepping out into the daylight proper and immediately glancing around him, taking in as much as he could of his surroundings.

There was not much to see.

The hut stood in a little clearing, isolated by the dead stumps and withered trunks of what had once been a forest but, with dry winds and draught, had long since become a wasteland. A dusty, uneven stone path wound its way through the remains of the woodland towards another cluster of ramshackle sheds and buildings, many formed from propping up one panel of decaying timber against another with a battered stretch of waxed fabric as a roof. In the distance, Tenichi thought he could see the curve of what might be a stream, though to his eyes it looked more like a muddy trickle and what little grass had managed to grow was in patches, yellow and struggling for nutrients.

At his dismayed gaze, the other man offered him another empty smile.

"You haven't been to Rukongai before, have you?" he asked matter-of-factly, as slowly Tenichi shook his head. "No, I suppose you wouldn't have been. The Gotei don't like sending people here — only those healer types, in their fenced off area to the north of this land. This whole stretch is designated no-man's land — nobody and nothing can live here, so nobody really pays it any mind."

"You seem to be living here." The words slipped from Tenichi's lips before he could stop them, and his companion let out a low chuckle.

“You say ‘we’, but I don’t see anyone other than you and I.” Tenichi sized up his companion again, inwardly wondering if he could jump him and overpower him long enough to find a way to escape. The whole area seemed deserted, and though he had been sure he had heard the footfalls of others beforehand, there was no sign of anyone else abroad now.

“I already told you, attacking me would be a bad idea,” the other man didn’t even bother to look at him. “I’m not fond of fighting, and I’d rather not give you more bruises to go with the pretty necklace of them you’re already wearing.”

“Can you read my mind?” Tenichi demanded, and his companion snorted, shaking his head.

“Don’t be stupid,” he said calmly. “I don’t need to read your mind, only your aura. You might be wearing spirit damping bracelets, but I’m not.”

“If I’m wearing spirit draining cuffs, you shouldn’t be able to read my reiatsu at all!”

“I said aura, not reiatsu,” the young man looked faintly amused. “Besides, whatever you say or do, it doesn’t really make a difference. I already know you won’t attack me, so there’s no sense in making like you will.”

“What makes you say that?”

“We’re wasting time,” the other man shrugged dismissively, “and someone is waiting to see you, Tenichi-dono.”

“You know my name!” Tenichi stopped dead, and the other nodded.

“Of course. No point in bringing someone here without basic information,” he said carelessly. “It’s not a secret, is it? Your name isn’t all that remarkable, and with all due respect, you don’t look like a secret operative to me. You were taken down far too easily — no member of the Onmitsukidou would’ve been snared by Kurotsuchi’s wiles quite so quickly.”

Tenichi bristled indignantly, but no stinging retort came to mind, and instead he growled, shaking his head in frustration.

“Fine. Tell me your name, then,” he said at length. “If you’re dragging me around the place and I’m meant to follow you, I’d at least like to know who’s my guide.”

He half expected his companion to refuse, but to his surprise the young man turned, nodding his head as if this were a reasonable request.

“They call me ‘Koku,’” he said frankly, sketching the kanji for “black” absently in the air with a pale, grimy finger.

“Just Koku?” Tenichi’s brow furrowed, and the other man inclined his head slightly in acknowledgement.

Tenichi glanced around him at the sorry, forlorn landscape once more, and grudgingly saw that his new acquaintance was right. This was the forgotten land, beyond even the confines of the Spiritless Zone, if Koku’s account was to be believed. This area was visited by shinigami but rarely, for nothing was thought to prosper in this dank, water-parched stretch of land. Plus souls had been evacuated from here during the construction of the Spiritless Zone, but even before that, it had not been a place where many had lingered. The idea that a forgotten settlement of such people still existed here was a ripple in Tenichi’s understanding of the Gotei’s reality. Did the Council of Elders know there were still people living on this land, he wondered absently, as his companion took him by the arm, guiding him across a dip in the road towards one of the less rickety buildings the unimpressive huddle of wood and thatch presented. Surely if they had, they would have provided protection and support for them long ago?

“Why are you living here?” he asked at last, and Koku sighed.

“Why would we not?” he returned evenly. “Where else is there to go?”

“The Spiritless Zone, I would’ve thought. That’s where most of the Plus souls are now. The barriers are designed to let Plus souls through automatically — there’d be no reason for you not to cross into better land and I know there’s water in plenty in those areas of Rukongai.”

“For Plus souls, yes,” Koku said cryptically. “Here. We’re at our destination. You’re not going to do anything silly like try to run away now, are you? We’ve come this far, and it would be a lot of bother if you created a fuss about it now.”

He raised a dusty fist, rapping neatly on the door of the small building, and after a moment’s interval, a voice called them in. Koku slipped his finger through the loose loop of twine that had formed the structure’s only lock, pushing back the door with one hand and giving Tenichi a nudge into the darkened room beyond with the other.

“In there,” he said brusquely. “You’ll find your answers, and I can stop babysitting you and get back to my book.”

With that he was gone, and Tenichi found himself staring blankly into a dimly lit chamber, the windows hung heavily with thick fabric as if to keep out the light of day. In the furthestmost corner of the room, a man sat huddled behind an old-fashioned desk, piles of parchment and fragments of old books scattered around him and a brush in his hand. Tenichi’s urge to run was quelled by curiosity, and, as the man set his brush aside, he found himself compelled to come closer, taking one step then another into the heart of the stranger’s lair.

A man with books and brushes did not seem at all dangerous, and now Koku was gone, they were apparently alone.

“Welcome, Tenichi-kun,” the man was getting stiffly to his feet now, pulling his fading grey cloak more firmly around his shoulders and approaching his nonplussed visitor with a slightly limping gait. “I’m sorry about the manner of your invitation, but there was no other way to summon you here without creating trouble for you and for Ketsui. I wanted it to be as subtle a move as possible — but my agents are sometimes a little overly enthusiastic and take my instructions a little too strongly to heart.”

“Who are you?” Tenichi blinked into the gloom, and the man moved to push back the heavy cloth curtains, allowing sunlight to filter into the small, shabby room. As he did so, Tenichi caught sight of his companion’s features for the first time and he gasped, disbelief and dismay flooding his features.

“You’re surprised to see me,” Keitarou smiled in acknowledgement, bowing his head mock-formally towards his visitor and gesturing for him to make himself comfortable inside. “I don’t suppose you expected me to be the one to call you here — perhaps since your mother’s death, you haven’t given much thought to my actions or whereabouts at all?”

“I shouldn’t be here.” Tenichi took an automatic step back, but Keitarou, despite his limp, was too quick for him, circling his hand around the shinigami’s wrist and guiding him gently but firmly into the heart of the chamber.

“You haven’t ever told anyone about my visit to your home, have you?" he asked softly, and Tenichi shook his head, eying his kinsman warily.

"Nobody would benefit from it," he said bluntly. "Ketsui and I are shinigami and the last thing we need is people remembering we have a blood connection to a wanted outlaw. I haven't talked about it with my comrades, and nor has he. Mother left this world not long after you came, and since we're both in squads now, neither one of us have laid claim to her house. We assumed you probably wouldn't come back again, and you didn't. A lot of time has passed since then."

"It has," Keitarou agreed pleasantly, pulling a motheaten cushion from beneath the table and indicating for Tenichi to settle himself down on it. Tenichi did so reluctantly, tension still coursing through his body as he tried to gauge his kinsman's motives.

"Why did you bring me here, now, of all times?" he demanded. "We may be blood kin, Keitarou-san, but the past is the past and our paths are headed in different directions. I don't know why you wanted me brought here, but..."

"I was thinking a lot, recently, about your father," Keitarou's words came out of the blue, and he sat back down on his own cushion, rubbing his rheumatic leg absently and meeting Tenichi's greenish eyes with muddy brown ones of his own. "I suppose Ketsui looks even more like him now than the last I saw him — well, he must. He'd be a full grown young man, now, I suppose — you said he was a shinigami in his own right."

"My brother isn't your concern and nor am I," Tenichi said stiffly, and Keitarou chuckled, nodding his head.

"True," he agreed merrily, "and I didn't bring you here simply to exchange family pleasantries. I wanted you to come and see this place for yourself, since I don't suppose you've had much cause to come here, have you?"

"I didn't really ask to come on a Rukongai sightseeing tour, if it's all the same to you," Tenichi said coldly. "This land is supposed to be abandoned, condemned and devoid of all natural resources. There's no point in bringing me here, since it's a place nobody can live and therefore, not a place anyone has any use for. You might be hiding here — probably it's the only place you could hide, in fact, to avoid being found by the shinigami from Fourth that are currently patrolling the Spiritless Zone — but aside from telling me where you're located, bringing me here serves no purpose at all."

"This land is supposed to be abandoned," Keitarou echoed Tenichi's words, a faint, mocking note in each of them. “Is that what the Council of Elders has decreed, Tenichi-kun?”

Tenichi stiffened.

“What is this all about?” he demanded. “Why am I really here? Why did your... your Kurotsuchi come take me? Why did you want to see me so badly? What is your real motive for taking me from Seireitei, Keitarou-san? I’m not a rebel and I have no sympathies with someone who murders and lies for a living. We might be kin, but as I said before, we walk separate paths.”

He patted the hilt of his sword.

“You shouldn’t have left this with me if you thought you could keep me here in some way against my will,” he added. “I might not be able to use my spirit power, but I can still fight if I have to. As a member of the Gotei, I...”

“Shh,” Keitarou hushed him, shaking his head in reproach. “I didn’t call you here to make you angry with me. It seems Kurotsuchi must’ve handled you more than a bit roughly and I’m afraid you’ve got the wrong impression of my summons. You have to realise that making contact with anyone on the other side of the Rukongai divide is dangerous for one in my position. Crossing into Seireitei is a highly risky endeavour, and what would your superiors think if they discovered you were meeting with me? Your family history is known to all of them, and they’d hardly be likely to believe it was all my doing. You already protected me by not revealing my visit to you when poor Irie was so ill. If your superiors knew that, you would probably be arrested at the very least, or worse, struck from the Gotei completely, branded a traitor and executed by Council justice. No, I didn’t want to risk that. I have no intention to cause you harm, Tenichi-kun. I never did, I never have, and I promise you, I never will.”

“Then what’s to stop me leaving here right now, of my own accord?” Tenichi demanded. “If you aren’t going to hurt me, how will you stop me?”

“I sent Kurotsuchi to pick you up last night for a reason,” Keitarou seemed unflustered. “His particular talent is that he can move almost undetected through guard patrols and he will have left no evidence of your abduction anywhere in Seireitei. If you were to go back now, and tell everyone I kidnapped you, how would you prove it? It would look like you’d derelicted your duty and absconded for a night — perhaps with a pretty town courtesan?”

Tenichi's eyes widened, and Keitarou chuckled.

"I'm not trying to bait you, my boy," he said softly. "Nor am I trying to damage your position in the Gotei — on the contrary, I want to protect it and maintain it as best I can. You are Daisuke's sons and you've struck out for yourselves. You and Ketsui both deserve to reap the rewards of your own hard work, and I'm pleased to see that you're both managing to do so."

"You... want me to be a shinigami?" Tenichi was suspicious. "I thought..."

"That such a thing would be unpalatable to an exile? Perhaps," Keitarou nodded his head. "I admit, I haven't had good experiences with shinigami over the years. Well, you know better than me how the Gotei view my name and my actions. I won't try to defend them to you — why should I? They're past and I can't change them. None of us can."

"Then why am I here?" Tenichi's eyes narrowed. "You still haven't explained it to me, and that boy — that Koku — he didn't tell me anything about it, either."

"No, I don't suppose he would have done," Keitarou reflected. "All right, then I'll come to the point. Will you walk with me a while in the sunlight, Tenichi-kun? My limbs are stiff and my leg isn't the best to walk on for great distances, but I can manage a short stroll if you'll accompany me."

"A stroll... where?"

"Around this area of Rukongai," Keitarou offered him a smile. "Your Gotei told you that this land was abandoned. I want to show you that it isn't — more than that, though, I want to show you how much the people here are suffering because of the Council of Elders' apparent disinterest in their plight."

"The Council of... Elders?" Tenichi's brow creased in consternation. "But this land is deserted. You might be here, and your servants too, but I saw nobody else when Koku was bringing me here."

"I came here a long time ago," Keitarou said slowly, getting to his feet once more and beckoning his companion to his. "Even then, people here were afraid and wary of shinigami. They had good reason to be, you know."

He pushed back the door of the hut, stepping out into the sunshine and indicating for Tenichi to follow him.

“You can’t sense them, because you’re still wearing spirit draining cuffs,” he said apologetically. “I can’t take them off, unfortunately, because it would put too many people at risk. When they heard you were here, most of the people who live hereabouts went into hiding. Many of them slipped underground, in order that you didn’t see them. They’re terrified of shinigami... just the sight of your black and white uniform is enough to make them disappear into hideouts and hovels until the danger is past.”

“But... why?” Tenichi looked confused. “The Gotei came here, and they evacuated Plus souls into the designated Spiritless Zone, to protect them from marauding Hollows. Why would people here fear them? I don’t understand.”

“No, you don’t,” Keitarou said with a sigh. “You’re not Clan, Tenichi-kun, but you’re still Seireitei born and bred. You can’t possibly understand the level of suffering and poverty that exists in this part of Soul Society.”

“I admit, until I was forced to shelter here, I didn’t know it, either,” Keitarou admitted solemnly, as they began to make the slow decline down the rocky, winding road towards what might have been a village. The muddy trickle of what might have been the stream rippled past to the right, and out of the corner of his eye Tenichi could make out the familiar form of Koku, curled up against the trunk as he thumbed through some battered, falling apart volume with genuine interest. “Things like food, water, shelter aren’t always easy to come by in Seireitei, but when we have them — even a little — we take their existence for granted. You and your brother faced high odds, escaping from Seventh and beginning a new life in Eighth — but thanks to Irie’s resourcefulness, you were always able to find those three things. You lived, grew and strengthened, and now you and he are both men to be proud of. Imagine not being able to do that for your children, though.”

“Plus souls don’t have children.”

“Children can be Plus souls too, you know,” Keitarou tut-tutted, and despite himself, Tenichi felt ashamed. “Families here are not blood kin, not usually, but they band together and form alliances because nobody likes to spend their time alone. Plus souls also need water, even though they don’t need food. This region was always dry and desolate, even before the Gotei started to build here, but once the Spiritless Zone was completed, resources here almost entirely dried up. You said that the Gotei evacuated Plus souls to the Spiritless

Tenichi nodded.

“Indeed they did,” Keitarou agreed. “I had to go underground when they were here, constantly ferreting around places looking for individuals to uproot and relocate. This evacuation did happen — but you do understand, I suppose, what the Spiritless Zone really represents?”

“It’s a place where Plus souls can exist, safe from the dangers of spiritual corruption and the attacks of Hollows,” Tenichi said matter-of-factly. “The plan was devised by the Urahara and completed with help from the whole of the Council of Elders. The Unohana now guard it and make sure nothing untoward happens there. The souls are far better off than they were fending for themselves in the wilderness before, Keitarou-san. Uprooting and separation might have happened, true, but those things can be survived. Ketsui and I survived them. What you mentioned before — shelter and water — so long as those are there, the Plus souls can survive.”

“What about those souls who weren’t evacuated, Tenichi-kun?” Keitarou paused to look at him, his features partly shaded by the overhanging branch of what, in life, had been a willow tree, but which was now a ghostly skeleton of its former self, it’s long, drooping limbs like fingers reaching out to beg Tenichi for alms as he passed by.

“But all the Plus souls were...”

“The Spiritless Zone is for Plus souls who have no native spirit power. The very nature of the environment is designed to try and prevent corruption of these souls, to reduce the number of Hollow transformations — correct?”

“Yes, but...”

“What about the souls who were already, as the Gotei put it, ‘corrupted’? What do you think became of them?”

or what paperwork passed through the Council's hands to authorise such a thing — but only those Plus souls without spirit power can, ostensibly, pass through the barrier into the Spiritless Zone. Those who possess spirit power are locked out. Their needs are greater — food as well as water, to fuel their strength, but the Gotei does not acknowledge spirit power within Plus souls. They cannot enter Seireitei, because they are not from Seireitei. They linger here, in no-man's land — until the lack of resources drives them to Hollowfication or death."

Tenichi's heart froze in his chest but, before he could raise any protest or defend his superiors for their decisions, the tattered cloth flap that formed the doorway of one of the makeshift shelters was pulled back and a small girl of no more than six or seven poked her head out, cautiously stepping out into the sunlight and glancing all around her before hurrying down towards the miserable muddy trickle that Koku had called a stream. Her arms were little more than pale sticks, her flesh pulled to them so tightly that there was no evidence of muscle whatsoever, and her fair hair hung long and limp down her back, her features gaunt and eyes wary and dull from hunger and neglect. Despite himself, flashes of memory penetrated his brain.

There had been children like that at the refugee camp in District Eight, when he and Ketsui had fled there with Irie so many years before. There had been people so thin and desperate for food that they would do literally anything to grab a morsel, even if it was stale or thick with mould. Tenichi remembered clearly the fouled, disease ridden water of the lake that so many had bent eager, frantic heads to, drawing what sustenance they could into their thin frames in order to prolong their lives a day or two more. Those recollections would linger with him forever, pushed to the back of his mind, but here, in this village, the sight of one scrawny young girl brought them rushing back.

At his pallor, Keitarou gave a solemn nod.

"I am here, so these people will not die," he said softly. "I am not like them, nor are they like me. However, when I was injured, the people here sheltered me. They gave me what little food they could, and little by little, my broken body mended. When the Gotei came looking for me, they did not betray me. So, when the Gotei took away their meagre resources, I decided to repay their faith in me and protect them. Kurotsuchi is my main go-between to Seireitei. He brings back food, news and other supplies, so that the people here do not die the way people died in District Seven, for want of a good meal.

The Council may have forsaken this place and these people, but I have not. What I can do, though, exiled here like I am, is limited indeed.”

Tenichi swallowed hard, his eyes never leaving the form of the young girl as she struggled to scoop up dirty brown water in tiny, pathetic hands, cupping it to her mouth in order to take a few sips.

“Everyone here has spirit power,” Keitarou continued slowly. “They will not come out while you’re here, because they are afraid of you. Since the Spiritless Zone began, others have been exiled from it, increasing the population in areas like this. It is a growing problem, and I am not able to resolve it on my own.”

“The Fourth Division are stationed within the Spiritless Zone,” Tenichi’s words came thickly, as though being spoken through the vocal chords of a stranger. “Surely the Unohana wouldn’t sanction anyone being thrown into a situation like this. I mean, if they knew...”

“I have no evidence to suggest the Fourth Division know anything about what happens in this area of Rukongai,” Keitarou said simply. “I told you, I don’t know who thought of it, or who passed paperwork through the Council... perhaps it was simply an oversight on their part, who really knows? All I can tell you is the reality of the Spiritless Zone’s existence. So long as it continues, more and more people will be thrown out to fend for themselves in a world that has no place for them. Plus souls with spirit power are not abnormal. They occur more often than the Council would like to think. But — as you know to your family’s cost — the Council are slow to recognise spiritual potential in any area outside of their own comfort zone. They have taken a good while to recognise what exists in the Districts, and Rukongai is another step ahead again.”

“That’s why I’m wearing these,” Tenichi raised his hands, glancing at the cuffs with new eyes. “You don’t want me to know the spiritual signatures of these people, in case I decided it was my duty to remember and track them down.”

“No, that’s not why,” Keitarou offered him a slight smile. “I don’t think you would do that, not given the past you and your brother once shared. No, Tenichi, I insisted on the cuffs for another reason. Whilst you wear them, nobody can discern your spirit power in this area. That protects all of us, don’t you think? Your superiors will never know you broke bounds and came here, and nobody will hunt for you here, meaning that the people here are also as safe as I can keep them.”

doubtfully. “Your reputation wouldn’t seem to suggest it.”

“I reward loyalty and despise betrayal,” Keitarou said briskly. “Souls in this settlement helped save my life, and also helped to deliver my first child into this world when no other support was available. These people have become like family to me, and I to them. They and I, we are all exiles together. Past sins and crimes are irrelevant, when it comes to a matter of survival. I do what I can for them, and they would rather die than betray me. It is a good arrangement — and I am not so young as I was.”

“I see,” Tenichi pursed his lips thoughtfully, then, “your first child?”

“He isn’t here at present, so you won’t have the fortune to meet him,” Keitarou said casually. “I sent him on another errand, because he has an unusual ability to slip into places that others dare not go.”

“You have children?”

“Are you surprised?”

“I... maybe I am,” Tenichi admitted. “I mean, I had heard... I knew that you had fled with... but...”

“The less you know about me and about them, the better for all,” Keitarou took him by the arm, steering him away from the small village. “Those things are not currently important.”

“I want your help, of course,” Keitarou smiled. “You are on the other side of the divide. You live there, and you have easy access to many things that I don’t. Even if I send Kurotsuchi through the barrier, it’s difficult to know what he can scavenge without anyone being suspicious. Your position is far more enviable — and I need someone on the Gotei side if anything is ever going to change for these people.”

“Wait a minute,” Tenichi held up his hands, and Keitarou patted him gently on the shoulder.

“I am not asking you to abandon your principles or rise in rebellion against your chosen vocation,” he said calmly. “I am not asking you to betray the Gotei or act against their wishes. All I am asking you to do is help me smuggle food and water through the barrier to the people who so desperately need it. Their survival is in the balance, and, like the Kyouraku helped you and your family, I’m the only one who can help them.”

“It’s hard to know who among the Gotei is most heavily involved in all of this,” Keitarou shook his head briskly. “I can hide from shinigami if need be, and I’m not afraid of them coming here. Trusting the wrong person might bring you under suspicion and into danger, though, and that is not what I want. I am doing my best to find another way to get across the plight of these people to the whole of Seireitei, and I will do so, with the risk being entirely on my head. All I ask of you is some support in terms of requisitioning supplies. As a kinsman of your father, I am asking for your help. As a former refugee, can you turn your back on these people and let them die?”

Tenichi swallowed the lump in his throat, remembering the little girl at the stream side. Slowly he shook his head.

“I can’t, and that’s why you brought me to see them,” he said darkly. “Just telling me wouldn’t have had the same effect... I had to come and see for myself in order for it to sink in. Someone told you that I’m a man of morals, didn’t they, Keitarou-san? That’s why you had me brought here. You knew I wouldn’t just turn away.”

“Maybe I was underhand,” Keitarou was apologetic. “That brief meeting of ours, so many years ago, told me that you were far more like Daisuke in character than your brother. Whilst I might have appealed to him, his caution would have slowed him down. You, like Daisuke, believe in things and go forth to defend them in a heartbeat. I needed that strength, and when I saw it in you, I was heartened. I hoped that, when the time came for me to speak to you, you’d understand. I trusted you wouldn’t be angry with me — the world is a dangerous place, and I am in no position to advertise my needs to anyone.”

Tenichi was silent for a moment, then,

“If the Gotei really are trying to block supplies from getting to those people... if they are really leaving them to die, ignoring that fact will be hard to do,” he said at length.

“True, but you only have my word that that’s the case,” Keitarou pointed out. “I can offer you no written evidence — it’s all my supposition, based on what people have told me and what I’ve seen. You can hardly burst into a Council session and demand answers based on my testimony, can you? It would make a mockery of both of us — and without me, these people would be doomed.”

“I wasn’t going to do anything of the sort!” Tenichi looked indignant. “I’m not a silly adolescent running around doing reckless things without a moment of thought, Keitarou-san! I’m the eighth seat of the Seventh Division...”

“Seventh Division?” Keitarou’s eyes glittered with surprise. “Not Thirteenth? Were you not a member of the Thirteenth Division the last time we spoke?”

“I was, but not now,” Tenichi frowned. “I transferred — it was better that way.”

“Better to serve a Captain from the family who killed your Father?” Keitarou was incredulous, and Tenichi shook his head impatiently.

“Endou-taichou isn’t like his ancestors. Everyone has said that, and District Seven isn’t how it was before,” he said frankly. “Besides, so long as I’m in Seventh Squad, I have a chance to find out what really happened to my father. So far, I only have your word for it that he was tortured and murdered in the way you said he was. If he’s really buried in Seventh somewhere, maybe now I’m part of this squad, I can find him. I might never know if you’ve told me the truth or not — but Mother never got to visit Father’s grave, and I’d like to do it in her place.”

“Daisuke’s grave, huh...” Keitarou’s eyes became nostalgic for a moment, then he smiled sadly, inclining his head.

“Very well,” he said evenly. “I’ll make an agreement with you, then, Tenichi-kun. In return for your help in bringing supplies to these people, I will tell you what I can about your father’s final resting place.”

“You... know where that is?” Tenichi looked suspicious, and Keitarou nodded.

“It will be risky, but I’ll take you to it,” he said matter-of-factly. “I was the one who buried him, so I ought to remember where he lies.”

“If Shouichi-sama killed him, why did you bury him?” Tenichi demanded, and to his surprise, genuine pain crossed his companion’s features.

“Daisuke died for me,” he said sadly. “The least I could do was rescue his body and give him proper rites.”

He gestured back up the rise towards the small shack that provided his own humble shelter.

“Let’s go back,” he suggested. “I’ll pour tea and we’ll discuss your father some more.”

“People in Seireitei will be looking for me,” Tenichi protested, and Keitarou smiled.

“You’ve been abducted,” he said simply. “Your Captain will receive word to that effect, and demands of food and coin will be made. In a day or two, providing your ransom is met, they’ll find you, bound and shivering but unharmed in an undisclosed location in District Seven. When asked, you’ll tell them that you were kept blindfolded and remembered nothing. Such abductions have happened in the past and will probably happen again in the future. There are rebel groups all over the Districts, using shinigami as bait to get donations to rebuild villages and towns destroyed by Hollow raids. You will simply be another among them — nobody need ever know that you came to Rukongai.”

Tenichi eyed his companion doubtfully, and Keitarou’s smile widened.

“I see,” he said thoughtfully. “So the Captains of Seireitei choose not to discuss those happenings with their members?”

“Nobody said anything to me,” Tenichi said warily, “so why would you know about it? Unless... you’re also involved?”

“I am here in Rukongai,” Keitarou dismissed this with a flick of his hand. “Unless the circumstances are extreme, I don’t leave the safety of this unwanted place.”

“But your man... your Kurotsuchi, he does.” Tenichi’s brain was working quickly now. “And you said your son was the same — slipping in and out of places. It isn’t as though you couldn’t...”

Keitarou laughed.

“One thing I have always been good at is deflecting suspicion,” he said evenly. “I am not your enemy, even if I am enemy to the organisation you serve. Even if I have organised the abduction of one or two shinigami, I have released all without harm once the ransom has been paid. The supplies rebuild broken villages and the food fills empty stomachs — would you call such an endeavour evil? These are things the Gotei ought to be providing already — is it so wrong to demand it where it isn’t forthcoming?”

“I...” Tenichi faltered, and Keitarou rested his hands gently on the other’s shoulders.

“I won’t hurt you, you have my word on that,” he said softly, “and I believe, now you have seen my cause, you won't betray me. You understand I am not working against Seireitei's people, but to aid them... and I have killed nobody with my actions. The assassination of a Clan heir is a notorious crime, but it was a long time ago, and much water has passed under many bridges since. I have a family to protect, and people who depend on me just to stay alive. I won't bring them into danger, Tenichi. You do believe that, don't you?"

Tenichi eyed his companion long and hard for a moment, then he sighed, nodding his head.

"You haven't brought Ketsui and I into harm's way, not even though you knew where to find us," he said softly. "I know you came looking for us — Kirio told us that you'd spoken to her, at the refugee camp, and paid her coin for her information. You said you were our father, but I know and so does she, now, that that was a lie. Father was already dead by that time — he never crossed into District Eight at all. You came to see we were safe, but you never made our life dangerous, even though you could have done."

"Daisuke wouldn't have forgiven me," Keitarou shook his head. "So you did know about that encounter, then? I wondered. The girl, Kirio, is also a shinigami with you, is she?"

"We were students together, at the Academy," Tenichi bit his lip. "She's the only person I told about your visit, Keitarou-san. Ketsui doesn't even know I discussed it with her, because he was with mother when I did. Kirio's someone I trust like a sister, more than just as a friend. She remembered meeting you that day, and we put the pieces together."

"I'm glad," Keitarou seemed genuinely relieved. "You understand my bond with your family is far deeper than any grudge I have against Seireitei, then? Good. So long as that arrangement exists, nothing will go wrong."

Tenichi felt something lurch uncomfortably in his stomach, as though protesting Keitarou's simple, sweeping logic — but there was something in the mud-slurried eyes that told him agreement was the safer option. He did not know where he was, or how far he was from the nearest Senkaimon — and besides, everything Keitarou had said was true. If his superiors knew he had come to Rukongai, no amount of excuses would protect him. Keitarou was a wily character who had outsmarted the Council for years — he would cover his tracks and leave Tenichi vulnerable and alone to face the music. Wary as he was of his kinsman, to defy him now would be reckless.

Slowly and in defeat he nodded his head, allowing his companion to lead him back up the hill.

As they passed the stream, he felt eyes on him and he turned, realising that Koku had lowered his book, his dark eyes now trained intensely on the young shinigami. Despite himself, Tenichi shivered. There was something in the young man's glance that had thrown him right on edge, but the next minute Koku's gaze was once more buried in the pages of the ancient tome, and the moment passed.

"Don't concern yourself with him," Keitarou advised, catching sight of Tenichi's expression and offering a smile. "Koku likes to read, and prefers his own company. You probably won't speak again before you leave... I don't think he's very interested in you."

Tenichi remembered that brief, intense gaze, and privately thought that Keitarou was mistaken. He said nothing, however, merely making a mental note to observe and remember as much about his visit here as he could.

He had no intention of betraying Keitarou to his superiors... at least, not at present. He would find out what he could and see whether Keitarou's knowledge about Daisuke's death was fact or fiction before he acted... first of all, he needed to know whether Keitarou had truly been Daisuke's ally, or the one who had betrayed him to his grave.

Author's Note: The Endou Family since Meifu.

Anyone who has read Meifu's Gate knows who Endou Hirata is. Now Captain of Seventh Squad and Head of the Endou, Hirata has done his best to improve the lot of his people and for the first time in a long time the District is in relative peace. This is partly thanks to Juushirou, since right after graduation, Thirteenth Division were stationed in Seventh District to teach the Endou shinigami how to be a squad and how to respect the District people. Now Thirteenth has its own barracks, of course, and although the Gotei divisions work across a wide and varied area, for the most part the Seventh Squad has direct control over Seventh District.

Hirata's father Misashi is still alive, but passed the leadership of the Clan to his son when Hirata became Captain of Seventh Squad. Hirata was also married not long after graduation — an arranged match with a hime from a distant Endou strain out of favour with Seimaru and Shouichi's administrations. Hirata's mother Sumire is also still living, and Endou Riku, Seimaru's mother, is still firmly confined within the northern fortress, Hokujou.

Hirata currently has three children — twenty four year old son Souja 総社 and twenty one year old daughter Kikyue 喜久絵 are the Vice Captain and Third Seat of Seventh Squad respectively. Hirata's younger daughter, seven year old Sayuri 小百合, has no discernable spirit power and lives largely with her mother, well away from the violence and drama of the Shinigami front line. For this reason, Juushirou has had little if any contact with her and so far as he is concerned, Hirata may as well only have two children.

Hirata and his wife Ai 愛 respect one another but are not in love and live fairly separate lives without any rancour between them, as Hirata is often busy with Clan or Squad business. They are united in their affection for their children, and Hirata went against the Endou grain by ensuring Kikyue was trained as hard as Souja to be a shinigami. Though Kikyue can never inherit the Clan, her skills are accepted by all of Seireitei, including a reluctant Endou-ke.

It must not be forgotten that Hirata's only sister Eiraki absconded with Keitarou to become his wife in exile, some considerable time before this story opens.

Also, the kanji for black looks like this: 黒. It can be read as "Kuro" or 'Koku' depending on the type of reading and circumstances. Tenichi questions Koku's usage of it because normally this form of reading only appears as part of a word, not as word on its own. When on its own, the reading "kuro" is more common.

6. Sakaki

Chapter Five: Sakaki

“Why didn’t you tell me one of your patrol had gone missing, Kikyue?”

As the third seated officer slipped back into the division compound, the sound of her brother’s voice made her start, turning guiltily to face his quizzical, impassive gaze. It was already late, the sun having set some hours before, and Kikyue had spent the whole time canvassing Seireitei looking for her missing waif and stray. In her preoccupation, she had forgotten to send a message back to her own barracks to notify her fellows of her prolonged absence, but even so, she had clearly not expected to find Souja waiting for her, still uniformed and awake despite the late hour. Glancing at her, the Seventh Division Vice Captain could see the mixture of emotions that ran through her gaze — apprehension, guilt, and finally, resignation as she realised she had been caught.

Kikyue’s eyes narrowed for a moment, then she sighed, dropping back against the wood panelling of the sheltered walkway with a weary look on her young features.

“He was here,” Souja agreed, nodding his head. “He was concerned about the boy, and, when I heard, so was I. I realise that he’s one of yours, and you want to take responsibility for him yourself, but in a situation such as this...”

He hesitated, his jaw twitching slightly in agitation.

“You know about the others,” he said, lowering his voice. “Eleventh, Ninth, and what happened there. There’s every possibility that Tenichi was the latest person to be abducted — that being the case, do you realise how much time we’ve already wasted because you didn't come through the proper channels of command?"

There was nothing more than the barest reproach in the young shinigami's tones, but despite that, Kikyue looked crestfallen, colour surfacing in her pale cheeks as she dropped her gaze to the floor.

"I know. I'm sorry. I hoped it was something... I wanted to find him, and I didn't think..."

"Tell me what you've discovered." Souja was not given to long lectures or scolding, and, at his sister's obvious contrition, he rested a hand gently on her shoulder, steering her towards the Vice Captain's office, where kidou lamps were still burning brightly despite the late hour. "You've spent every waking moment looking for him, I'm sure, so we might as well make up for lost time by eliminating what isn't possible. I know you went to Thirteenth, but other than that..."

"I did," Kikyue confirmed, obediently trudging behind her brother to the secluded office located towards the rear of Seventh District's compound. She glanced around her, making sure that the coast was clear of any stray recruits sneaking around after hours, but the halls were silent, and once they had slipped inside the study itself, Souja slid the door shut, fastening the lock to prevent any untoward interruptions. He gestured for his companion to make herself comfortable, and Kikyue sank down onto one of the deep crimson cushions that lay before the low-slung desk, resting her hands in her lap.

"Well?" Souja took his own seat, cocking his head on one side and eying his companion critically. "I can tell you don't want to report this to me as your Vice Captain, so how about you tell me as your brother? We can cover the gaps and the loopholes later — right now my concern is locating the boy and, if I can, putting your mind at rest for whatever's led us to this point."

"You always go soft on me," Kikyue's eyes glittered with frustration. "Behind closed doors, Aniue, nobody sees but you do. You'll listen to me as your little sister, but I'm not... here, I'm not that. I'm your subordinate and if I do wrong, you... you discipline me. That's how it works. I lost one of my men — you should be interrogating me on why, not talking to me as though it's something that can be swept aside and brushed over as learning experience."

"Tenichi's safety is my priority," Souja said lightly. "We've had this conversation before, and I know how you want to prove yourself, but at the moment, we have other things to do than strip you of privileges. Besides, if Tenichi is the latest victim of the kidnappers, you're probably heaping blame on yourself that isn't yours to take."

"This doesn't fit the pattern of the others," Kikyue objected. "Father's strict about us repairing damage we've caused, and nobody would dare argue with him about it."

"True, and I've had no word from anyone that Tenichi has been seized," Souja admitted. "That's why I want to rule out all other options. Whilst I appreciated Juushirou-dono giving me the heads-up, earlier, I would have rather it had come from you. It should have been kept a Seventh Division matter, if possible... you know that."

"I do," Kikyue agreed reluctantly, "but Tenichi came to us from Thirteenth, and... that's why."

"I know," Souja offered her a smile. "All right. I know Juushirou-dono is as clueless as we are as to where our officer might have got to, and he seemed to know less than even I do about the abduction incidents. He said you'd stopped to speak to Kirio-dono and Ketsui, though — did you have any luck there?"

"I didn't see Ketsui," Kikyue shook her head. "I did speak to Kirio-dono, though. She was a little reticent to begin with, but when she realised he was missing, she did tell me that she'd seen him, late last night. She wasn't sure on the time, but he'd called by to see his brother, and found him out on patrol. He stopped to speak to Kirio-dono a while, then left. She thought he was returning back to base, but obviously, he never arrived."

"Late last night, but at an undetermined time," Souja's brow creased in contemplation. "That probably means it was after our curfew order — or at a time he should have been somewhere else, since Kirio-dono wouldn't get him deliberately in trouble with us if she could prevent it, and if he hadn't broken any rules, she would've been much more clear-cut. Still, that's not important now. It was evening and he visited Thirteenth for a brief while. Then he left, and there's no suggestion he came back here at all last night?"

"No, sir. None," Kikyue agreed miserably. "His bunk-mates said they didn't see anything of him, and his bed hasn't been slept in. I spent most of the day scouting out areas of Inner and Outer Seireitei, hoping for a clue or an eye-witness, but nothing."

"Aside from the lack of motive, it is just like the other abductions," Souja's expression became grim. "Unlike the other divisions, though, Seventh have no reason to hide in shame. We've done our duty, and so if we've been targeted, there's no reason for us to keep quiet. I'll wait till morning — we'll see if a note or communication of any kind appears. If not, then I'm going to take it to the Vice Captain's meeting."

"Are you sure?" Kikyue looked doubtful. "Tenichi's life might be in danger, if you make a fuss."

"Tenichi's life is in danger so long as he's at the whim of rebels we know nothing about," Souja pointed out. "Besides, keeping it quiet is impossible, now. I told Juushirou-dono all that I'd heard from Ninth and Eleventh. It wouldn't be the first time the subject had been hinted at in a Vice Captain meeting, but I suspect it will go one step further, now. I thought the Captains would have discussed it, but apparently not."

"What about Father?" Kikyue asked quizzically. "If it goes through all those channels..."

"Yes, it will have to go to Father, but he is someone I've had word from today," Souja replied succinctly. 'He sent word to say he'd be back tomorrow afternoon, and I replied by return to say we'd be ready and expecting him at any time. Oh, don't worry, I said nothing about any of this then,' as Kikyue's eyes widened with dismay. "That doesn't need to be passed through the ears and mouths of messengers when it can be done as easily from source to target when he gets back. Maybe he'll have ideas of his own about Tenichi's whereabouts — in the meantime, you should get some rest. This is my problem now, and I intend on taking it by the scruff of the neck. If these rebels have got brazen enough that they'll grab a high ranking shinigami from a squad who's been treating the Districts pretty nicely, they'll soon realise they messed with the wrong Clan."

"You sound a little like Father, talking like that," Kikyue sighed, stretching her hands over her head. "I'm sorry I didn't report to you sooner, Oniisama. It was foolish, but I wanted to find him. I thought he had just snuck out, and, well..."

"You wanted to avoid a disciplinary for both of you, I know, but I think this is more than just breaking squad rules," Souja eyed her keenly. "I mean it, Kiki. Go to bed. Sleep. Leave it with me. I'll look into whatever I can and I'll report to Father tomorrow if a report needs to be made. It's my job as Vice Captain, and since you reminded me that you're my subordinate, I'm now releasing you of responsibility for this particular matter."

"You're still just protecting me," Kikyue objected, but she got to her feet, and Souja could tell she was too tired to fight his instructions with her usual sparky wit and determination. "All right. I'll help, though, when the sun rises. Don't cut me out of it, please. Tenichi is still mine, and I want to make sure he's safe."

"I know," Souja agreed. "We can talk about that in the morning — for now, leave it here and get some rest."

Kikyue shot him a glance, but she did not demur, and as she left the office, Souja let out his breath in a rush, relief coursing through his veins. He had expected a battle, but Kikyue's genuine preoccupation with Tenichi's disappearance had overridden her normal desire for independence, and he would take advantage of that so long as it lasted.

Besides, there were some things she wasn't ready to handle. Loyal as she was, ruthless and decisive, she was still young and lacking in the experience that five years at the Academy had given Souja. Unlike his sister, his idealism was rooted in reality, and as he pulled himself to his feet, he cupped his hands together, summoning the stray particles of spiritual residue from the chamber to gather against the warmth of his skin. They mingled there, migrating towards his touch in search of the warm, comforting glow of his aura, and as he drew them together, he watched them take form, the dark, spectral wings of the butterfly spreading out over the narrow body and flapping once, twice, three times before launching into giddy flight.

Summoning a Hell Butterfly was a talent that most shinigami still struggled to master, but Souja had learned to do it almost by accident. Once, as a twelve year old boy, he and some Clan friends had been playing in a ravine near to the main Endou estate when one of the children had slipped and fallen, breaking his leg. Though they had tried to move the youngster, none of the children had been strong enough to manage, and in his impulse to help his friend, Souja had found himself drawing stray reishi towards him, his fingers forming and grooming them into hazy insect form without even stopping to think. He had sent the butterfly, drunk and feeble though it was, fluttering back to the manor for help and, within the hour, a rescue party had descended upon them, ready to bear the half-fainting patient to a place of safety.

Hirata had been with them, but as his guardsfolk had supervised the rescue, he had taken his son aside, eyes anxious as he had plied the young boy with questions. The result had been specialist training with the Urahara of District Three, and, by the time he had begun at the Academy, three years later, Souja had perfected the art of Hell Butterfly summoning to a high level of sophistication. He was the only Vice Captain in Seireitei with the dubious distinction of being able to send a butterfly across two Districts before it faltered and disintegrated, the message still being comprehensible up to forty eight hours after it had first been released. This message, however, was going to somewhere far more close at hand.

Briefly he closed his eyes, transmitting his thoughts into the insect's ghostly form, before releasing his hold on it's aura and allowing it to fly free from the window into the midnight sky. For a moment he watched it, its fleeting silhouette barely visible against the darkness, but then it was gone, and he could sense no more than the faintest buzzing of its life force at the back of his thoughts.

He turned back to his desk, rummaging through the papers there until he found the one that he wanted.

The response message would take a few hours to come, and in the meantime, there was plenty more work for him to do. His eyes narrowed slightly as he scanned the fading report document, taking in the crest of the Eleventh Division that had been inked in by hand at the top of the missive. The kanji for "Secret" was scrawled across the back in red ink, but he paid it no mind, reading carefully and conscientiously through the three short paragraphs of information and committing the tiniest detail to memory as he hunted for any clue that might help him in his quest.

Thank goodness for being on good terms with all of the other Vice Captains in Seireitei.

He ran his tongue ruefully across the tips of his teeth as he set the piece of paper down.

When I asked Ikata for anything he had relating to the abduction of his members, he didn't even stop to question why I'd want it. He pulled it right out of his division reports and handed it over without even hesitating. There's something for cultivating friendships with my comrades. I know I'll owe him a favour later, but I'm sure that I'll repay it somehow. I'll offer to have Seventh take over patrol duty around the garbage disposal units for him, probably. He hates sending his men there, and they hate going, but no other squad is interested in changing territories or rotating shifts. It might not go down well with the Endou to begin with, but they've learned that questioning me is questioning Father, and that's something you only do once in your life. No, I'm sure I'll find a way to repay Ikata's helpfulness.

He sat back on his heels, contemplating.

Kikyue's right, though. This is different from those encounters. Although the abductees from Eleventh remembered nothing about their experience, the ransom notes were quickly forthcoming, and written in printed hand.

The notes weren't submitted for proper analysis, so there's no way of finding out whether the incident in Eleventh and the one in Ninth were done by the same group or coincidentally by two, and it's harder to convince a Kuchiki-led squad to divulge information about such things if there might be a question of threat to their honour. The Ninth are jealously protective of that, far more so than Sixth, probably because they're so far from the core of Kuchiki command and therefore have to prove themselves with everything they do. Eleventh, fortunately, aren't so reluctant to talk, providing you equal their rank and their birth. I outrank both Minachidono and Ikata in terms of my birth level, and sometimes that helps.

His eyes narrowed to near slits.

Tenichi disappeared last night, between leaving Thirteenth and the time he should have arrived back here. Nobody at Seventh saw him yesterday evening, which means that twenty four hours have already passed with no word from any would-be abductors. The note Ikata told me about named and shamed particular members of the Eleventh Division for being lax in their duties to Seireitei, and from the whispers I've heard, I got the impression that Ninth was the same. Seventh aren't guilty of District neglect, though. There's been no claim for ransom, no name and shame — not yet. Tenichi might just have gone of his own accord... yet...

He shook his head impatiently.

No. No, Kikyue searched, and there's few as determined as my sister when she gets going. She would have found him, if he was hiding out somewhere here, and there's only so far he could have got in the space of a day. Kikyue's shunpo is superior to Tenichi's, and her senses are sharp. She would have picked up on where he was very quickly, which means that wherever he is is not somewhere she can find him. Shinigami don't just vanish without a trace, but this is looking suspiciously as though Tenichi somehow has.

His glance flitted towards the half-open window, his mind on the buzzing presence of the Hell Butterfly as he felt it reach its destination, scattering spirit particles to the wind as it conveyed its message.

I suppose we'll see what my other sources have to say about all of this. If this is part of a bigger organisation, maybe they'll have heard something of use. It's worth a shot, if nothing else... and there's not much more I can do until Father gets back and until I attend the Vice Captain's meeting on the morrow.

I'd rather know what I was launching myself into before I launch into it, so let's hope that the reply comes before dawn this time.

Naoko bowed her head in apology before her Captain, raising her head to meet his pensive gaze with her frustrated green one. “We canvassed the area you instructed, and Ketsui was very good about talking to several of the locals, but nobody had anything they could tell us. We found no trace of any Hollows, and as far as we could see, no obvious dissent against what was going on in Inner Seireitei.”

“I see,” Juushirou set down his chopsticks, reviewing his Third Seat’s words with careful concentration. “Don’t look so down, Naoko. You did your best, and that’s all. If I was wrong in sending you, then I apologise for the wasted time. I just thought it important we check that nothing negative was going on in Lower Seireitei. Trekking out two nights in a row is excessive, and you’re probably tired — but nonetheless, I feel reassured that we’ve covered as much of the local terrain as possible and found nothing amiss.”

“You don’t look very reassured, if I may say so,” Naoko said astutely, taking the cushion he indicated and smoothing her hakama across her legs. “You look quite the opposite. What’s wrong?”

“You’re far too perceptive, but I suppose you’re right,” Juushirou offered her a wry smile. “I am concerned. It’s like being ill without a diagnosis. You know there’s a problem, and you can’t shake it off, but everyone is telling you that you’re fine and it must be in your imagination. This is like that. I know there’s something amiss at work here, but I can’t pinpoint what and it bothers me.”

“Perhaps if we’d asked harder... pressed more...” Naoko grimaced. “We didn’t want to make enemies of the locals, though, not given the current situation. Thirteenth has a good reputation among District people, and we were aware that reputations are easier to break than mend.”

“Mm,” Juushirou agreed. “Yes, you’re right. No, you’ve done nothing wrong. I’m grateful to you — and soon, when I dismiss you, I want you to take time to rest. I’ll assign your usual patrol duties to someone else for a change, as you look ready to drop and I won’t have any harm come to you, not when the division needs you to be on the ball.”

Naoko opened her lips to protest, but before she could get a word out, there was a thudding knock at the door of the office, and Juushirou’s expression lightened slightly, his gaze flitting towards the divide.

“Come in, Enishi,” he called, raising his voice, and the divide slid back, revealing the broad Vice Captain, who cast Naoko a startled look.

“Shikibu? You’ve come back, then? Anything new to report?”

“This has something to do with the Hollows and all that business, doesn’t it, sir?” Enishi turned a quizzical gaze on his superior officer, who nodded his head

“Close the door,” he said with a sigh. “While it’s just the three of us, let’s drop the formality and brainstorm in a more even way. I have something I want to share with the two of you, and it may be important that it doesn’t go beyond these walls — at least, not yet.”

“Sure,” Enishi was surprised, but did as he was bidden, thudding back across Ugendou’s hollow floor and dropping down with a thump on an empty cushion across from Naoko. “What’s up, Ukitake? You don’t usually look like that unless you’re about to start a haibyou fit — and I can’t say I’ve heard you coughing at all lately, so I don’t suppose that’s it.”

“No... no, I’m actually quite well, at the moment,” Juushirou shook his head. “It’s about something else. Enishi, you know that Kikyue from the Seventh was here yesterday, don’t you?”

“Yep, sure do,” Enishi nodded his head quickly. “She was here on some errand, and wanted Hikifune and Ketsui. Couldn’t help her with the latter, being that you’d got him busy with other things, but I pointed her in the direction of Hikifune, and so far as I know, they spoke and then she left.”

“Kikyue-dono was here?” Naoko’s ears pricked up. “Just on a whim, or for a particular reason? I didn’t think she and Kirio were particular friends.”

“It was business,” Juushirou admitted heavily. “I haven’t made a big deal of it, but Kikyue came here looking for Tenichi. It seems he’s gone missing, and she wanted to check all the places he’d most likely show up.”

“Missing?” Identical shock registered on the faces of both officers, and Juushirou nodded.

“I haven’t told Ketsui, and I don’t intend to, yet. Not while I don’t know what's happened," he said carefully. "I pulled Kirio in here after Kikyue left, and I told her that she wasn't to talk about it with anyone until I gave her leave. She's not happy, of course, but she agreed. I found her plenty to do yesterday, and she and Ketsui didn't see each other for more than a few minutes, since he'd know at once if she was upset about something like this."

"But he's really missing?" Naoko's brain was clearly working at speed. "He hasn't just got himself tied up in something stupid?"

"Doesn't seem that way," Juushirou shook his head. "I know he's not our problem or our responsibility any more, not directly, but I'm not inclined to brush it off and let it go. I went to see Souja, at Seventh's headquarters, and he said something to me about a spate of abductions among some of the other squads, by suspected disgruntled District rebels trying to force Clans to pay for repairs on damaged villages."

"I heard something about that," Enishi's eyes lit up with remembrance. "Least, not much that was of any use, and I didn't think a whole lot about it, not at the time. Ikata was spouting off about some dictum of Minachi-dono's at one of our Vice Captain meetings, and he was less than pleased about it at the time, I'm telling you. Ikata's not the kind of person who keeps it to himself or his squad when he's got a grievance burning, and he had one that day. I didn't get all the particulars, but I got the gist that a couple of his lower officers got themselves tangled up with District troublemakers and because of it, Minachi-dono was being doubly strict on security and so on."

"You didn't think to report any of this to Ukitake-kun?" Naoko arched an eyebrow, and Enishi shrugged sheepishly.

"I don't usually do that, not when a loudmouth like Ikata's just sounding off," he admitted guiltily. "Maybe I should, if it was important, but I didn't really think it was. He blows things out of proportion — and as I understood it, nobody was hurt, right?"

"Yes, but it wasn't an isolated incident," Juushirou replied. "Souja believed it had happened in Ninth too, though they're more tight-lipped with the details. Souja thinks Tenichi might be the next victim, and that the rebels, emboldened by their successes, have widened their net to include any shinigami as fair game."

Enishi muttered a curse, and Naoko let out a heavy sigh.

"Souja-dono seems very well informed," she murmured. "I wonder if that means he expected something like this to happen?"

“Anticipated it?” Juushirou glanced at her quizzically, and Naoko shrugged.

“Maybe not in his own squad,” she said pensively, “since Seventh are almost as strict as we are on paying compensation to villagers who have lost homes and livelihoods in our raids. No, not that, I’m sure. It’s not impossible, though, that he thought it might happen in one of the other squads and was gathering intelligence in case there was a pattern between them.”

She shot Enishi a sidelong glance.

“Perhaps you should take more notes at Vice Captain meetings,” she suggested acerbically, “or, alternatively, spend more time talking to your colleagues, in case you learn something useful.”

“Naoko, this isn’t Enishi’s fault,” Juushirou chided, as the tall Yamamoto flushed an uncomfortable red. “I didn’t know anything of this, and nor, as far as I can tell, do any of the Captains except those who have been directly affected. If Souja picked up extra information, it was only by some fluke he obtained it, and Enishi isn’t at fault for missing the clues when they were so sparsely scattered. What concerns me now, though, is that we get word out and find out who’s behind this.”

“The same people as the ones messing up the Hollows?” Enishi recovered himself, shooting Juushirou a quizzical look, and the Captain nodded.

“I think it’s likely, but proving it is a problem,” he responded. “There’s absolutely no smoking gun anywhere we’ve investigated, and even less to identify potential kidnapping groups, let alone brooking a connection between the two things. It makes me uneasy, but I’m having trouble drawing the lines and pulling the whole picture together.”

“Meanwhile, what’s happening to Tenichi?” Enishi looked troubled. “I understand not telling Ketsui, but isn’t there something we can do to try and find him?”

“I imagine that Seventh are already covering those bases, with Kikyue’s visit and Souja’s apparent information on the subject,” Juushirou shook his head. “Right now, we don’t know for sure that he has been abducted. The other kidnappings left a ransom note, but so far I’m not aware that this has happened here. We’re waiting on that kind of information — at which point, Ketsui should probably be told. Right now, though, he’s not to know anything. I don’t want him unnecessarily distressed. If Tenichi is in danger of his life, and loses it before we can find him, there's no sense in causing the boy more stress than need be — and if he turns up safe, well, so much to the good. Either way, Ketsui's the kind who will fret about things he can't change, and that's no good for anyone, least of all his brother."

"Tenichi would be the first to say he should be kept in the dark," Naoko admitted. "It's all right, we won't say anything — will we, Houjou-kun?"

"Nope, not a word," Enishi agreed gravely. "If you want me to go tackle Ikata about this kidnap stuff, too, I will. He's kin, so he might talk to me — it's worth a shot."

"If you don't mind," Juushirou responded. "I don't believe there's much he can tell us, but I do intend on taking this to a Captain's meeting. I had word from Unohana-taichou this morning, telling me that she'd succeeded in getting my concerns on the agenda for the next Captain's Meeting, and that'll likely be in a day or two's time, she's hoping. I'll raise this there, then... and considering I'll be upsetting Minachi-dono by bringing it up, I want to be as informed as possible on what happened to his members."

"Consider it done," Enishi saluted, and Juushirou grinned, relief in his hazel eyes.

"In that case, Naoko, I'm dismissing you and you are forbidden from doing anything like work until you've had a proper meal and a good few hours sleep," he said firmly, gesturing towards the door. "Anything else, Enishi and I will handle from here. Understood?"

Naoko's expression was rebellious for a brief moment, but at length she got control of herself, letting out a sigh.

"Yes, Captain," she said flatly. "I understand."

"She'd work herself to death, if you didn't tell her to go rest up from time to time," Enishi remarked, once the redhead had left the chamber, and Juushirou nodded his head.

"She would," he agreed, "which is why I make sure it can't happen. This is bothering me, though, Enishi. It's as though something is coming, and even though I can feel it, I can't stop it. It's there, gathering pace behind the scenes, and by the time we see it..."

He pressed his lips together, his gaze flitting to the peace and calm that lingered beyond Ugendou's walls.

"By the time we see what it is, and where it's coming from," he murmured softly, "I'm very afraid it might be already too late."

The sky was a hazy blue, clouds drifting lazily across it as though they had all the time in the world. A bird on the wing let out a cadenza of notes, rising and falling as it soared and swooped over the landscape, its form reflecting in the glittering surface of the lake water below. Among the trees, children could be seen playing, their feet bare and their clothing damp at the hem from paddling in the lake shallows, yet their eyes were bright and eager, their laughter carrying across the clear air like music on the breeze.

Katsura stepped over the uneven stone pathway, pausing to perch on the edge of a boulder to watch the young ones play. They had everything they needed here, he realised, a smile touching his lips as he observed their reaction to his appearance. Instead of cowering away in fear and apprehension, they raised grass-stained hands in a wave, identical grins wreathed across faces already sticky from the berries they had picked from a nearby bush.

So intent was he on the scene, Katsura almost missed the flash of black and white at the periphery of his vision — almost, but not quite. He turned, almost overbalancing off his stone as he caught sight of the shinigami he had met at the river, her thick dark hair bound back from her face in a neat braid. She had not seen him, bending to pick flowers from the water's edge, and, as he watched, the children ran over to her, greeting her with warm hugs. As they chattered to her merrily about their game, her delicate lips spread into a gentle smile, and she plucked flowers from her basket, slipping one blossom into the hair of the nearest little girl, whilst patting one of the small boys on the head with a word of reassurance and encouragement. The children gathered around her as though flocking to a mother figure, and, as Katsura watched, the shinigami settled herself on the ground, paying no heed to the damp grass. The black fabric of her shihakushou spread out around her, and the children crowded in, eager and willing to hear whatever she had to say.

For a moment, Katsura badly wanted to be a part of that group, and at that moment, the shinigami raised her gaze, soft, velvety grey eyes meeting his startled ones across the lake.

“Mitsuki,” her lips parted, and though she was too far for him to hear her voice, the word resounded in his skull as though she had been standing next to him. “Edogawa Mitsuki.”

“I might have known you’d be skipping off your duties, if nobody was there to watch you.”

With a jolt the image jerked and faded out, as the harsh words broke through his consciousness, rousing Katsura rudely from his sleep. He blinked, struggling for a moment to get his bearings, but as he brought the world into focus, he saw two cool blue eyes staring down at him, and he groaned, pulling himself into a sitting position and brushing the leaf litter from his clothing.

It had been a dream, then. He had dreamed about the shinigami, but she wasn't really anywhere nearby. Instead it was Sakaki who had dropped down on the ground in front of him, her eyes impatient and her fingers already curled around the dagger that she carried at her belt, behind her katana. A moment longer, Katsura knew, and his companion would have resorted to using one or other of the weapons to wake him up, and he inwardly shuddered at the thought. Sakaki took far too much pleasure from causing gratuitous pain, and she had no qualms about who she maimed, not even her own flesh and blood.

"You got here all right, then," he said wearily, rubbing his eyes and glancing the young woman over from head to foot. She was robed almost entirely in black, in an outfit that would have made the most stealth-conscious Shihouin jealous, for it was designed to blend easily into her surroundings and allow the most silent of movements even when travelling at speed. Her black hair was tied in a tail behind her head, her spiky fringe sticking out all ways from her brow as though refusing to be fully tamed, and Katsura did not need to meet her gaze to know that the anticipation of the hunt was already rippling through her young form. Those blue eyes were feral, the gleam in them the look of a predator about to corner a particularly delicious piece of prey, and Katsura thanked his lucky stars that, not for the first time, he was off her menu. Sakaki would not hesitate to draw blood from him, or indulge one of her sadistic games under the guise of waking him from his sleep, but she knew that killing him would carry far reaching consequences.

She set the dagger aside, clearly disappointed that she had not had a chance to use it, but she nodded.

"You're not hard to find, not when I know what to look for," she said simply. "I have my orders, and I can memorise a map. He said you'd be in this area, and so I scouted around the perimeters before I actually tracked you down. The sun rose about an hour ago — I had just about decided to wake you using force when you came to."

"Thankfully, I didn't need your particular brand of morning wake up call today," Katsura said dryly, and Sakaki pouted.

"You're such a wuss," she needled him. "A little blood and gore wouldn't have killed you, and it would've made a neat warm up to the main act."

She licked her lips, and Katsura half wondered if she was imagining his blood spilling across his arm, pooling on the grass around them. He shivered inwardly, shaking his head.

“You’re not to draw unnecessary attention to yourself, or to us,” he warned her, holding up his hands. “You know what you’re here to do, and that’s all you need to worry about. Follow your orders and we’ll both get back safely, all right? I don’t want to be covering for you because you went beserk and killed more than you were supposed to. Remember, we’re not here to slay innocent civilians. We’re here to...”

“Gut Shinigami. I know. I know!” Sakaki clicked her tongue against her teeth impatiently. “I’m not a little girl, Katsu-nii. I can tell my soul reapers from my plus souls, and I wish you’d give me credit for knowing my target when I see it. I had to repeat my orders three times before I was allowed to leave the village, and you’d think by now I’d be trusted to carry out a kill on my own. That is my speciality, unless you’d forgotten — I’m very good at this kind of work, and I don’t see why I had to be paired with you to complete it, if you want the truth.”

“You’re still a child by most people’s standards, though I can see that ‘most people’ doesn’t really apply to you,” Katsura sighed, getting to his feet and pulling his companion up with him. “You’re still only sixteen, Sakaki, and people worry about you when you’re let out on your own.”

“I can take care of myself,” Sakaki muttered, and Katsura nodded wryly.

“I mean, they worry about anyone who happens to run into you, not about you per se,” he amended drolly. “You know what would happen if you left a trail of death and destruction leading to our door. It’s bad for business and he’d never let you out again if you compromised our safety with your blood lust. Kill who you’re supposed to kill, and enjoy it if you must, but for heaven’s sake, no extras, understand?”

“I get it,” Sakaki rolled her eyes. “Oniisama, you’re really no fun when you start sounding like him. Relax. I already staked out the Shinigami’s main camp, and I’ve sussed out how to best get in without creating suspicion. They’re healers, so they won’t know what hit them. I’ll strike hard and fast and be gone before they can raise an alarm.”

She eyed him coquettishly.

“What about you?” she demanded. “The report we had back home was that they’d split into two groups. Are you going to manage to take out the others without me to hold your hand?”

A fleeting image of Mitsuki from his dream, surrounded by the children of the village ran through Katsura's head, and he frowned, quelling the sudden well of panic that rushed up inside him.

"I'll be fine," he said flatly, pushing it away. "I've never stopped to think about or care what happens to a shinigami yet, and I'm not going to start by worrying about a few stray ones just because they're healers and not combat fighters. In fact, that makes my job easier. You take care of the main camp, and I'll handle the others. You'll have enough to do with them, anyway. I'm not sure how many are here, overall, but..."

"Eleven," Sakaki said triumphantly, shooting him a superior look. "I counted. There are four camping down by the river — they're yours, so I left them alone — and seven more up at the main camp. They're mine, so don't even think of interfering or taking my fun, all right?"

"I know, and I'm not going to," Katsura grimaced at her. "If you're so cocky, go take care of your business and leave me to mine, all right? You don't need my help getting through the filtered Gate back to base, so I almost wonder why you decided to come meet up with me at all."

"His orders," Sakaki said succinctly. "I didn't choose to, and coming all this way only to go back was a drag, but at least it gave me a chance to check out the potential prey. I got the better deal, so it's all good. I'm happy to leave the stragglers to you — not that I think they'll give you much fun."

She dimpled at him, her smile sending chills down Katsura's spine.

"I got to come wake you up, at least," she pointed out, "although maybe not quite in the way I hoped."

"Believe me, I'm not complaining," Katsura muttered. "Look, I'll see you back at base later this evening, most probably. Complete your half and I'll complete mine. We'll compare notes later and report in, and that's us done for the Spiritless Zone for the time being. We don't want to be caught up in the aftermath, so don't linger around to admire your handiwork. I'm not going to come fish you out of trouble if you're still here when the Shinigami come."

"They won't be able to take me anywhere, so I'm not worried," Sakaki said confidently, "but it's fine. I won't linger. There'll be plenty of time to savour everything later."

She patted him lightly on the shoulder.

"Take care of yourself, Katsu-nii. Don't do anything I wouldn't do — and make sure you come back in one piece.”

With that she skipped off across the grass, darting into the undergrowth like an excited child just beginning a treasure hunt, and Katsura groaned, a dull ache beginning at the base of his skull.

I hate working with Sakaki.

He turned on his heel, making his way slowly down towards the river to splash water on his face.

I'm sure it's not normal to enjoy the idea of killing things so much. I know she's a teenager, and we all go through funny moments, but even so, she gives me the chills. I can't imagine what part of the family she got that from — whatever it was, I'm glad it doesn't extend to me.

He dipped his hands in the cool water, kneeling to wash his face and arms as thoroughly as he could manage without stripping off to his underclothes. The refreshing chill of the water doused the last remnants of his sleep, and he frowned, reflecting on his companion's words more carefully.

When you have a sister like Sakaki, yeesh, who needs enemies? Given a choice between her in a frenzy and a random encounter with a hostile shinigami in a deserted alley, I'd take my chances with the death God.

Death God.

The word rippled across his senses, teasing and poking at him as memory of his dream returned in fragments.

Edogawa Mitsuki, huh?

A rueful grin touched his face.

What is this? I've never stopped to think about a shinigami before, and now I'm dreaming about one? This is dangerous. If word got back home... thank goodness Sakaki can't read minds, else I'd be in deep trouble.

He got to his feet, drying his face on his sleeve, and as he did so, the humour faded from his features.

Mitsuki was here at this river last night. That means that she's part of the patrolling group that Sakaki labelled strays. That puts her under my remit... which means...

He swallowed hard, quelling his misgivings.

So I saw her do something kind — so what? A one off encounter with what might have been a one off gesture... am I really going to allow all the hard work go to ruin for the sake of that brief moment? I don't know her, and I have no reason to ever know her. She's the enemy, and how many times have I been told what happens if you're soft on the enemy? Pull yourself together, Katsura. You have a job to do.

His lips thinned, his jaw hardening as he summoned his resolve. Cautiously he stretched out his senses to the surrounding area, feeling tentatively through the layers of reishi for the familiar sensation of a tainted soul. At first, there was nothing, then, at length he locked onto something, absorbing the pain and torment that whirled through the entity's mind, preventing it from processing any form of coherent thought. His eyes narrowed, brow creasing in concentration as he poured his energy into snaring this rage-driven beast, pulling it towards him and meshing his thoughts into its pain, moulding and reforming the creature's chaotic instincts into something more focused and precise.

From somewhere in the distance, he heard the earth-splitting shriek of a Hollow announcing its presence, and a grim smile touched his pale features.

He had got one. Good.

He closed his eyes, bracing himself against the negative lull of the Hollow's mindscape and digging deeper beneath the creature's consciousness towards the core of its being. Knotting a thin wraith of his own spirit power around the creature's core like a noose, Katsura hesitated for the briefest moment, allowing his control over the beast to become firm and complete. Then, as the fluctuating waves of rage and despair began to slip into a dull, rhythmic hum, he inserted an extra command into the beast's psyche, projecting an image of the shinigami shihakushou as he did so.

It was just one word, but one strong enough to override all other impulses.

Kill.

Author's Note:

My Christmas break just started, so in celebration, here's a new chapter =D. Introducing Sakaki-chan. O.o.

7. Unexpected Ally

Chapter Six: Unexpected Ally

“Well, it looks like the Buchou’s concerns were over and above the call of duty, this time,” Kazuki leaned back against the trunk of a tree, a pensive expression on his unshaven features. “We’ve come all the way here, but everything looks to be safe and secure. We can go back and put his mind at rest.”

“It’s better that way, though,” Haseyo pointed out grimly. “We’ve seen enough villages taken apart in the last few weeks that to be able to report everything as stable comes as a nice change.”

“No kidding,” Seri grinned. “I like that kind of report. True, it makes for a boring mission, but at least there’s no more damage to tell him about.”

It was morning in the Spiritless Zone, and, along with her three companions, Mitsuki was packing up to return to the main Fourth Division camp in Hokutan. Their patrols of Junrin’an’s borderlands had revealed no new signs of trouble, and, though none of them had voiced it, each felt a little uneasy being far from their base just in case their skills were needed elsewhere. Eleven people were not many to cover three secured districts, but Madeki’s words still lingered in Mitsuki’s mind, and despite the inconvenience, she was glad they had come.

“It looks like it’ll be a nice day to walk back, at least,” Haseyo remarked now, fastening her obi more tightly and pulling her sword up from its resting place beside a tree, hooking it neatly over her sash so it hung at her side. “We can track along the river for part of the way, make sure that none of the settlements here have any other concerns, and then cut across the narrow part of Nakaken to Hokutan before it gets dark. The flowers are quite pretty in the valleys hereabouts, so it seems a shame not to enjoy the view.”

“You’re not supposed to be thinking of flowers,” Kazuki grimaced, rolling his eyes. “Yeesh, this is what I get when I come patrolling with girls. I should’ve known there was a short straw.”

“You didn’t complain when Mitsuki asked you to tag along,” Haseyo snorted, giving her companion a playful shove. “Besides, there’s nothing wrong with admiring the flowers. We see too much of the other when we're rescuing villagers from burnt out settlements — you can't begrudge me a few moments somewhere pretty on our way back, surely? We've done our job, so there's no harm in it. Mitsuki's in charge and she won't object if we take that route back — right, Mitsuki?"

Mitsuki opened her mouth to answer the light-hearted banter of her comrades, then paused, as something chilling rent through her senses, sending a shiver down her spine. She swung around, her eyes canvassing the surroundings for any sign of the source, but she could see nothing but grass and trees, beyond the rise the roofs of another settlement village located nearby. She glanced at her companions, but Seri was focused on fastening the ties on their equipment, and though Kazuki and Haseyo were both alert to their surroundings, neither one of them had reacted. Mitsuki bit her lip, inwardly wondering if tension was finally getting to her, for try as she might she could not shake the sensation that something dark and evil had spread its tendrils across the peaceful landscape.

"Mitsuki?" Seri's nudge at her elbow made the young healer realise her friend had been trying to communicate with her and she turned, preoccupation in her gaze as she tried to focus on what the older girl was saying.

"Sorry? I wasn't listening."

"I'll say you weren't," Seri tut-tutted impatiently, finally managing to tie the last knot on the lengths of cord that tied together their travel equipment and brushing her hands together to remove the dust. "I asked whether we were ready to set off back. Buchou wanted to reconvene in three days, didn't he? Kazuki's right that we've found nothing hereabouts, and there doesn't seem to be a point in lingering. If we set off now, we should make it back to base camp before dark, and then we can debrief. Whatever he sent us out looking for, it's not here, and so long as we are, we're not taking care of other problems in other parts of the Zone."

"Mm, I suppose so," Mitsuki nodded absently, her gaze still scanning the horizon, and Seri snorted, grasping her companion by the shoulders and giving her a short, sharp, shake.

"What is wrong with you this morning?" she demanded, eyes bright with curiosity. "You look and sound like you're on another planet, and your face is as white as a sheet. Don't tell me you've taken sick from all this pottering around the place? You can't catch diseases from plus souls, no matter how much time you spend in their company, so..."

“Seri, can’t you feel it?” Mitsuki turned anxious eyes on her companion. “Something dark and sinister spreading itself across the horizon?”

“Dark and sinister?” Seri pressed her lips together, then shook her head. “Unless you mean Buchou in a temper if we get back late, then no, I honestly can’t. You’re letting your senses go into overdrive, girl... calm down and see things rationally for a moment, all right?”

She patted her friend lightly on the back.

“If there were Hollows here, we’d have found them. It’s good to be on the alert, but you can take it too far.”

She turned to Haseyo, raising her voice slightly so that Kazuki, at the perimeter of their campsite could also hear her voice.

“Haseyo, Kazuki, can you do me a favour and take a walk down to the river’s edge? It might seem odd, but I’d just like to make sure that everything is in order there, before we haul sticks and move on out.”

“To the river?” Haseyo shot her a quizzical look. “You mean the village there, where you met that young girl the other night?”

“Yes, if you don’t mind,” Mitsuki nodded her head, a sheepish look in her grey eyes. “I know, it’s probably nothing, but...”

“We can spare a minute or two to do that,” Kazuki cast Haseyo a playful grin, then nodded his head, saluting Mitsuki’s orders with a wave of his hand. “We’ll only be a few minutes. You and Seri finish up clearing the campsite, and we’ll meet you at the fork in the road where the river bends in about fifteen minutes from now?”

“Yes. That’ll work. Thank you,” Mitsuki felt relief flicker through her body, and she grinned. “You can call me over-protective if you like, but it’ll nag at me otherwise. I thought I felt something from that direction, and I wanted to be sure nobody was in danger.”

“Consider us on it,” Haseyo shrugged her shoulders, glancing at Kazuki then nodding. “See you at the crossroads, then.”

With that she shunpoed out, and, after a moment, Kazuki followed her, leaving Mitsuki and Seri alone in the woodland.

“You know, you didn’t need to do that,” Seri chided. “There’s nothing out there, Mi-chan. If there was, don’t you think, as healers, we’d have felt it? I know your senses are better attuned to these things than ours, but at that kind of proximity, if there was a Hollow...”

“I don’t know that it was a Hollow I felt,” Mitsuki owned, kneeling down by the campfire and sweeping the cooled ashes into the grass with her hands. “It was something dark and sinister and it was coming closer, but I didn’t say it was a Hollow.”

“Then..?”

“I can’t pinpoint it,” Mitsuki admitted, frustration in her tones. “It ought to have been a Hollow, but it wasn’t a reiatsu that I locked onto, nor was it a particular spiritual footprint. It was more... a sense of something? It’s hard to explain, but... what I sensed was like... the instinct to kill?”

“You sense instincts now?” Seri let out a low whistle, amusement clear in her gaze. “That’s impressive, even for you. Seireitei ought to be careful, if that’s the case — you’d be ferreting out conspiracy just by walking down the main street!”

“Don’t tease me,” Mitsuki scolded. “I know how mad it sounds, but that’s what it felt like. Here, in such a pure, clean area, things that aren’t so clean carry much more easily. It may be nothing, but it’s worth checking it...”

She froze, eyes widening with alarm as a crackle of unmistakeable reiatsu spiked through the clearing, the trees juddering almost to their roots at the sudden vibrations.

“Mitsuki?” Seri’s own features drained of colour, and her fingers closed around the hilt of her sword, half-drawing it from its sheath. There was no need for Mitsuki to ask if her companion had felt it that time, for the whole copse was suddenly thick with it, a dark, stifling layer of spiritual energy that identified the interloper as a Hollow.

“That was what you felt, wasn’t it?” Seri’s words were strained, her earlier humour no longer in evidence as the toxic reiryoku rattled against her healer’s wits, and Mitsuki nodded grimly, her own fingers dusting against Yuuyugo’s sealed hilt.

“The village,” was all she said, however, camp equipment forgotten as she slipped into shunpo, racing as quickly as she could through the seams of reishi towards the river where she had met the young girl such a short time before. Kazuki and Haseyo were gone before them, she remembered with a jolt of relief, for Kazuki was proficient with his sword and Haseyo’s Kidou was also of an impressive level. Those few moments in which she had sent them ahead may well mean the difference between saving the village and searching for survivors, and in a situation like this, every second counted.

Seri would follow her, of that she had no doubt. For all her casual remarks and light-hearted banter, her friend never wasted a moment when it came to serious danger, so Mitsuki focused her entire attention on pinpointing the Hollow's location, following the choking threads of mangled reiryoku as they led her closer and closer to the flowing river.

Could the Hollow pollute the water with its tormented aura? Mitsuki had no idea, but she wasn't about to wait and find out.

She dropped out of shunpo at the water's edge, just as a blood-curdling, ear splitting shriek of defiance roared through the surrounding area. She took a deep breath into her lungs, fighting against the beast's emotional anguish as it threatened to seep through her sensitive wits and distract her from her purpose. She had never liked fighting Hollows, understanding far too well what they were thinking and feeling, but as she got her bearings, she realised that this one was unlike most of the creatures they faced as a matter of course.

Hollow thoughts were normally garbled, projecting out into the ether such random snippets of grief and agony that even the most dense of healers could pick up and follow its train of thought. This one was different, though, for instead of the stray fragments of the Hollow's pain polluting the atmosphere, all Mitsuki could sense was a driving urge to kill.

"Onesasan!"

A shriek from across the bridge made her start, and her heart leapt in her throat as she recognised the little girl who such a short time before she had helped carry water back to her village. The child was frightened, now, her cheeks streaked with tears of panic, and as Mitsuki took a step towards her, the child ran pell-mell across the wooden planking of the bridge, flinging herself on the startled shinigami with a whimper of fear.

"The monster's here, the monster's here!" she sobbed. "Please, Onesasan, make the monster go away?"

Mitsuki held the child tightly to her, casting her gaze around to try and pinpoint the location of the beast, but despite the stifling waves of reiryoku still polluting the air, she could not see anything.

"It was here?" she asked softly. "You saw it?"

"I saw it," Yukio nodded her head, terror glittering in her bright eyes. "It came here and it roared and screamed and everyone was running away.”

“That was the right thing to do,” Mitsuki swallowed her fear, patting the girl lightly on the head. “Did you see where it went? If you can tell me where it is, I’ll go and look for it.”

“It went to the trees. To the road, over there,” Yukio pointed towards a thicket that spanned the far side of the bank. “The shingami went there, and it went there too.”

“Shinigami?” Mitsuki’s eyes narrowed. “Shinigami were here?”

“Mm,” Yukio nodded, still clinging tightly to Mitsuki’s shihakushou. “A man and a woman. They came and so did the monster. They led it away and it followed them, but it might come back, and Oneesan, I’m scared. I don’t want to be eaten by a monster!”

“You won’t be. You won’t, I promise,” Mitsuki soothed the child gently, but her mind was racing.

Haseyo and Kazuki. I sent them here just in time, but now...

“Mitsuki!” Seri materialised on the bank a few feet away, making the young plus soul jump, and at the sight of her, Mitsuki made up her mind.

“It’s heading towards the crossroads!” she exclaimed, gesturing in the direction that Yukio had indicated. “Haseyo and Kazuki lured it off, but it’s sending out serious signals and they might need help. Go after them and give them a hand, will you? I’ll follow just as soon as I’ve made sure nobody here is hurt, but you’re better with your sword than I am, and they’ll value that more than Yuuyugo at the moment.”

Seri hesitated for a moment, then nodded her head, disappearing back into shunpo as she went to obey her companion’s commands. Mitsuki slipped her fingers into Yukio’s shaking hand, leading her back over the bridge towards the settlement.

“Nobody is going to let you get eaten, I promise,” she murmured, as the young girl hesitated. “My friends will get rid of the monster, and so will I, when I’ve made sure nobody here is injured. That’s why we were sent here, and we won’t leave until it’s safe, I swear.”

“Oneesan,” Yukio merely clung to her saviour’s hand, and Mitsuki felt the weight of the girl’s trust in the tight squeeze of those young fingers.

“It’s all right. We’re going to get rid of it, and everyone will be safe,” Mitsuki spoke soothingly, hoping that none of the souls could hear the racing beat of her heart. The Hollow’s killing instinct had increased since she had stepped off the bridge and into the settlement, and though she knew there was still some distance between it and her, it was impossible to ignore the waves of angry determination as they crashed over the whole of the surrounding region. No wonder Plus souls were being tainted, she mused darkly, if this was how the Hollows acted before they struck.

“Is anyone here hurt at all?” she asked now, glancing around her for any sign of Hollow devastation. At the far end of the main street, she could see smoke and, as they drew closer, it was clear that the Hollow had made its presence felt, smashing up two or three of the shack-like houses on its pathway through the centre. Mitsuki could sense the faint residue of a Kidou spell here, and she knew it had been Haseyo. So this is where her colleagues had headed off the Hollow — and just in time, too, she realised, for although there were a group of shivering, shuddering, crying Plus souls huddled beneath the broken overhang of their home, she could not detect any signs of serious injury among them.

She let out her breath in a rush.

We got here in time, this time.

“Is anyone hurt?” she asked again, realising that in their distress, none of the settlers had managed to answer her. “It’s all right, I promise. The other shinigami have chased the creature away, and will make sure it can’t come back. That’s what we’re here for, so you needn’t look so afraid. I’ve come to help anyone who’s injured.”

“Just scratches and bruises, shinigami-san,” a woman pulled her shawl more tightly around her shoulders, and Mitsuki recognised Yukio’s obasan from their previous encounter. “Your comrades were here oh, ever so quickly. As though they’d seen it coming, it was. The monster didn’t care much for us when it saw them, so it followed them out of the village sure enough.”

And that’s how it should be.

Mitsuki nodded her head in acknowledgement of the woman’s words.

“Yukio is frightened,” she said softly, gently disentangling her fingers from the child’s determined grasp. “Please, take her home and let her rest. She isn’t in any danger, but the monster gave her quite a shock.”

“I will. Thank you for bringing her home once again,” the woman inclined her head in a bow. “You look after us well, and that’s a fact, shinigami-san.”

Mitsuki opened her mouth to say that they did their best, but before she could voice even the first syllable, a paralysing sense of fear and pain rocketed through her healer’s wits. She gasped, stumbling under the weight of the sensation, and from somewhere in the surrounding area she could hear Yukio calling for her, suddenly seeming miles away. She took a few unsteady steps, reaching out desperately for the beam of a nearby shelter to steady herself as a second wave, just as intense and disabling as the first ripped her wits apart. Terror and agony mingled for a moment against her senses, tears glittering on her lashes as she fought not to drown in these foreign emotions, and then, just as soon as it had come, the feeling was gone.

“Shinigami-san?” Yukio’s obasan touched her arm, and from somewhere she had acquired a cracked mug, holding it out to Mitsuki with a concerned look on her face. It contained water, probably from the river, and as Mitsuki gathered her wits, she realised just how close she had come to passing out. Those two overwhelming rushes of energy had all but knocked her off her feet, yet now she felt nothing but emptiness, a hollow, aching sensation lurking deep within her heart.

“Shinigami-san, please, drink this. You went so pale, and you look quite ill,” the obasan pressed the mug on her, but Mitsuki’s body had already begun to put together the threads of what had happened, and she shook her head, offering the plus soul a harried, empty smile.

“I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to worry you,” she murmured. “I have to go. My friends need me. They need my help. Yuuyugo...”

She ran her fingers around the hilt of her weapon, drawing it from its sheath. At the sight of it, the gathered villagers drew back, a mixture of awe and alarm on their features, but Mitsuki could not focus on this now. Unease knotted up inside of her as she interpreted what the source of those rushes of darkness had been, and, whilst she kept telling herself such a thing was impossible, deep down she knew that no matter how swiftly she moved, she might already be too late.

Haseyo. Kazuki.

As she slipped back into shunpo, racing into the eye of the Hollow’s maelstrom, she felt the tears trickle down her cheeks, brushed away by the speed of her movement but quickly replaced by more. Although it had been some several years now since she had last attended a scene of violent shinigami death, the bubbling nausea lurching through her stomach told her all too clearly what she would find when she reached the copse. Yuuyugo's voice whispered at her senses, trying to calm her, but Mitsuki could not focus on her zanpakutou's kind, gentle nature right then. She had felt it, but until she saw it, she would not let go of the tiniest shred of hope that she had somehow been wrong.

Maybe it wasn't what I thought. Maybe they just lost consciousness. Perhaps, with Yuuyugo, I can...

Her words failed her as she reached the crossroads, dropping out of shunpo and registering the bloody scene that lay before her.

The Hollow was a scorpion type, its long, spiny tail curling and weaving around it in an agitated kind of war dance. Its chalk-white pincers waved wildly from left to right, beady, glittering eyes full of such bitter hatred that Mitsuki felt giddy just by glancing at them. On the ground before it, like broken rag dolls lay the red-soaked forms of two familiar figures, the black of their shihakushou concealing what Mitsuki now knew to be fatal injuries, for both shinigamis' white obis were deeply stained. Kazuki's sword, sealed and abandoned lay embedded in the ground a short distance away, and Mitsuki's stomach rocked again as she registered the blood that streaked all the way from hilt to blade. The Hollow's white pincers were also stained with crimson, their sharp tips gleaming with the freshness of the liquid, and Mitsuki knew that the monster had impaled her companions, flinging them aside as though they were no more concern than an insect who had flown into its path.

There was no sign of Seri.

The Hollow roared, pounding its tail against the trees as it set its gaze on its new victim, and Mitsuki swallowed hard, her grip tightening around Yuuyugo's hilt. She was not a fighter, and, in such close proximity to the monster that had slain her companions, she knew that she was not at her best. Her body still hadn't recovered from the intense shockwaves her comrades' deaths had subjected her to, and as she feverishly tried to remember the words to a spell — any spell — she felt her mind go completely blank.

"Seri!" she screamed, forcing the two syllables through her vocal chords as she searched the surroundings desperately for any sign of her missing ally. "Seri, where are you? Where are you?"

There was no reply, and the Hollow dug its spiny, pointed legs into the ground, readying itself for another fatal unleashing of its attack. Mitsuki steeled herself, forcing her mind to cooperate with her body's needs. She was the last line of defence between the Hollow and the Plus settlement. Her comrades had died bravely trying to protect the innocents, and now, with Seri missing, perhaps hurt and unconscious somewhere, Mitsuki knew that it was down to her alone. Instinct drove her to raise Yuuyugo, though her hand trembled, and inwardly she wondered whether or not she could manage to use her sealed blade to slice through the creature's mask.

It had already killed twice. It would surely not balk at killing more.

"Hadou no Sanjuu-ichi! Shakkahou!"

A voice came from the trees beyond, followed by a blinding flare of red light, and Mitsuki stumbled back as the spell connected with the Hollow's body, knocking it off its balance and forcing it to scramble its ungainly form around to regain its footing. As the light faded, Mitsuki caught sight of a blessed figure silhouetted between two trees, and she inhaled a shaky breath of air into her lungs, relief coursing through her.

"Seri," she whispered, and her companion nodded grimly, her hands already raised to fire another spell.

"Get at it from the other side," she called. "Put Yuuyugo away, Mitsuki, we need your Kidou here. If it's just the two of us, we have to take it off guard. It can't attack two ways at once... and the only way of hitting it is to take it by surprise!"

Mitsuki nodded, obediently sheathing her weapon, her mind locking on at last to the incantation for spells she had learned so many years ago at the Academy, and, as the words rippled past her lips, she felt her determination rising, overtaking her fear and grief at her colleagues' deaths. She could process this later, when her life and the lives of others weren't in danger. Right now she had a job to do, and, even as a healer, she had no choice but to fight.

"Hadou no Sanjuu-san, Soukatsui!" she exclaimed, barrelling the blue cannon spell into the Hollow's pincer and cracking it clean across from left to right. It shattered, and the beast let out a shriek of agony, but Mitsuki closed her mind to the creature's suffering, focusing her thoughts on nothing else but the next spell.

"Hadou no Sanjuu-ichi! Shakkahou!" A second blaze of red came from Seri's part of the forest, and the Hollow wheeled back, apparently confused by this dual-pronged attack. Seri's aim was true and the spell glanced off the monster's mask-like face, breaking away some of the edge and causing it to scream once more, thundering its tail against the trees with such force that one of them splintered, shuddering for a moment before toppling to the ground below.

“We’re getting there!” Mitsuki exclaimed, pressing her hands together to fire the next spell. Adrenaline pumped through her veins, obliterating everything from her mind except the need to protect the villagers that had shown her such trust and kindness. “Seri, we’re getting there! If you can take your sword...”

She faltered, as, for the first time she caught sight of her friend across the glade. Seri’s hands were locked together, determination fixed in her eyes as she readied herself for the next spell, but it was the colour of the other’s obi that made Mitsuki’s heart falter in her chest. Like the threads of fabric that entwined the corpses of her companions on the ground, Seri’s obi was stained with red, and, as she registered this fact, waves of pain and confusion began to penetrate through the adrenalin haze, telling her that Seri was injured and that the wound was serious.

“Seri, you’re hurt!” she exclaimed, dismay in her eyes.

“You’re not, though, and Yuuyugo can see to me after,” Seri did not move from her stance, although Mitsuki could now see that the shadow at her friend’s feet was not caught by light or the trees but by the steady stream of blood trickling down her companion’s body. “We need to take this one down, Mitsuki. Then we can worry about anything else.”

She winced, and Mitsuki was aware for the first time of the grey pallor in her friend’s cheeks.

She’s been bleeding for a while. She took injury when Haseyo and Kazuki were killed.

The realisation shot through her like a bullet from a gun.

I was so focused on protecting the village, I didn’t even notice. How could I not feel it? Was I that shaken by Haseyo and Kazuki’s deaths that I didn’t pick up the thread of a wounded comrade?

Her gaze flitted to the Hollow.

I’m going to need to kill it. Yuuyugo and I... are going to need to kill it. I don’t know if I can do that... but Seri’s barely conscious and using up all of her strength trying to hold it at bay. I’m not injured, so it’s down to me. I have a zanpakutou, surely... surely somehow, I can use it to take this Hollow down?

“Mitsuki, don’t do anything stupid!” As though she had read Mitsuki’s thoughts, Seri’s warning came from across the other side of the copse. “Charging at it, blade drawn only gives it an incentive to use those pincers. You've shattered one but there's still one left and it's handier from the right than the left. We've tried attacking directly with blades and it doesn't work. Keep your distance from it. Use Kidou. Your sword skills aren't... aren't good enough to fight it any other way, and I don't w... want to see you go the s... same way as H... Haseyo and... K... Kazuki."

Her words faltered and spasmed across the clearing, laced with pain despite her attempts to hide it, and Mitsuki knew her comrade could not stand and fight for much longer.

"Don't talk!" she instructed. "That's an order, don't say another word! You're not fit to be fighting, you'll kill yourself! Let me make the decisions — Buchou left me in charge, remember? If I have to take the Hollow down myself, then I'll take it! If I have to use Yuuyugo..."

Her words faltered, and Seri's slender form swayed slightly, the girl sinking to her knees with a gasp of pain. The Hollow loomed over her, seeming to sense that an easy victory was at hand, and without thinking about it, Mitsuki lunged forward, fingers glittering with Byakurai as she charged bodily into the fray.

"I won't let you kill her too!" she shrieked, her words more than half hysterical as the pounding waves of the Hollow's instinct mingled with Seri's pain and confusion and the empty grief of the other shinigami deaths. "I won't let you hurt those villagers, either! They've done nothing to you, and you don't belong here! I'm not going to let you hurt anyone else!"

The Hollow swung around, its interest in Seri's limp body waning as it detected the determination in Mitsuki's aura, and it opened its mouth, emitting another earth-shuddering scream of defiance. Its eyes rolled and glittered in its head, malevolence sparking from deep within the bony sockets, and then it swung its torso around, bringing the unbroken pincer down towards its new prey.

Hands trembling, Mitsuki fumbled at her waist for her sword, pulling it out just in time to push it between her body and the oncoming claw, but sweat made her palms slick as she realised she really had no idea how to wield her weapon against such a beast as this. The Hollow had the advantage in size and power, and though she held firm to her blade, it was taking an awful lot of her strength to force the creature back. It withdrew its pincer, a lazy, sweeping gesture that made her realise it was toying with her, like a bored cat playing with an unfortunate mouse. Unlike Hollows who, in the past, had simply lashed out without rhyme or reason, this one was cognisant of its actions and more, it was dragging out the hunt, giving her a moment to catch her breath before swiping down towards her again. She had never encountered a Hollow who had been able to make such complicated judgements before, and a deep sense of unease settled in the pit of her stomach as she realised something else.

Hollows normally killed to feed, sating their thirst for spiritual energy on the reiryoku of their fallen victims, but this creature was ignoring Haseyo and Kazuki's bodies completely, disdaining Seri's wounded form for the thrill of chasing a less injured shinigami around the dirt-track crossroads. It was as though its intention was to kill, rather than feed — but Hollows couldn't do things like that. They were instinct-driven, impulse-guided creatures, incapable of cognisant thought and certainly unable to control when they attacked and why. Anything else was impossible.

Wasn't it?

Mitsuki got a grip on her imagination before it threatened to run away with her. This was not the time to be debating things like that, not when she was in mortal danger of becoming the creature's next victim.

It already killed two people. Seri is hurt, and I should be using Yuuyugo to heal her, not to fight off this monster. I'm all that there is between it and Yukio's village... I can't stand down, not even if it kills me. But if I die here...

Her gaze flitted to Seri, who had given up her fight to stay conscious.

If I die here, Seri dies too. If it's really driven by the thrill of the hunt and the kill rather than a thirst for spirit power, Yukio and her companions might die, too. Everyone might be killed, if I can't hold this creature off.

Tears of frustration and terror flowed down her cheeks, blurring her vision and making the Hollow's monstrous form seem little more than a morass of black, white and red. If she couldn't see it, she couldn't aim straight, but with the entire area thick with death and distress, Mitsuki was not confident of holding onto her wits long enough to strike a blow, anyway. Try as she might to regain focus, the seeping tendrils of the monster's emotional energy slipped into her thoughts, overriding her common sense. No matter how hard she tried, she could not remember a single thing from the two years of Ouyoudou she had taken when at the Academy, and the words and names of spells fragmented and merged together, preventing her from launching an attack.

As the Hollow swung down again, Mitsuki's body braced itself for the pain of the impact, shuddering as she imagined the sharp claw piercing through her vital organs before it had even brushed against her shihakushou. Any minute now... any minute now...

But the blow didn't come.

Drawing shallow gasps of air into her fear-ravaged body, Mitsuki blinked back the tears, struggling to see why the monster had not run her through, tossing her aside as it had done to her comrades.

Through the haze of her tear-sodden vision, she could make out a shape, faint but unmistakably real, standing between her and the Hollow. It was a person, robed in black from head to foot so that she could not even distinguish whether it was a man or a woman who stood before her, but whoever it was had raised their hand towards the Hollow, and Mitsuki felt the soft ripple of some kind of energy passing between them.

The Hollow faltered. It stopped. It lowered its one remaining pincer and let out a moan of pain and grief as though acknowledging its game was over and it had been somehow thwarted. As Mitsuki watched, detached and disbelieving, the creature shuddered then fragmented into dust, the black remnants of spirit ash raining down onto the grassy floor.

As the figure turned towards her, Mitsuki felt her grip on consciousness waver, her vision dipping in and out of focus as the adrenalin abandoned her to her fate. She sank to the ground, the world around her spinning, and though she tried to form words, nothing coherent would come out. The black-robed blur was coming towards her now, speaking to her, but she could not make out either features or words. As her body succumbed to the strain of the battle, Mitsuki allowed herself to slip into the darkness, relinquishing her consciousness and sinking into black.

It was morning, and another day had begun in the parched spread of terrain that constituted Rukongai's abandoned wasteland.

Tenichi pushed open the door of the small hut cautiously, glancing around him for any sign of life, but the streets were once more devoid of inhabitants. Despite the quickly rising sun, the brownish trickle that comprised the local stream was deserted, and from somewhere he was sure he could hear the faint murmur of voices, but try as he might, he could not lay eyes on a single soul.

He glanced at his wrists, inwardly berating the metal bands that still clung tightly to his skin. Although he had agreed to play by Keitarou's rules, he had done so more as a survival tactic than anything else, and he had hoped, with the extension of the man's trust, that the spirit draining cuffs might have been removed. He had been disappointed, however, for although Keitarou had been gracious and charming since their conversation about Rukongai's people, he had made no attempt to raise the subject of the cuffs again. Tenichi had been unsure how to broach the topic without giving the impression he planned to escape, and so he was stuck with them, feeling half-blind and semi-deaf in a world where he could not read the spiritual auras of his companions.

How much time had passed now?

He sighed, leaning up against the roughly slotted together lengths of wood that formed the hut's outer wall. It had been more than a day, he was sure of that, and though Keitarou had assured him that a ransom note would be sent to his Captain, as far as he knew, no such memorandum had been released. Nor had the scientist said any more about returning him to Seireitei, and Tenichi curled his lip at this.

If he wants me to trust he's on the level, he needs to start by keeping his word about things like that.

His mind flitted back to the abduction. He had not been far from Thirteenth when it had happened — had Kirio or her comrades seen or heard anything? Whoever had taken him — the boy Koku had called the kidnapper Kurotsuchi, he remembered — had used strange skills and illusions to throw his target off guard, and, from the carefree way in which both Keitarou and Koku had discussed it, Tenichi felt sure that nobody else would have witnessed the event. He had yet to meet this mysterious Kurotsuchi, but he had already made up his mind that when he did, spirit cuffs or no, he would teach the man a lesson for dragging him here against his will.

"You're up early," a voice interjected from across the dusty track that passed as a thoroughfare between the rows of broken homes, and Tenichi raised his gaze to see Koku a few feet away, watching him. The dusty old tome he had seen the young man reading the other day was once more clutched beneath his arm, and Tenichi frowned, absorbing the dichotomy of a Rukongai wastrel with a passion for literary pursuits. At the shinigami's gaze, Koku's lips twitched into a faint, humourless smile, and he strode forward, holding the book out for his companion to see.

"It's just a book," he said off-handedly, as Tenichi took it carefully in his grip, turning it over so that he could read the title. "Nothing dangerous, just something to read. There aren't many of them, not here, but occasionally Kurotsuchi brings one or two back for me. He knows I like them, and he's good at brown-nosing if he thinks it can get him an advantage later."

"Kurotsuchi again," Tenichi murmured, his gaze running over the archaic kanji that made up the book's title. With a jolt he realised that he could only understand maybe half of them, and at his bewilderment, Koku laughed, reaching out his hand to claim it back.

"It's an old volume, written in outdated script. I suppose they don't teach Shinigami that at your famed Academy," he remarked casually. There had been no snide edge to his tone, yet Tenichi bristled at his words all the same.

"I'm surprised they teach it to Rukongai vagrants," he snapped back, pulling the book out of Koku's reach and flipping it open to view the first couple of pages. "I can see that being very useful in a place like this, being able to read all the ancient characters when the people around you are dying of thirst and malnutrition."

"Ah, so you do have a political standpoint," Koku did not seem perturbed by his companion's ire, merely walking around to Tenichi's other side and plucking the volume calmly from his grip. "This one is a book of ancient prose and poetry, as it happens. It came from the library of one or other of the Clans, I think — I'm not really sure, and it's a bit dry in places, but some of it makes for interesting literature."

"What the hell has that to do with politics?" Tenichi stared at him, and Koku let out a low chuckle.

"I see," he reflected. "So the Academy teaches you how to bruise, fight, and kill Hollows — but it doesn't teach you how to get into the minds and hearts of the people making the rules?"

"Don't speak like that about the Academy!" Tenichi shot back. "You have no idea what it's like, and you don't know what we're taught and what we're not. I have no idea why stupid stories written centuries ago would have any relevance to anything here, nor what the hell you get out of reading them, but that doesn't give you the right to mock me or the job that I do."

"Probably not," Koku acknowledged frankly, glancing at the volume then shutting it with a snap. "Only, the best way of getting inside the heads of people you know nothing about is to read what comes out of those heads."

He smiled.

"I've never met anyone from the Clans, nor really spent much time thinking about Seireitei," he added casually, "but if I read these, I feel I know a little bit more about them and how they work. It's interesting, that's all. A hobby. In a place like this, you have to have a distraction or you go mad. There's not much to do, so learning characters and how to read them is a good way of killing time. That's all it is."

"You learn Clan politics by reading archaic literature?" Tenichi arched an eyebrow, and Koku shrugged.

"Unlike you, I don't have the chance to meet the real thing and study them in person," he said dismissively.

"Is that why you're talking to me? So you can study me, too?"

"No. No, I don't want to study you," Koku shook his head. "I'm interested to meet you, being that you're the son of Daisuke-san, but that's all."

"Keitarou-san's talked about Father?" At this, Tenichi was taken aback.

"Often," Koku inclined his head, "and about you and your brother. He seems very fond of you — and it's rare for him to be fond of anyone, hence my curiosity. I hope you'll forgive it — I suppose us Rukongai vagrants don't get proper guidance in Seireitei manners."

Tenichi pressed his lips together, his jaw tightening at the cryptic snub in the other's voice, but this time he did not rise to it, instead gesturing to the street and stream that lay beyond.

"Are they still hiding from me, or did Keitarou-san tell them that I'm not about to hunt them down and slaughter them to turn into new shihakushou?" he asked frankly. "I don't like it, you know, not being able to feel when people are about — I get the sensation folk are watching me, and try as I might, it's hard to shake."

"You're probably being watched very carefully," Koku said pensively. "New faces aren't really welcomed in these parts. Well, you can understand it, can't you? They've been through plenty of bad things, and you're a shinigami. That's not going to endear you to them, even if you do seem bothered about their predicament. It's interesting that you are, by the way," he added off-handedly, "since I would've thought that after going to your Academy and being ranked up in one of the Gotei squads, you'd not spend much time dwelling on the place you came from. Not that I'm passing judgement or anything," as Tenichi frowned, "but it would be easy to do. Natural, even. You fell on your feet — nobody would begrudge you turning your back on the Urahara and that legacy completely.”

“Urahara, huh?” Tenichi’s brows knitted together. “I’m not an Urahara, Koku. I never have been, never will be. Father was, sure enough, but he wasn’t exactly wanted by them. I’m a District shinigami and I’m not ashamed of that fact. Sure, my brother and I came through some tough times, but we survived them. We worked hard to be where we are now, but forget about it? No. You can’t, not when you’ve been in a place where you’re driven from your home and forced to beg for shelter from a foreign Clan in a crowded, disease-ridden refugee camp. It’s exactly things like that which made Ketsui and I become Shinigami in the first place. We wouldn’t want to forget it.”

“I see,” Tenichi thought he saw a flicker of respect cross his companion’s dark brown eyes, though the next moment it was gone and the impassive, unreadable expression was back in place. “I didn’t expect that, but I stand corrected.”

He indicated the stream.

“Keitarou-san wants me to keep charge of you for the time being,” he said frankly. “You probably resent that, being marshalled around like you’re a child of six, but it’s necessary. If you’re going to go back to Seireitei, it’s better you see as few faces here as possible. Safer for you and for them, you see — better you don’t know more than you have to about where we live.”

“I’ve seen your face, but you don’t seem bothered by that fact,” Tenichi pointed out, nonetheless falling into step with the younger boy and allowing him to lead the way along a winding, narrow path that cut through the back of some of the delapidated residences to a place where the stream had managed to rouse itself to more than an empty trickle. “Are you so sure of Keitarou-san’s protection or my silence that it doesn’t bother you if I know who you are?”

“Mm, something like that,” Koku shrugged his shoulders. “Or more like, I’m someone he expects to keep a proper eye on you without causing too much of a scene. Besides, you already saw me the other day. There’s no point me hiding from you now — it’s not as though I can wipe your memory, so I might as well be the one to keep charge of you.”

“Will you answer my questions?” Tenichi asked, and Koku looked amused.

“That depends what they are,” he said cautiously. “If it’s about people here, then no, I won't. Questions about me and about Keitarou-san, too, I probably won't give you much to chew on. But if you want to try me, go ahead. I'll tell you if I can tell you, and not if I can't. That's the best I can do, so it will have to do."

"Hmm," Tenichi cast his glance back at the uneven properties, half-thinking he had seen a child's face peeking out behind the dirty weave of cloth that sufficed as a door before it had been hurriedly withdrawn. "How long am I going to be here? Keitarou-san said he'd send a ransom note to my Captain, but at this rate, they'll think I left of my own free will. That won't do you or him or me any good, since if they come looking and they managed to find me..."

"They won't come here. They'd have absolutely no reason to look for you in a place like this, nor any will to look, I imagine," Koku seemed unconcerned. "As for the note, it will be delivered. Keitarou-san's been busy with another matter — one that concerns you too, as it happens. He did make an agreement with you when you spoke, didn't he?"

"An agreement?"

"About finding Daisuke-san's grave?"

"Yes. Yes, he did," Tenichi clenched his fists slightly at the mention of his father's final resting place, digging his nails into the soft flesh of his palms. "Does he really... can he really tell me where Father is?"

"If he says so, I suppose he probably can," Koku replied thoughtfully. "He wouldn't make a bargain like that if he didn't mean it, but I wouldn't know for sure. I never met Daisuke-san, and I certainly never visited his grave. I'd think, though, that it's somewhere in Seireitei, rather than here in the Rukon Valley. That being the case..."

"It wouldn't be here," Tenichi shook his head quickly. "If Father was killed by an Endou, if he was..."

"Well, then taking you to where he was buried is a bit of a dangerous gamble, isn't it?" Koku pointed out patiently. "Keitarou-san isn't exactly the kind of person who can be seen jaunting around Seireitei, so I imagine he's drawing you up a plan of how to find it for yourself. For that, he needs to study the old maps of Seireitei, since he's not lived in District Seven for a very long time. I guess he thinks that's more important to you than a ransom note to your Captain — so he's giving that his full attention first."

"I hadn't thought about that," Tenichi admitted. "I suppose it would be bad for me, too, if I was seen with Keitarou in Seireitei.”

“Meaning?”

“Well, normally he doesn’t bother about the deaths of people, not that much,” Koku said pensively. “Never really has, it’s not his way. He cares for the folk here all right, but that’s different... still, he seems quite firm about not putting you or your brother in harm’s way. He could’ve had you here long before this — he’s talked about it, but this is the first time he worked out a way to do it that wouldn’t bring you into danger. Daisuke-san must’ve been someone he cared about, else he wouldn’t go to such lengths to protect someone he barely knows.”

“Keitarou-san was Father’s closest cousin. When we were children, he’d often visit, and he was always kind to us then,” Tenichi remembered with a sigh. “Maybe that memory means more to him than I thought it did — I suppose I find it hard to dislodge the image of the Clan killer from my mind.”

“I don’t suppose he’d care if you didn’t,” Koku reflected. “So long as you’re alive and well, I think that’s all that bothers him.”

“You seem to know Keitarou-san well,” Tenichi sent Koku a suspicious look. “Theorising on his thoughts and feelings like this, it makes me think you must be someone quite important, too. Someone high up in his circle of trust — am I right?”

“I already told you those questions aren’t allowed,” Koku shook his head impatiently. “We get along all right. He knows I won’t betray him, because I’ve nowhere else to go — no route to escape and no prospects either, beyond this wasteland. If you call that trust, then I suppose that’s trust — but more than that...”

He shrugged, and Tenichi ran his gaze over his companion once more.

I wonder what kind of reiryoku I’d sense from him if these cuffs were off. He doesn’t seem dangerous, and he doesn’t look like a fighter, but Keitarou-san left him alone with me and that means he must be able to at least defend himself against my bare blade.

Out loud he said,

“I’d like to know how much longer I’m going to be kept a prisoner here. I don’t mind smuggling food and supplies to your contact — but I can't do anything of the sort if I'm here, not over there."

"You'll go back, pretty soon, I imagine," Koku told him frankly. "Meantime, you should just sit tight and wait. Don't try and learn too much about this place — it'll be harder for you to lie if you do. It's better you keep your curiosity to a minimum."

He patted the cover of his book.

"We can talk about literature, if you like," he suggested. "Or, if that's not to your taste, something else. I have a few other books, and you can take your pick when we get there."

"There?" Tenichi asked sharply, and Koku nodded, ducking between the broken bough of a long dead elm tree and gesturing for his companion to follow.

"Didn't I explain myself?" he asked, surprised. "Keitarou-san asked me to mind you. If we stick around out here, we'll stop people from getting on with their lives. I thought we'd go back to my shelter and wait there — if there's any news, people will soon work out where we are."

"I'm glad you didn't say 'house'," Tenichi stopped dead, eyeing the construction with alarm. It had been built with the trunks of dead trees, some of them hacked in half by clumsy hands and then pushed together to make what passed as walls on three sides, whilst the side that faced them was covered in a length of thick brown cloth. Squinting at it, Tenichi could faintly make out patterns against the dull colouring, and he realised that it had once been a tapestry of some kind, abused and trampled so deeply into grime that it was now stiff as cardboard and barely recognisable. The roof was a meshed together mass of branches packed with mud to keep the elements out, and at his expression, Koku smirked.

"It's not a house. It's a shelter," he said matter-of-factly, leading the way forward and pushing back the grimy fabric, beckoning for his companion to follow. "I didn't say I lived here, only that this is where my books are. I like privacy, normally, and folk don't bother me here unless they have to. It's not much, true, but it does the job. There's enough light between the tree trunks to read by, mostly, and if I'm careful, sometimes I can light a small fire on a dark night. Come on inside, anyhow. There's nothing much here but a couple of rugs to sit on, but if you haven't forgotten what it was like to live as a refugee, you should be able to make do."

With this flippant remark, he disappeared inside, and Tenichi gritted his teeth, not wanting to be shown up by his offhand companion. He obediently bowed his head to slip beneath the fabric, finding himself in a small shelter no bigger than four tatami mats square at the absolute extreme. It was sparsely furnished, as Koku had said, there were some old rugs but nothing much else to pass as seating, but a wooden frame in the far corner supported five or six more heavy volumes in the same style as the one his guide was holding. At his gaze, the young man nodded, returning the missing book to the rest of the pile.

“In Seireitei, they’d call that a bookshelf,” he said ironically. “It keeps them safe and off the ground, if nothing else. I made it out of stray bits of timber when one of the houses not far from here blew apart in a storm. There were lots of bits and pieces that were useless for building a replacement, so I kept them for this.”

He sat down on the nearest rug, crossing his legs and indicating for Tenichi to follow suit.

“Well? I don’t usually bring folk here, so I’m not really kitted out to play host. Still, if the wind gets up later, it’ll act as a break if nothing else.”

Tenichi gazed around him at the barren walls, remembering the grimy hovel that he, his mother and his brother had sheltered in after their flight from District Seven.

“You all really live like this?” he asked softly, and Koku spread his hands.

“There’s not a lot to work with, given the landscape and the lack of natural anything,” he said simply. “We get water and food, of course, through Keitarou-san’s channels, but a lot of that goes to the villagers to make sure they stay alive. There isn’t much opportunity for bringing more extravagant items through the divide. We’d get caught very easily, if we started stripping Seireitei of all its goods — besides, you make do, don’t you, with what you have?”

His gaze flitted to the makeshift bookshelf, and a faint, genuine smile touched his lips.

“I have my books,” he said honestly. “It might seem stupid to you, but they’re important to me. They’re pretty much the only thing I have that belongs just to me... so I take good care of them, and read as much as I can. I like to read — its a way to see the world beyond what’s right in front of you.”

“I suppose that’s true,” Tenichi was taken aback. “I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to...”

“You’re from Seireitei, so it’s hard for you to understand,” Koku dismissed his companion’s awkwardness with a flick of his hand, shaking his head. “It’s not important. I’m not looking for your pity — save that for the villagers you’re going to help us feed. It might not be how you planned to spend these few days, but its best to go along with what we say and not make too much of a stir, if you can help it. Keitarou-san probably knows what he’s doing, getting you involved in this — try and trust in his judgement, all right?”

“Do you trust in his judgement?” Tenichi asked softly, and Koku laughed.

“Canny question, but one I’m not at liberty to answer,” he said lightly. “Like I said, we do all right. Besides, I’m not you. You’re Daisuke-san’s son, so he views you in a different way. He won’t do anything to hurt you, Tenichi-dono — he’s far too fond of you for that.”

There was no bitterness or envy in the young man’s tones, just casual acceptance of the facts, and Tenichi sighed, sinking back against the wall of the shelter.

“If you say so,” he murmured darkly. “All right. For now, I’ll play by your rules. I’ll give it a little time, and see what transpires. I need to go back to Seireitei, though, and I can’t linger around here forever.”

He pursed his lips thoughtfully.

“If need be, I’ll talk to Keitarou-san myself about it,” he decided at length. “For now, though, what’s it to be? Classical literature, scientific evolution theory, astrological star patterns, basic medical procedures in extreme wildernesses or the flora and fauna of lower Seireitei?”

He gestured to the bookshelf, his eyes lighting up with amusement at Tenichi’s expression.

“I have a diverse collection,” he said comfortably. “Pick whatever you like. Keitarou-san usually prefers to do things by night, so we’ve time to kill till then. No doubt someone will come find us when there’s something to eat — till then, let’s change the subject to something more educational.”

She was coming around.

Katsura perched on the edge of the broken tree trunk, his gaze never leaving the still form of the shinigami for one moment. She had not moved an inch, yet, but he could feel it, the swell and ripple of her mind as it began to waken from its shock-induced slumber.

He eyed her warily, in two minds about what he should do.

He had not intended on following the Hollow to its killing ground. Though he had given the orders, unlike Sakaki, he had no real desire to see his puppet spill even the blood of those he considered his enemies. It was a necessary job as part of the bigger plan, and therefore he had carried out his instructions — but now, sitting here in the silence of the forest, he knew that he had failed.

Why had he come here?

He rested his chin in his hands, remembering the moments before he had emerged onto the scene. Her thoughts had summoned him, he realised bitterly. In her fear and hysteria, she had projected them out for miles around, loud enough for anyone to hear them in startling, painful clarity. Her fear and worry had jerked at his heart, drawing forth memories of their brief meeting by the river, and although he had known he was acting against his better judgement, he had not been able to resist her call.

Edogawa Mitsuki.

He groaned, burying his head in his hands.

What had possessed him to come to the aid of a registered shinigami? She was Gotei, and she belonged to them. However kind she had been to the young girl and her kin, he had no reason to trust her. If she knew too much about him, it would be dangerous — not just for him, but for all of them. It wouldn't be Sakaki leading a trail to their door, he realised with a rueful grimace. At this rate, it would be him, sabotaging his own strategies and saving the life of someone he hadn't known existed until a few days before.

At the very least he should leave her — disappear from this place before she woke up. Yet still he sat there, watching the rise and fall of her chest as if unable to abandon her in such a vulnerable position.

When she had fainted, he had not been able to prevent hearing the cacophany of her thoughts, each one striving for dominance until her brain had overloaded. As she had lain on the ground, unconscious, he had picked up their residue, seeing with unmistakable clarity her overriding concerns.

She was worried about the village. She was worried the Hollow would go there, and kill the people who lived there.

Katsura chewed down on his lip, tasting blood. She was fighting to stop that happening. Two of her colleagues were dead, and she was terrified of holding that sword — but even so, she faced the Hollow to protect the village. That's why I came here, isn't it? She was protecting the Plus souls, just like she was when she helped that young girl in the village. How could I let her die, when she was willing to sacrifice her life for theirs?

He sighed, letting his breath out in a rush. She would open her eyes soon, blink and bring him into focus, and he would have to field questions he did not want to answer. He had already disobeyed a direct instruction, and had let his impulses rule his head. He knew nothing about this shinigami, but despite that, he knew with ever-growing certainty that he did not want her to die.

Maybe she's the only one among the whole of Seireitei who really cares about the fates of those who can't fight back. Perhaps she's the odd one out, the plum in the apple barrel. Probably I wouldn't be able to convince anyone at home of the logic of saving her, but even so, I'm not going to be the one to cause her death. She might be dressed in black and white, but she's not my enemy. Somehow I can feel that..though if anyone back at base ever found out, I'd never be allowed to leave there again.

Her words were soft and blurry, her lashes fluttering to reveal confused grey eyes, and Katsura got to his feet, moving slowly and carefully across the battle-scarred ground. There was a lot of blood, he reflected absently, splattered up trees and pooled on the grass, and some inexplicable instinct inside of him made him want to shield her from it — conceal from her the shock of her companions' deaths until she was better able to deal with it.

Or maybe, just to hide from her what you've done.

The little voice of his conscience nagged at him, but he pushed it aside, focusing instead on her. Slowly and with shaking hands she pulled herself into a more upright position, her black hair muzzy and tousled and her face still streaked and blotched from her tears. The other night, when he had seen her, she had seemed serene and beautiful, deserving of her name's meaning, but at that moment she seemed vulnerable, the gentle elegance erased by the shock of the encounter.

Glancing at her, Katsura was struck by a sudden thought.

She was not used to being involved in a fight.

Her thoughts were no longer so open to him, not now she had fully regained consciousness, and as she began to gaze around her in confusion, Katsura coughed slightly, alerting her to his presence. She gazed up at him, fear momentarily sparking across those grey eyes, but he held up his hands, offering her a sombre smile.

“I’m not going to hurt you,” he said lightly. “You were passed out, but you seem to have come to all right now.”

“You...” Recognition flashed into her expression, and despite himself, Katsura took a step back. “The man from the river, the soul with tainted reiryoku. You... were here? Why are you here? Who are you, and why...”

She drew breath sharply into her lungs, glancing around her as if remembering that she had not come here alone. The still forms of the two dead healers lay where they had fallen, black shihakushou fluttering in the breeze, and she let out an incoherent whimper, scrambling to pull herself upright. She staggered and swayed, her body not yet ready for what her mind wanted to do, and without thinking about it, Katsura came to support her, holding her body firm until she had properly regained her balance.

“You’re not up to doing that,” he chided. “I didn’t come to help you to see you flop and flounder all over the place. Take a moment and breathe. The Hollow is gone and it won’t come back.”

“The Hollow...” Mitsuki gazed at him blankly, then. “You... it was you! You did something to the Hollow, you...”

She closed her eyes, swallowing hard again, and from the greyish green colour of her skin, Katsura realised that the shock had not completely cleared her system.

“Seri,” she murmured, more than half to herself, pulling away from his hold and stumbling across the grass to where the third shinigami lay in a pool of congealing blood. From where Katsura was standing, the woman appeared as dead as the other two, her skin ashen and colourless from loss of blood. He had not expounded much energy trying, but he had not picked up even the faintest murmur of a thought from this crumpled, shihakushou-shrouded heap, and so he had assumed that, like the two corpses already cooling beneath the shade of the trees, she had succumbed. He opened his mouth to say as much, then realised it was a futile gesture, for his companion was not paying him the slightest bit of attention. Despite the fact she was in close proximity to an unknown and — Katsura acknowledged dryly to himself — potentially dangerous individual, her only concern was for her friend's life. Weak and disorientated from shock she might be, but Mitsuki's shaking fingers were already fumbling with the knot of the red-dyed obi, tearing it back with strength he hadn't realised she still had in her urgency to reveal the wound within.

"Mitsuki?"

No answer, just the continued, frantic clawing at the still girl's ruined uniform, the sound of tearing fabric mingling with the hum of desperation tingling in her aura.

"Mitsuki, please. You mustn't..."

"I'm a healer. I have to heal her," She cut across him, her words more to herself than in response to anything he had said to her. She was lost in a world of her own, the half-thoughts and broken fragments of emotion that flared from her aura highlighting the intensity of her instincts to help her companion. Katsura had the sudden impression that Mitsuki would give her own life here and now if by doing so she could preserve her friend's, and his eyes widened slightly as he processed that thought. He had never felt such a strong swell of feeling before, but, as he allowed the severed wisps of Mitsuki's escaping thought processes to penetrate his mind, he found himself for the first time exploring the possibility, considering, even if only for the briefest of seconds, whether he would ever feel compelled to do the same.

So that was what a healer was.

For the first time Katsura understood, but as he watched the pale, blood-splattered hands feverishly pulling apart the black cloth, he found himself wondering why he had been sent to target people like this. How could someone like Mitsuki, who wasn't even aware of the danger around her as she tended to her comrade be a threat to him or more importantly, to them? He shook his head as if to clear it. Such thoughts were treasonous, and he was in trouble enough already, having spared at least one life that, by the orders he had been given, was supposedly forfeit.

The gash through Seri's abdomen was exposed at last, red and angry, and Katsura winced at the jagged edge of the wound. The Hollow's claw had torn through her, not sliced cleanly like a well polished blade, and he could only imagine with a shiver what kind of internal wreckage such a blow had left behind. Something that was definitely not skin flapped at the edge of the gaping tear, and Katsura swallowed hard, wondering if he might disgrace himself and lose his stomach contents, but Mitsuki did not flinch for a moment. Instead she pulled Seri's full water gourd from her friend's belt, loosening the top. Tearing off a strip from her own obi, she damped the cloth, using it to methodically clear away debris and detritus from around the nasty crimson weal. The shinigami's body flinched slightly, as if aware of the sensation of cold against the raw edges of the wound, and Katsura frowned, picking up for the first time the faintest fragments of consciousness.

Pain stimuli. Base and involuntary, but there.

"She's alive."

The words left his lips, surprise lacing every one.

"I know she is. I know, but she won't be if I don't... she's lost so much blood," Mitsuki's words were agitated and disjointed, and to Katsura's alarm, she patted her hand to her waist, fear leaping into her hazy gaze as she registered the fact her sword wasn't in its sheath.

"Yuuyugo!" she exclaimed, spinning around so fast she almost toppled over. "Where is Yuuyugo? Where is she?"

"Who or what is a Yuuyugo?" Katsura stared, completely thrown by this sudden change in demeanour, and Mitsuki let out a cry of frustration, clenching and unclenching her fists as if struggling to keep a hold on her composure. Her fingers were already liberally coated with the unconscious shinigami's blood, but she didn't seem to notice the gore, instead gazing around her frantically.

"Where is she?" she murmured. "Please, I need her. I need Yuuyugo, otherwise Seri will..."

"I don't understand what you're talking about," Katsura said honestly. "There's only us here. You and me, and, well, her, if her life can even be saved. The other girl is dead — if that's Yuuyugo..."

"No! Don't be stupid!" Mitsuki pulled herself to her feet, staggering back towards Katsura and grabbing him by the arms, covering his sleeves with blood before he could pull himself away. The sweet, sickly smell made him feel nauseous once again, and he grimaced, shaking his head as if to clear it.

"I need my sword," at last, Mitsuki spoke again, fixing him with an urgent, pleading expression. "I had it before, when the Hollow was here. You were here then, weren't you? Please, where is it? Where is my sword?"

"I don't think you ought to have a weapon, not babbling and pottering around half-crazed like you are right now," Katsura gathered his wits, unnerved by the intensity of her gaze. “You might hurt yourself, and that would be a shame, don’t you think?”

“No!” Mitsuki was near tears now, frustration rippling at every corner of her being. “My sword isn’t a weapon! My sword is... Yuuyugo is... without her, I can’t help Seri. Please, tell me where my sword is. If you don’t... Seri...”

She faltered, the tears beginning to slide down her already abused cheeks, and despite himself Katsura felt a lurch inside him as he registered the depth of her grief. Against his better judgement, he sighed, nodding his head.

“You dropped it when you fell,” he said at length. “It’s over there, beneath the broken branch of that tree. I didn’t touch it or do anything with it — but I’m serious. You should be careful. I don’t know much about medicine and wounds and stuff, and if you hurt yourself, I won’t be able to do anything about it.”

Mitsuki did not answer him, instead pushing him away and burrowing like an eager dog among the snapped wood and scattered leaves for the hilt of her sword. At length she found it, pulling it from the undergrowth as though she had discovered buried treasure and Katsura braced himself, unsure what his companion was about to do. Mitsuki seemed once more oblivious to his presence, however, hurrying back across the crossroads to where her still friend still lay.

As he watched, the shinigami skidded to her knees at Seri’s side, resting the blade of the sword horizontally across her companion’s damaged body. Her pale lips moved, too softly for Katsura to hear what she was saying, then the weapon glowed with a sudden ethereal light, fragmenting into tiny particles of shimmering energy. Captivated by the gentle aura the blade exuded, Katsura inched closer, watching as the minute fragments of the sword sank deeply into Seri’s wound, stopping the steady flow of blood and knitting together the organs that had been rent apart beneath. Mitsuki was oblivious to him, and Katsura realised that, had he meant her harm, it would have been possible to snap her neck and escape before she’d even registered he was behind her. Even as he saw the possibility, though, Katsura knew he was not going to hurt her.

The sword is also a way of healing.

Fascinated, he watched as Mitsuki’s brow creased in concentration, her fingers glowing with gentle golden energy that surrounded the wound, locking in the fragments of the scattered sword’s energy. Nobody ever told me that a shinigami sword could mend bodies as well as break them, either. I’m starting to think there was a whole missing module in my “What Shinigami can do and why I should beware of them” training.

For twenty minutes, Mitsuki worked, Katsura watching everything she did with curiosity. Forgetting that the patient his companion was battling to save was one of the shinigami he had been ordered to kill, he found his thoughts resonating with Mitsuki's own, and, little by little, he began to will Seri's colour to improve, the wound to knit and heal and the wounded woman to survive.

At length the light around Mitsuki's hands flickered and faded, and she sank back on the grass, exhaustion etched into her pretty features.

Katsura broke the silence, and Mitsuki started visibly, turning to stare at him as if she had forgotten completely that he was there. For a moment they held each other's gaze, doubtful and hesitant as to how to continue, then Mitsuki let out a heavy sigh.

“You stopped the Hollow. Thank you.”

Guilt rippled through Katsura's conscience at the weary sincerity in his companion's voice.

I sent the Hollow. You shouldn't thank me. Your comrades are dead because of me — I stopped that beast killing you, but I didn't think twice about them.

Out loud he said,

“Your friend will live?”

“I... don't know,” Mitsuki reached up to brush a piece of stray hair out of her eyes, but before she could, Katsura grasped her loosely around the wrist, pulling her hand before her gaze so she could see the state of it for herself.

“You need to wash this, first, else you'll look like you gored someone yourself,” he said lightly, extending a gentle finger to push the muzzy lock back behind her ear. She flinched at the unexpected contact, and he smiled, touching her briefly on the shoulder before withdrawing his hand from her personal space. “It was very impressive, what you did there, but you need to pay better attention to yourself, too. Anyone could have attacked you while you were helping her — and now you don't have a sword to fight back with, either.”

“Isn’t it inconvenient, though, losing your blade inside someone else?”

“It’s not like that,” Mitsuki shook her head. “When I draw back enough spirit power, my weapon will be complete again. That’s all it is — reiryoku. If I wasn’t so tired from the fight, I’m sure I would’ve pulled it back together by now.”

She offered him a faint smile.

“I don’t even know who you are,” she realised. “You came and you rescued me, but I don’t even know your name.”

“Better you don’t,” Katsura said matter-of-factly. “Your kind and mine, we don’t mix all that well.”

“Not shinigami,” Katsura’s lip curled pensively over his teeth. “It’s better to leave it at that. I don’t suppose it would do either of us any good if we were to be on first name terms.”

“You know my name, though,” Mitsuki objected. “You called me Mitsuki, even though I’m sure I didn’t tell you.”

“I heard your friends call you that,” Katsura lied easily, knowing that the dead shinigami would never be able to refute his story. “At your camp, before I met you at the river. There’s no mystery in that.”

“You have reiryoku,” Mitsuki’s thoughts were coming more concisely now, and she sat back, gazing up at him pensively. “You’re not a shinigami, I can tell that, but you’re... you’re not a normal Plus soul either, are you?”

“I guess you could say there’s nothing much normal about me, no,” Katsura hid a wry smile. “You needn’t worry, though. I’m not going to hurt you.”

“I know,” Mitsuki’s gaze drifted across the ground towards the still forms of her two dead comrades, and she sighed heavily. “You could have done that easily, but you stopped the Hollow instead. Whoever you are, I’m not afraid of you. If you wanted to hurt me, I think I’d sense it from you — but I don’t. You wanted to help me — that’s the last thing I remember before I passed out. If you hadn’t been there, then I...”

She broke off mid-sentence, getting to her feet and moving slowly and reluctantly towards the two corpses.

“Those two are beyond your help,” Katsura warned her, and Mitsuki nodded, kneeling down between them.

“I know, but I’ll have to report this back to my squad leader — maybe even my Captain,” she said solemnly. “I need to know how they died, so I can give a proper report.”

Her words were gentle and even, but the faint tremor in her voice did not escape Katsura’s attention, and he sighed, inwardly feeling guilty for his part in her grief.

“I’m sorry,” he spoke before he realised he was going to, and Mitsuki raised her head, shooting him a startled look.

“Why?” she asked, surprised. “You haven’t any reason to apologise to me. You saved my life — it’s not your fault if you weren’t here before to save theirs.”

She bit her lip, looking pained.

“As it happens, nor was I,” she admitted painfully. “I was in the village, making sure nobody there was hurt. If I’d been here... but I don’t know. The injuries look bad ones... I think they would have been beyond saving, even if I had been here to help.”

Katsura was silent for a moment, his gaze running over her features one by one as he tried to pick up the faintest tendrils of her thoughts. He could not read them clearly, he realised — as before, they were closed to him, but every so often he felt the dull hum of her grief, resonating deeply against his wits. It was not a pleasant feeling, and before he knew what he was doing, he was on his feet.

“You shouldn’t be here,” he said quietly, apprehension in his dark gaze. “Your friend needs proper medical care — you should go back to Seireitei and make sure she gets it.”

“No!” Katsura’s exclamation startled them both, and Mitsuki stared at him in confusion.

“No?” she echoed quizzically. “Why not? I’m not authorised to open a gate to Seireitei.”

She eyed him for a moment, then,

“If you wanted me to take you there with me, I don’t have that power. Not even for saving my life, I’m afraid.”

“I don’t want to go to Seireitei, and I especially don’t think I ought to go there with you,” Katsura told her dryly. “I’m pretty sure it’s not allowed, taking people over the divide — isn’t that what those big, repellant walls are all about, keeping folk where they should be?”

“Walls? You mean the Sekkiseki divide?” Mitsuki frowned. “Yes... I suppose so. I guess those affect you too, don’t they? You have reiryoku.”

“Yes,” Katsura agreed. “Damn nuisance, to be honest. I can’t get anywhere without one of them getting in my way... it gets claustrophobic.”

“Where would you be going?”

“That’s not as important as getting your friend help, is it?” Katsura pointed out, and Mitsuki bit her lip, nodding.

“True,” she agreed uneasily. “I have to get her back to my squad Captain and let him assess her wounds. Probably she’ll get recalled to Seireitei for proper care, but there’s nothing I can do here.”

“You can’t go back there,” Sakaki’s eager, blood-lust filled eyes haunted Katsura’s thoughts and he shuddered, forcing the image away. “It’s dangerous, on your own, travelling all that way with an injured comrade. Can’t you send for back up from Seireitei from here? Even if you can’t open a... a whatever you call the holes you people walk through, I’m sure you can send a message?”

“It’s not that simple,” Mitsuki shook her head. “I need to go back to camp. It’s the only... I need to take Seri there, if I’m going to get her help.”

It’s the only place where you can make a connection to Seireitei.

Katsura mentally filled in Mitsuki’s unspoken words, adding a curse for good measure, then, out loud he said,

“She’s unconscious. She can’t walk. You’ll put yourself in danger and any other Hollows... any other creatures out there...”

“I don’t have any choice,” Mitsuki shook her head. “It’s my duty. My responsibility. I have to take her back. I’m grateful for what you did, but I have to return to camp. If I don’t...”

“There’s danger there, too,” the words were out before Katsura could stop them, and his eyes widened with alarm as he realised what he’d said. He clamped his hands over his mouth, but Mitsuki had heard him.

“Danger? In Hokutan?” she whispered, her face draining once more of colour.

“Yes,” Katsura reluctantly lowered his hands, his thoughts racing as he tried to work out what he could tell her. He could not let her go north, and risk running into Sakaki and her blood-thirsty blade. He had not saved her life just to make her one of his sister’s victims, yet nor could he betray the young assassin by telling Mitsuki the truth. She would pull away from him if she knew he had been involved in the slaughter of her colleagues, and despite his intention to stay detached, Katsura felt suddenly certain that he could not bear to see her fix him with reproachful, accusing eyes.

He’s not going to forgive me, if he ever finds out about this.

Katsura ran his fingers agitatedly through his thick dark hair.

“Tell me what you mean?” Mitsuki pressed, her grey eyes anxious. “If my companions are also in danger, I need to warn them. I have to take Seri back, but...”

“Let me come with you,” at length, Katsura made up his mind, his gaze flitting reluctantly towards Seri’s unconscious form. “Let me carry her back.”

“But...”

“I know. You know nothing about me, and you don’t know what my motives are. I’ll be honest, I don’t really know that myself, not right now,” Katsura said bleakly, “but you’ll just have to trust me. There’s no other way you’ll get back there without putting her life and yours in danger.”

“What do you know about Hokutan?” Mitsuki asked quietly. “Why do you say there’s danger there? I’ve had no communication from my squad chief — why would you know something I didn’t?”

“There have been Hollow sightings in that area recently,” Katsura said vaguely. “I don’t like them any more than you do — they go after me because I’m different, just like they go after shinigami. I don’t have a shiny weapon to fight them with, but I have learned to deflect their attacks and destroy them. You’re tired and you have no sword. Your companion is half dead. If you let me come with you, it’s true that I might be an enemy, and I might betray you. Maybe I’ll try and kill you — you can’t be sure. If you don’t let me come with you, though, and a Hollow attacks you...”

He let his words trail off, and Mitsuki sighed, shrugging her shoulders.

“If there’s reports of Hollows in the north, I need to get back as soon as possible,” she said frankly, tucking the hilt of her weapon into her obi. “I don’t know who you are, and it’s hard to trust someone with no name — but you’re right. I can’t carry Seri on my own. Besides, I believe you. You could have killed me several times already — its not as though there’s anyone here to witness it. You have spirit power and if you’re caught by shinigami, you could be in trouble for being here — so you’re putting yourself in danger by helping me. That danger increases the closer we get to my camp and my comrades. The question is, why would you take that risk at all?”

“You wanted to protect the little girl,” Katsura shot her a crooked smile, shrugging his shoulders. “I’m a sucker for things like that — a softy, underneath all this black creepy fabric. It keeps the draughts out and it’s cheap, but it doesn’t convey the real me.”

Mitsuki arched an eyebrow, and Katsura held up his hands once more in surrender.

“All right. I’ll be serious,” he said frankly. “I grew up in a village like the one by the river. When I saw you help the little girl, I was surprised. I didn’t realise that shinigami and Plus souls could be like that with each other, and it opened my eyes. My experiences with shinigami have been limited, but I’ve never heard many good stories about them, especially in Seireitei. Now I’ve met you, though, I’m intrigued. You’re not like I expected. You’re kind, and you care about them. Shinigami like that deserve to be helped — so I’m helping you. Good enough?”

“You come from Seireitei,” Mitsuki deduced sharply, and Katsura laughed, shaking his head.

“No, but nice guess,” he said playfully. “I come from here, just like that little girl and her neighbours do. That’s why it matters to me, keeping people like them alive. If it matters to you too, we’re on the same wavelength. Let’s leave it at that, shall we? We’re wasting time, and your friend needs help — doesn’t she?”

“She does,” Mitsuki agreed, shooting Katsura a pensive look, but to his relief she nodded, moving to check Seri’s wound one last time.

“If you can lift her, I’ll lead the way,” she said matter-of-factly. “It’s not a short walk, so the sooner we begin, the better.”

I hope Sakaki’s nowhere near the Shinigami camp by the time we arrive there.

Katsura did as he was bidden, scooping the unconscious Seri up into his arms and falling into step with his shinigami companion.

Explaining this to myself is proving hard enough, but if he were to find out...

He shuddered, shaking his head.

He can't find out. He won't. There's no need for him to know. So one or two healers survived, so what? They can go back and report on what happened and that'll do just as well as leaving their corpses scattered all over the Spiritless Zone. Yes, that'll do. That's what I'll tell him. If he finds out some of them lived, I'll tell him that. It'll get things moving more quickly, and that way, Mitsuki doesn't need to die.

He shot her a sidelong glance, taking in the preoccupation in her grey eyes and the lingering pallor of her cheeks. She was still exhausted, he could tell, but fully in command of her wits now, and the aura of vulnerability he had felt earlier had slowly slipped away. Still, he would not forget it. In that moment, he had been driven to protect her, and he frowned, admitting to himself how dangerous a game he was playing by letting his heart rule his head.

Still, I don't want her to die.

He pressed his lips together, tightening his hold on Seri's limp form.

Edogawa Mitsuki is a person of interest to me now. Shinigami or otherwise, I don't want to let her die.

Author's Note: December 21st, 2011 — Ukitake Juushirou's Birthday =D

This chapter -though it isn't very cheery, sorry Juu — is in honour of Juu's birthday and the third anniversary of the Meifuish world, too.

And, a very Merry Christmas to all who celebrate it!

8. The Vice Captains

Chapter Seven: The Vice Captains

The meeting room was empty when Souja reached it that morning, pushing back the sliding door and glancing pensively inside for any sign of life before slipping into the room and moving to take his usual seat at the table. The Seminar Chamber was located in the heart of Seireitei's governing complex, in a compound adjacent to the main halls that housed the Council of Elders, and from the window, Souja knew that there was a clear view across to the front courtyard of their administrative building. Though the Seminar Chamber was occasionally used for other purposes, these days it was almost entirely given over to meetings of squad officers, and, as the Captains generally preferred to gather within the Council complex itself, it had almost become an unofficial Vice Captain base.

Despite its grandiose name, the room was not a big one, narrow and long, with a carved table set in the centre. There were enough spaces to seat fourteen officers, but nobody ever sat at the far end, and the head of the table generally belonged to whichever Vice Captain was nominated speaker for that meeting. This was not as democratic as it sounded, for there were frequent spats over the distribution of power, and Souja had soon learned that there was little to be gained except resentment by pushing himself forwards. He was not as assertive in his manner as his younger sister, who, he had no doubt, would have faced down all comers, and he found it more useful to sit and listen rather than lead and speak.

A warm voice from the doorway made him glance up, a smile touching his features as he recognised the broad, friendly features of the Thirteenth Division Vice Captain, Houjou Enishi. Souja liked Enishi a good deal, admiring the other officer's straight dealing and honest demeanour. Coming from a Clan like the Endou, it was sometimes hard to believe there was a world beyond intrigue and manipulation, but Enishi was a quick reminder that another school of thought did exist, and more, flourished in some quarters of Seireitei. A Clansman like himself, Enishi had sacrificed any plans for Yamamoto honour to help lead Seireitei's Thirteenth and newest division, and he had proved an excellent choice, steady and easy-going with scared new recruits, yet firm in his discipline and his subordinates always knew where they stood.

“I rose with the sun,” Souja answered now, gesturing for the other man to come and join him. “I wanted to be sure I was in good time, though, as I have things I want to discuss today.”

“Me too,” Enishi pressed his lips together, squeezing his considerable frame behind the table, then, “Did you find the kid?”

“Kid?” Souja frowned, stalling for time, and Enishi laughed, clapping a hand to his forehead.

“I’m sorry,” he said sheepishly. “I forgot, to you, he’s not a kid. Tenichi, I meant. Taichou was pretty concerned, and so were the rest of us when we heard he’d gone missing.”

“Oh,” Souja’s eyes darkened, and he shook his head. “No. There’s been no word, not from anyone who might have abducted him. I’ve been looking into some potential avenues of information, but not much has come back from it. I won’t pretend I’m not worried — and also, angry. I’ve got to report this to my father, when he returns this afternoon, and I can only imagine his reaction.”

“Tisn’t your fault. Hirata won’t hold you responsible for it,” Enishi said reassuringly, and Souja sighed, rubbing his temples.

“There aren’t many people even of Father’s rank in Seireitei who’d dare to drop the honorifics and call him just by his first name,” he mused, and Enishi shrugged.

“Force of habit,” he said easily. “Comes from spending five years of school together, then being his Vice Captain when he was Thirteenth’s Third Seat. Hard to call him anything else when if I think on it I can still see that scared little mite huddled on his bed, glasses slipping down his nose and body trembling as though we were all going to eat him. There’s no slight meant, I promise you. He’s used to me and my lack of formality by now.”

He spread his arms, making himself more comfortable.

“You intend to talk about Tenichi at the meeting today?”

“I had thought to raise it, yes,” Souja inclined his head. “Kikyue’s going out of her mind about it — she feels to blame, since he’s one of her men, and it’s generally upset the squad that he’s not shown up. I want to know more about what happened in Eleventh and Ninth — I assume that Juushirou-dono mentioned those things to you, too?”

“Yes,” Enishi’s features became grave. “I was going to ask Ikata if I could come chat to his abducted juniors after the meeting, see if I can't find out anything from them. I know that it's said the abducted kids don't remember what happened, but it's worth a shot, and Ikata's my kinsman, by a long and convoluted path. He might let me try."

"Ikata's not overly discreet with his opinions," Souja said carefully, and Enishi sighed.

"You could say that about me, too," he remarked. "Must be a Yamamoto thing."

"No... no, it's not the same," Souja rested his chin in his hands. "Ikata's not fond of Minachi-dono, is he? You can tell, whenever he's called on to talk about squad business. He's not that fussed about letting us know the kidnappings happened, either... which is surprising, given that Minachi-dono apparently didn't raise it with the Council of Elders or the other Captains."

"Not liking someone doesn't mean you can't work for them," Enishi rubbed his chin thoughtfully. "I know what you mean, but to be honest, whilst it's just you and I, Minachi-dono's not the easiest person to work with anyway. Like as not, Ikata needs a moment to let off steam sometimes. Minachi-dono wants everything his way and he wants it done before he's given the order. It keeps life challenging — I wouldn't choose it."

"As I hear it, you didn't choose it," Souja said dryly, and Enishi grinned.

"Too true," he said philosophically. "I found a damn fine Captain and I couldn't be more settled with the Thirteenth. But that's beside the point. About young Tenichi. Do you think there's a serious risk his life's in danger?"

"Not having received a ransom, it's possible," Souja grimaced. "I'm hoping not. The only thing worse than a missing shinigami to relate to my father when he comes back from the Clan is the death of one. He's never in a great mood when he comes back from the heart of Seventh District, and this won't help at all."

"What's all the doom and gloom so early in the morning?" The breezy greeting of the Eighth Division Vice Captain, Shiba Sora prevented Enishi from making any kind of response to Souja's words, and both turned to see the young woman, green eyes bright with curiosity and dark curls fastened back from her face with a band that seemed ready to burst at any moment. Sora was the youngest child and only daughter of District Five's illustrious Shiba Clan, but her naturally gregarious, inquisitive nature had driven her to seek responsibility outside of her homeland, and though it had caused some tension between her and her eldest brother, the Vice Captain of the Fifth, for the most part Seireitei had accepted her choice with equanimity. As Shunsui's second, she often found herself with a challenging workload, torn from pillar to post trying to keep up with her Captain's eccentricities and lackadaisical manner, yet she had thrown herself into it with enthusiasm, and, at a glance, Souja could tell that she relished the opportunities working in Eighth had given her.

"You both look like someone spoiled your birthday dinner," she said now, resting her hands on the surface of the table and glancing between one and the other as if hoping to be let in on the secret. "You're also both much earlier than you usually are — I was surprised to hear voices when I came down the hall. What gives? Did someone change the time of the meeting and not tell me?"

"You're here pretty early yourself, Sora," Enishi pointed out good-naturedly, and Sora snorted, dismissing this observation with a careless shrug.

"I get up early," she said matter-of-factly. "I always allow an extra hour for pounding Shunsui's head against the wall, just to make sure he's up and around in time for division inspections and things like that. It's become a pattern now, I hardly even notice any more — but that's beside the point. What's got the pair of you gloomy and chatting with your heads so close together? I thought I heard Ikata's name as I got here — did that buffoon do something stupid again?"

"No, not as far as we know," Souja found it impossible to suppress a smile at his companion's casual terminology. "Shiba-dono, we were talking about the incidences of abduction in Ninth and Eleventh. You remember that Ikata brought the subject up with a few of us a short time ago?"

"I remember," Sora transferred her strength to her arms, vaulting herself over the table and landing neatly beside the seat she usually used. "He was pretty ticked off that anyone would dare encroach on Eleventh's territory and I'm pretty sure I heard him monologue for a while about what he'd do to the culprits if he got a hold of them. The kids were returned safely, though, weren't they?"

"Yes, they were," Enishi agreed, "but now Souja-dono's missing someone, and we're trying to figure it out."

"Seventh had someone abducted?" Sora's eyes widened in surprise, and Souja sighed, nodding his head.

"Kotetsu Tenichi," he admitted heavily, and Sora's eyes became even bigger.

“Yes,” Enishi confirmed. “You’re well up to speed on things like that, Sora — anything you can tell us that you think we don’t already know?”

“About the Kotetsu boy? Not much,” Sora shook her head, her green eyes becoming thoughtful. “He has a brother, doesn’t he? Sometimes comes and spars with our Tenth Seat, since they’re of rank and almost of the same age. As for Tenichi, Shunsui’s mentioned him once or twice, but that’s all. Apparently he has promise, maybe even to be a division leader one day, if the Council were to consider him. He’s District, of course, but I seem to remember he went to Seventh because you had a lack of specific combat strength and he filled the gap?”

“Mm,” Souja nodded. “Father arranged the transfer with Juushirou-dono, but that’s how I understood it. Juushirou-dono was worried Tenichi was being held back in Thirteenth, and Tenichi didn’t seem to object. Quite the opposite, he was keen to take the challenge, and he slipped into our squad just fine. Then this happens. It’s been almost two days now since he disappeared. The others had ransoms before a day was out, correct? At least, Ikata said so — but we’ve had nothing at all.”

“Ninth was the same way,” Sora rested her chin in her hands, and Enishi shot her a look of surprise. “Oh, yes, I know all about that. They’re neighbours of ours, barracks-wise, but also, it’s not hard to pick up snippets of information if you know where to look. Anabomi-taichou likes to run a close ship, but occasionally whispers leak out. One of the Ninth’s recruits was abducted, wasn’t she? Apparently she was an Academy classmate of a couple of our newer members, and so bits and pieces came across that way. Kaoru-chan heard our recruits talking and got curious. As it happens, a former classmate of hers, Takaoka Sakura is a ranked officer in the Ninth, so she asked some questions and found out the bare bones of what had gone on. She reported it back up to Shunsui and I, but since we didn’t want to get her friend in any trouble, we’ve kept it pretty much to ourselves to see what transpired. Probably, if you asked Anabomi-tai directly, he’ll claim that nothing of the sort happened in his division and that we’re mistaken — but it’s for sure that it did. Still, the ransom note came within twenty four hours and the kid was returned to Ninth safely, if a little confused. I spoke to the girl myself, just casually, when she came by the barracks with a message for Shunsui, but she didn’t seem to remember anything much about where she'd been or what had happened to her."

"They probably kept her drugged," Souja said wisely, "but it doesn't help our cause if we don't have any leads."

"This is different, though, isn't it?" Sora pointed out. "Your squad aren't guilty of desecrating land and not repairing it. Seventh has one of the higher records for compensation, after Thirteenth and Eighth — I've heard Shunsui talking about it. That means there's no motive to take one of your members at all."

"Right. No motive and no note makes us uneasy," Souja agreed. "I've mentioned it to Juushirou-dono and I'll talk to Father as well in the hopes this will be brought up at a Captain's or even a Council meeting — in the meantime, I want to make sure people are aware the targets aren't just from squads who are shirking their responsibilities. If everyone's aware that one of Seventh's members has been abducted, then maybe they'll be more vigilant over their own people and we'll find something else out."

"You think Tenichi is dead?" Enishi looked alarmed, and Souja shook his head.

"No, I'm trusting that he isn't," he said cautiously. "Until we have a lead to go on, though, searching for him is pretty futile. Whoever took him knows Seireitei — and they know more about us than we do about them."

"I guess Thirteenth don't have anything to add on any of this?" Sora shot Enishi a glance, and the tall shinigami shook his head.

"We're as foxed as anyone," he responded with a sigh, rubbing his brow absently. "It's all a mess, if you want my opinion."

"Thank you for the information about Ninth, though, Shiba-dono," Souja reflected. "I'll take a more direct approach, now that I know for sure the incident did occur."

"The others are coming," Sora turned towards the door, as the sound of footsteps and voices heralded the arrival of the other squad deputies. "If you want to raise it as a point of discussion, Houjou and I will back you up. It's important, since it implies we could all be under threat."

"...Like I said, I'm claiming Chair for this meeting," the unmistakeable tones of Ikata Jintarou broke through the divide, then the door was flung back, revealing the Vice Captain of the Eleventh Squad. He strode into the room with his usual swagger, chest forward and black hair gleaming with whatever slick substance the officer had used to fix it firmly in position. A man in his middle thirties by appearance, Ikata was the kind of person whose presence in any room was difficult to ignore, for he exuded confidence that bordered on arrogance, a demeanour that demanded to be noticed, even if that notice was derision. He sported a beard, which added to both his age and his swarthy appearance, and, when asked about it, he had once boasted that he grew the hair to conceal the scars of battle that criss-crossed over his chin. Another scar over his left eye indicated that the boasting may not have been idle exaggeration. He was combat proficient and a weapons aficionado, disdaining the more tactical skills of Kidou for a direct, all out sword barney, and among the lower ranks of the Gotei there were numerous rumours of recruits who had been cut to pieces on division initiation due to his hard training regimes. In truth, Souja knew that Ikata had never so much as scratched a recruit with his own blade, let alone maimed them, but he had allowed the stories to promulgate anyway, certain it added to what he was hoping was a fearsome reputation.

Although a Yamamoto, like Enishi, Ikata had come from the fringes of his Clan and had begun in Eleventh at a low rank, working his way through the levels with single-minded obstinacy. He had never made any secret of his intention to hold high office there, though his Captain, Minachi had rejected his candidacy for Vice Captain on several occasions before finally relenting and allowing his subordinate to take the badge. Relations between Vice Captain and Captain had never been harmonious, and Ikata, after a few too many sakes, was not above badmouthing his superior officer to any who should pass by — but, Souja reflected, he had heard similar stories of Minachi's ranting behind closed doors about his second officer's ways. They were a funny pair — a strict Clansman drilled in Gotei tradition and a thug who happened to be born just the right side of the line to make his rise in rank acceptable — but of the two, Souja felt far more comfortable dealing with Ikata. Minachi was a cold and often spiteful man — whilst Ikata, for all his thuggery, was easier to read.

"Ikata, you held Chair last meeting," Urahara Shiketsu, Vice Captain of the Third Squad and heir to Third District's scientific clan put in evenly, moving calmly across the chamber to take up his own seat. "That position is meant to pass between each of us equally — it seems fairer, therefore, to allow someone else to have a turn."

"Some Vice Captains haven't had a shot at Chairing a meeting at all, or not for a long time," Shiba Ryuusei, Sora's elder brother and Vice Captain of Fifth agreed with a nod. "We ought to take a proper ballot on it this time, Ikata. True, you had something to address us with the last time, so we made you Chair, but...”

“None of the other namby-pambies get to the point, and we’ll be sitting around on our asses doing nothing for the whole meeting if we let them take control,” Ikata’s words barrelled into Ryuusei’s, rudely preventing the other man from finishing his sentence. “If you want to lead, you take the lead. That’s how it works, Shiba! I’m good at holding together things like this. Besides, I’ve got plenty to bring to a meeting, and...”

“Has Ikata got going already?” Souryou Kanshi, Vice Captain of the Tenth Division poked his head tentatively around the sliding door, an amused expression on his features. He met Sora’s gaze, exchanging wry grins with her, then brought the rest of his body into the room, leaning up against the wall as he watched the power play take place. Kanshi was a wry humoured, sharp-witted individual, whose true motives Souja often found difficult to read. Half Shiba, half Kuchiki by birth, he had grown up mostly on the District Five side of the equation, making him both well connected and well-known, but he was not one to give his agreement to things lightly, preferring to sit back and observe before offering an opinion.

“As you see,” Sora said now, gesturing towards the other side of the table, where Ikata had already plunked himself down in the leader’s seat, folding his arms across his chest belligerently as if challenging anyone to remove him by force.

“We’re still missing quite a few people,” Souja glanced around him, taking in who was there and who was not. Kanshi nodded.

“Aoi won’t be coming. Sekime-taichou got herself locked in her laboratory this morning and he’s trying to find a way to let her out,” he said lightly, humour dancing in his gaze as he related his story. “I had a Hell Butterfly to that effect. Apparently she was working on some particularly potent binding Kidou and managed to accidentally seal the door to the lab. She can’t seem to remember what spell she used, and so they were having a lot of trouble breaking it when I got Aoi’s message.”

“Poor Michihashi,” Enishi looked sympathetic. “Sekime-taichou may be a genius, but I wouldn’t want to be running around after her getting into all these scrapes.”

“Well, at least she didn’t blow herself or her lab up this time. That’s progress,” Kanshi eased into his seat, eying them quizzically. “Did I interrupt something, by the way?”

“When the meeting begins, we’ll raise it properly,” Souja reflected.

"I had hoped to have everyone here, but I suppose in a situation like that, it can't be helped."

"No. Fortunately, Aoi is a patient, tolerant soul," Kanshi agreed. "I'd be climbing the walls, but that's just me. Providing, of course, my division still had walls to climb — you can never be too sure of things like that in the Twelfth."

"So that leaves us with..." Sora glanced around, counting the members present on her fingers, "five more to come. Yamamoto, from the First. Shihouin probably won't come from the Second, since I'm pretty sure the Onmitsukidou are on secret manoeuvre again."

"If it's secret, Sora, how do you know about it?" Enishi blinked at her, and Sora grinned unrepentantly.

"I hear stuff," she said casually, "you know how it is. Anyhow, other than them, we're still waiting for Shirogane-dono and the Vice Captains from Fourth and Ninth."

"Shirogane-dono and Hyakken-dono are on their way," Souja spread his senses, picking up the distinctive Kuchiki auras approaching the meeting room. "I don't know about the rest."

"...So as I was saying, Ikata, it would be fairest of all if..."

"I intend on Chairing the meeting today, if nobody else minds," The door slid open, cutting Shiketsu's reasoning dead as the two Kuchiki shinigami stepped into the room, bowing their heads in acknowledgement of their colleagues. It had been Shirogane who had spoken, the Vice Captain of the Sixth Squad and an elevated personage among Seireitei society, by dint of his being the heir to what was generally considered the oldest and most powerful Clan in all of Soul Society.

At his words, silence fell, and Ikata's eyes darkened into a sullen glower, thick lips twisting into a grimace of disapproval.

"I already said I was chairing this meeting," he said flatly, and Shirogane raised a hand, dismissing his words with a flick of his fingers.

"A Chair can't be Chair again two times in a month," he said matter-of-factly. "The Kuchiki haven't chaired a meeting in a while, so I intend on chairing this one."

"You're pulling your weight around, Nagoya!" Ikata's quick temper was already flaring, his cheeks red as beetroots and he got to his feet, pounding his fists on the table in his annoyance. "We have to take a vote for something like that — you can't just waltz in and claim Chair without asking anyone's opinions on the matter!"

"Oh, the irony," Kanshi murmured, rolling his eyes, and Souja hid a smile despite himself.

"I see," the smile remained on Shirogane's lips, but his silvery eyes became suddenly cold. "I'll give you a word of advice, Ikata. Do not refer to me by that name again, if you please. Nobody has called me Nagoya in over two decades and to do so is to suggest a direct slight against the Kuchiki Clan. I'll trust you won't be foolish enough to repeat the incidence — if you were, you'd find yourself answering to my uncle, who, Vice Captain or not, would soon put you in your proper place."

He turned to glance around the room.

"Does anyone object to my Chairing this meeting?" he asked lightly, and dead silence met his question. He gave a little nod of approval, then turned back to Ikata, arching his eyebrow at his comrade.

"You see, nobody minds," he spoke softly, but Souja could pick up on the danger signals the Kuchiki was putting out. "I suggest you move, so we can begin this meeting at once."

Ikata glowered some more, muttering unrepeatable profanities beneath his breath, but he saw when he was beaten, and so, with a great show of bad temper, he got to his feet, stomping across the room like a spoiled child to take up the seat designated for the Vice Captain of the Eleventh. Inwardly Souja winced — it took someone of Shirogane's standing and singularity to look Ikata directly in the eye and humiliate him without fear of any reprisals.

"That's better," Shirogane did indeed seem unruffled, settling himself down in Ikata's vacated seat and gesturing for those still standing to take possession of theirs. "Who is still missing?"

"Shihouin, Yamamoto and Unohana from the Fourth," Ryuusei glanced around the room. "Oh, Michihashi from the Twelfth is also absent."

Shirogane sighed.

"We will begin without them," he decided, with a glance at the position of the sun beyond the chamber window. "It's time."

"Michihashi is tied up with his Captain. He sends his apologies," Kanshi interjected.

“Is that literally tied up, or figuratively?” Shirogane asked ironically, and Kanshi grinned.

“Bit of both, I think,” he admitted. “Anyhow, he said he wouldn’t be able to make it. I don’t know about the others, sorry.”

“Shirogane-dono, I’d like to raise something for this meeting, if I may, now we’re mostly assembled,” Souja raised his hand, and Shirogane cast him a startled glance, as if surprised to see the Seventh Division Vice Captain speaking up so early in a meeting. “It’s something that’s of direct concern to my squad at present — but also, I believe, something that’s affected others in the past few weeks.”

“Go ahead,” Shirogane nodded in his direction, and Souja stood, casting his gaze around the assembled adjutants. His gaze paused for a moment on Ikata’s angry features, then shifted to the serene ones of Mikihara Hyakken, the Vice Captain of the Ninth, and his lips thinned.

“The night before last, one of my division members was abducted on his way back from visiting the Thirteenth Division barracks,” he said softly. “We have searched, and Thirteenth Division have been helping, but there has been no sign of him anywhere in the surrounding area. In light of the reports Ikata-dono so kindly gave us a short time back about the events in Eleventh, we can’t help but think that our Eighth Seated officer is the latest shinigami to fall foul of these unknown Seireitei vigilantes.”

“That’s how it looks to us,” Enishi scratched his head pensively. “The shinigami’s one of our former members — Kotetsu Tenichi — and so it wasn’t strange for him to come visiting our barracks. His brother’s still with us, and so are friends of his. We’ve spoken to them, and our Sixth Seat confirms he came to see her, but left to go back to Seventh that evening. Since then, nobody’s seen anything of him.”

“You’ve mounted a thorough search?” Shirogane’s brow creased in consternation, and Souja nodded.

“My sister has scoured the whole area and I’ve had other patrols looking since,” he agreed. “There’s no sign of him, and all the testimony I’ve had from others suggests he’s not the kind of shinigami who would abscond, not even for one night. That it’s now been two...”

“Did you get a note?” Ikata broke into the conversation, gazing at Souja quizzically. “We got a note pretty sharpish, you know, outlining all the grievances and yada yada, stuff those cowards were too pathetic to say to our faces. No clues on it, of course, just written in nondescript kanji.”

“We haven’t had any note,” Souja said grimly. “With no disrespect to the Eleventh Division, either, Seventh are not a division who have omitted to support District people who have been affected by our actions.”

“More concerning is the location of this abduction,” Shiketsu said gravely. “Souja-dono, you’re quite sure that it happened between Thirteenth’s barracks and your own?”

“That is the conjecture, yes,” Souja agreed. “We can’t prove it, but it seems most likely.”

“That’s not a great distance,” Shiketsu bit his lip. “Even in the dark, it’s almost unheard of for such a thing to happen without anyone noticing. A flare of reiatsu, the sounds of a struggle — but you say nothing of this nature was reported?”

“Nobody saw anything,” Souja responded bleakly. “I would like the permission of the relevant Vice Captains to speak to any members of their squad who might’ve been abroad the night after last on any errand, just in case, but it seems hopeless to me. We’ve even tried tracing his reiatsu — but we’ve had no luck doing that, either. It’s faintly around the Thirteenth and just beyond, but then, nothing at all.”

“Is there an active Senkaimon located between Thirteenth and Seventh?” Kanshi cast Shiketsu a questioning look, and the Third Division Vice Captain shook his head.

“There is not,” he said firmly, “There was one, some years ago, but with all the shifts in Seireitei’s structure and the building of new barrack buildings, it was sealed over more than ten years past. Even if that were not the case, however, Kotetsu Tenichi isn’t an officer with authorisation to open a Senkaimon on his own whim. We would notice if he had opened it. Kotetsu Tenichi is not a shinigami with Bankai — therefore doing so untraced is impossible with our current technology.”

“Perhaps the Third could look into that for us in more detail?” Souja asked hopefully. “I’m sure you’re correct, Shiketsu-dono, but on the off-chance these rogues have managed to find a way of re-opening a dead gateway...”

“How would District people manage that?” Hyakken wrinkled his brow in disbelief, as the even-tempered Shiketsu nodded his assent. “You’re applying Clan philosophies to people of a far lower level of education, Souja-dono. While you’re worried for your member, surely you don’t think...”

“I think it would have been very helpful, Hyakken-dono, if you’d been more forthcoming about the events in your own division when Ikata-dono was kind enough to relate Eleventh’s,” Souja said levelly, watching as consternation flooded Hyakken’s proud features.

“He means the abduction of a Ninth recruit by unknown hands, ransomed and paid for before the girl was safely returned,” Sora said candidly, causing hot colour to flush Hyakken’s cheeks. “I’ve heard about it from our own recruits — though Anabomi-taichou seems reluctant to allow discussion about it in outside areas.”

“Is that true?” Shirogane’s eyes narrowed. “Have members of your division suffered from abduction too, Hyakken?”

“One girl was taken and held for a short time, yes,” Hyakken rubbed his temples. “Anabomi-taichou made me promise not to report it, though — it was a divisional matter and we resolved it. The lass is quite safe now and unharmed — the matter is closed.”

“You didn’t think that the main house of the Kuchiki might like to hear about this?” Shirogane’s words carried a dangerous edge, his grey eyes glittering angrily. “Ikata’s Eleventh were targeted because they apparently failed to compensate families uprooted by shinigami activity. I was under the impression that such a thing didn’t happen among Kuchiki-led divisions, but perhaps I have been misled.”

“I see,” Shirogane’s lips pursed in displeasure. “I shall talk to Anabomi-taichou myself about this, and then decide whether to take the matter to Guren-sama. You know that the Kuchiki have an active policy of repair and support towards those we protect in the Districts. Neither Guren-sama nor myself will tolerate any deviation from that motif, not even within a squad that intends to operate as a separate entity.”

“Y... yes, sir,” Hyakken looked crushed, and Souja felt suddenly sorry for him, trapped between the orders of his Captain and the orders of his Clan. Shirogane was only an adjutant by rank in the Gotei, but in Clan terms, he was a far, far more powerful figure than even the Captain of the Ninth aspired to be — and as such, if he chose to exert influence, Souja was certain he could see the unfortunate Anabomi stripped of his rank and title before the day was out.

I doubt he will, though. He's made his displeasure known, but I think it unlikely he'll take it further.

Souja sighed, folding his hands across the table in front of him.

“If I may ask where Hyakken-dono and Ikata-dono’s shinigami were taken unawares?” he asked quietly. “Were they not stolen from Inner Seireitei?”

“On patrol near the Second/Third border,” Ikata said gruffly. “Idiots, not paying attention to the dangers around them, making themselves prey for who knows what. Mikihara, what about you?”

“I really am not sure,” Hyakken admitted uneasily. “I wasn’t involved in the actual matter itself, I only heard of it later. I believe they were somewhere outside Inner Seireitei, though. Perhaps in one of the District territories, but I don’t know which one.”

“But Tenichi-dono was stolen in brazen sight of the barracks, and nobody noticed,” Shirogane looked grim. “You were right to bring this to the meeting, Souja-dono. I understand your lord Father is currently away from the squad?”

“He returns today and I will make a full report to him, then wait on his advice,” Souja responded evenly. “Till then, any information I can gather is of value to me, and I would welcome it. We want to recover Tenichi safely — but even more, we want to put an end to these abductions once and for all.”

“I’m sure we’ll all cooperate as much as we can with your investigations, Souja-dono,” Kanshi said gravely. “I’ll mention it to Hakubei-taichou when I get back to barracks, and I’m certain everyone else will do the same. You’re right — if a shinigami can be taken so close to safety with absolutely no motivation, anyone could be next and we can’t risk it escalating.”

“Ukitake... Ukitake-taichou has some concerns about the District anyway,” Enishi reflected, rubbing his chin ruefully and Souja realised he had almost slipped up and dropped the formality expected of him in public circles. “I don’t know all of them, of course, some are beyond my remit, but he’s been worried about the Hollows and the way they’ve been behaving in some of our raids lately. I think he’s had Shikibu investigating in more detail, and possibly, Tenichi’s brother, which may be why Tenichi was taken. I’ve been thinking about this a bit since speaking to my Captain last — I wondered if Tenichi being taken was meant as a message to stop investigating.”

“A foolishly naive one, if so,” Ryuusei grimaced. “The lad’s brother is aware of this Tenichi’s disappearance?”

“No, not yet,” Enishi shook his head. “Only Shikibu, Taichou and myself as well as the officer Kikyue-dono questioned are in the know. For Ketsui’s sake, we’re keeping him out of it. Maybe it is far-fetched, but I dunno. Taichou is concerned, and that’s usually a red light in the right direction.”

“I know,” Enishi nodded. “I guess I’m raising half-theories I don’t really understand myself, but I’ve just heard him talking about it, and it made me wonder. That’s all.”

He spread his broad fists with a rueful shrug of his shoulders.

“I’d have asked him for more clear notes to bring with me this morning — s’what I’d planned to do — but Ugendou was a no-go zone and I didn’t get a chance,” he added sheepishly.

“Fever,” Enishi said succinctly, and Sora groaned, pulling a graphic face.

“What a time for that,” she reflected heavily. “Oh well. You’ll just have to probe him about it for the next time. I think Shu... Kyouraku-taichou said something about him addressing the Captains about Hollow attacks, so maybe he’ll go over our heads with it and we’ll get the memo later, anyway. In the meantime, is there a lot we can do? Without knowing what J... Ukitake-taichou was getting at...”

“I think it would be a good plan if we’re all a lot more vigilant about our squads and the Hollows they come into contact with,” Shirogane reflected at length. ‘If both Ukitake and Kyouraku think there’s something to pursue, probably it’ll go further, so for the time being we’ll have to wait for the Captains on any clear-cut instructions relating to what Houjou just said. We’ll agree to monitor our own raids and expeditions in the meantime and,’ he nodded his head towards the Seventh Division Vice Captain, “do what we can to assist Souja-dono with his enquiries at the same time.”

“Thank you,” Gratitude glittered in Souja’s eyes. “Hopefully from this point on, we’ll make more progress.”

“In which case, let’s move on,” Shirogane cast another glance at the position of the sun, gauging the time. “Is there any other business?”

“And that’s as much as you can tell me?”

Keitarou pursed his lips, processing the report his companion had brought him carefully. “It’s not much to work with... not enough detail, and we’re hard pressed for time. If Kurotsuchi’s report is correct, and the Gotei are beginning to investigate...”

“There’s no doubt of that. Ukitake’s raised the subject with the Captains and there’ll probably be a meeting in the next few days,”

The voice came back across the spiritual Kidou link, broken and wavery, but unmistakeable in its weary frustration. “It’s no good for me either, Keitarou-dono. If they were to know that I was working with you like this... if they guessed...”

“But they won’t, will they?” A smile touched Keitarou’s features, bringing his hands together pensively and watching the faint flicker of spiritual energy dart between the tips of his index fingers. It was not an easy spell to hold long-term, let alone utilise as a two-way communicator, but practice and determination had at last drawn its rewards. “That’s why I chose you. You’re almost above suspicion — nobody would ever guess that you’d be working with a wanted exile and rebel lurking in the wastelands.”

“You should be careful,” the other speaker cautioned, their voice lowering to a dull murmur. “This isn’t a secure place for us to be talking, and I can’t guarantee to keep the line open very much longer. You shouldn’t tell even me more than you have to about where you are and what’s going on. That way, if the worst happened...”

“If the worst happened, I have no doubt about what you’d do,” Keitarou said composedly. “In the meantime, I appreciate your report, even if it’s not as thorough as I’d have liked. I realise what risks you’re taking, and I won’t ask for any more — not this time.”

“Mm. I know. I need to do better,” the voice was frustrated. “I’ll try, I promise. When I know what measures the Council are putting in place to investigate, then it’ll be easier to pass on the information, but I’m dependent on a lot of things for that.”

A pause, then,

“The Hollows’ behaviour recently... can I put that down to you?”

“Ah, you’ve noticed that?”

“I’ve heard reports. So have other squads. It’s only a matter of time before they start to realise something is controlling those creatures to attack when and where they are. You had better be ready with your back up plan when that happens, Kei-dono, because I’m in no place to salvage your cause from my current position. It’s already suspicious enough if I venture out into the District wilds by myself... if I was to start doing so in connection with Hollow activity...”

“You needn’t worry about that,” Keitarou’s words were reassuring. “I promised you, didn’t I? When we first opened terms of this agreement, my first assurance was that I would do nothing to threaten your current position. You’re far more useful to me where you are, and I don’t want to see you fall into disgrace. I have other people and other plans in preparation for when action needs to be taken. Just providing me with the right information is enough. I won’t ever ask any more of you than that.”

“I must be mad, but I believed you then and I believe you now,” the voice sounded tired. “It’s hard work, sometimes, but I’ll keep it up. I’m not done with Seireitei, not yet. On my own, there’s not much I can do — but with your help...”

“Yes. That’s what it’s all about. Help,” Keitarou agreed evenly. “I still remember every word of our conversation all those years ago, and I don’t intend on reneging on it for one moment.”

“Mm.” There was a long, protracted silence, and Keitarou felt the spell waver, as though his contact was having trouble regulating their spiritual energy. The memory was a conflicting one, he reflected pensively, that even now could draw forth waves of frustration, and he waited patiently for the moment to pass and the fibres of the spell to return to their former alignment.

“You have my word,” he said, as the interference began to calm down. “It means a lot to me, knowing someone within the Gotei views me as something other than a murdering anarchist. I told you when we met back then that I’d reward your faith in me, and I shall. Everything is moving to plan — I’m not backing out on our deal now, nor will I.”

“Yes,” the other person agreed softly. “I know. What you’ve already given me has proven that — you’re not the one who should be grateful, that’s me. Seireitei has never understood, but I keep my mouth shut, hoping that one day they’ll really understand how much more progressive your Soul Society vision is. It’s just the frightened clucking of a few rich overlords not wanting to let go of their stranglehold — but without it, the possibilities for this world...”

“They’re endless,” Keitarou agreed smoothly. “That’s what I like about talking to you. I know that you’ve seen things as they should be seen... and it brings me reassurance that the drive for change is just as much alive on your side of the divide as on mine. When the time is right...”

“Yes,” the word was barely more than a sigh, “and I’ll carry on with my surveillance. Just... Kei-dono, be careful. I don’t know by what means you’re manipulating the Hollows, and I don’t want to know. It’s better that way. If the Gotei lock onto it, though, people like Ukitake aren’t going to rest until they’ve dug right down to your roots and exposed you and everyone you’re trying to protect. I don’t want you killed — right now, there’s nobody else who’s capable of bringing about this new future of yours.”

“Don’t you worry about Ukitake,” amusement danced in Keitarou’s muddy eyes. “I know all about him, and I’ll be ready. Trust me, all will be well.”

“Then I need to go,” in the background, Keitarou could faintly hear the sound of other voices, and his contact’s words dropped to the faintest of murmurs. “Till next time, when I hope to have more to report.”

There was a crackle of energy, and the spell that had connected them flickered and died, leaving Keitarou alone in his study.

He sighed, leaning back on his hands as he contemplated what he had been given.

I suppose I can't blame anyone for being nervous. Katsura's skills are well-honed, but he's naive and he gets distracted easily when on Seireitei's land. No, he's better off in Rukongai for the time being. I'll keep him away from the other side of the divide for a bit, allow things to settle and let them turn their attention to other matters. I can't suppose they haven't noticed that Tenichi is missing, yet? With any luck, that will take precedence over a few odd Hollow behaviours in the Districts. And, once Katsura and Sakaki complete their task, nobody in the Gotei will be thinking about events in the District for quite some time. As a distraction manoeuvre, it lacks panache, but its effective. It sends a message, and clogs up shinigami resources so that we can move more freely in other areas.

“I wish you hadn’t brought that boy here.”

The heavy divide that blocked off his study quarters from the rest of the small dwelling was pushed back, and a woman ducked her head beneath the cloth, a look of reproach on her face as she stepped into the room proper. She had waited for the spell to finish, he realised, not wanting to eavesdrop directly on his business, yet impatient to speak to him all the same. No matter how cross or perturbed she was, she had always respected his right to speak to his undercover contacts in private, but, glancing at her, Keitarou realised that even the feeble aura she put out was prickling with agitation, enough, perhaps, to make the spell's connection unstable.

"It was a reckless gamble, Kei-sama — I thought we'd agreed that there'd be no more of them, not this time around."

Keitarou sighed, leaning back against the house's support beam to run his gaze over his wife's deceptively fragile looking form. She was older now, of course, though in the way of most Seireitei people, two decades of aging had only rendered her as more of a woman and less of a girl still in her teens. Her thick dark hair was braided and wound around in a knot at the nape of her neck to keep it from getting in her way, and the vivid blue eyes that had sparked with such defiant life when they had first paired up were quieter now, yet still as deep and as richly blue as he ever remembered. She was robed simply, in pastel blues and browns stitched together into a basic peasant kimono and held together at the waist with a length of dusty, fraying black fabric that passed as an obi. Her feet were bare, though Keitarou was sure he had had tabi and getastolen from Seireitei for her use only a month or two earlier, and he surmised ruefully that these, like so many of the extras he acquired, had been spirited away to help the people in the local village.

Though Keitarou's connection to the Rukongai villagers he lived among was a real one, it faded in comparison to his wife's. When they had first arrived in Rukongai, he remembered, he had been critically wounded, compounding the damage done to his body by ingesting a vial of his own reidokupotion to effect their escape from the clutches of the Gotei. Eiraki had nursed him, all the time preparing for the birth of their first child, and it had been the kind hands and guidance of the local women which had helped her to cope with both burdens. Eiraki had been born a Clanswoman of considerable wealth and status, but the Rukongai poor folk had accepted her as one of their own, and their kindness and comfort she had neither forgotten nor betrayed. Whilst Keitarou talked about Rukongai from the point of view of his political ambitions, for Eiraki it had become a passion and a crusade — righting the wrong that had rendered these kind unfortunates on the very fringes of Soul Society.

It had not taken long for Keitarou to establish that the people here had been mistreated and abandoned by the Gotei shinigami enough times in the past, and, as he had regained his physical strength, he had begun to see how he could utilise his new circumstances to his advantage. The people here did not fear him, as many in Seireitei did. He had become their protector, and, little by little, he had gained their loyalty and their trust, for now they gravitated to him and his kin in a time of need. Rukongai souls had helped bring his children into the world, had taught Eiraki how to nurse them and had played a part in their education and their upbringing. In the past twenty or more years, Keitarou had set down roots in this barren wasteland and, when the Shinigami had come to evacuate Plus souls to the Spiritless Zone, his neighbours had rallied round to protect him, allowing him to hide from those who would have dragged him back to the Council's gallows.

He had fallen on his feet, yet try as he might, he could not see the people here as anything more to him than a useful tactic — a pawn in a time of war. Now, whilst her concern was primarily for him and for the safety of their young, it was also for the souls who could not protect themselves from hunger or from harm, and at the reproach in her expression, Keitarou let out a heavy sigh.

"I've been looking for Tenichi for a long time. Ketsui, too," he said softly. "They are kin to me, Eiraki-chan. Do you expect me to forsake them?"

"Yes," Eiraki spoke bluntly, her expression not wavering for a moment, and Keitarou was reminded ruefully that even now she was the only one who could meet his gaze and scold him as an equal, no matter what the circumstances. His one real weakness had been falling in love with her, but he was finding that such emotions were not easily reversible, and so he had learned to cope with it as best he could, no matter how inconvenient.

"You've known where they were for a long time, and you could've left it that way," she said now, moving across the floor towards him and resting her hands on his arms. "I forsook my family when I left District Seven, and I never did look back. You should have done the same, Kei-sama. Having ties to that world only makes us vulnerable. It puts us in harm's way, and then..."

She shuddered, shaking her head, and Keitarou knew she was remembering the last time she had encountered any of her Seireitei family. It had been a bad memory for the both of them, for Keitarou had been near death, and only Eiraki's intervention had prevented him from losing his life. Deep down, Keitarou knew that Eiraki still loved the brother that had confronted them — but equally, he knew she would never turn back to him. She had made her choice, and never once in the past twenty or so years had she complained about the hardship that choice had brought her.

“That won’t happen again,” he said now, reassurance in his voice. “I’m not taking on Kuchiki. I’m not doing anything, in fact, except staying here and coordinating things from afar. You worry far too much about me, Eiraki-chan. I’ve learned from our past encounters. I know my weaknesses, now, far better than I did then.”

“Kotetsu Tenichi is a weakness,” Eiraki’s eyes were emotionless now, cold and predatorial as she raised her head to his. “You know it. I know it. He shouldn’t be here. Send him back.”

“I will. I will, and soon,” Keitarou patted her gently on the head as though she was still a young girl rather than a grown woman, wife and mother. “Don’t look at me like that, Eiraki-chan. It hurts when you doubt my ability to manage things. I haven’t grown old or senile, not yet.”

“Hrm,” Eiraki’s eyes narrowed, and she ducked away from his touch, moving back towards the slat-framed window of the low-ceilinged chamber. “Maybe not, but telling a member of the Gotei where we are isn’t a good plan of action. The others, they had their heads covered and they had no idea where they’d been or who had held them. They never came here, and you handled it all at distance, without taking silly risks. On the contrary, that boy is unrestrained, and walks among us as though he belongs here. I don’t understand why, that’s all. I don’t know how you can tell he won’t betray us, and bring it all crashing down.”

“In that respect, you could call it a gamble,” Keitarou admitted, running his hand through his muddy brown-blond hair. “Though less of one than you might think, given the reasons behind my taking him now. He wants to know about Daisuke, and I can answer those questions. So long as that’s true, he won’t — can’t betray where we are. He’s like his father, honest and principled. He’s given his word that he’ll help provide for the people here, too. That should make you happy. Doesn’t it?”

“Not if it might hurt them or us in the long run,” Eiraki sighed, looking suddenly tired. “Kei, where is Katsura? Kurotsuchi said you sent him somewhere, again, though I thought he had come back from Seireitei. This constant coming and going tries my patience... you might not dart into danger yourself, but sending them...”

“Katsura is a grown man, and intelligent,” Keitarou reflected. “Talented, too. I’m not worried about him, Eiraki, not on this particular mission. Sometimes, true, he lets the bright lights of Seireitei distract him, and he’s at the age where he’s far too fond of girls and the favours they can offer him. In the Spiritless Zone, though, there’s unlikely to be anything to tempt him to linger. He’ll be home soon enough, don’t worry... I haven’t sent him into any particular danger, and this time, he isn’t alone.”

He paused, then,

“Sakaki...” Eiraki looked pained, then turned away from him, and for a moment, Keitarou could not see the emotions that reflected in her eyes. “All right. I suppose if she’s there too, all will go to plan. I just don’t like it, when they’re constantly away and at the whim of others. What if someone was to connect them to here? To us?”

“Now, why should they do that?” Keitarou moved behind her, sliding his arm around her shoulders and pulling her gently towards him. She sighed, the tension seeping out of her, and she did not resist his touch, instead sinking back against his body and closing her eyes.

“It was easier when it was just you I had to worry about,” she murmured, more than half to herself. “That was enough to drive my hair white, but now... it’s so much more complicated. I don’t know, half the time, what you’re planning or when you intend on taking action. I trust you — I always have and I still do. I believe in what you do, that hasn’t changed. Just now, there are so many more lives involved. So many more people at stake.”

“True,” Keitarou nodded, pursing his lips as he considered her words. “You’re not wrong. We couldn’t win the war with just the two of us. We needed this time to regroup, and now we have. Tenichi is only my latest objective. There is a lot still to be done before we can launch our coup d’etat, and I’m taking every care to make sure things go as they should.”

“I still don’t think that boy should be here,” Eiraki said flatly, and Keitarou nodded.

“I know,” he agreed levelly. “It won’t be for a lot longer. I’m stalling him — waiting for the right moment.”

His eyes narrowed, a calculating look entering his mud-slurried eyes.

“Do you remember District Seven?” he asked softly, and Eiraki snorted derisively, nodding her head.

“I will never ever have reason to forget,” she said bitterly. “What about it?”

“Your grandfather tried his best to exterminate the Urahara,” Keitarou’s grasp around her tightened slightly as he remembered. “He killed Daisuke, and wanted to track me down. He also had a lot of lesser Urahara slaughtered, just to ensure we didn’t speak against him to the Council. He did a good, thorough job — he eradicated most everyone he could. Ketsui and Tenichi are survivors, of course, but Daisuke sent them away and so they grew up in foreign land. The others...”

He shrugged his shoulders, his eyes darkening.

“When you and I left the Endou manor, there was a concerted search for us,” he whispered, pressing his lips towards her ear so that the vibration of his words tickled against her skin. “You remember it, just as I do. We had to live by our wits to escape properly. Do you know why that was?”

“Kyouraku Tokutarou broke his promise to me not to hunt you down,” Eiraki said grimly. “They were stalking you even before I chose to come with you — I was so afraid that you’d never come back, or that they’d kill you before I had a chance to speak to you and tell you what I felt.”

“Well, they failed,” Keitarou soothed her gently. “However, their search was a threat to me — to both of us — and more recently, I discovered exactly why. I had thought that the Urahara exiles were all killed by Shouichi and Seimaru — but I was wrong. It seems a sect of them survived — literally going underground to escape from the threat of persecution. These people bought their lives from the Endou — they sold themselves to Misashi and his son in order to protect their own existences.”

Eiraki stiffened at the sound of her father’s name, turning to stare at her husband in consternation.

“Urahara? Working with Father?”

“Yes,” Keitarou fought to keep his tones even, nodding his head. “Mostly insignificant in terms of spirit power, though some of them had a modicum of intelligence, and a few were powerful enough to merit notice even in the Urahara court of my father. They were descendants of two or three northern families who worked with Otousama on the reidoku and who fled the District before he was arrested. People who'd heard that he was a Council target and got out before they were tarnished by the same brush as he was... probably people who gave evidence against him to that same Council, since none of them were ever tried or executed when Father and those more loyal companions he had died. Cowards and traitors, the lot of them, skulking in the shadows out of my line of sight. I have no idea how they succeeded in doing that, but somehow, for a century, they did."

"And now?" Eiraki turned to face him properly. "What of these people?"

"They're probably still working for the Endou, still digging underground, still looking for us," Keitarou said grimly. "That's why I'm waiting before I return Tenichi. His Captain is away from the squad at the moment. What I have to convey in this abductee's ransom message is not the same as what I've asked for in the past. I don't want money or supplies from your brother, Eiraki. I want answers."

"You want to know the location of these underground Urahara, so you can kill them?" Eiraki asked, and Keitarou nodded.

"If I know that, I can take steps," he agreed simply.

"Why bother?" Eiraki asked quizzically. "They looked for us a long time ago, but they didn't find us. We're not in their neck of the woods now. There's no reason to..."

"These Urahara — they were used by your father but officially pardoned by your brother and, as far as I know, they work for him in espionage of varying levels." Keitarou relinquished his hold on her, moving to the window to gaze out over the barren landscape. "They're known as 'Kitsune' — foxes, maybe even fox spirits, given how easily they can disappear. It would be naive to suppose those spies were all within Seventh District. The Gotei is now a much wider ranging organisation than it was back when we first met. Whilst it's possible the bulk of them are there, I would be surprised if they hadn't been deployed through the Gotei Divisions by now."

"Even more reason to keep away from them, surely?" Eiraki asked, and Keitarou shook his head.

"Their existence could prove a problem to what we're trying to achieve," he said grimly. "If they're loose across the Gotei, they're also loose across the Districts, picking up tidbits of data that might otherwise have been overlooked. Districts no longer keep so proudly to themselves. Foreign shinigami cross borders all the time. We already have the Shihouin's Onmitsukidou to contend with, but for the Clan of Seventh, this is all a whole lot more personal and, if you'll forgive me, ruthless. I don't need people tying together fragments of information into a whole picture, not whilst we're still building towards our goal."

"True, but going out to find them is surely going to bring them more of that kind of information?" Eiraki pointed out, folding her arms across her chest. "If Oniisama is doing as you say — and I don't know whether he is — these are people who are good at hiding. Hunting them down will be difficult and we don't have the resources."

She looked suspicious.

"Are you sure this isn't just about you avenging yourself on people who betrayed Keitsune-sama?"

Keitarou's eyes flickered for a moment, then he sighed.

"I can't completely detach that thought from this one," he owned wearily. "I wouldn't be human if I didn't connect the two things in my mind. I've left it this long, though, Eiraki-chan. I've waited. Much as I'd like to see them all skinned and strung up to hang, you're right. It would be a futile endeavour if revenge was the only goal."

"But it isn't?" Eiraki arched an eyebrow, and Keitarou shook his head.

"These Urahara are a danger to us," he said frankly. "No. Not just to us, Eiraki, but to others. Maybe Sakaki, maybe Katsura, but more importantly, to someone else we're both working hard to protect and shield."

"Someone else?"

"An exiled fox, feral from its kind will cross the woodland path, leaving new scent and causing the river willow to turn towards a new sun," Keitarou intoned gravely, his words and expression impassive. "Once met, this bond cannot be broken, for the willow will protect the fox even with its life."

Eiraki's features paled, despite the cryptic nature of his words, and she grasped at his fingers, staring at him in alarm.

"You mean... they're a threat to... Kohaku?"

"Maybe," Keitarou agreed grimly. "Maybe not, but I can't take the chance. We can't take the chance. Yes, he's a lot stronger than he was. The last couple of years especially, he's improved in leaps and bounds. That said, though, he's still young and there are still dangers. Perhaps I'm overreacting, but if the Gotei were to know about him... about what he can do... what if the Gotei decided... Hirata decided to send these spies of his to Rukongai next? Their origins are as Clan as yours or mine — do you think they wouldn't sense Kohaku's presence the moment they arrived? Maybe even ours, too? Do you think that we... and therefore he... would not be top of any hunting bird's hit list?"

"No..." Eiraki's face was drawn, and she shook her head. "But would they? So far, Rukongai has been so..."

"So far, but the mission I sent Katsura and Sakaki on will change that," Keitarou said grimly. "I had to get rid of the shinigami from the Spiritless Zone, and killing them was the safest option for us — but there will be shinigami in that part of Rukongai to investigate and retrieve the corpses, and that's generally bad news in the short term. By no means do we want them extending their search here."

"Do you think Hirata-nii will give up these people?"

"Not really," Keitarou rubbed his chin, "but asking about them does two important things. One, it tells him that we know they exist, and so he can't slip them in and out under the radar if that thought crosses his mind — more likely he'll try and protect them and therefore hold back from any forays we don't want him to make. It will preoccupy him enough to create a smokescreen, at least, so I hope. Two, it will tell me how much he values them as opposed to one of his squad. It's a test. I need to read how things are."

"Will you kill him?" Eiraki's voice was barely more than a whisper, and Keitarou shook his head.

"I'd like to, but I won't. I promised you that I wouldn't, as he wouldn't kill you that day he faced us in District One," he said gently, brushing his finger against her cheek and twisting it absently into a stray lock of her dark hair. "He remains our enemy, but I won't kill him. That means I have to neuter him through other means. Your brother is no longer a weak and retiring young man, Eiraki. I saw his true nature in that moment he came at me, and felt the power in his sword, too. I won't take it for granted that his affection for you will benefit us a second time. I need other weaknesses — since I know he's still yours, whatever you might say."

Eiraki pursed her lips, but made no reply, and Keitarou patted her absently on the head.

"What about Tenichi, if Oniisama doesn't take your bait?"

"I will send him back, probably. I'll find a way to do so that leaves him ambiguous about our aims and motives. It might work in our favour, if he is released knowing his Captain wouldn't pay his ransom — but I'm still thinking on that one. I don't want to make him too openly resentful of the Gotei, because he's forthright enough to give it away."

"And if he betrays us?"

"He won't," Keitarou smiled. "He's already one of us — he just doesn't know it yet."

"You mean..?" Eiraki's gaze drifted to the sheathed knife at her husband's waist, and Keitarou laughed, shaking his head.

"No. No, not that," he chided softly. "Kohaku. Kohaku is the reason why I know. Do you doubt his word more than you doubt mine?"

"I suppose not," Eiraki relaxed somewhat at this, letting out a heavy sigh. "Does he know about the Kitsune, by the way?"

"I haven't spoken of it at all," Keitarou responded evenly, "so if he does, it's not from me. It's better we don't unsettle him with things we can't confirm. With his help, it would be a lot easier to find and kill these folk. A lot less risky, in many ways. I'm prepared to sacrifice things — limbs, locations, even lives if need be, to bring about our final victory. However, if we lose Kohaku..."

"You don't need to say any more," Eiraki said quietly. "If it's that way, then..."

She trailed off, and Keitarou put a reassuring hand on her shoulder.

"I will protect him," he said softly. "We need him — more than anything or anyone else, we need him, and so for that reason, I won't take any chances. He may be what divides success and failure, Eiraki, so it's for his own good — and ours — to eliminate these people and move forward with our plans."

The Shinigami camp were not expecting her.

Sakaki crept around the perimeter of the small, make-shift settlement, getting her bearings carefully and judging with an expert eye the swiftest way to get in and out again should she need to beat a hasty retreat. She ran her fingers pensively across the hilt of her katana. There had never been an occasion when she'd had to do the latter, but she had had it drilled into her from a very early age that it was always best to consider all the possibilities, however unlikely, before launching into a scene.

The encampment was not tightly secured, and she eyed it with derision, taking in the blind spots between the two shinigami guards on duty. They would not be able to see each other from where they were positioned, relying on one to set up a vocal alarm if they saw any sign of trouble. From her position in the nearby bushes, Sakaki allowed herself a soft chuckle. They wouldn't have time to raise any kind of alarm — both of them would be dead before they realised she was there.

Half of the perimeter was thick with shrub and bush, the other side opening onto a trackway that doubtless led down to one of the local settlements over which the Shinigami were meant to be standing guard. Sakaki sniffed the air, taking in the faint scent of ash and sulphur on the wind. So a Hollow had been here, then? Her nose wrinkled in distaste. Katsura had been this close to the shinigami, and yet hadn't laid a finger on any of them?

Typical.

She grimaced, rolling her eyes. Her brother still persisted in this new-fangled idea of preserving lives if they could be spared, a school of thought Sakaki had never had any time for at all. Although she was still only sixteen, she considered herself far the more traditional type of assassin, and prided herself on her slash first, ask later mentality.

If the wrong person gets killed by mistake, so what? All it means is they can't come back and be a problem later.

She rolled up the sleeves of her rough kimono, gazing up at the overhanging branches of a string of nearby Japanese maple trees.

If they weren't trouble, they wouldn't be in the area you're planning a hit. Obviously getting rid of them is a good plan, and anyone else who might decide to cause a problem later on. If Katsu-nii thought like that, everything would be a lot simpler — I only hope he's found the nerve to nail the shinigami in the south, because I don't want to have to mop up his spoils afterwards. It's no fun if they're already maimed and bloody — I like a fresh kill, and I'm not my brother's keeper.

Keeping herself out of view of the two sentries, she raised her arms, leaping up to grab the lower branch of the nearest tree and pulling herself nimbly into the thick foliage of its branches. For a moment she curled up close to the wood, allowing the faint rustle her jump had made to be passed off as a gust of wind or a bird by the men below, then, very cautiously, she inched her way deeper into the tree's bough, testing each branch for strength before shifting her weight onto it. A little further ahead, she knew, this tree meshed with the next one, and so she pushed on, plotting a pathway through the greenery whilst down below the shinigami kept their eyes on the paths for any sign of trouble.

They had no idea she was there, but then, Sakaki was used to that. Shinigami rarely knew she was anywhere, she reflected with a bitter sigh, looping slim fingers around the branch of her final destination tree and hauling her body across a gap of about half a metre into the safety of the overhanging maple. The bough swayed and creaked a little, causing one of the sentries to look up, and Sakaki held her breath, feeling a thrill of adrenaline charging through her veins as, for a moment, she debated whether or not she had been seen. The moment quickly passed, however, and, as the sentry returned his attention to the ground below, she let out a disappointed sigh, curling her fingers around the hilt of her dagger and pulling it silently from its cloth sheath at her side.

She glanced at it, taking in the half-glint of her reflection rendered by the fragmented sunlight that dappled through the criss-crossing branches above her head. Then she swung it around, squinting slightly as she judged her trajectory. She had one shot, and if she misjudged, her job would become a lot more difficult, so, as she stretched out like a snake across the wide branch she had chosen as her support, she felt her pulse speed up a second time, heart racing in her ears as she picked her moment.

One second passed. Two, three, then ten, stretching into thirty, and still she did not move, her eyes fixed on the sentry she had chosen as her primary target. He was a half-inch out of her line of fire, only a short distance, but enough to make the difference between living and dying. A wounded man could still gasp a warning to his comrades, maybe even yell and raise the alarm before his blood saturated his lungs and choked off his air. Sakaki's lips thinned, impatience glittering in her eyes, but still she did not move, knowing that if she rushed it, she could bring the whole plan to nothing.

Finally, after what seemed like forever, the sentry moved, stepping back very slightly to enjoy the shade of the maple tree, and Sakaki saw her chance. Lifting her hand very slightly, she steadied her position, then, with the deftest flick of her wrist, she launched the dagger through the air, firing it with speed and accuracy down towards her target's heart.

The sentry turned his head slightly, as though seeing the missile coming out of the corner of his eye, but it was too late for him to do more. With a dull thud, it embedded itself in his chest, the force of the shot cracking through the rib and causing the sharpened blade to penetrate deep into the vital organs beneath. His eyes widened, his lips twitching for a moment, but he could not form coherent words, and, as those sightless orbs rolled back into his head, he crumpled and fell, sliding to the ground with the softest of impacts. Sakaki allowed herself a smile of triumph, resisting the urge to punch the air. One down, but there were still six more, and she had to take them all out before she could feasibly call the game over.

She shuffled her position around, eying the second sentry carefully to see whether he had noticed anything amiss, but, as she had surmised, he was far enough out of the line of sight of his comrade not to have seen or heard a thing. The tree she had chosen as her vantage point towered over him, and with a slight modification to her position, she was soon right above him, glittering eyes gazing down at the unsuspecting shinigami as she readied herself for the second kill.

This one would be more fun, she reflected to herself, pulling the katana from its sheath and positioning it in a vertical hold between her hands. Then, with the faintest of rustles, she leapt from the branch, descending on the shinigami, weapon unfurled. This time, he did not even have time to so much as look up and, as she landed atop his shoulders, her weight causing his legs to buckle at the unexpected assault, she grabbed her gloved fingers roughly around his mouth, watching his eyes bulge for a moment with fear and alarm before bringing her weapon neatly across his throat, slitting it deeply and causing a fountain of crimson blood to spray out across the ground.

Discarding her victim, Sakaki took a moment to shake her blade free from the majority of the blood before turning her attention on the camp as a whole. Unlike Katsura, she could not pinpoint where her targets were exactly by spiritual means, but her hearing was sharp, her vision the acute skill of a predator well versed in stalking, and so she canvassed the campsite carefully, alert for the slightest movement or shadow that would give away the presence of living beings within. She turned to retrieve her dagger from the chest of the first shinigami, wiping it absently on the sleeve of her clothing, then returning it to the sheath at her belt. She might need it again later, and in any case, weapons were not easy to come by in Rukongai. She had no mind to be scolded for discarding a perfectly good knife in the heat of battle and, whilst her prey were armed with spirit swords, they were weapons of no value to someone like Sakaki.

The first tent she reached was empty, but from the next one she heard the faint murmur of voices, and she tensed, dropping to the ground and moving slowly and silently on all fours around towards the back of the shelter. Going in through the entrance was too obvious, and Sakaki knew that all those who had been trained in carrying arms would always have one eye on the doorway, ready to move at the first sign of trouble. Attacking from behind gave her better odds, especially since she was outnumbered five to one, and though she was confident in her abilities to dispatch the other shinigami, she wasn't taking anything for granted. These people had spiritual powers which could disable or even kill her, and she wasn't about to let them have time to release their zanpakutou.

Once behind the tent, Sakaki ducked behind a discarded wooden crate that had once held some form of medical supplies, shaking her blade once more then eying it critically. It was still quite spotted with the blood of the previous victim, but it would have to do. She didn't have time to be fussy about the cleanliness of her katana when there were shinigami to kill and a limited amount of time in which to do it.

Allowing the adrenaline to take her once more, she sprang forward, ripping the razor-sharp katana through the canvas of the back of the tent and tearing it open, darting through the opening without a moment of hesitation. There was an exclamation from within, but Sakaki knew better than to stop and ruminate on her situation when danger was almost certainly a sword swing away. Acting purely on instinct, she swung her blade forward, clashing it against the half-drawn weapon of one of her opponents before using her free arm to grab at the shinigami's throat. Startled, the individual ducked back to avoid her touch, and Sakaki drove home her advantage, launching into the unfortunate healer feet first and winding the woman in the gut. She crumpled, gasping in shock and pain, but Sakaki could not worry about her for the time being for the shift of air against her ear told her that the tent's second occupant had got their weapon from its sheath. Ducking the blade, she swung around, plunging her own sword deep into the other shinigami's gut before the man could react, and he staggered back, clutching at his midriff in surprise and dismay. He opened his mouth, but before he could speak, Sakaki had pounced on him, using her body weight to pin him to the ground before wrapping her fingers around his throat and squeezing determinedly until she heard the familiar 'crack' of a snapped neck. The man's eyes became dull, and Sakaki retrieved her sword from his belly, his corpse already forgotten as she wheeled back on her original target, sweeping the katana across the woman's throat before she had managed to recover her breath.

Four down, three to go.

Sakaki's eyes glittered with the thrill of the kill, surveying her victims critically. They had been ready to fight, but not against someone like her, and it had cost them dear. She had not found their leader yet, though — the one she would have to pay particular care and attention when facing.

Unohana Madeki, that's the name that he gave me. A third seated officer within the Unohana division, and therefore someone who's probably pretty good with a sword. I could take proper damage from him, so I need to plot accordingly.

She scoured the tent for anything that might be of use to her in the next stage of her assault, the cooling bodies already forgotten as she began to plan her next kill. Boxes and crates like the empty ones outside were piled up in one corner and, stepping nimbly over the leg of the fallen man, she moved to investigate them, one ear open for any sign of disturbance. They were pressed firmly shut, the lids screwed down, but Sakaki had never been patient enough to work out delicate ways of breaking in, and she turned her sword around, bashing a hole in the side of the crate instead and then inserting a curious hand, feeling around for whatever was within. For the most part it was bandages, she realised with disgust, but then her fingers closed around what was unmistakably a glass vial and she pulled it out, gazing at it thoughtfully for a moment.

I wonder...

Sliding her blade back into its scabbard, she unfastened the lid of the vial, giving it a tentative sniff. A smile spread across her lips.

Houten-yaku. Just as I thought.

Pulling the sword free from its holder once more, she tipped the liquid liberally across the blade, watching as the smooth, glittering substance mingled with the smeared blood, tainting it with an eerie reddish tinge.

That should even up the odds a little, I reckon.

Tossing the vial aside, she turned her attention back to the crate, pulling out lengths of bandages and tossing them aside as she hunted for anything more useful. More vials of the anaesthetic potion came to light, and she pocketed a second, standing on tip-toes to reach as far into the wood-slatted box as she could. At first, she could feel nothing, but at length her fingers brushed against something that felt like sand, but much finer, and she closed her hand around it slowly, drawing it to the surface and holding it a safe distance away to examine it.

Tiny granules of something scattered across her palm, small enough to be mistaken for dust, but pure white in colour.

Some kind of medicine, waiting to be made up?

Sakaki glanced at it quizzically for a moment.

I don't know what it is, though, and I daren't mess around with it. It might be something like Gaten-yaku, something I can handle, but it could easily be something more deadly, so I won't risk tasting it.

“Who are you?”

The sound of a voice made her spin around, momentarily caught off guard by the intrusion of one of the remaining healers, and, at the sight of the bloody bodies, the shinigami let out an exclamation, a fat hand closing around the hilt of his weapon and drawing it swiftly from his sheath.

“Buchou!” he yelled, and Sakaki cursed, knowing that her cover was now well and truly blown. “Buchou, we’ve got an intruder! She’s armed, and she’s taken down two shinigami!”

“You’re going to regret doing that,” she hissed, closing her hand around the dusty powder as she readied her own blade, and the shinigami’s eyes became cold, clear hatred burning in their green depths.

“You’re the one who’s going to regret it, Plus soul,” he said disparagingly. “I don’t know what you thought you were doing, coming here, but killing shinigami is a crime punishable by death.”

“Then you’d better die, and let me get on with my job,” Sakaki spat back, lunging forward and bringing the handful of dust up, throwing it in the shinigami’s face. He coughed, his free hand going to his eyes, and Sakaki did not hesitate, bringing her drug-laced weapon down towards her enemy’s own. Instead of disarming the man, however, Sakaki knew better than to waste time on civil niceties, and she slashed her katana through the shinigami’s arm, his howl of agony merely ripping adrenaline once more through her young body. Her opponent staggered and stumbled, blood pouring from the wound, and eyes streaming from whatever she had thrown in his face, and Sakaki watched for a moment, fascinated by the jerky, puppet-like contortions his body made before succumbing to the anaesthetic and crashing forward on top of the still form of his comrade.

There was no time to gloat, though, for Sakaki could already hear voices from outside the tent. She had already wasted the drug on a lesser shinigami, and there were still two healers left — two targets she could not leave behind.

I have another vial of anaesthetic, though. I'll keep it as a last resort.

She coughed, waving her hand to clear the dusty air around her. It would not do to drug herself by accident, but the atmosphere was getting heavier, and those voices beyond were getting louder. Bracing herself for a violent confrontation, she raised her weapon cautiously, then, with an inward pep talk, she burst forward, slashing and spitting at the startled shinigami beyond.

“Hey!”

A woman’s voice penetrated the air, but Sakaki had slipped into savage mode, now, kicking, punching and swinging her sword as though a demon had possessed her.

“Fall back, Keiko! Let me handle it!”

A male voice — the voice of the squad Buchou, some little voice inside Sakaki’s wild brain told her, and she snarled, turning and launching herself in his direction, blade up as if in challenge. Her lips curled back, revealing sharp white teeth that, given the right incentive, she would gladly plunge into a foe’s body to inflict harm, but the squad captain was not a lower ranking shinigami, and he met her blade with his own, dark eyes rich with consternation as he surveyed her crazed, blood-splattered form.

“Keiko, check the tent. Check for injuries,” he ordered, in a voice that told Sakaki he knew his comrades were dead but was trying his best to shield the living companion from harm’s way. “Leave this to me, I’ll take care of her.”

“Sir?” the woman sounded doubtful, and Madeki waved his free hand impatiently at the tent, gesturing for her to go. She faltered for a moment, then obeyed the command, leaving Sakaki alone with the strongest and most challenging member of the Seireitei contingent.

“Who are you and what do you want here?” he demanded of her, parrying her sword a second time and pushing his weight forward as though intending to use his superior male strength to disarm her. “Answer me, and explain yourself.”

“You can’t take me down with that weapon,” Madeki’s voice sounded calm, but the look in his eyes told Sakaki he was far from it, his mind racing from the savagery he must know had taken place across his camping ground. “It’s an asauchi, nothing more than a basic sword. Surrender and let me take you into custody. If not, I’ll have to kill you, and I don’t want to do that.”

“I want to kill you, though,” Sakaki told him through gritted teeth, her eyes hardening with resolve. “I’m not going to be killed by any damn shinigami, in this life or the next one! I already killed your precious companions, and I’m not stupid. You want to take me captive so you can sell me to Seireitei — and that’s not going to happen!”

“Bakudou no Ichi — Sai!” Madeki’s spell flew out towards her, and Sakaki let out a curse, dropping to the ground to avoid it and rolling towards her opponent, sword still gripped in her right hand. Her left fumbled at her obifor the sheathed dagger, but Madeki was bearing down on her, weapon drawn and hand already glimmering with the threat of a second Bakudou. Sakaki’s desperate fingers brushed past the knife, touching the cold vial of unopened anaesthetic and without thinking what she was doing she had pulled it from her belt, tossing it at him like a grenade.

This was clearly the last thing Madeki had expected, for he brought his sword up to deflect the object, the light prickling at his fingers desisting with his need to defend himself. The vial shattered against the flat of his sword, sending clear liquid raining down on it and on him, and in the moment of hesitation, Sakaki lurched a kick at his leg, causing him to stumble and lose his balance. Scrambling to her feet, Sakaki was ready with her katana, praying that she had at least bought herself a few minutes with which to launch a counter-attack.

It was not to be, for Madeki was quick to right himself, his dark eyes boring into hers as he backed her up against the tent she had so defiled.

“Who are you?” he asked again, his words lacking in any emotion now. “Why are you here, and what do you mean by attacking my subordinates?”

“As I said, I mean to kill them,” Sakaki shot back, hackles rising like a cornered wildcat preparing to launch a clawed attack on her attacker. “I mean to kill you, too. That’s why I came here. To kill all of you. To kill you stupid shinigami and tell your Gotei to stay away from here and from us!”

Madeki’s eyes narrowed, his blade moving up towards Sakaki’s throat, but then he faltered, his grip on the sword trembling slightly as though unable to keep the same firm hold he had had moments before. Startled, Sakaki gazed at him in apprehension, expecting a trick, but as she met his eyes, she understood the reason for his sudden hesitation.

The Houten-yaku. Some of it entered his system. Some of it... worked.

Relief crashed over her as the Third seated officer stumbled, struggling to keep his balance, and she saw her opening, launching forward with her body and knocking him to the ground. He fell like a stone, the sword clattering onto the ground, and, as she stepped over him cautiously, Sakaki marvelled at how quickly the drug had taken effect.

A potent dose. Probably meant to be diluted with something before ingesting, but never mind. It worked just in time.

She bent to touch the edge of his sword, noting the faint discolouration against the blade, and a thought struck her.

I wonder... if a shinigami can be poisoned by a drug touching their sword, not just their body? He was going to release it at me... and then... this. Oh well.

She got to her feet, circling around to Madeki's head, and hovering her sword pensively over the man's throat.

There's still one more left. One in that tent, and the sun is getting higher in the sky. I need to get back soon — I've wasted far too much time here. He'll sleep for a while, so I can come back to him after. The other one first. She saw me, and she's still conscious. Even if I did release some kind of drug in that tent, I need to take care of loose ends.

Her gaze flitted to Madeki's dulled, half-open eyes, and a predatory smile twitched at her lips.

"Wait for me, Buchou," she whispered, "I'll be back for you in a minute."

Skipping over his motionless form, she pushed back the flap of the tent, katana at the ready as she prepared for a surprise attack. As she stepped into the tent, though, she realised that there was no movement coming from within, and with a jolt she made out the form of the final shinigami sprawled out across the stomach of one of those she had already killed.

Well, whaddya know? I guess it was an anaesthetic after all.

Grim humour teased at Sakaki's blue eyes, and she moved forward, grasping the woman's head by the hair and pulling it back to reveal the throat. A quick slash of the blade later and the shinigami's deep sleep became an eternal one, and Sakaki stifled a yawn, stepping back out into the sunlight and taking a deep breath of fresh air.

I took in some of it, then. Maybe I did before, too.

She glanced at her sword, registering how much heavier it felt now than it had moments before. With a sigh she returned it to its sheath, moving back to where Madeki lay in a stupor, his breathing heavy but even.

He's still alive. I wonder how much anaesthetic it takes to kill a man.

She bent at his side, touching her finger to his throat clumsily.
I'm going to have to hope for the best, and trust that he took enough into his blade to speak for him. I need to get back, before I fall asleep here and get caught. I'm covered in blood, and that's going to look pretty suspicious to anyone walking past.

She swallowed another yawn, grimacing ruefully at her hands.
Best I find some hiding place and sleep this off. Somewhere nobody can find me, so then I can go back and report in safety. It's a pain, but I can't risk being found here, so this time, I'll have to retreat. Sleep for a long time, Buchou — else I'll have to come meet with you again, and that'll be a drag for the both of us.

With that she reluctantly turned on her heel, picking her way through the campsite towards the deep forestland that lay beyond.
I don't think I took in enough of the drug to cause me harm, but there's no sense in taking unnecessary risks. I'll find a nice tree to sleep it off in — then I'll go home and tell him that the job's done.

Behind her, Madeki's eyelids twitched slightly, as though registering her departure. Had she turned, maybe she would have seen heavy eyes shift slowly and purposefully in the direction she had gone. Had she looked, she might have seen her foe absorbing as much detail about her as possible. She did not see the shinigami's eyes close, her image the last thing imprinted on his thoughts before sleep claimed him. Lost in her own concerns, she slipped into the forest, heedless of the trail she had unwittingly left behind.

Author's Note: Happy New Year!

Although this story is written to something like Chapter 24 on my flashdisk, I go back to university at the end of this week so updates may become spasmodic again. Bear with me! ;)

Ficcish factioid stuff...

Houten (崩点) is one of the potions that Ukitake assumes Yoruichi has used to drug Ichigo on the bridge when faced with Byakuya in the Soul

Society arc (vol 14 of the manga). You might assume that the powder Sakaki finds is the other one, Gaten (穿点). Yaku is simply the suffix for “medicine” (from the kanji kusuri 薬).

Members, ViceCaptains and Captains of Divisions

I realise that some names are familiar to readers of Meifu and some are new characters, but to try and save on the confusion, here’s a minor run down on the divisions and their members in these stories so you can keep up with who is where. Some names may not be familiar to you yet, even if they are from earlier stories — but will doubtless be of relevance as the story potters on.

FIRST DIVISION

Captain: Yamamoto Yuuichi (Current head of the Yamamoto Clan — Hashihiko has died)

Vice Captain: Yamamoto Akira

Third Seat: Gujihara Tetsu

SECOND DIVISION

Captain: Shihouin Midori (Current head of the Shihouin Clan)

Vice Captain & Head of Onmitsukidou: Shihouin Kai

Third Seat (and Onmitsukidou Fukukan): Etsuo Saku

Other members:

Oomaeda Kaneyo

THIRD DIVISION

Captain: Urahara Nagesu (Current head of the Urahara Clan)

Vice Captain: Urahara Shiketsu

Third Seat: Urahara Yunosuke

9. A Cry For Help

Chapter Eight: A Cry For Help

It had been a long ride.

Endou Hirata removed his cloak from his shoulders, tossing it down onto his desk and running his fingers through his long dark hair, moving to the mirror with a sigh to examine his appearance. A young man stared back at him, tired eyes meeting his from behind the lenses of round-rimmed glasses. Despite having been a Captain for almost twenty years now, he still resembled a new graduate from Genryuusai's Academy in many ways, but there was something in the pale blue eyes that told anyone who thought he was a fresh recruit that they needed to take a second look. He had never been tall of stature, and indeed, many of his fellow Captains still towered over him, yet the fright-or-flight reactions that had marked him out during his schooldays had all but been overcome now, and, at least in public, he walked proudly, his head held high.

If he wasn't proud of the Endou Clan, there was nobody else to be proud for him, so even if he had doubts, Hirata had long since learned not to show them in his demeanour.

That day he was robed not in his customary shihakushou, but the rich brown and red of his family's crest colours, the dark earthy silk pulled together at his waist by a crimson obi that had been pressed and stored with loving care among his other, more military possessions. This obi he wore more than any other when visiting the main house, for it had been a gift from his youngest daughter, Sayuri, a child with whom he spent little enough time as it was. He put a finger to the silk now, running it gently over the neatly woven fabric. At the edge, only just visible above the folds of the cloth was the distinctive shadow of a hunting bird, embroidered neatly in tiny, perfectly formed stitches. Although she was only seven, Sayuri was already excelling in all her lessons, and as he touched her handiwork, a faint smile touched Hirata's face, softening the predator that lurked within and making him seem several levels more lighthearted.

I spend more time with Souja and Kikyue because my job requires it, but whenever I go home, Sayuri still runs to greet me, hugs me and chatters excitedly about all the things she's done since last we saw each other. I wouldn't have her anywhere near the barracks or the dangers that lurk here, but when I go back to the Endou manor, at least there is one innocent smiling face waiting to greet me.

“Otousama?”

There was a knock at the door of the office, and Hirata’s gaze darted towards the wood with a sigh, knowing that the moment he responded to the call and admitted his son to his chambers, his duty as Captain of the Seventh Division would begin once again in earnest. Though he loved his work as a shinigami, sometimes leading a division as high-maintenance as Seventh was a trying, tiring job, and he would have liked to have had a moment to rest and recuperate before rejoining his squad. From the anxious tone in Souja’s voice, however, he realised it was not to be, and so, with marked reluctance, he turned back towards his desk, moving his cloak aside and calling for his son to come in.

Souja did so, sliding the door back quietly on its runners and stepping into the Captain’s chamber with a respectful bow of the head. This was his son and heir, Hirata reflected ruefully — a young man who always did things the way they should be done, regardless of the close bonds of kinship that bound them together.

“Otousama, I trust you had a good ride back from the main estate?”

The question was a polite formality, and Hirata could tell from his son’s aura that the young man had something more pressing than small talk to discuss.

“I did,” he confirmed now, gesturing for his companion to take a seat. “And before you ask, your mother and your sister are quite well. I didn’t expect to be set upon the moment I returned back, however. Is there something you need to report to me, Souja? I was going to change and take a bath, but if it’s important...”

“It is, sir, and I apologise for it,” Souja did as he was bidden, raising earnest eyes to his father’s clouded ones. “As Vice Captain, I ought to have been able to handle the matter entirely myself, but as it is...”

He reached into his obi, pulling out a folded sheet of parchment, which he toyed with between his fingers as he debated how best to begin his explanation.

“It’s been about forty-eight hours, now,” he said at length, “and neither Kikyue nor I can find head nor tail of Kotetsu Tenichi.”

“Tenichi-kun?” Hirata’s eyebrows shot up behind the rims of his glasses. “That’s the boy who transferred from Thirteenth, isn’t it? I gave him over to Kikyue’s command — and you’re saying she’s somehow managed to lose him?”

“We fear worse than that, Otousama,” Souja admitted, folding the sheet of paper and then unfolding it again without seeming to realise what he was doing. “There have been a number of minor incidents involving shinigami from other squads that recently came to my attention. Shinigami of low rank have been abducted from Seireitei, held to ransom and then released unharmed when that ransom is paid. Usually, it comes in the form of supplies or food, water, things like that, and the kidnapped shinigami have been from squads who are reluctant to pay compensation to destroyed villages. However, even though Seventh are up to date with such things, it’s our general belief that Tenichi has become the next victim of these vigilante District rogues.”

“Abducted?”

Hirata stared at his son, aghast, then he groaned, removing his spectacles and burying his head in his hands. “And Juushirou trusted him to me — what will he say when he knows... does he know?”

His head shot up sharply at this thought, and Souja nodded apologetically.

“Kikyue went to seek his counsel,” he admitted. “I’m sorry, Otousama. I hadn’t realised... I don’t suppose either of us thought you’d want to keep it to ourselves. It’s a serious matter, and I think we need help in getting to the bottom of it.”

“No... no, it’s fine,” Hirata sighed heavily. “Just my pride, taking a hit. Well? What clues do you have? You are quite sure that he was abducted? There’s no question of anything else having occurred?”

“We’ve explored every angle and this is the last remaining one,” Souja said sadly. “It’s outrageous to think of, a shinigami being taken so close to his home barracks, but it’s the only explanation. Added to that, a message came a little while ago. It’s addressed to you, by name, and so I didn’t like to open it, not with you coming back today.”

“In my absence, Souja, you are in charge here. Things like this are for you to handle,” Hirata reminded him, nevertheless taking the crumpled piece of paper his son held out to him. Picking up his glasses and returning them to their perch atop his nose, he turned the offending article over in his hands to examine the name across the front. It was written in cheap town ink, much like that which could be bought at market stalls across the length and breadth of Soul Society, and though the characters that made up his name were written in a neat and well-schooled hand, they were not distinctive in any particular way. Running his gaze over them, Hirata could not tell if they had been penned by a man or a woman, and as he turned it back to unfasten it, he realised that the seal was unmarked, giving no clue as to its place of origin.

“Very suspicious,” he murmured, more than half to himself, sliding his nail beneath the crude wax fastening and unfolding the sheet, smoothing it out across the desk. “The other divisions also received notes in this manner?”

“So I’ve been led to believe,” Souja agreed. “To be honest, it was a relief when it arrived. The other Divisions had notes far more quickly, and I was starting to fear for Tenichi’s life.”

“Hrm,” Hirata’s brows knitted together. “Well, if the others were returned safely on payment of a ransom, I suppose whoever’s involved hasn’t graduated to slaughter for gain yet. That’s something to be grateful for. I...”

He paused, his words trailing away into nothing as his attention was caught by the body of the letter, and his lips thinned, his jaw tightening as he re-read the paragraph over a second time.

“Otousama?” Souja’s words held a note of anxiety, and Hirata lowered the sheet, glancing at his son.

“The other squads, which did you say they were?”

“I don’t know that I did, but it was Eleventh and Ninth, sir,” Souja looked startled at the suddenness of this question.

“And the nature of the ransom?”

“Menial supplies. Food. Water. Materials for rebuilding shattered houses — things of that nature,” Souja’s brow creased in confusion. “Why?”

“Eleventh and Ninth,” Hirata pressed his lips together. “Eleventh are notorious for shirking their community duties, because Minachi doesn’t approve of the Districts in any way, shape or form. He’s never forgiven Juushirou for... well, in any case, he’s never paid them much heed. Ninth... I imagine that Anabomi-dono decided to cut some corners because his workload was over capacity, and this was the result. In both cases, someone was paying attention and exacted their punishments according to the crime... correct?”

“Yes, sir,” Souja nodded, looking non-plussed. “I don’t understand, though, what you...”

“The Endou haven’t committed the same crime as the other divisions,” Hirata sighed, holding out the sheet to his son and gesturing for him to read it. “It seems whoever is behind this is both knowledgeable and dangerously clever. They don’t want supplies from us, Souja. Read it. Read it aloud. They want something else.”

“Endou Hirata-dono, Respected Captain of the Seventh Division, greetings,” he began slowly. “In respect to your seated officer, Kotetsu Tenichi, he is in our custody. He has not been harmed, nor is his life in imminent danger, however, if you wish to have him swiftly and safely returned to you, we would ask you to enter into a trade.”

He glanced up.

“Keep reading,” Hirata pressed his fingers to his brow, feeling the start of a dull headache beginning to spread beneath the skull.

“The terms of the exchange are as follows. It is our belief that you have in your employ members of an underground group known as the ‘Kitsune’. In return for the safe return of your squad member, we wish to know the current location of these Kitsune, and their active operations. This is not negotiable. We will give you forty-eight hours in which to respond. Failure to comply will result in further consequences.”

He took a deep breath into his lungs, and Hirata nodded, absorbing the ashen shade of his son’s cheeks.

“The Kitsune?” Souja whispered, as the silence threatened to envelop them both. “But... who would want...”

“Who indeed,” Hirata said grimly, grabbing the parchment and scrunching it between his fingers as he fought to quell the hunter’s instinct that swelled with indignation inside him. “Before we can take any kind of action, Souja, we need to answer that very question. Who would want to find the Kitsune, and more significantly, why?”

He got to his feet, reaching for his cloak once more.

“Take charge here, and say nothing to your sister, not yet,” he instructed brusquely, ignoring the look of alarm that passed over his son’s features. “There are few even among the Gotei who know the Kitsune exist, and I need to get to the bottom of this at once. We have little time indeed to secure Tenichi's return, but the whereabouts of loyal agents is not on the bartering table. I need to think this out... and I can't do that here."

"But... where are you going?" Souja asked apprehensively. "The squad will be expecting you, and..."

"Time is of the essence, so they'll have to wait," Hirata said grimly. "I don't mean to sacrifice one of my men if it can be avoided. I'm going to Thirteenth Division — any urgent messages can be forwarded there. Oh, and Souja? I suppose you've been in communication with Joumei since Tenichi disappeared?"

"I have," Souja chewed on his lip. "I sent a Hell Butterfly as soon as I'd done de-briefing Kikyue, and I got a response just before dawn the next morning. He couldn't tell me very much, though. Whoever's behind these abductions, it doesn't seem to have crossed their territory."

"Then the best thing you can do is send another message and tell him to keep his — and everyone else's — heads down for a while," Hirata responded flatly. "They're used to that, so they'll manage it — but under no circumstances are you to go into Kitsune territory, not without my say-so. Understood?"

"I promise," Souja nodded earnestly, his fingers already moving together to sculpt the blue-black insect. "I'll do as you say."

"Good. Then tell Kikyue and the others I'll see them later," Hirata flung the cloak back around his shoulders, fastening the badge a second time at his throat. "I don't know how long I'll be or how late I'll be back, so continue without me. I'll see you when I do."

Souja hesitated for a moment, then, at length, he bowed his head.

"Yes, Father," he said softly. "I trust that when that happens, we'll have better news to discuss."

The sun was beginning to drop in the sky over Hokutan by the time Mitsuki and her enigmatic companion reached the network of small settlements on the path to the shinigami encampment. As she walked between the rows of charred, abandoned ruins, Mitsuki felt her heart clench in her chest, remembering the terror and panic that had flooded the valley the night the Hollow had struck. There were no souls here now, for even the injured they had tended to would have been relocated, and the ashes of the village were a forlorn reminder of how difficult it still was to police a peaceful Rukongai.

Only three districts, and we still can't match up to what the enemy throws at us.

Mitsuki stole a glance at Seri, eying her pale complexion with concern. Her friend was still alive, for she could feel the dull thrumming of her comrade's pulse weakly resonating against her senses, but she knew that there was no guarantee that Seri's life had been saved. Yuuyugo's hilt still hung at her waist, bereft of its blade, and Mitsuki knew it had taken a lot more of her strength than she was used to using to repair the savagery of Seri's internal wounds. Although she could feel faint tendrils of the blade's energy beginning to seek each other out once more, she knew it might take twenty four hours or even longer to fully regenerate the missing spirit power in Rukongai's sterile atmosphere, and she still had to find a way to report to Madeki that two of their squad had died.

She was exhausted, for the walk was not a short one, yet somehow she kept putting one foot in front of the other. Her companion had kept to her pace, seeming to understand without asking that she was approaching the end of her tether, and secretly Mitsuki was grateful to him for his unspoken consideration. They had talked a little, exchanging random snippets of meaningless small-talk, but soon enough both had sunk into silence, Mitsuki focusing all her strength on putting one foot in front of the other.

What he was thinking, she didn't know, but as she stumbled against a protruding stone in the pathway, a black-covered hand shot out from beneath the heavy cloak, grabbing her around the arm and righting her before she could tumble over. She shot him a startled glance, disconcerted by his swift reaction, but he just grinned at her, a disarming, open grin that put her off her guard.

Who was he? Why was he here? Mitsuki had a thousand questions, but all of them stuck in her throat. Whoever he was, he had come to her aid, and more frightening than walking the wilderness with a nameless stranger was the idea of trying to make it back to base camp alone. The aftershock of Haseyo and Kazuki's deaths still ricocheted at intervals around her shattered consciousness, and she found herself glad of the distraction, using the silence to puzzle out what little she knew about the man who had come to her rescue.

He was not a shinigami. He'd said as much, with an edge to his words, and Mitsuki could tell from his aura that it was true — he didn't have a spirit sword, for there was no second consciousness vibrating in harmony with his own. He had claimed to come from Rukongai, but Mitsuki was sceptical. Though she had met souls with tainted spirit power, she had never encountered a Plus soul who had been able to confront and face down a Hollow, much less destroy it without any visible weaponry. No, more likely he had come from Seireitei. Why he was in the Spiritless Zone, well, that she couldn't explain. How old did she think he was?

She shot him another surreptitious glance. Young, she thought. Perhaps in his twenties, but it was difficult to be sure. Had he escaped from some provincial prison in the Districts using his uncommon spirit power and then, somehow, managed to slip into Rukongai in search of sanctuary against his pursuers? She narrowed her gaze, trying to work out if he looked like an escaped criminal. He was clean-shaven, she realised, with pleasant, easy-going features that somehow struck her as vaguely familiar. Had they met before? Mitsuki discarded this thought almost as soon as it had come, for she had been in Rukongai for more than two decades, longer, probably, than this man had been alive. Still, though, there was something reassuringly commonplace about his appearance. His eyes were dark, and at first glance Mitsuki had thought them brown, but under closer scrutiny, she thought they might be a very dark blue. His complexion was fair, as fair as her own, and unruly black hair fell in uneven waves around his face, ostensibly tied back by a rough ribbon but in reality more of the dark mane was outside of the tie than still within it. From throat to foot he was clothed in black, the fabric cheap and unremarkable in either the weave or the cut, and completely devoid of any emblem that might disclose his District of origin. Her gaze strayed to his obi, but there was no sign of any weapon, not even a basic knife with which to cut food. He carried no belongings, and if she hadn't known better, Mitsuki would have been tempted to believe he just wandered into the Spiritless Zone on a random whim to see the sights.

"About the Hollow," at length she broke the silence, fixing him with a probing glance.

"Mm?" her companion seemed startled by her sudden return to conversation, but he smiled, tilting his head so that he could see her more clearly around Seri's limp body. "What about it?"

"What... how... exactly did you kill it?"

"Oh," he pursed his lips, a fleeting moment of what might have been consternation crossing his gaze. "I don't know, really. I mean, if it has a name, I don't know what it might be. I just acted on impulse... it's never gone quite like that before."

He cast her another disarming grin, lifting Seri more firmly in his arms and shrugging his shoulders.

“I have spirit power. No point in pretending otherwise,” he said flippantly. “If I really focus, I can bring that power together and do stuff with it. It’s nothing as impressive as you shinigami people are meant to do — no bright colours or fancy explosions — but if I concentrate very hard, I can repel the Hollows and defend myself. This time I had double the incentive, though, so it worked twice as well.”

He winked at her, and despite herself, Mitsuki offered him a wry smile.

“Do you think that flirting with someone when you’re carrying her wounded friend, covered in blood and returning from a scene of carnage is a good plan of action?”

“It lightens the mood,” her companion seemed unperturbed. “You’re tired, and you’re worried about what to tell your squad captain, aren’t you? I’m trying to take your mind off it — that, and mine off what kind of reception I might get, if any of your companions should see me.”

He bit his lip, and Mitsuki frowned.

“You’ll be fine. I’ll tell them you saved my life — Seri’s too, as it happens,” she promised. “Buchou is strict but he’s fair. He’ll listen.”

“Mm,” the young man murmured noncommittally, and Mitsuki could tell he wasn’t convinced.

“You’re... not wanted for anything in Seireitei, are you?” she asked hesitantly, and he stared at her, then burst out laughing.

“Oh, good grief, is that what you think?” he demanded, clearly amused.

“I don’t know,” Mitsuki flushed, feeling suddenly awkward in the face of his obvious mirth. “You won’t tell me your name, and you’re worried about meeting up with shinigami, as though you’ve got something to hide. You’re in a place you shouldn’t be, and yes, I owe that fact my life, but...”

“Believe me, Mitsuki, you have nothing to worry about,” her companion told her dryly. “You should be focusing on finding your camp, not interrogating me about things that don’t matter.”

“That’s another thing,” Mitsuki remarked, nonetheless turning her gaze back on the landscape, looking for particular landmarks with which to guide them to their target. “I don’t remember giving you permission to call me Mitsuki. I’m pretty sure I’m older than you — and we’ve just met. If you won’t give me your name, you could at least remember your honorifics.”

“Are you fussy about things like that?” He looked taken aback, and Mitsuki shrugged.

“It depends,” she said matter-of-factly. “I don’t know anything about you, so in those circumstances, intimate name sharing isn’t exactly appropriate.”

“Putting space between us,” her companion let out a mock sigh, then, “I see. All right. I’m sorry, Mitsuki-san. I didn’t mean to offend your sensibilities.”

He grinned at her wickedly.

“As for my name, why don’t you try to guess?” he challenged her. “I’ll give you a clue. It’s somewhere in this forest — at least, most probably.”

“If you guess right, I promise I’ll tell you,” he said solemnly. “There, does that sound like a fair deal to you?”

“Not really,” Mitsuki pulled a face. “There are hundreds of things in this forest. Grass. Trees. Animals. Flowers. If I went through every one of them, we’d be here all day and all night, too.”

“But it’s stopped you moping over your friends a little, so play along with me,” came the unrepentant response. “Otherwise I’ll start asking you questions — such as, why would someone who cares so much about the ordinary folk here in Rukongai choose to take up arms and fight as a shinigami?”

“As you already saw, I’m not really much of a fighter,” Mitsuki pulled a graphic face. “My skills are healing ones, mostly. My Kidou isn’t bad. I’m not confident holding a sword, though — that’s never been my forte.”

“You sure you should tell me that?” the young man arched an eyebrow. “I’m a stranger whose name you can’t guess, remember? I might be anyone or anything.”

“If you were waiting to ambush me, you’d have to be pretty slow on the tactical update,” Mitsuki said matter-of-factly. “I was unconscious for a good while after tackling that Hollow, and you could’ve finished me then. You keep trying to make me afraid of you, but I’m not. Even without a name, I guess you’re just not that intimidating. Sorry if that disappoints.”

“You know, I think you have a mischievous streak underneath all that wanting to help people,” her companion eyed her thoughtfully, and Mitsuki’s lips twitched into a smile.

“Maybe I do,” she reflected. ‘Perhaps it’s the Kuchiki blood. I’m not always like other healers, and... what?’ as she noted the look of dismay that suddenly crossed the stranger’s face. “What is it? What’s wrong?”

“You...’re a Kuchiki?” the words were soft-spoken, even and level yet Mitsuki could tell that he was working hard to keep them that way. She nodded her head, confused.

“By birth, yes, though I’ve been in Rukongai so long I’m sure most of the Clan don’t even remember me,” she agreed. “Why? Does that scare you?”

“Scare me?” her companion let out a low, humourless laugh. “The most powerful, terrifying group of rich folk with swords happen to be your family. No, why on earth should I be scared? A big, brave soul like me? Surely not.”

“Now I know you’re from Seireitei,” Mitsuki reflected. “Rukongai people don’t know much about Clans, let alone the individual names of them and their standing.”

“You can pretend if you like, I don’t mind,” Mitsuki cut across him. “For now, though, we’ve...”

She faltered, her brows twitching together in sudden alarm as something murky and distorted filtered through her healer’s senses. To begin with, she couldn’t place it, then her eyes widened with dismay as she realised it was a distress call, a flaring of reiatsu by something or someone too broken and damaged to properly form their words.

The signal was damaged, yet Mitsuki’s wits had honed onto it now, and, her companion and Seri momentarily forgotten, she hurried forward towards the camp perimeter.

“Buchou!”

Caution thrown to the wind, she almost tripped over the legs of the first dead sentry before she saw him, leaping back as though stung as she rested her eyes on his greyish, blood-spattered features. His expression was one of surprise and fear, and Mitsuki swallowed the bile in her throat, bending to touch her fingers to his neck automatically without any hope of finding life. His body was still warm, though cooling, and Mitsuki estimated he had died about half an hour earlier — no more, for his corpse had not yet begun to stiffen and the blood that soaked his uniform was still damp to the touch.

He had been killed, and she had not known about it. Although her spiritual senses spanned far and wide, too much open, spiritless space had been between her and her squad-mates, and so when he had been cut down, she had been teasing her companion on their walk here. She had not known... not felt it...

Before she could remonstrate with herself too greatly, she saw a dark stain across the other side of the grass. Heart in her throat, she made her way towards it, disbelief and horror flaring within her as she laid eyes on the second of her dead companions. This one had met a gorier end, throat slashed and body crumpled on the ground like discarded litter, and she took a step back, shaking her head.

“No...”

His voice made her jump, and she turned, seeing her unknown companion standing a short distance behind her, his gaze clouded as he surveyed the dead shinigami.

“You knew this was going to happen,” Mitsuki’s words were numb. “You warned me... you said they were in danger. If I’d hurried... if I’d dallied less...”

“This isn’t your fault.” His words were soft, as though trying to soothe her, but Mitsuki was beyond soothing right then. Her eyes had caught sight of something on the ground, something covered in black cloth, a torn white trail of what might have been an obi stretched out like a signal against the grass. As she hastened towards it, she saw an arm move, twitching clumsily before falling back against the earth in defeat.

Even without that, though, Mitsuki knew this one was alive.

“Buchou!” She hurried down at his side, fingers already glittering with healing energy as she checked her superior officer over for cuts or bruises. He was barely breathing, she realised, his pulse sluggish and heavy, but there was no sign of savagery on his body and, though his sword was drawn, his shihakushou remained clean and intact. Pulling back his eyelids, Mitsuki soon saw the cause of the man’s unresponsiveness. Houten-yaku.

And a considerable dose, too.

Mitsuki spread her hands over his chest, closing her eyes to focus what little spiritual energy she had left on neutralising the anaesthetic. Madeki's spirit power was strong and his will to live obstinate, yet still she could not be sure she would not lose him, pouring more and more of her reiryoku into her spell until she had no more magic left to give. Trembling with exertion and the after-effects of the shock, she sat back on her heels, pressing her hand to his chest and feeling with giddy relief that his pulse had steadied, his breathing both even and deep as he slipped into a proper slumber. He would probably not wake for a while, but he was alive, and, as far as Mitsuki could tell, he would recover.

She turned to speak to her mysterious companion, but there was no sign of him, and she frowned, pulling herself unsteadily to her feet as she glanced around the dishevelled campsite. A scene of carnage and devastation greeted her, the scent of blood pungent and overpowering, and as she cautiously unfurled her senses, she realised what was wrong with the whole picture.

There was nobody there.

Not her rescuer, not her squadmates, nobody. At her feet, her squad captain's heart still beat, and from somewhere not too far away, she could feel the reassuring rhythm of Seri's life force, resolutely clinging onto life despite the depth of her injuries. Aside from them, though, she was alone.

Her gaze flitted towards the tent, eying the brownish stains that had begun to spread across the white cloth, and she bit her lip. Something killed them. Something horrible... just like Haseyo and Kazuki. Whatever it was was powerful enough to take out my team.

She struggled forwards, gripping hold of the torn tent cloth and pulling it back to reveal the scene of slaughter inside. Her knees buckled at the sight, but the faint scent of scattered anaesthetic powder made her back away, taking deep breaths of fresh air as she fought to calm herself down.

Madeki was unconscious, Seri was wounded and everyone else was dead.

Her heart spasmed, skipping at least three beats before starting up on its normal rhythm once more.

I have to contact Seireitei.

Mitsuki's hands trembled as she fumbled at Madeki's belt, inwardly saying an apology to her squad captain for taking such liberties with his clothing. At last she found what she was looking for, the Seireitei transmitter that he never moved anywhere without.

I have to speak to Retsu-sama. I have to... I have to...

She cast one last glance around her for any sign of her enigmatic rescuer, but he was nowhere to be seen. Seri's huddled form lay beneath the tree where she had found the first victim of the massacre, and as she moved to her friend's side, Mitsuki realised that the young man had laid his burden down gently and securely before fleeing the scene.

I suppose I see his logic. If he was found here, a stranger and maybe a wanted Seireitei escapee, it would look bad.

Mitsuki ran her fingers over the transmitter, using her free hand to brush Seri's thick hair from out of her face.

It's up to me to get help, now. If there's only me, then that's what I need to do. Buchou left me in charge, so with him incapacitated, I have to call Seireitei and get help for him and for Seri. Whatever it was might come back... and it will soon be night.

She shivered at the thought, half-wishing the young stranger was still there to keep her company.

They'll come. When they know, they'll come at once, and then it'll be all right. They'll come and get us... they must.

Chapter Eight is short, so while I'm home I'm going to upload nine with it as well...

10. The Hidden Hut

Chapter Nine: The Hidden Hut

Rukongai was cold when the sun began to set.

Tenichi stifled a shiver, pulling the thin fabric of his shihakushou more tightly to his body in a vain attempt to shield his body from the sharp wind that had begun to pick up around the dusty tracks and pathways that surrounded him on all sides. For once, he was on his own, for the ever-attentive yet disinterested Koku had been summoned away on some other errand, and he had taken advantage of that fact to explore his surroundings, really taking in for himself the barren wasteland to which he had been forcibly brought.

The longer he was here, the less he felt like he had been abducted by force. Though he was still highly wary of Keitarou and his motives, he could not deny the truth of the poverty every way he looked. Houses with missing beams, roofs broken and decaying, dry pools and dying trees hanging like skeletal reminders of a once prosperous landscape. Though he had never been to Rukongai before, he had never thought that conditions on the other side of the Sekkiseki divide could be so wretched. Seireitei had spent so much time working on ways and means to improve the situation of the hundreds of thousands of Plus souls that apparently made their homes here — yet despite that, it was clear this area had long since been forgotten or ignored.

Had it been an oversight, or was it on purpose? Tenichi frowned, bringing his lips together tightly as he debated both trains of thought carefully to himself. He was not ignorant or naive enough to believe that all of the Seireitei Clans cared overly about the fates of those not directly in front of their noses, and he had been old enough when his family had been sent into exile to recall the long trudges knee deep in mud through frozen rainstorms and whirling winds, holding tightly to one another in fear of being separated. He remembered only too vividly walking with his eyes closed to prevent the dust and debris from the pathway blowing up and scratching at his eyeballs, and as he stood there, watching the sandy earth swirl a little on the path before him, he knew that it was a memory people in this forsaken hole might also share.

But, for them, it wouldn't end with refuge. Tenichi's family had been able to settle in District Eight and had forged a life for themselves, despite the hardships they faced. They had stuck together through everything, because they had all believed wholeheartedly that better times were to come. When Tenichi had applied and been accepted to the Shinigami Academy that was the crowning achievement of District One's most illustrious noble shinigami, those days seemed to have arrived. Ketsui had quickly followed him as soon as age and ability had allowed, and now both of them lived lives that, during their time as refugees they could only have imagined. Food was available, water too, as was the warm camaraderie of other like minded individuals with whom they shared their day.

I told Koku I hadn't forgotten what it was like to be a refugee, but maybe I have, just a little. I remember the images, but standing here, I begin to really feel it, too.

A sense of loneliness wrapped itself around his heart and he shivered, forcing it away. Keitarou had promised to release him, he reminded himself. Koku had agreed to raise the subject, too, and he wasn't fool enough to suppose they wanted him in their territory long-term. Although, he reflected, gazing up at the grey, colourless sky for any sign of either sun or moon, the more he saw of Rukongai, the more risky their gamble of bringing him here.

I could promise not to talk, and then go back and tell my Captain everything. They haven't hidden anything from me — Koku I know by face and name, and there's also Kurotsuchi, who I haven't met but whose name I could also pass on. I know where Keitarou's base of operations is, and even though I don't know precisely where I am in Rukongai, I'm sure there can't be too many valleys so utterly overlooked. It would only take one word to the right person, and then...

But what would happen to these people, then?

A soft, nagging voice poked at his thoughts, making him jump and spin around as if to see a real speaker. Even as he did, though, he knew that the voice was in his head, the gentle, reproachful tones of his long dead mother reminding him once again of the struggle she had faced to keep both her sons alive and well. As he thought of her, another memory drifted across his thoughts — one of Daisuke, dusty from a long day's research work, yet greeting them with smiles and hugs and asking them what they had done that day. Keitarou had been with him that day, he recalled with a jolt. He had brought fruit from the Endou manor, and had shared it with the children, though Irie had scolded him for taking a risk and stealing from the men who fed and clothed them all. Keitarou had dismissed her concern with amusement, his muddy-brown eyes light and amused at the suggestion of being caught, and as he relived those fleeting fragments of a past life, Tenichi remembered a feeling of security and reassurance. He hadn't known, then, what his family were involved in or how dangerous their lives would become. Back then, he had been a child who had trusted in the adults around him — and one of those adults had been Keitarou.

The man who tested me on my kanji, and who always answered my questions about the things I'd seen in the village, if he was able to do so. The man who knew why trees bloomed in spring and shed leaves in autumn — and who bothered to explain to me how the birds built their nests and why the egg-shells scattered around our home were different colours depending on where I found them. He didn't come often, not often at all, but when he did...

He frowned, rubbing his temples.

That man became this man... because of Father? Because Father was murdered, Keitarou-san took revenge on the Endou and it spiralled into how things are now? But Keitarou-san hasn't come to this point unscathed, either. He moves stiffly. Perhaps whatever injury caused that lameness is part of the reason he now chooses to remain here, limiting his vigilante actions to protecting those who helped support him when he needed it most. Maybe the vengeance and spite is behind him. If I were to report this in, they'd come here in force. Raid the place. Probably people would be hurt. Maybe people who are already living in terrible conditions... and who would protect them, then? There'd be bloodshed — maybe on both sides. No. No, it's better this way. If I can do something to get supplies here in secret, then nobody need get killed on either side and everything can continue peacefully.

A rustle from the pathway ahead drew him from his thoughts and he paused, raising his head to see a dark-clad shape shift behind a nearby building. Immediately on his guard, Tenichi hastened forward, only just remembering at the last minute that his spirit power was sealed and he would not be able to use shunpo to give chase. He darted behind the building, not sure what he expected to see. A young woman was standing there, fear etched on her thin features as she stared at him uncertainly. At first, Tenichi could not work out why she had not fled, but then he caught sight of her foot, misshapen and deformed at the ankle, and he realised the odd rustling sound had been her shuffling gait, moving the only way she could between solid structures and using them as her support.

He offered her a smile, but she continued to stare at him, taking a limping step back to put distance between them. Tenichi glanced down, noticing that his fingers had curled instinctively around the hilt of his weapon, and he inwardly berated himself, pulling his hand away and raising it in the air to indicate he had no intention of attacking.

"I didn't mean to scare you," he said quietly. "You surprised me too, but I'm not going to hurt you."

The girl continued to stare at him, and Tenichi noticed the heavy bucket clasped defensively in her arms.

"You're going to find water." It was a statement, not a question, and slowly and jerkily the woman nodded her head.

"There's no water around here, though," Tenichi glanced around him, seeing nothing but dry tracks, and the woman's lips trembled, but she made no attempt to speak.

"You'll have to walk a long way to find any, won't you?" Tenichi's voice softened, as inwardly he made up his mind. "Will you let me help you? I really didn't mean to hurt you, and... wait!"

As the woman tossed the bucket in his direction as a distraction, limping desperately towards the break between the next two shelters. The vessel clanged against exposed stone, and Tenichi scooped it up, hurrying forward to grasp the woman loosely around the wrist. She struggled against his hold, her fear clearly reflected in her eyes, but Tenichi merely steadied her on her feet, releasing his grip and holding the vessel out towards her.

"Keitarou-san brought me to Rukongai. He wants me to help you, and I want to help, too," he said evenly. "My name is Tenichi. Kotetsu Tenichi."

More silence.

"You don't have to tell me your name," Tenichi assured her quickly. "I told you mine so that you know who I am, and why I'm here. My father Daisuke was Keitarou-san's cousin, and so he and I are kin. You trust Keitarou-san, don't you? In that case, you can ask him about me yourself. Ask him why I've come here — he'll tell you the same as I just have."

The woman eyed him uncertainly, but at the mention of the name Keitarou, some of the tension had slipped from her skinny body, and she nodded her head.

"Natsuko," she said softly, her voice barely above a murmur. "I've seen you... with Koku-dono. By the... by the river."

"Yes, that's right," Tenichi nodded eagerly. 'I was with Koku, and also with Keitarou-san. You believe me, don't you? I know I'm dressed like this,' he gestured to his grimy shihakushou, "but even though I have a sword, I'm not here to hurt you. I learned to hold this to protect people — people like you and people like my kin back in Seireitei. I would never draw my sword on an innocent soul."

He bowed his head towards her sombrely.

"I'm pleased to meet you, Natsuko-san," he added. "Will you let me help you find water? It's a long walk, and your foot... it looks quite sore."

"It's always been this way," Natsuko glanced dispassionately at her leg, then shrugged. "I don't know why. I don't remember. It was from before... when I came here, it was like that."

From the Real World?

Despite himself, Tenichi's curiosity piqued. He had never spoken to a proper Plus soul before — an entity from the Real World who had been reaped to Seireitei space yet who did not fully belong in this world. A place-marker soul, bringing reishi back to Seireitei before dissipating into dust and reforming to provide new life and stability. In his studies at the Academy, Tenichi had learned that some Plus souls endured for a century or more without any reiatsu to speak of, but he recalled Keitarou telling him that the souls here were contaminated — tainted with spirit power and therefore gifted or cursed with a lifespan that could potentially equal his own.

"There's water underground," Natsuko was speaking again, clearly having no interest in the past she could not remember, and Tenichi turned his attention back to the conversation, not wanting to unsettle the woman by asking her awkward questions. "Sometimes, people manage to dig through to it. There's not much, and it's deep, but it's here. Yesterday, someone from the village broke a rock and water came from it. It's near here. I want to find it."

"I'll help," Tenichi decided. "I might be able to split the rock better with my sword — we can try, at least."

"I suppose so," Natsuko looked doubtful. "Don't you want the water, though?"

"I'm fine," Tenichi dismissed her concern with a flick of his hand. "I won't steal it from you, Natsuko-san. Keitarou-san wouldn't like it if I did that — and he might not be so keen to let me linger around here, if I was bullying you all."

"Keitarou-sama would not," Natsuko said with certainty, "and Eiraki-sama would curse you and hunt you down herself."

She laughed, a strange, brittle laugh, and Tenichi felt a chill at the implied threat in her words. Almost certainly it was not a threat from the woman herself but something she was repeating, something she had heard, something she had been told...

Eiraki-hime, the sister of my Captain who took off with Keitarou-san and abandoned the Endou. The stories say she was the one who killed Guren-sama's son and heir in cold blood before she was even an adult. Perhaps she's more frightening a prospect than Keitarou-san. If she spoke those words...

Out loud he said,

"Eiraki-sama is protective of you all, isn't she?"

"She is kind to us, yes," Natsuko's smile became a touch more genuine and she nodded, her hard eyes softening slightly. "She always has been. Well, and so it should be. We're kind to her, too. She's like one of us, except strong in ways most of us are not. She wouldn't allow anyone to hurt us — she'd slit their throats first."

"Well, it's a good thing I don't want to do harm, then," Tenichi said ruefully. "I've no intention of crossing Eiraki-sama, believe me."

"I do," Natsuko agreed slowly. "All right. I'll show you where the water reserve is. If you help me, I'll tell Eiraki-sama, and then she'll look well on you. Is that fair?"

"Yes, that's fair," Tenichi confirmed. "Can you manage to walk there, or..."

"It's the only way to get around, so I'll manage," Natsuko said simply, turning awkwardly on her good leg and beginning to shuffle off towards a narrow pathway that led towards the centre of a crop of long-dead trees. "If you can't move, you can't survive."

"Even with Keitarou-sama and Eiraki-sama's help, it's hard, isn't it? Living here." Tenichi fell into step with her, walking at a pace so slow it chafed him, but forcing him to keep alongside his companion so as not to demean her determination. Natsuko sighed, looking weary, and Tenichi wondered briefly if she was older than she had first appeared.

"There are so many of us, and more all the time," she reflected. "There are so few of them. Of course it's hard."

"I guess that was a stupid question," Tenichi acknowledged. "I'm sorry. I'm learning about it all the time — I haven't spent a lot of time in Rukongai, not yet, but I do want to help. When I go back to where I come from, I need to know what I can do to help make life better here."

“You probably can’t,” Natsuko said frankly, “but... at least you want to try.”

She offered him a faint smile.

“Shinigami aren’t usually so helpful when we’re like this,” she added, “but if Keitarou-sama brought you here, and you’re kin to him, I guess you’re different.”

She limped to a stop, gesturing towards a cluster of rocks just beyond a dip in the road, and Tenichi’s gaze strayed to where she pointed, his eyes narrowing as he tried to make out what was the tiniest trickle of muddy brown water between the two jagged fragments of grey stone.

“There?” he asked, and Natsuko nodded.

“Can you split it further?” she asked doubtfully, and Tenichi nodded, pulling his weapon from its hilt and stepping forward to examine the problem more closely. As he did so, he caught a glimpse of a pathway just beyond where they had halted, half-hidden by a thicket of what must once have been thriving bush and shrub but what was now a skeleton of white-bleached sticks intertwined together like a natural fence, sharp and splintered and warning people against approaching. A tiny gap between the thicket and the wall of a nearby ruined shack indicated that access was there, but as Tenichi tried to work out what lay beyond, he felt a hand on his arm.

“You can’t go there,” Natsuko’s voice was barely above a murmur, and, glancing at her, Tenichi saw apprehension in her tired eyes. “Even if you are here because Keitarou-sama brought you... we don’t go through there. None of us do. It’s not allowed.”

Natsuko hesitated, glancing around her, then shaking her head.

“We don’t go there,” she repeated. “You mustn’t either. Keitarou-sama would be cross. We’re not supposed to disturb him... we’re not allowed.”

“Him?” Tenichi latched onto this, and horror flooded Natsuko’s gaze. Her hands flew to her mouth, and she visibly paled, realising she had let something slip. Tenichi sighed, gently patting her shoulder.

“I won’t tell Keitarou-san you said anything. I promise,” he said softly. “I just want to know what’s dangerous. I want to keep safe while I’m here, so it’s important I know... isn’t it?”

Natsuko eyed him uncertainly, then,

“You promise not to tell?” she asked anxiously. “We’re not supposed to... especially not to people from outside.”

“People from outside have been here before?”

“Mm. When this place was evacuated, they came,” Natsuko agreed bitterly. “We didn’t tell them, though. We never tell them. I shouldn’t tell you, either. You’re from outside, even if you are Keitarou-sama’s kin.”

“Natsuko, if you don’t tell me, I’ll have to ask Keitarou-san,” Tenichi said sensibly, and Natsuko shook her head frantically.

“No! No, please don’t! He’ll be cross — we’re not allowed to...”

“Then you tell me?” Tenichi beseeched. “What’s beyond those briars? What’s so dangerous it needs to be avoided at all costs?”

Natsuko looked uncomfortable, but slowly she inclined her head.

“Not what. Who,” she whispered, her eyes darting around her all the time as if looking for unseen eavesdroppers. “That’s where he is. Kohaku-sama. He’s there.”

“Ko... haku-sama?”

“Mm,” Natsuko nodded agitatedly. “We’re not to disturb him. It’s bad, if we do. Sometimes there are screams... Keitarou-san told us... stay away, because if we don’t... bad things could happen.”

She swallowed hard.

“Once, when there were really loud screams from that place, a man went to see what was happening,” she whispered, eyes huge now as she recounted the story. “When we found him, he was wandering around the place, gibbering to himself about things that made no sense. If anyone went near him, he started yelling and fighting against them. It was like he’d gone crazy — jerking and foaming at the mouth and yelling curses. Then... then he died... and... and Keitarou-san told us that we should stay away from that place, just in case.”

“No... no, we haven’t,” Natsuko agreed nervously. “We’ve heard him, but not seen him. Keitarou-san said he didn’t want anyone else hurt, and so we stay away. The man who died, Keitarou-san was worried by it. He made us all promise one by one, and we did. We swore. Nobody’s crossed the boundary since.”

“Does Keitarou-sama?”

“Sometimes,” Natsuko agreed. “But not often, not these days. The screams come less, too. We try to forget it. It’s nothing to do with us.”

She inched towards the water source, eying him with pleading eyes.

“The water, Tenichi-dono. Please.”

“Yes. Yes, of course,” Tenichi cast the dim pathway a final glance, then nodded, tightening his grip on the sword and turning his attention back to the task at hand. “I’m sorry to have put you so on edge, Natsuko-san. I won’t go there, and I won’t ask again. I appreciate the warning... now I’ll repay it by getting you some water.”

He crouched to his knees, putting his weight behind the hilt of his zanpakutou as he used the blade like a chisel to split the rock apart, allowing the thin trickle of water to gush into a small pool around his feet. Natsuko let out an exclamation, hurrying to catch the water in her tarnished vessel, but all the time Tenichi was working, his mind was on the woman’s story and the genuine fear he had seen in her eyes.

Kohaku-sama... huh?

He pressed his lips together.

That wasn’t part of what Keitarou-san mentioned to me. I wonder what... or who... is through those briars. I thought I could just make out the walls of a hut — but if there’s something in it, with my spirit power cuffed, I can’t sense anything at all. Whoever it is, obviously they pose some danger to Plus souls, and so Keitarou’s kept them away. To protect them? In which case, why keep something like that so close to them? Unless it’s one of them — a Plus soul so tainted that it can taint others and drive them to madness.

A shiver ran down his spine at the thought.

When I get a chance, I’ll try and ask Keitarou-san about this. I want to see his reaction — I’m sure I can find out without implicating Natsuko or getting anyone into trouble. The way she talked makes me think something really dangerous is lurking in this valley, and if I’m here, I need to know what it is. It’s risky... especially since I want to go back to Seireitei and get on with my life. The more I know, the more dangerous it becomes — Koku was right about that and I ought to listen, but some questions need answering no matter what the risks might be. I’m a hostage in a place nobody’s going to rescue me, and I have to look out for my own safety. That means knowing the risks of this environment, since I don’t know when I might be leaving.

My priority is getting back to Seireitei alive. Anything else can happen from that point on.

Juushirou pulled his blankets more tightly around his shoulders, gritting his teeth in frustration as a shiver ran through his thin body. “I’ve been fine for such a span of time together, and now, when everything is starting to kick off, this happens.”

He glared mutinously at the blue fabric pouch that lay on the floor beside him, faint dribbles of clear liquid soaking through to the tatami mat floor as the ice gathered by one of his lower ranking officers began to melt in the warmth within Ugendou’s four walls. On the floor, scattered around him were a number of books, some from his own shelves and others from the division’s substantial, if compact library chamber, but all had been discarded barely read. A fresh ink brush lay beside the ink tray on his desk, but the parchment that lay there was clean and white, testament to the fact very little of purpose had been done in that room that day.

The tension, however, was moving ever closer to boiling point.

It was the same day, afternoon shifting towards evening deep within Thirteenth Division, and all around the bustling barracks shinigami were getting on with their late tasks, each hoping to scrape together a few spare minutes in which to enjoy themselves after work hours were done. All, that is, except for the Captain. Holed up in Ugendou since waking at dawn with one of his persistent, chronic fevers, Juushirou was about reaching the end of his patience tether, and even the fresh icepack that Kirio had brought him a half hour earlier had gone little way to soothe the heat of his frustrated temper. Though he had lived with the lung condition haibyou all his life, he had never quite resigned himself to the times when the disease had the upper hand over his frail body, and, as most who knew him could testify, whilst he might be a great Captain, he was a horrendously poor patient.

“You poor soul,” from the doorway, Shunsui cast him an amused smile, lounging up against the wooden runners as he surveyed his friend. ‘I had come here with the hope of discussing some of that annoying “everything’ with you, but from the looks, I’d do better putting it on hold and letting you rant off your fever, wouldn’t I? We both know that if you rest and let it do its thing, it'll pass, and it's not as though you're needed out in the field this morning, is it?"

"No, but I was going to go myself into Seireitei proper and see what I could pick up about the Hollow attacks in the local vicinity," Juushirou grabbed up the blue pouch with very bad grace, putting it to his brow with a sigh and leaning back against the wood panels that made up Ugendou's walls. "I know, I know, I'm like this every time, but really, I had been feeling so much better of late. I've been taking the new remedies Unohana-taichou sends over by way of Shiki-chan each week and I thought they were beginning to have an impact."

"Mm, probably they are, but you're worrying about Tenichi-kun," Shunsui pressed his lips together, sauntering across the chamber and dropping down with a light thud opposite his friend. 'Yes, I know about it,' as Juushirou sent him a startled look, "at least, bits and pieces. I knew that there had been some incidents, and I'm sorry for not discussing it with you sooner, but you were already on one crusade and it seemed unlikely to be something that would affect you or your squad. Just some District idiots getting political, nothing more serious. However... according to Sora-chan's summary of this morning's Vice Captain's meeting..." he shrugged. "Maybe not. Tenichi might not be yours any more, but I know you haven't fully let go of him. And, from what Souja-kun told Sora, the circumstances of this one are messed up."

"It makes no sense, and you're right, I am bothered by it," Juushirou groaned, closing his eyes briefly as he allowed the cool liquid from the ice bag to trickle over his hot brow and down his cheeks. 'I didn't sleep so very well last night trying to puzzle out how he was taken, and I didn't get very far. Probably that explains this,' he gestured to his body, "but it's a nuisance all the same."

"Did Enishi talk to you about their meeting?" Shunsui asked, and Juushirou shrugged.

"The bare bones," he replied. "He took over my share of the drill duties as well as his own, so there wasn't time for more. He's priceless, because he never complains, but it leaves me sitting here feeling highly useless."

"That's what a Vice Captain is for. Doing your work when you can't or don't want to," Shunsui grinned. "Call it training. One day he'll benefit from all this experience."

"Yeah," Juushirou shot his friend a rueful look. "So? What was this 'everything' you planned on discussing with me?"

“Like this?” Shunsui arched an eyebrow, looking sceptical, and Juushirou nodded.

“I’m bored,” he said plaintively. “I’m not having an attack, Shunsui. I did cough a little, last night, but not very much since this morning, and no blood. I have a headache and I’m hot and bothered, but quite in my wits and perfectly able to talk, even if I’m not in such a good shape to wield a sword. At least make me feel as though I’m doing something worthwhile. Tell me what you know about the abductions — or the Hollows — or anything, so I can pretend I’m doing useful work this afternoon instead of wasting time holed up in bed.”

“All right,” Shunsui grinned, but relented, reaching an arm across to shut the sliding door, then shuffling around to face his friend once more. “What I know comes from Kaoru-chan, whose friend Sakura is in Ninth. The girl that was taken from there remembers nothing at all about the incident, and from what Sora said, Anabomi’s been covering it up so even Shirogane-dono and Guren-sama didn’t know it happened. Anyway, the M.O is pretty classic. Shinigami is of low rank. Shinigami is patrolling in some area away from Inner Seireitei. Shinigami is seized by unknown individuals who cuff them and take them to a secure location. Ransom note is sent. Ransom is paid, shinigami is returned. Most likely they’re knocked unconscious on abduction, and so remember nothing when they’re returned. I also heard that Anabomi did a spiritual scan of the girl when she was brought back, for traces of foreign reiryoku, but found nothing of any use to their inquiries.”

“Ikata is very outspoken. Sora said he’s not tried to keep it a secret, and has complained about Minachi’s high-handed dealing with it for good measure to anyone who’d listen,” Shunsui nodded. “From what she said, yes. The two in Eleventh were taken, held, and returned in the same way.”

“Away from Inner Seireitei,” Juushirou murmured. “Yet Tenichi was taken here — in a place where there are no easy access points for District, but plenty for shinigami.”

“You think it’s an inside job?” Shunsui’s eyes became slits, and Juushirou shrugged.

“Its possible, though I’m trying to think otherwise,” he said wearily. “Nobody saw anything. Souja has been investigating, so has Kikyue, but nothing has come of it. How can a shinigami of Tenichi’s rank and level just disappear into nothing in the midst of what’s meant to be a safe location unless someone was paid to look the other way? The trouble is pinpointing who, where and why. I don't have any of the above, just a vague sense of unease about the whole thing — certainly not enough to build a case on. And, if I'm wrong, I don't want to make unfounded accusations."

"Have you told Ketsui that his brother is missing yet?" Shunsui asked, and Juushirou shook his head.

"No, but I must," he responded darkly. "Another thing preying on my mind. I was hoping we'd have more news sooner than this, even a note or a ransom demand so we could confirm where he is. From what Enishi said, though, Souja hadn't had any note by the time they had their meeting this morning."

He pulled the blanket more firmly around him, dumping the ice pack back onto the tatami mat floor and stifling a dry cough. "It makes me wonder what the delay is. Maybe it isn't like the others, but someone is trying to make it look as though it's connected to throw us off the scent."

"You think he was taken for other reasons?" Shunsui asked quietly, and Juushirou shrugged.

"It worries me," he said gravely. "That's all."

"It worries you, and you make yourself sick in the process, so we all end up worrying about you," Shunsui sighed, rubbing his temples. "Look, delegate this one to me, all right? I don't pretend I know the lad as well as you, nor have I been his Captain, so I can't say I've that kind of bond with him. Maybe that's better, though, considering. Let me look into it. I'll deploy some of Eighth and see what I can find out. I'm sure Souja would be glad of some help, and you have enough on your plate investigating the Hollow activity."

"I appreciate what you're saying, but I can't," Juushirou shook his head. "Tenichi and Ketsui are my recruits, Shunsui. Even if Tenichi belongs to Hirata now, he's still one of mine. I can't shake that — I have a responsibility to him and his safety."

"You have no such thing," Shunsui shook his head firmly. "You take the world onto those skinny shoulders of yours and they're just not big enough to carry it all. Tenichi is a grown man. He's not your recruit any more, he's Hirata's Eighth Seat and it's up to Seventh to do the legwork and track him down. Ketsui is your concern, true enough, but if it comes to it, you can get Kirio-chan to talk to him, set him straight and explain. They're not children and you can't protect them, even if you want to. This is the problem with making your squad your family — sometimes you blur the line and see your siblings instead of your subordinates.”

“Maybe,” Juushirou let out a heavy sigh. “It’s the only way I know how to do it, though. It’s how I am, and it won’t change. Whatever squad he’s in now, I still feel I have a duty to help if Tenichi is in trouble.”

“Right now you have a duty to your Division to get well,” Shunsui said firmly. “You know it and so do I. I’m glad you were sensible enough to stay in bed today, at the very least.”

“Naoko told me that she’d send a message to Fourth Division if I thought about getting up and taking my training drills, and have someone come and sedate me,” a faint, sheepish smile touched Juushirou’s pale lips. “She’s very forceful, sometimes, and she takes my health even more seriously than Enishi does. I didn’t feel up to arguing with her, so I let her have her way and sent her off to take charge of the recruits Enishi was meant to oversee doing their various chores.”

“You weren’t brave enough to defy her, though,” Shunsui pursed his lips, letting out a low whistle. “I underestimated Naoko-chan’s ability to emulate Unohana-taichou, but I guess it’s there deep down, even if the healing side isn’t.”

“Perhaps, but she was right, and I’m glad she spoke up and told you what she thought,” he responded evenly. “If you’re less fevered tomorrow, we’ll both go and look into this — how’s that? I’ll offer my personal services as your side-kick, and that’s a rare thing I don’t give many people, so be honoured. If you think there’s someone on the inside playing devils, the more people we have investigating it the better.”

“All right,” Juushirou looked relieved. “Thank you, Shunsui. If we both tackle it, maybe we’ll make up for lost time. Hirata will be back too, soon, and...”

“Unless I miss my guess, he’s already back,” Shunsui turned, his eyes narrowing slightly as he glanced towards the door. “In fact, I have this strong feeling he’s heading this way. Call it a hunch if you like, but I think I just heard a bird of prey flap its spiritual wings.”

“Souja’s told Hirata about Tenichi,” Juushirou deduced, and Shunsui nodded.

“That would be my first guess, too,” he agreed with a sigh. “And when you’re all bundled up like this as well, but never mind. I think he’s coming here, and doubtless Souja’s told him you’ve been helping in their search. Some old habits die hard — I guess we’ll have to hear him out.”

“Taichou?”

At that moment there was a light knock at the door, followed by the voice of Kira Hideharu, one of Juushirou’s seated officers. “Taichou, Endou-taichou is here. He wants to see you. I told him you weren’t feeling well, but he says it’s important and... well... can I let him in?”

There was an edge of nervousness to the man’s tones, and Juushirou pressed his lips together, glancing at his friend.

“I can feel it too, now,” he murmured. “I’m trying not to use my spiritual senses much while my temperature’s unsteady, but it’s hard to ignore it.”

“Hirata’s not happy, and he’s put the wind up Kira when Kira tried to dissuade him,” Shunsui agreed grimly. “I wonder just what exactly Souja said.”

“Taichou?” Kira’s voice sounded anxious, even pleading. “Please, if you’re awake, will you answer me? I’m really sorry to be disturbing you, but Endou-taichou...”

“It’s all right, Kira. Let him come in,” Juushirou raised his voice, his hoarse tones carrying across the small chamber. “I’m awake, and S... Kyouraku-taichou is with me, so he won’t be disturbing me at all.”

There was a faintly audible sigh of relief, followed by the murmur of words on the other side of the divide, and Shunsui grinned despite himself.

“Kira’s sword work might be better than it was and he’s probably a solid member of your squad these days,” he reflected, “but his courage and deference when faced with senior officers, even ones he went to school with, still leaves something to be desired.”

“He does his best,” Juushirou responded simply, and Shunsui let out a chuckle.

“I see. You won’t let me criticise one of your own? I suppose that makes sense. I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to imply a slight against Thirteenth.”

Before Juushirou could respond, there was the sound of the door sliding back, and both men turned to see their comrade and old school friend step over the threshold, entering the chamber and pulling the sliding door shut with a snap behind him. He was still dressed in Clan robes, his red Endou cloak flapping around his shoulders, and one look at his expression told Juushirou that his former classmate was not here to ask after anyone's health.

As a boy, Hirata had been unimposing, but as a shinigami, that impression had changed. The weight of the Endou had demanded him to play the part of the confident Clansman, even when he had his own inward doubts, and his sword, Tsumi no Fuuhi, was renowned among the members of Inner Seireitei as one of the most ruthlessly powerful among the current Gotei. Juushirou had never seen his younger classmate as threatening or frightening in any way, but in that moment, as he absorbed the grim line of Hirata's mouth and the hard, unreadable expression in the pale blue eyes, he realised that the impression was not simply the junior officers' over-imagination. His aura prickled around his body, held in check only by what was a steely sense of will and purpose, but Juushirou could tell that Tsumi no Fuuhi was angry, and that Hirata himself was only just keeping his hunter's instinct in check.

"I'm sorry to come when you're sick," he said now, bowing his head slightly towards the Thirteenth Captain. "I didn't know, but it can't wait."

He cast Shunsui a glance, long and hard, then turned back to Juushirou.

"I need to talk to you. Alone."

"Ouch," Shunsui pretended to wince, holding up his hands in mock-surrender. "How to make an old friend feel unwelcome, Hirata-kun — the temperature in here dropped by about a hundred degrees the moment you looked my way."

"Shut up," Hirata's eyes snapped with impatience. "This isn't a time to be joking around. I need to speak to Juushirou. It's nothing to do with you, so if you don't mind..."

"Maybe I do mind, though," Shunsui said evenly, folding his arms across his chest and making no attempt to get up from the floor of the chamber. "Juushirou isn't well. He's not in any fit state to deal with you in this kind of temper, and I'm certainly not going to let him be subjected to your flaring spirit power when he's already running a fever. Get your bird back in harness and shut off the hunter, else there'll be no conversation at all."

“Shunsui...” Hirata’s eyes became near slits, and Shunsui raised an eyebrow, meeting the younger Captain’s gaze with an even, unhurried one of his own.

“I can beat you, if I have to, though I don’t want to, because it will make Juu sad,” he said evenly, his tones measured and calm despite the implication in his words. “I’ll say it again. Calm down or you won’t be speaking to Juu at all.”

Hirata opened his lips as if to retort, but at that moment Juushirou coughed, holding up his hands as if to demand a ceasefire.

“Not... not in my chamber,” he managed, between spasms. “Hirata... please... it’s not making it any easier with your reiryoku flaring up l..like that.”

Hirata’s eyes widened, the anger dissipating from his expression as though something in the white-haired man’s words had risen him from a spell, and Shunsui sighed, slowly shaking his head.

“See? Now you made him cough,” he told the visitor reproachfully. “It’s no good, Hirata-kun. You’re old enough to do better, especially when Kira told you Juu wasn’t feeling one hundred percent.”

“I’m sorry,” Hirata’s expression glittered with guilt, and he dropped his head apologetically in his friends’ direction, the flaring, predatorial reiatsu that up till a few moments before had surrounded him dissipating to a dull hum in light of his contrition. “I didn’t mean... it was just...”

He trailed off, as if unsure how to continue, and Shunsui gestured for him to sit down.

“Sometimes, you know, you let it rail too easily out of hand,” he said quietly, as Hirata hesitated, sending a concerned glance in Juushirou’s direction. “When it’s us, under normal conditions, we know how to handle it and you, if need be. With other people, though, you might easily give the wrong impression. You’re the one who likes to say you’re not that kind of Endou. Keep tabs on it, else you’ll cross the line once too many and someone you like will get hurt.”

“Kira did tell me, and I’m sorry,” Hirata removed his glasses, rubbing the bridge of his nose as if trying to relieve some of the tension physically. “I should have stopped and checked myself before I stepped inside, but I’m tired and frustrated and then I saw Shunsui was here...”

“You really want rid of me, don’t you?” Shunsui feigned a hurt expression. “That’s charming. I thought we were friends, Hirata-kun.”

“It’s not that,” Hirata shook his head impatiently. “It’s not me wanting rid of you, just what I have to talk to Juushirou about is something that’s top secret. Even more so, right now, given everything that’s happened. I don’t want to discuss it with more people than I have to — particularly not with people who don’t know anything to begin with.”

“Hirata?” Juushirou looked concerned. “What do you mean, top secret? If this is to do with Tenichi, Shunsui knows all about that. If not...”

“It is about Tenichi,” Hirata agreed, “but it’s not just about that. I know Kikyue came to you, and I know Souja’s been open with everyone about the boy’s abduction, so it’s not exactly a private matter. What I want to talk to you about, though, is.”

He eyed Shunsui doubtfully for a moment.

“You don’t trust me?” Shunsui asked softly, and Hirata grimaced.

“I do,” he said frankly. “More than myself, a lot of the time. What you said is right — probably you or Juushirou are the only people who can face me down when my spirit power flares up and threatens to overwhelm me like it did just now. I rely on the both of you to make sure I stay the proper side of the line — but this is a special circumstance.”

“Something I already know about, but that Shunsui doesn’t?” Juushirou rubbed his chin pensively. “There aren’t many things like that. I discuss most things with Shunsui — and I’m pretty sure you do too, as a rule.”

Hirata stopped mid-sentence, digging into his hand-embroidered obi and pulling the parchment from beneath its folds. “Here. Read this. Don’t say anything, just read it. When you’ve read it, you’ll understand why I want to talk to you in private. It’s complicated and time is ticking away.”

“All right,” Juushirou was nonplussed, but he took the sheet, unfolding it and running his hazel gaze down the columns of kanji. As he was doing so, Shunsui sat back on his hands, a gesture that to anyone else would look as though he was just lounging all over the place as usual, but to the white-haired shinigami, meant he was giving his friend extra space to read in peace without fear of having the document read over his shoulder. Curious as Shunsui could be, Juushirou knew he would not try to read the letter without Hirata's express permission. It was one of the characteristics he most liked about his lazy, enigmatic friend — Shunsui was often infuriating, but it was always honourably done, underpinned by the thick vein of integrity that characterised him as a shinigami. Sword-wise, he might be one of the most powerful in the Gotei — indeed, only Juushirou and a couple of others could confidently raise a blade to his without fear of quick defeat, but as an ally, his strength was his loyalty to those who had won his trust.

As soon as he had read the contents of the letter, Juushirou understood Hirata's request for secrecy. He re-folded the sheet, passing it back with a grim expression on his thin features.

“It did,” Hirata agreed bleakly. “It seems it was waiting particularly for me, which means that whoever sent it knew I was away and when I would be back.”

“Juu thinks whoever abducted your Eighth Seat is somehow affiliated with Inner Seireitei,” Shunsui put in thoughtfully. “I don't know what's in the letter or why Juu's also now looking like someone stole his favourite pet, but if you don't mind me leaving huge plotholes in the conversation, I'll try to adlib along with you both and see if I can offer my thoughts.”

“An inside job?” Hirata's eyes slitted, and for a brief instant the predator glinted once more beneath hooded lids. Juushirou shrugged.

“Or someone on the inside passing information to someone else,” he replied. “I don't know. It seems like they know too much about the Gotei movements, that's all. Providing this is the same people who took the other... you do know that others have been abducted and ransomed, too?”

Hirata nodded.

“Souja filled me in,” he agreed briskly, “as far as he was able. To me, it sounds like Tenichi's abduction was in the style of those, but not the same modus operandi. This note almost proves it. They're similar, but not the same. What they asked of the other divisions isn't what they've asked of us... and yet..."

"They're still asking for something of benefit to them, something your squad can, theoretically, provide," Juushirou looked apprehensive. "I'm going to strengthen security around Thirteenth, just in case. The information in question belongs to you, but it's not unknown to me, either. If they know what you know, then they might... know I know too."

"Oh, good grief, that was cryptic enough to make a top rank spy have a nervous breakdown," Shunsui remarked. "If you're not going to tell me what you're talking about, at least try and vary the verb a few times so I don't get my brain tangled trying to keep up."

"Sorry," Juushirou sent his companion an apologetic look. "I suppose we were speaking in tongues."

"Whatever you were speaking in, it wasn't vernacular Japanese," Shunsui agreed ruefully, moving to get to his feet. "Maybe I ought to go and leave you boys to it. Hirata's calmed down, so I don't need to protect you from the Wind Hawk any longer — I could saunter back to Eighth and see whether Sora's done all my paperwork for me in my absence."

"Has she ever done, yet?" Juushirou asked curiously, and Shunsui laughed, shaking his head.

"You don't know Sora-chan if you think she's that easily manipulated into filing documents and signing releases," he said with a grin. "I can hope, though. That's also a part of Vice Captain training, or so I tell her whenever she complains."

He winked at Hirata.

"Keep the bird in chains and play nicely, all right? I don't want to come in here and find Juu choking up blood the next time I visit — which will be soon," this last to his white-haired friend.

"No, wait," Hirata held up his hands, and Shunsui turned, shooting the other Captain a quizzical look.

"Yes?"

"Sit," Hirata sighed, resignation in his pale blue eyes. "Sit down, and listen. I'll tell you. You're smart and you might see something I haven't — we haven't."

"It's top secret, isn't it?" Shunsui reminded him. "You don't want anyone who doesn't need to know knowing about it — right?"

He shrugged his shoulders.

“If it’s not my business, I don’t have to be here to hear it. You don’t have to pander to me — I’m not offended, not if it’s like that.”

“Hirata’s right,” Juushirou interjected. “If he’s happy discussing it, I’d rather talk it out with you. I’m not fully on the ball tonight, and you’re sober, which means you might stand a better chance of being rational. Besides, you can keep a secret. It’s a delicate matter, but I think your input would help.”

“Because I’m sober?” Amusement danced in Shunsui’s brown eyes, but at a nod from Hirata, he retook his seat, folding his arms and slipping his hands into the sleeves of his haori as he gazed at them expectantly. “Well? If you feel that way, I suppose I can spare a little bit more time. Sneaking back when Sora’s gone to bed usually means I escape the lecture till the morning, and first thing I’m never awake enough to absorb all her complaints, so I don’t mind. If you’re sure, though, Hirata — I don’t want you to feel I’m forcing it out of you.”

“It’s not that,” Hirata admitted. “I just don’t want any bloodshed. You mustn’t raise it with anyone, Shunsui. Anyone at all. It’s not something you ought to talk to us about, either, unless it’s entirely safe to do so.”

“Sounds like trouble waiting to happen, but I’m all ears,” Shunsui responded lazily. “Well? What is this big secret the pair of you have huddled together over?”

“It goes back to when Thirteenth Division was stationed in Seventh District,” Juushirou glanced at his younger companion, who nodded his head. “That’s how I know about it, and you don’t. It’s more Hirata’s story than mine — it involves him more — but I was aware of it... of them... because I was his Captain and, well, he sought my advice a couple of times regarding them.”

“Kitsune?” Shunsui pursed his lips. “Like, foxes?”

“Not exactly,” Juushirou’s expression became troubled. “At the time Urahara Keitsune was arrested, there were, apparently, rumours that some of those Keitsune had relied on for support in his work had managed to secure their safe escape by bartering information about their scientific experiments and, essentially, compounding the Council's case against their leader. In reality, it doesn't seem to have helped them any, for those who turned on Keitsune were considered despicable within their Clan, and were banished, although most of them fled before any sentence could actually be carried out. Due to Urahara pressure, the Council ultimately offered them no protection. In fact, I believe any who were alive at the time of Keitsune-dono's execution are also still technically under warrant of death by both Council and Urahara law, only none of them have ever been caught."

"Most of the Urahara didn't want Keitsune killed, but understood it had to happen once all of the evidence was open for public view, and these people were the ones who opened it up and made it impossible to ignore. Rikaya-dono had no choice but to denounce his brother and cut ties," Hirata agreed sadly. "It brought shame to the Urahara and left a lot of bad feeling in District Three — to the extent that even Nagesu-dono, with his reputation for pacifism and reconciliation, has either not wanted to or not been able to repeal the orders against these people. The exiled group were labelled 'Keitsune no Uragirimono' = the ones who betrayed Keitsune. In exile, they changed the name. Keitsune became Kitsune, and that's how they call themselves — wild foxes running feral from their mother Clan rather than traitors to a long dead man."

"That's ugly, but not entirely surprising," Shunsui mused, and Juushirou could tell he was digesting every detail, mulling it over carefully. "If I bothered to read Oniisama's dusty records, I'd probably find some reference to them from the Council proceedings of the time. From how you're talking, though, these Kitsune are still very much around. More, you know far too much not to have some direct involvement with them — so you obviously don't hold such negative opinions of them as the Urahara do."

"Mm," Hirata sighed heavily. "The Kitsune are almost entirely made up of Clansfolk from the North of District Three. It's also through this strain that ancient and traditional ties with the Endou are at their strongest. Keitsune's father — the head of the Urahara before Rikaya-dono — also married a part-Endou princess, quite probably on the advice of these families. In fact, it's a very strong possibility that his wife came from the Northern regions herself. I don't know for sure. Without the Urahara records, it's hard to be certain, and the Urahara have preferred to forget they ever had any blood ties to us at all. All I can be sure of is that a large proportion of the people Keitsune relied on to help with his research and testing belonged to one or other of these northern lines... at least one of which was significantly high ranking to create a subsequent scandal when the arrests began.”

“You’ve spoken about the Urahara in your blood before,” Shunsui remarked. “I didn’t realise it went both ways — you traded your hime to them and they to you.”

“There were, once, positive trade and other links between our two Clans,” Hirata laughed bitterly. “Hard to imagine now, but once, it was that way. Being so geographically distant, our land had resources Third lacked and vice versa, so it was mutually beneficial and marriages between the families helped keep the rapport amicable. By the time of the Keitsune incident, though, Grandfather was in charge and his policy was generally war rather than peace. The diplomatic arrangements with Third lapsed, but some individuals on both sides maintained ties. That’s why so many Urahara fled to District Seven, even though it was a long trek. The Kitsune fled there too, and hid. They literally went underground — took over the old Sekkiseki mines that had been abandoned or exhausted and made their home in those tunnels.”

“When we were in Seventh, we encountered the Kitsune,” he said slowly. “One or two of them had been working for Misashi-sama, in such a secret capacity not even Sumire-dono knew it was going on. He’d used them as a network of informants, promising them protection against Seimaru and Shouichi-sama, and therefore when the culls were taking place, the Kitsune escaped. They always knew when a hit was going to happen... and avoided it by going back underground. With the Sekkiseki residue still deep in those tunnels, they were never found.”

“Mm,” Hirata pressed his hands together absently, and Juushirou knew he was still fighting to keep Tsumi no Fuuhi’s spirit from breaking its shackles and flying free. “All of those who were involved with Keitsune’s case are dead now. Spiritually gifted folk have their life force stunted by being in constant contact with Sekkiseki, and so most of them succumbed before I even knew about them. Those who survive are descendents — those who were born in Seventh and they are loyal to the Endou. Where Seimaru and Grandfather abused their historic ties to the Urahara, Father protected and provided for them, and so a bond was established. The Kitsune are now Endou spies — and as such, when Keitarou first appeared on the horizon and when Eiraki disappeared, they were dispatched to gather information in an attempt to track him down.”

“Keitarou,” an ice chill ran down Juushirou’s spine and he gazed at Hirata sharply. “Are you saying... do you think...?”

“No proof,” Shunsui said firmly, before Hirata could speculate. “Go on, Hirata. Finish what you were saying. We’ll come to idle speculation later.”

“When I became Head of the Clan, Father handed control of the Kitsune over to me, and I’ve divulged it to Souja but kept it, so far, from Kikyue,” Hirata continued pensively. “Nobody else in my Division or my family knows. Ai certainly knows nothing — I wouldn’t involve her any more than Father involved Mother. Souja is my heir, so he needs to be abreast of things, but it’s too risky to let anyone else in on the secret. The wrong careless word or command and they could be put in jeopardy. They work loyally and tirelessly and put their skills to our benefit without question — its not my intention to get any of them killed.”

“Let me guess,” Shunsui’s eyes became thoughtful. “Your note from our friendly neighbourhood kidnapper wants information on the Kitsune in return for Tenichi’s life.”

“What do you want to do?” Juushirou asked quizzically, and Hirata shrugged.

“The hawk in me wants to go tear shreds into people till I find the truth and get Tenichi back,” he admitted, a note of shame in his voice. “The rational shinigami wants me to play it carefully and not do anything to make the situation worse. There’s absolutely no question of me handing over the location of the Kitsune to anyone, whether I know their names or not. Even Juushirou doesn’t know where their main base is, and I’d rather it remained that way. Still, though, there’s the boy’s life to consider. I can’t just discard him. He’s one of Seventh squad and it would be bad — no, terrible for morale if I were to do that.”

“If you can’t betray the Kitsune and you want to save Tenichi, what do you do?” Shunsui bit down absently on his lip. “It’s a tough one. Souja knows all of this, you said?”

“He does,” Hirata agreed. “He has a close friendship with one of the Kitsune boys — they played together as children, and the boy's father was one of my most trusted agents up until two or three years ago.”

“When... something happened to him?”

“He died,” Hirata said succinctly, “of Sekkiseki exposure. I told you. It shortens their lifespan. We’ve tried to find a way to overcome it, but removing the Sekkiseki removes their protection against outside interference, so they won’t have it. Better to live shorter lives and die free, they say, than aim for immortality and spend it in prison. So long as the Urahara indictment against them remains, they can’t risk coming out into the open. Even though these are all guiltless descendants far removed from the original incident, they still have to carry the burden all the same.”

He shrugged his shoulders.

“In any case, the man’s son, Joumei, is now about the same age as Souja, and effectively, the leader of the group with his father’s death,” he added. “He’s a descendant of that most high ranking family I mentioned earlier on, and the other Kitsune hold them in high renown. I encouraged the friendship because it’s important for them to have absolute trust in one another, and it helps keep the trust between us and them for another generation. For that reason, too, I’ve had Souja send the warning. They’ll get it and Joumei will take them all underground, far from prying eyes... in the meantime... I need to find my missing squad member and I’m not confident that calling the kidnappers’ bluff will do the trick.”

“If they know about these Kitsune, they obviously have a deep, dark reason for wanting to find them,” Shunsui said slowly. “I know now why Juu was so upset at the mention of Keitarou’s name. It’s been a very long time since he made any kind of move, but he’d have a motive to do this, wouldn’t he? They betrayed his father and we know how dotty he is about that subject. It would be an easy leap for him to take a shinigami from your squad and turn the screw.”

“But Juushirou thinks that it’s an inside job,” Hirata pointed out, “and with the information that they have, he might be right.”

“Nagesu-dono is too reasoned, Shiketsu-dono too level-headed,” he objected.

“It doesn’t have to be someone at the top of the Clan, though,” Shunsui pointed out. “It might be a lower ranking officer. The Urahara have two squads — Third and Twelfth. There are a lot of Third Clansfolk dotted between the two squads. It could be any of them.”

“Or we could be grasping at straws because even something as awful as an internal revolt is better than the alternative,” Juushirou said grimly. “None of us want to think that Keitarou might be stirring again, but we can’t entirely rule it out. Hirata, I’ve had Naoko investigating Hollow activity in the Districts, and we think there’s something odd about it. I’m going to bring it to a Captain’s meeting when I’m well enough to do so. Tenichi’s abduction just makes it all the more important we do so.”

“We need evidence. Hard evidence,” Shunsui drummed his fingers against the tatami mat floor, unable to fully hide his agitation as the subject moved into less pleasant territory. “We have none. Wild suppositions from hysterical Captains aren’t going to cut it. There are a lot of other explanations, including recalcitrant Urahara wanting to mop up a botched security job from almost a century and a half earlier. First, though, we need to find Tenichi... and hope that in the meantime he’s strong enough to hold out against whatever has him.”

“That’s a point, you know,” Juushirou observed softly. “Why Tenichi? He’s a high ranking officer, much more difficult to nab than a recruit or a low seat. He’s strong, potentially a leader of the future. Why take someone like that when there’s easier pickings on the ground?”

“Because he’s someone valuable to my squad?” Hirata suggested. “Taking someone powerful suggests a powerful opponent, and that’s good enough propaganda.”

“Mm, maybe,” Shunsui rubbed his chin absently, “but Juu has a point. It’s still a gamble... that might require more thinking, later down the line, once we’ve located the lad and managed to get him safely back here in one piece.”

“Providing we do,” Juushirou spoke ominously.

“That’s the fever talking,” Shunsui shot him a reproachful glance. “You’re normally the one who believes in things, however small the probability of them happening. Pessimism is generally my department — lets not poach each other’s jobs now, all right?”

“Unless we can think of a way to track down his abductors, though, Juushirou might be right,” Hirata rubbed his temples. “We’ve no clues to go on. Souja says there’s nothing to indicate any sign of abduction in the near vicinity, and I’d trust him and Kikyue to have checked every possibility. Souja even said he raised it with the Vice Captains this morning, but so far, nothing has come of it.”

“Kirio said that Tenichi was here, but as far as she knew, he’d gone back to Seventh before curfew was called,” Juushirou agreed. “You can talk to her as well, if you’d like, Hirata, but Kikyue already did and she shared whatever she knew.”

He frowned.

“Now we’ve had a note, it’s for sure he’s been abducted,” he added grimly. “There’s no keeping it any longer from Ketsui... I ought to send for him and tell him what’s happened.”

“Not while Hirata’s here. It’d scare him, seeing the Seventh Captain on the verge of losing his spiritual temper,” Shunsui shook his head. “I know you’ve reined it in, Hirata, but it’s still there, and if he saw that then he’d realise how serious the matter was. Talk to him in the morning, Juu — when you’ve had a chance to sleep off your fever. We might have had more news, then, and...”

Before Shunsui could finish his sentence, the door of Ugendou was flung back, revealing a breathless, red-faced Makoto, an anxious look on his face. “Houjou... I mean, Fukutaichou just received an urgent message from the Fourth Division, and he sent me to notify you at once!”

“An urgent message... from the Fourth Division?” Juushirou’s eyes widened and he glanced at his two friends, who returned his gaze with equally non-plussed looks. “From Unohana-taichou, then? Something urgent, requiring the attention of Captains and Vice Captains right away?”

“Yes, sir, right away,” Makoto’s eyes glittered with a mixture of apprehension and urgency, and he nodded his head emphatically. “There’s been a distress call... all squads are to be on urgent alert in case their services are needed!”

“A distress call?” Shunsui echoed, and Juushirou felt a sudden cold sensation begin to run through his body, sneaking up to and closing gently around his heart. Without thinking about it, his fingers drifted to his throat, where a silver pendant bearing the crest of the Kuchiki Clan hung, normally out of sight beneath his robes.

“Explain,” he said now, his words more abrupt than he had intended, and Makoto bit his lip, clearly unsure how to begin his message.

“Take a breath, Atsudane, then do as your Captain commands you,” Shunsui said softly, and Makoto sighed, slowly nodding his head.

“It’s the Spiritless Zone, sir,” he said at length, an almost apologetic look in his dark eyes, as though he personally was responsible for generating the bad news. “A distress siren was triggered from one of the protected regions, and try as they might, nobody from Fourth has been able to make contact with any of the shinigami deployed to that area. After consulting all the evidence, Unohana-taichou believes that the Zone may have come under some kind of hostile attack, perhaps from Hollows or from some other entity. She’s working as quickly as she can to unlock the safety barriers to open a gateway down to that location, but in the meantime, she wanted all active military squads on alert, just in case...”

he swallowed hard, then,

“A distress flare...” Hirata’s eyes became stricken, his gaze shifting to Juushirou, whose face, despite his fever, had drained entirely of colour. “And no response?”

“Originally they thought it might be a technical glitch, but none of the shinigami on duty were able to patch through a signal, and even Unohana-taichou wasn’t able to make contact,” Makoto agreed anxiously. “Houjou-fukutaichou sent me to alert you. He and Naokosan are getting the squad primed in case of attack — but he said you ought to know right away, and when Kira said Kyouraku-taichou and Endou-taichou were with you...”

“We need to go back to our own squads and issue similar orders,” Hirata murmured, and Shunsui frowned, shaking his head.

“Juu, you don’t know that anything bad has happened,” he said softly, and Juushirou jerked his head up, hearing his name but not a lot else as his mind began to race towards horrific, unthinkable possibilities. “Hirata, I can’t leave him here alone like this, not when there’s a message like that and he’s already sick. Atsudane, run to Eighth and tell Sora that she’s to assume full command of the Division and prepare accordingly. She’ll be frantic enough herself, I imagine, but she’ll do as she’s told because it’s a direct order. Tell her I’m detained at Thirteenth and I’ll be back as soon as I can... in the meantime, she doesn’t need to wait for my further instructions to act.”

“Yes, sir,” Makoto seemed relieved at the excuse to leave, saluting Shunsui sharply before withdrawing from the chamber. Silence fell, then, slowly, Hirata got to his feet.

"I can't delegate this to Souja. Not with things as they are," he said regretfully. "I'm sorry, Juushirou. I need to go... though you have my word that if Seventh are called on and there's anything we can do, we'll do it without hesitation."

"You should go," Juushirou's words felt alien to him, even as he heard himself speak them, detached and calm as though his vocal chords had become detached from the chaos ruling his mind. "You too, Shunsui. It's an order from a senior member of the Council of Elders and we ought to follow instructions."

"Uh-uh," Shunsui shook his head, but Juushirou got to his feet, putting his hand against the wall to steady his fevered body before reaching for his shihakushou.

"Juushirou?" Hirata stared at his friend, aghast, and Shunsui was on his feet in a moment, grabbing the white-haired Captain by the shoulders and pulling him back down.

"You are not going anywhere," he said firmly, a forceful look in his brown eyes. "You're sick and there's no way you'd be able to hold together any kind of objectivity with an alert message like that going the rounds. Enishi and Naoko have Thirteenth in hand, and they'll do what's needed, so you stay here. In this state..."

"Get off me," Juushirou pushed his companion aside, grabbing the shihakushou and shooting the Eighth Captain a dark glare. "This is my division and I still make the rules here. You just commanded one of my men without even thinking about deferring to me, and I'm not having it. This is my Division. I'll do as I like, and in an emergency..."

He trailed off, as a bout of coughing racked through his thin frame, and Shunsui sighed, hitting his brow with his palm in frustration.

"Hirata, you go," he said with a grimace. "Leave this to me. I'll deal with it. Seventh need reassurance right now, and your hunting bird is it."

"All right," Hirata seemed reluctant, but he nodded, glancing at Juushirou for a moment before withdrawing from the room.

"Shunsui, you're not stopping me." Juushirou was already unknotting the tie of his nightrobe, preparing to pull on his black and white uniform. "You know you can't stop me... not with something like this. It's an alert, and an urgent one — I'm not ignoring it and nor should you."

“You’re not thinking about Thirteenth Division or their deployment, though,” Shunsui said softly, sitting back against the wall of the chamber, apparently realising that fighting with his friend was only more likely to bring on a fresh round of coughing. “You’re thinking about Mitsuki — we both know that you are.”

Juushirou faltered, gazing at Shunsui helplessly, unable to suppress completely the tears that prickled at the back of his hazel eyes.

“She promised me she’d come back,” he whispered, the anger slipping from his voice as worry and anguish took over. “All those years ago, when we said goodbye, she promised. I’ve taken care of myself, too. I’ve done what I could to make sure I’d be here, and I’ve waited. When the others came back and she didn’t, I was upset, but I set my mind to waiting a little longer, however long that might be. It was the Spiritless Zone. It wasn’t dangerous. It should be all right. Now... now this...”

“We don’t know what happened,” Shunsui said softly, and Juushirou shook his head, swallowing hard against the bile that rose in his throat at the thought.

“That’s what makes it worse,” he muttered, pulling on his hakama and sliding the black hakamashita over his pale ribs. “A distress flare with no response pickup suggests something bad. Unohana-taichou is involved directly and throwing caution to the winds by releasing the safety barriers to allow access to what’s been a scientifically protected site for a long long time. She would only do that if she thought her personnel were at risk of their lives.”

“And you’re going to do what? Race in there half-delerious and coughing up blood to run to Mitsuki’s rescue?” Shunsui looked sceptical. “For a start, your reiryoku would destabilise anything they’ve worked to do in that zone over the past several years. And, secondly, if you think you can get past me, you won’t get past Daisenpai. She’ll take one look at you and lay you out with a soporific Kidou before you can say Healing Squad. She knows your partiality for Mitsuki and she’ll probably expect you to race in like an idiot to save the day. You might as well sit it out, Juu. They’ll get in there and find out what’s happening, but in the meantime...”

“I can’t sit around here and wait,” Juushirou cut across him, tying the white obi about his waist and lifting his haori from its peg, sliding it over his arms and hugging it tightly to his body as though it could somehow protect him from the chill in the evening air. “If Mitsuki is in danger, Shunsui, I can’t and I won’t. What you’ve said might be true, but it doesn’t change anything. If Mitsuki’s in trouble, I’m

“Juu...”

“I have to,” Juushirou said firmly, his words shaking slightly as he reached for the chamber door. “You understand more than you want to admit, so don’t try and stop me. I have to know what happened, Shunsui. I have to see for myself.”

11. Rescue Mission

Chapter Ten: Rescue Mission

Stupid, careless, idiotic girl.

Katsura trudged through the grass, his face the picture of thunder and his fists clenching and unclenching at his sides as he tried to keep his reiryoku from flaring out of his control. Losing his temper was not something he often did, but, in the circumstances, he knew that only fortune and Mitsuki's own distracted behaviour had prevented him from making a scene.

The Shinigami camp had been a mess. He had steeled himself for corpses, knowing that they were friends of the girl he had impulsively rescued from the Hollow, but certain that in the circumstances he would at least be able to offer her reassurance that she was not alone with night on the approach. As they had happened on the scene, however, while Mitsuki's attention had been taken by Madeki's faltering pulse, Katsura's eyes had fallen on one thing and one thing only.

Footprints, smudged in blood, leading a trail towards the forest.

His eyes narrowed, dark gaze sparking with uncharacteristic fire. How many times has she been told? Enter a scene, do your job, leave it clean! An untrained child could draw a connection between the massacre and those prints, Sakaki — it's only lucky for you that Mitsuki's a healer and her priorities were elsewhere! As soon as others get here, they'll pick that up and follow it in a heartbeat. Heedless and unnecessary — wait till we get back to base!

He paused, casting his gaze over the ground. He had been following the prints from their final victim into the dense thicket that lay beyond, but with each step the evidence of Sakaki's path had become a tiny bit fainter, until he had to bend and examine the blades for shinigami blood residue.

She thinks that because she has no spiritual presence, she's untraceable. That's nonsense right there. What the hell was she thinking?

He sighed, dropping back against the trunk of a nearby tree. The scent of blood was more diluted here, but Katsura could feel it nonetheless, severed specks of a shinigami's life force drifting and dividing on the breeze. Sakaki could not feel such things, therefore never understood, but to Katsura it was like the ghosts of her victims were haunting this forest, dragged here unwillingly by the young girl's carelessness. Until the rain fell, or enough time passed, they would linger, screaming a silent plea to anyone sensitive enough to hear their calls for justice. Katsura had never had any sympathy for shinigami — the 'enemy', as he had always thought them, but he knew the risk of leaving evidence hanging so close to the scene of crime.

The tracks stopped here, though. Although the air was still saturated with dead shinigami reishi, Katsura could tell it didn't go any further. Sakaki couldn't shunpo, and there were no gateways or slipholes through the Rukon divide in this area, therefore a break in the trail meant only one thing.

His sister was here.

He raised his gaze, squinting as he tried to see through the criss-crossed branches. Was that a dark shape he could make out, huddled against the trunk? Reluctantly he reached out his senses, cautiously exploring the air around the shadow before brushing his thought patterns against its, reading whether or not it was alive and whether it was who he sought.

A bevy of slashing, bloodsoaked imagery made him reel back with a gasp, hurriedly pulling his thoughts away from hers as he struggled to regain a hold on his composure. Although reading Sakaki's mind was not a challenge, it was something he shied away from doing, for the thoughts and impulses that lurked there were enough to give him nightmares and he had no mind to be driven mad by the psychotic blood lust of a teenage girl. Right at that moment, though, he had confirmed his suspicions, and he grabbed hold of the tree's supple trunk, giving it a violent shake to dislodge the sleeping assassin from its branches.

At first nothing happened, but as he tried again and then a third time, there was the sound of a creak and a groan, followed by the sharp snap of a branch splitting in two. A moment later, something dark tumbled through the green-leafed boughs, landing with a thud on the grass below.

Katsura watched impassively as the huddled ball of dark fabric began to stir, muttering a string of curses and reaching a hand up to touch her head.

"When you've quite finished taking a nap," he said slowly, and she jerked her head up, staring at him for a full minute before recognition coupled with resentment flooded her features. She scrambled to her knees, hand moving to her blood-soaked blade, but the movement was clumsy, and Katsura frowned, darting forward to cup the girl's chin in his hands. He raised her gaze forcibly to his, adding to her earlier expletives with one of her own as he made out the blurry haziness of his companion's eyes.

"Drugged?" he asked flatly, and Sakaki hissed, recoiling from his touch and pushing him away.

"Why did you come after me? That wasn't your order," she spat out, her words slightly uneven, but clear enough to reassure Katsura that whatever dose his sister had received, it had been relatively minor. He grimaced, grabbing her by the shoulders and dragging her forcibly and mercilessly to her feet, giving her a short, sharp shake and pushing his head close to hers, anger sparking in his eyes.

"Unless you want me to rewrite your brain patterns for you, you shut up and listen to me," he said blackly, tightening his hold on her shoulders so that she winced. "You're hiding less than a ri from the crime scene, covered in the blood of your victims, and what's more, you left a trail. I came here because I followed you here. If I could, other people will. You're covered in foreign reiatsu, and it's already breaking down into the atmosphere, making it even easier to pick up. Did nobody ever tell you how to clean up before leaving a kill scene? What was the point in giving you a sword if you're only going to use it to bring us all into danger?"

"Get off me!" Sakaki reacted like a feral cat, kicking and clawing at her brother's skin until he released his grip. "It wasn't my fault! It was the... the... anaesthetic..."

"You were infiltrating a healer's camp," Katsura said inexorably. "You should have known there was a risk of soporific medicine nearby."

"It doesn't matter," Sakaki's eyes became sullen. "I did my job. I killed them. They won't link it back to me."

"What if they had found your trail before I did? What if I hadn't come this way to make sure you were all right?" Katsura demanded. "What do you suppose the penalty is for those convicted of killing Shinigami? Do you want to be hauled to Seireitei to stand trial?"

"They wouldn't be able to do that," Sakaki said coldly.

"No, but it would hardly matter, seeing as you'd be dead before they got you in the dock," Katsura snapped back. "We have to get out of here. Thanks to you, there are clues a mile wide leading from the scene. Broken branches, blood matter, you name it, it's here. I can sense it, so they will. They'll find every bit of it, which means we can't leave the Spiritless Zone from here. We'll have to travel — and fast."

"You are not taking me anywhere!" Sakaki protested, but Katsura's hand clamped itself around her wrist.

"We're going, and I'm taking you home," he said frankly. "I'm pulling rank. As your older brother, it's my duty to make sure you're all right, whether you like it or not. If you get killed here, Okaasama will cry. You know it. I know it. Whatever sadistic pleasure you take from slitting the throats of these shinigami, put it aside and think for a moment about the people who worry about you, all right? Okaasama wouldn't forgive me either, if I left you here — though I should. If I cover for you all the time, you'll never learn to do it for yourself."

"You think you're so clever," Sakaki muttered, her expression every bit the sulky teenager, but Katsura was not in the mood for listening.

"They'll open one of their gates. Soon, probably. We don't have time for this."

"Don't be such a worry-wart," Sakaki snorted. "It'll be ages before they realise the shinigami here are killed. Days. Months, maybe. They aren't that well connected."

"He'll die. He was doped up. The anaesthetic will see to him, even if I didn't," Sakaki stifled a yawn. "Will you let go of me? I've no mind to have my molecules mangled by your attempts at shunpo, and I don't need your help to get back home."

"I'm not letting you out of my sight. Not till we're safely back where we should be," Katsura retorted. "You shouldn't be so complacent. It won't take two seconds to alert the Gotei that there are officers down here, and..."

He faltered, clamping his jaw shut as he realised what he had almost given away, but Sakaki wheeled on him, an accusatory expression on her young features.

"Why would that happen?" she demanded, her voice dangerously low. "If you killed the four in the south, and I killed the ones here, why would anyone be sending a distress flare back to Seireitei?"

Katsura pressed his lips together, and Sakaki snorted derisively, shaking her head in disbelief.

“You come and lecture me about leaving loose ends, but this is really about you, isn’t it?” she deduced. “You screwed up. You didn’t kill them. Even now they’re roaming back here...”

“The Hollow killed two of them, wounded a third, probably fatally,” Katsura snapped across her. “The other... the other took it down. I don’t have a sword like you do, and Hollows aren’t that easy to find or control in this area. I did my best.”

He swallowed hard, glad she could not read his thoughts, for the lie hung heavily over his head as though to expose his deception.

“Did they see you?” Sakaki’s inevitable question came, and he quickly shook his head.

“Of course not. What do you take me for?” he lied flatly. “Do you think I’d have let anyone see me then allow them to wander off into the wilderness to tell all and sundry what they saw?”

“I don’t know,” Sakaki eyed him speculatively. “You never do take on anyone on your own. You use the Hollows. It’s hard to know what you would or wouldn’t do if it was up to you and your bare hands.”

“I use the Hollows so I’m not seen,” Katsura returned evenly. “The shinigami killed the Hollow, and that’s what shinigami do. I don’t take as many risks as you do, Saki-chan.”

Except that I walked half-way across the Spiritless Zone with Mitsuki to make sure she was safe from Hollows and... and safe from you, too, if you were still at her shinigami camp. I took the slowest route, detoured where possible and delayed so that we wouldn’t get there when you were still there. Mitsuki saw my face, and even if she doesn’t know my name, there’s far more chance of her remembering it than there is of your drugged Captain doing the same for you, even if he lives. I took all the risks this time, Sakaki — but if I tell you, you’ll tell the people back home. Maybe you’ll turn on me... that’s not an option.

His brows pressed together in consternation.

Whatever impulse made me help Mitsuki, it’s probably better I leave it like this. She thought I was from Seireitei, so she’ll never come look for me in the abandoned Rukon Valley — and without my name, I’m nothing more than another random District stranger passing across her radar. I gave her her life this time, so it’s up to her whether she’s fool enough to lose it by coming back and trying again. I won’t be able to protect her any more, and I shouldn’t even think about it again.

He glanced at Sakaki, letting out a heavy sigh.

I have other things to protect. Even if she's insane, Sakaki is my sister and that's a bond by blood. I can't betray that. I'll get her out of here. Protecting her and my family is much more important than a random shinigami who happened to do good things. Better it ends here.

"I knew I should've killed those others on my way up here," Sakaki groaned, "but he insisted on giving you your share. As it is..."

"As it is, you left a blood trail and maybe a living captain. I'm pretty sure the injured one of mine will die, she was slashed up pretty bad, but I admit, one got away. It wasn't a perfect eleven," Katsura turned his own unease back on the offensive, grasping Sakaki's other wrist tightly between his fingers. "That being so, I'll make a deal with you. I won't tell anyone about your blood trail, and you don't tell anyone about my less-than-perfect Hollow, all right? We can't waste time hanging around here, though. Whatever the reasons..."

"I could go back and kill the ones left," Sakaki suggested, glancing at her sword, but Katsura shook his head.

"There's every chance the survivor already sounded a distress flare or siren or something like that," he said, stifling a sudden flare of fear at the thought of Mitsuki impaled on the end of Sakaki's bloody blade. "We can't risk going back. I can leave reiatsu, even if you can't — it's too dangerous."

"Mm. Pity," Sakaki sighed, but to Katsura's relief she nodded, shrugging her shoulders. "All right. I suppose you're right."

She smiled, a cold, calculating smile as she gazed up at him.

"And it's a deal," she added. "I won't tell if you don't. Just, don't think you need to nanny me around, Katsu-nii. I did my job better than you, and there were more of them for me. I'm younger than you. If you're not careful, I might replace you in Okaasama's affections. You're her shining light, we both know that — but if you start screwing up..."

"We're going, and we're going now," Katsura was not willing to hear the end of his sister's smug speech, slipping his body into shunpo and pulling her protesting and screaming with him into the streams of light. Shunpo was a haphazard art for one with no Academy or Clan education, but one he had managed to master to a reasonable level of functionality, and so, by the time he dropped them out of it, breathing heavily and sweating hard, they found themselves in the heart of the middle district, Nakaken.

"Why did you bring us here?" Sakaki took a shuddering breath into her lungs, staggering a few steps and grasping hold of his arm to steady herself. "I feel sick, now, Katsu-nii. You're mean. You do it on purpose."

"Nakaken didn't see any attacks. We'll leave from here, since nobody will be looking for spiritual anomalies so far from the scene of either crime," Katsura said evenly, sliding his fingers into his obi and pulling out a smooth black device, rather like a stone, over which he rubbed his palm. "I'll open the gate, so don't go anywhere, all right? We're going back together, so I can make sure you get there safely."

"I don't need your help getting through that thing. Sekkiseki doesn't hurt me," Sakaki pouted, and Katsura sighed.

"Yes, but with a shinigami drug in your system and shinigami blood all over your clothing and sword, I'm taking no chances," he said matter-of-factly. "I have no idea what kind of detection devices there are on that barrier, but we're not going to risk triggering it if you try and pass through wearing contaminated clothing. We'll go through my way, and we'll do it together. All right?"

"You're my brother, not my father," Sakaki sulked, but Katsura paid her no attention, instead focusing his reiryoku on activating the small stone. It glowed, humming briefly with energy, then the air before them began to ripple and split, revealing a gaping hole of blackness in the atmosphere beyond. The edges of the opening frayed and danced, shaking out of their alignment slightly so that the gateway seemed to be an odd shape gashed into the Spiritless Zone's pure air, but despite its fluctuations, it remained firm, and Katsura took Sakaki's hand in his, stepping purposefully into the gloom.

There were no Hell Butterflies in the Spiritless Zone, but with the stone in his hand, the pathway back to the abandoned regions of Rukongai was a quick and simple one, and before long they were standing once more on dry, barren earth, the sky overhead as heavy and overcast as it had been when they had left.

"You took long enough,"

Koku's voice greeted them, and Katsura let out his breath in a rush, turning to see the young man standing a short distance away, watching them with no expression on his features. He had been waiting for them, Katsura realised, perhaps for some time, yet there was no flicker of impatience in the other's dark brown eyes. He nodded

"We had a lot to do," he said vaguely, and Sakaki snorted, sending Koku a look of dislike.

"You didn't need to come fetch us. We don't need you," she said dismissively. "Go back to your hovel and read your books. Leave the real work to us."

"You look as though you did plenty of that, already," Koku's eyes took on a look of distaste as he ran his gaze over her blood-spattered form. "You stink of death, Sakaki — you even have blood in your hair."

"I've been killing people. That's what happens, when you use a weapon in the way it was meant to be used," Sakaki's words were barbed, tension hissing through her young body like a wildcat ready to pounce on a particularly unpleasant rival who had just stepped into her territory, but Koku just laughed, shaking his head in a condescending fashion.

"Go clean up," he said frankly. "Nobody will want to see you while you look and smell like that. You've decaying reiryoku particles coming off you from all angles — and folk here are sensitive to that, even if you're not. You'll make someone sick."

"You really have no idea how to talk to girls, do you?" Sakaki's teenage pride was clearly offended by this, and she tossed her head. "I was going, anyway. Talking to you is pointless. Even if some people here think a lot of you, I think you're a waste of space, and I'm not going to waste my time with someone too cowardly to baptise a blade in blood."

With that she was gone, head held high in indignation, and Katsura watched her leave with a look of resignation in his dark eyes.

"As friendly as ever," Koku seemed unperturbed, turning his gaze on his companion questioningly. "Well?"

Katsura's eyes narrowed, taking in his companion's expression carefully. There was a question in the brown eyes, a deeper, more thorough question than he had put into words, and in a moment, the older man knew that Koku understood exactly what they had been sent to do. He groaned, dropping down onto the ground and leaning back on his arms.

You don't need me to tell you. You can sense it, can't you? Sakaki's covered in blood. You can read it just as clearly as I can.

That wasn't what I was asking.

The words snapped back across the psychic divide, crisp and decisive, and Katsura saw Koku's eyes narrow slightly in contemplation. He grimaced.

Don't. I'm not ready to, not yet. You can't turn my skills back against me, Koku. It's not fair.

It's safer if you tell me that way than in words other people can hear. There's nothing to tell. We went, we did, we came back.

Fine. Have it your way.

Koku's words were dismissive, and he turned as if to leave, but Katsura knew from the faint disappointment echoing across the psychic projection that he was not satisfied. Koku took a few steps, then paused, still not turning back to meet Katsura's gaze. Even so, though, Katsura felt as though those brown eyes were boring deep into him, searching for something that he was determined not to give.

It would only put you at risk. Don't, Koku. I mean it. I'm not ready.

Keitarou-san brought a shinigami here.

The change in subject was so sudden Katsura almost didn't grasp the meaning in the words until a few moments later.

"What?" The exclamation came out loud, and Koku turned, shaking his head.

No, talk this way.

The reproach came psychically, more of a broken whisper than a sharp scolding, as Katsura's agitation rocked through his reiatsu, threatening to break their psychic connection apart.

Why? Why on earth? What for?

Somehow Katsura managed to bring the ripples of his reiryoku back under control, stabilising the link to his companion's thought processes, but he could not hide the dismay that glittered in his gaze.

This one is different. He's one of ours.

Koku's eyebrows shifted in what might have been interpreted as a facial shrug.

He's a Kotetsu. Keitarou-san wants to trust him. He brought him here to make him one of us.

Will he?

Katsura looked anxious, and Koku smiled ironically.

Apparently. But if I were you, I'd keep away from him. Keitarou-san doesn't want anyone to speak with him who doesn't have to, and he might be harder to sway if he knew you and Sakaki went to kill Shinigami today.

Don't worry. I'll keep out of his way.

Katsura's eyes darkened, their deep blue shade appearing almost black as he absorbed his companion's warning.
Has he been here long?

A couple of days. He won't stay much longer, though. Keitarou-san intends on sending him back to Seireitei shortly.

Koku held out a hand to pull his companion to his feet.

We should try and keep Sakaki away from him until that happens, though. Otherwise, it could be messy.

Understatement.

Katsura groaned inwardly at this thought.

All right. Let me go clean up, then I'll go and find her. Impress on her the importance of not showing her psychotic side to visitors.

Do that.

Koku seemed relieved.

She'll listen to you much more easily than she will me.

What will you do?

Go back and find our visitor, probably.

Koku sighed.

He's with Keitarou-san now, but I've been on sentry duty on and off and it seems better I stay that way. It's easier, knowing where he's been and what he's doing, and I'm not as interesting to him as you or she might be, if you were to encounter one another. I'm just Koku, don't forget. Just another uninteresting resident of Rukongai, far beneath the notice of the Gotei Thirteen.

Don't be like that. You shouldn't let Sakaki's comments get to you.

I'm not. I'm just stating it as it is. If this Kotetsu Tenichi did go back to Seireitei and talk, uninteresting Koku is much the safer option for him to talk about.

The way you say that... you don't think he's our ally?

No, I know he is, or he will be.

Koku's lips pursed, his expression becoming unreadable.

Just, I'm not sure whether he's become that yet. It doesn't hurt to take precautions... it's always better to be prepared.

His chest was burning.

Juushirou stumbled across the cobbles that led to the inner sanctum of the Fourth Division, pausing to steady himself against the sturdy bamboo walls that flanked the divide between their entrance and that of their neighbours, the Fifth. Dragging gasps of impatient air into battered lungs, he coughed, his vision swimming and dancing before his gaze. He could not stop here — he could not give up now. Until he knew what had happened in Rukongai...

His heart clenched at the mere thought, as unbidden, Makoto's report echoed cruelly once more against his senses.

Mitsuki.

He closed his eyes, tears glittering in their depths. A Captain could not cry — did not cry — whether on duty or not, and he had not come here to make an emotional scene of himself. Still, though, despite the fever that still blazed through his veins and the dizzy ache that rocketed around his skull, he could not turn back.

Every breath scalded against the raw lining of his lungs, triggering fresh spasms, but he struggled to push them back, grimly making his legs take one pace and then another, moving ever closer to the Fourth Division's central triage office.

Juushirou, this is foolish.

The cutting words of You, half of his zanpakutou's In'you spirit broke through his fevered thoughts, but he paid the white fish no mind, putting all his focus into staying upright. Using the bamboo divide to support himself, he kept going. One step. Another. A third...

The exclamation slashed through his aching head like a siren, causing him to wince, putting his hand to his head and almost losing his balance completely. There was a cry of alarm, and then he felt someone take him by the arm, gently yet firmly steadying him back onto his feet. With difficulty, he turned his head, his blurry gaze meeting the concerned aqua one of a young woman of about Kirio's age. This was Shikiki, Juushirou's adopted sister and a member of the Fourth Division since her Academy graduation some several years earlier.

Unlike Kirio, she was broadly built, even chubby, the wide white obi swathed about her middle stuffed with sachets of medicine and other healing implements rather than the familiar bulge of a zanpakutou scabbard. Thick waves of unruly rose-petal hair were tied back in a braid that fell almost to her waist, stray ends sticking out every which way as though refusing to be tamed, and a wild fringe cut through the broad curve of her forehead, softening what was a kind, if not overly attractive face. A pair of vivid aqua eyes peeked out from beneath the ends of the fringe, usually bright and full of intelligence, though today they were clouded with tension, a dull reflection of the sea waves when the tide was full in on an overcast day. Wide cheeks and a square jaw completed the image, yet although the most generous of judges could not call Shikiki pretty, there was a pleasantness and charisma in her expression and demeanour that drew people to her all the same. Although she was not as tall as Juushirou, her substantial frame made it easy for her to steady the thin Captain against her, and she reached up stubby fingers to brush his brow, letting out a murmur of dismay.

“I see,” she said softly. “That’s why you’re here. Really, Juu-nii... you can be such a fool sometimes.”

She tut-tutted, shaking her head in clear disapproval.

“Retsu-sama has plenty enough to worry about without you collapsing on her as well,” she chided gently. “She sent me out to meet you — now I know why.”

“I need... go inside... find out... Mitsuki,” Juushirou forced the words through his vocal chords, hoarse and stifled as he tried to prevent himself from a violent fit of coughing. The short journey between barracks had been enough to stir the darker symptoms of his disease, and Shikiki groaned, slipping her fingers firmly around his wrist.

“I’ll take you inside,” she agreed slowly, “but you’re not going to where Retsu-sama is, not like this. You’re fevered and you’re not making any sense. Right now, everyone’s trying everything they can to get a signal through to Rukongai, and Retsu-sama’s putting all her focus into lifting the spirit filters so that rescuers can cross over and see what’s happening. You can’t do anything, so come with me and rest.”

“Shikiki...” Juushirou bit his lip, and the girl’s gaze softened.

“You’re still stupid sometimes, Juu-nii, even with the haori,” she reflected pensively. “I promised Retsu-sama that I’d look after you, though, and I will. Come on. Come with me. You’ll feel better if you’re lying down, and then I can see what I can do to make your chest easier.”

“But Mitsuki!”

“We don’t know, yet. When we do, you’ll know too,” Shikiki did not miss a beat, but even in his dazed state, Juushirou could feel the uncertainty prickling in his foster sister’s aura. He was given no choice to object, however, for the young healer was already pulling him forcibly towards the side-door that, from previous experience, he knew led to a private suite of rooms reserved for patients in need of special restive care. It was a wing detached from the central hub of Fourth Division’s activity, a place as far as possible from where Retsu and her companions were frantically trying to reestablish links with their missing squad members, and Juushirou tried to resist her hold, but Shikiki was determined, and he was weak, rendering his efforts futile.

“Retsu-sama will come and be cross with you if you disobey me,” the healer’s words were firm, and she made no attempt to change course or even to slow her pace. “She’s in an especially harried mood right now, and believe me, you don’t want that.”

In spite of his desperation, a faint flare of self-preservation told Juushirou that he did not, in fact, want to face the Captain of the Fourth Division in a state of disapproval. With a painful sigh, he gave up his resistance, allowing his companion to lead him inside and usher him down on the nearest of the empty beds that filled the crisp, clean wing. There were no other patients in residence, and as he dropped onto the soft mattress, Juushirou felt his body shudder with palpable relief that it had stopped moving.

“I should’ve known you’d come here, when the message went around,” Shikiki sat down on the seat beside his bed, the wicker creaking a little as she shifted her weight, making herself more comfortable. “I didn’t think it would be like this, though. I didn’t realise you were having one of your attacks, Juu-nii. You should’ve sent for someone sooner — I’d have come by and given you something to calm it down.”

“And then you got the alert,” Shikiki groaned, burying her head in her hands. “I’m sorry. If we’d realised... well, I’m sure that we’d have sent a different one to Thirteenth than the one we did. Retsu-sama just sent out a general alert to all the Vice Captains — but in the panic, nobody stopped to think...”

“I already told you, we don’t know anything yet ourselves,” Shikiki repeated patiently. “All we know is that a siren was sounded and that we’ve not been able to make contact. It might just be a technical glitch. Something might have set off Madeki-dono’s alert button without them realising — it could be any number of things. Retsu-sama’s assuming a worst case scenario because it’s the best thing to do in the circumstances, but it doesn’t mean anything has gone wrong. The Spiritless Zone is a relatively safe environment, when all’s said and done.”

“Then... why did Madeki-dono... carry an alert button in the... first place?” Juushirou demanded. “I’m not foolish, Shiki-chan. I... know that means... there are risks.”

“Precautions, that’s all,” Shikiki sighed heavily. “Look, Juu-nii, are you even going to listen to me? What would Mitsuki-dono say, if she saw you like this? Fevered and babbling based on one alert call? She’d be cross, wouldn’t she? She would lecture you and tell you to stop being stupid. She’s a shinigami, just as you are. They’re all trained operatives — not people who need you or anyone to run to the rescue.”

“You never met her, so you wouldn’t know,” Juushirou snapped back, knowing he was being unreasonable, but unable to control the swirl of his emotions. “She had already gone to Rukongai by the time you went through the Academy and joined Fourth.”

“But I am a member of Fourth, and I’ve heard a lot about her and the others in Rukongai from those who came back and from Retsu-sama,” Shikiki was unmoved. “I know she’s someone you care about, Juu-nii. I heard enough about that, too, from Shun-nii and from you yourself when you talk about your time at the Academy. It doesn’t mean she’s helpless, though. She chose to go there, and she knew what she was doing. They all did. Have some faith in them and in her, all right?”

“I just want to know what’s happened. That’s all,” Juushirou whispered, feeling the warm dampness of tears against his cheeks. He cursed, reaching up to brush them away. “Not knowing what’s going on... it’s not about wanting to see Mitsuki, or drag her back here, or prevent her from doing what she wants to do. I just want to know she's all right... that they're all right. That's all."

There was a long silence, then Shikiki pressed her lips together.

"I can't tell you that they are," she admitted reluctantly. "I don't know the answer and I'm worried about them myself. I didn't ever meet Mitsuki-dono, but some of the others that went there, I did know. Not all of them have been in Rukongai as long as she has... and besides, they're my squad mates. Of course I'm worried."

Juushirou gazed up at her, feeling suddenly guilty as he saw through his sister's calmness to the anxiety that lurked beneath. He sighed, closing his eyes.

"I'm sorry, Shiki-chan," he murmured. "I didn't mean..."

"For now, all I can do is wait. Wait, and help you," Shikiki cut across him, pushing back the folds of the white haori and placing chubby hands across the chest of his shihakushou. "Breathe normally, deeply, if you can, and try not to cough. I'll try and fix up your lungs a little, repair the mess you just made of them dragging your body across Inner Seireitei. Even if I can't answer your fears just yet, I think it would be better for both of us and for Retsu-sama if you were able to receive any news with a clearer mind. If anyone over there is hurt, we'll need all our resources to help them, and patching you up will just slow that down."

"I can't argue with that," Juushirou acknowledged, opening his eyes to see a faint, yet distinctive pink glow spread out from the young woman's finger tips, enveloping his ribcage with a sensation of deep, penetrating warmth. Different from all of the other healers in Seireitei on account of her unusual barrier magic, Shikiki's sense for healing had been honed by her years under Retsu's leadership, and, although she did not yet hold high rank in the division, she was renowned even among the Unohana as one of the most powerful and effective practitioners in Inner Seireitei. Born in the Districts, and orphaned by the purges of tyrannical Clanfolk, Shikiki's background had never been clearly defined, but as he watched her go about her task, Juushirou found himself absently grateful that he had managed to meet with her before she too had been killed. Shikiki had saved many lives over the years, including both his own and that of the Sixth's Vice Captain Shirogane, and Juushirou knew beyond all doubt that it was these small yet significant inroads that had turned the views of the proud, austere Kuchiki in favour of supporting District shinigami.

Shikiki's barriers rejected whatever damage was inside them, turning them back to a former state, and, though she could not reverse death itself, she was often called to the front line when a shinigami's injuries appeared to be unsurvivable. Just watching her now, Juushirou felt comforted.

"If Mitsuki is hurt, Shikiki, will you... do that... for her too?"

"If my comrades are injured, Juu-nii, I'll use every shred of my skills to bring them back from the brink," Shikiki's response came without a moment of hesitation. "That's why I have this power. Of course I would help. Don't be silly — just relax and let me put you back together again."

"You can't cure me," Juushirou reached up to push her hands back. "You shouldn't waste..."

"You should shut up and let me do my job," Shikiki sent him a pointed glare, and despite himself, Juushirou hesitated. "If I want to heal you, I will. This is Fourth Division and the only Captain's orders I obey are Retsu-sama's. She told me to take care of you, so I am. I'm not a little girl any more. I know the insides of your lungs thoroughly, and I know how to fix them without using too much of my reiryoku. I'll have plenty left for emergencies, if there indeed are any emergencies."

"Sorry," Juushirou said sheepishly, dropping his arm back to the bed, and Shikiki grimaced at him.

"Good. That's better," she said matter-of-factly. "I told you when you got the haori that I wasn't going to treat you as anything but Juu-nii and that means telling you off when you need telling."

Her eyes narrowed.

"I should send you to sleep," she reflected, and Juushirou's gaze became one of dismay.

"No! Please, Shiki-chan, don't do that! I want to know... when there's news, whatever it is, I..."

"I won't," Shikiki relented, "so long as you lie quietly and don't cause any trouble. Understood? No trying to sneak past me or anything like that. You stay put, and I won't sedate you, but if you dare so much as put a foot out of this room, I'll zap you myself. My aim is pretty good, and I think a few bruises from falling over are better than risking you triggering another haibyou event."

"You know, your bedside manner is sometimes a bit disconcerting," Juushirou murmured, though already he could feel the burning pain in his lungs subsiding to a dull, manageable ache. “You ought to talk to Unohana-taichou about that — if the patient wasn’t me, they might take it the wrong way.”

“Oh, don’t worry. It’s just you I talk to like this,” Shikiki said frankly, pushing her fingers beneath the dark folds of fabric and onto the pale skin of Juushirou’s chest, running them gently against the ribs that protruded slightly from his skinny form. “You’re not like the other Captains, so I don’t have to be formal with you. Don’t worry, I’m not shaming your family by threatening anyone else. You can take it, though. It’s fine so long as it’s you.”

“I’m starting to wonder what you think a big brother is,” Juushirou observed, and Shikiki grinned, her eyes lighting up despite her worry.

“For most sisters and brothers, a punch-bag, but in my case, I get to do the fixing up after, not the punching,” she said evenly. “You’re feeling better though, right? It’s helping?”

“It is,” Juushirou acknowledged.

“And you feel stupid now, right, for dashing out so impulsively and causing such a fuss?”

Shikiki lifted one plump paw to touch his cheek, where already the tears that had scattered there had dried. “Fever makes you act stupid, but you know, don’t you, deep down inside? You know how a shinigami Captain should behave and where you should be right now.”

“Mm,” Juushirou sighed heavily, allowing his head to move forward slightly into a feeble nod. “Enishi and Naoko have Thirteenth, though. In the circumstances, I’m better here than... than there. If the news is the worst... Shikiki, I’d rather they didn’t see me. I’d rather none of Thirteenth saw me.”

“Do you think that’s likely?” Shikiki’s question was in earnest this time, and Juushirou knew she was looking to him now as an older brother, seeking reassurance in his words as she had done from time to time as a young child. Unlike some of his other, more naive siblings, Shikiki had never been easily fobbed off with untruths, and try as he might, Juushirou could not pull words of optimism together.

“I don’t know,” he said softly, his voice shaking slightly. “I don’t want to think it, but it’s all I can think of.”

“You really love Mitsuki-dono, don’t you?” Shikiki withdrew her hands from his chest, the pink glow fading and dissipating into nothing. “Even after so many years apart, you still care for her like you did back then, don’t you?”

Juushirou lifted his hand to his throat, cupping it around the silver Kuchiki pendant.

“I do,” he agreed sadly. “Maybe it’s foolish for a Captain to have those feelings, but I do. If I know she’s all right, then I’ll be all right — but if she isn’t, if not...”

He stopped, unable to continue, and Shikiki sighed heavily.

“I’ll do whatever I can, if it’s needed,” she promised quietly. “You have my word on that, Juu-nii. Retsu-sama might send me in through the divide — she asked me already, if I’d be willing to go. She said that my skills might be of best use if the situation is serious, and they wouldn’t want to waste time getting people back here when I could be on site ready to begin at once. With my powers, time matters. I was going to stay here with you, but I think... maybe... I ought to go through.”

“No way that would be allowed. Your reiryoku is way, way too high to risk it,” she said bluntly. “Retsu-sama already sent a message to Second for the Onmitsukidou and some of them will be coming through the divide, too. They want people who have tight reiatsu control and who can move easily between locations if need be. From outside, nobody can sense my spirit power, so I’m an obvious choice to go. You, on the other hand, you’d be one of the worst. Even if you were well enough — which you’re not, you’re only feeling better because you’re no longer on your feet — Retsu-sama wouldn’t sanction it.”

“But...”

“Sending a Captain through would cause panic across Seireitei,” Shikiki said sensibly. “You know it and so do I. Captains aren’t deployed in things like this unless necessary. Retsu-sama will go, most likely, because this is her squad and it’s her duty to lead the rescue party, but an outside Captain? Nuh-uh. Did your fever take away all of your political common sense, Juu-nii? If this is what being in love does to you, remind me never to try it.”

“Gah,” Juushirou rubbed his brow ruefully, realising with a jolt the truth in his companion’s words. He had come here on a whim, driven by panic and nostalgia, but Shikiki's reproach was like a dash of cold water gushing over his body, forcing him back to his senses and making him re-assess his actions in a calmer, more practical light.

"Gah?" Shikiki tilted her head. "Was that a comment or a grunt of agreement? It's hard to tell."

"It was a grunt of reluctant acknowledgement," Juushirou raised his gaze. "All right. I won't go. You're right, it's foolish, and I'm letting my heart rule my head. I'm frightened, and I acted like a panicked civilian instead of a military officer in uniform. Mitsuki's life is precious to me, but if I push to go to Rukongai, I'll cause greater ripples for a whole lot more people, won't I? I'll stay here, Shiki-chan. I promise. Even if you go, I won't try to follow. You have my word."

"Good," Shikiki looked relieved, getting to her feet and patting him on the head as though he was a small child. "I'd better head back to Retsu-sama's office, then, and find out what's going on. Unless I miss my guess, some of the Onmitsukidou just arrived, and that means it won't be long before the gateway opens. If I'm going, I'll need to be ready at a moment's notice."

She bent to kiss him on the brow, then,

"Try and relax, even if it's hard," she whispered. "I'll try and find Mitsuki-dono, I promise. I'll try and save everyone, but her in particular. I'll tell her you're waiting for her... maybe that'll help."

With that she was gone, leaving Juushirou alone in the sterile chamber, and he sighed, sinking back against the bed with a groan of resignation.

Whether he wanted to go or not, his body had already gone on strike, refusing to move more than it had to, and he half wondered whether during her healing, Shikiki had used her spirit power to relax his muscles, making it impossible for him to get up. He had felt the dull hum of energy that heralded the arrival of Seireitei's black-clad secret forces, among them the familiar spiritual signature of his old school friend, Shihouin Kai, and so he knew Shikiki's judgement was correct. If things were happening, it would begin soon.

Kai didn't need to come himself, but he did, because it's Mitsuki. I'm sure that's the case — he came because one of our class was in trouble, and he might be able to help where nobody else can.

Juushirou closed his eyes briefly, ordering his thoughts as fear threatened to overwhelm him once more. In the back of his mind was her image, laughing and joking, those soft grey eyes that could be both gentle and kind or thundering like angry stormclouds, the thick dark hair and the delicate complexion that had made her appear both fragile and beautiful to his young, adolescent gaze. He had never met anyone like Mitsuki in the years before or since he had been a student at the Academy, and although Shikiki had brought him back to himself enough for him to control his panic, he knew that, if she was dead, he would not be able to keep it together.

Better nobody sees me, though, if that happens.

Juushirou's gaze flitted to the door.

Shunsui didn't follow me as far as Fourth. When Shikiki came out, his reiatsu disappeared, so I guess he went back to Eighth. I'm glad... right now I don't want him or anyone else lingering around. I want to know what happened, and no amount of company is going to make the wait for news easier. When I know what's happened, then I'll deal with it — but God, if Mitsuki's killed, I don't know how I'll process that. How I'll tell Naoko. How I'll face Sora. How...

Rest, Juushirou. Whatever news is to come, it hasn't come yet.

The gentle tones of In, the black fish of his zanpakutou spirit soothed him, her long, spectral tail brushing against his thoughts to reassure him.

Shunsui gave you the motif 'hope' when you were students. Now is one of those times you need to cling onto it.

Hope... huh.

Juushirou closed his eyes once more, certain that sleep could not possibly come at a time like this.

I'll try, In. I'm sorry, You. It's not easy, being a Captain and still not being able to protect everyone and everything, but... but this was Mitsuki's dream. Her goal, her reason for graduating and her aim in life. If... if it is the worst... then I'll try and cling on to that most of all. This is what she wanted... if the worst has happened, somehow... I'll just... just have to accept that.

“How is he?”

As Shikiki pushed open the door of her Captain's office, Retsu raised her head from the documents in front of her, casting her subordinate a questioning look. Despite the chaos around her, the Fourth Division Captain seemed as serene and in control as ever, but Shikiki was sharp-eyed and sensitive to her leader's feelings, and she could see the consternation lurking deep inside the older woman's dark eyes. Retsu was professional and would do her job to the letter, all too aware that, in a squad of shinigami with sharper than usual emotional sensors, any crack in her composure would cause deeper shockwaves to rent through the whole operation. She could not show her feelings, but Shikiki was in no doubt that Retsu was as worried about Mitsuki and her companions as any of them.

“He’ll be all right, now. He’s resting,” she answered, closing the door and crossing the floor towards the desk. “I’m here and ready to go too, Retsu-sama, if you need me. I felt the Onmitsukidou arriving, so thought I should report to you.”

“The gateway will open in the next ten minutes,” Retsu rolled the scroll into a tube, putting it on one side and gesturing for the nervous recruit hovering by the door to take it and file it in the relevant place on the shelf. “I’d be glad if you came too, Shikiki-san. Your abilities may be of great use to us, and it would be a comfort given that we do not know quite what we are stepping into.”

“We’ve tried on every frequency, and even one or two suggested to us in a kind message sent from Sekime-taichou, but nothing has worked,” she agreed levelly. “It seems there is no other option but to go in ourselves and see what has occurred.”

She led the way to the door, pulling it back and holding it open for her young companion to follow her down the hall.

“Kai-dono and three Onmitsukidou officers have arrived and are ready to accompany us,” she continued as they stepped out into the rear training grounds, making their way towards a knot of trees between which the Rukongai gateway was suspended. Indeed, as they rounded the corner of the old barracks building, Shikiki could make out the dark uniform of the secret operatives, the gold badge that glittered at the throat of one of them signifying him to be their leader and the Second Division’s Vice Captain, Shihouin Kai, although unlike the other Vice Captains, he wore no insignia on his arm. His amber eyes were expressionless and focused, and at Retsu’s approach he bowed his head towards her in acknowledgement of her summons.

“We are ready when you are, Unohana-taichou,” he said quietly, his words deferential and concise, betraying no emotion and asking no unnecessary questions.

“Thank you, Kai-dono,” Retsu acknowledged Kai’s words in the same matter-of-fact manner, inclining her head slightly in gratitude. “The gateway will open shortly. Please prepare your men for entry.”

“Yes, ma’am,” Kai agreed. There was the slightest twitch of his left hand, and immediately the three operatives tensed, preparing themselves for the moment they would dive into the unknown. It was impossible to know what lay on the other side of the divide, even if there was no immediate threat present, yet Shikiki felt no fear or apprehension in any of their auras, and this matter-of-fact approach to the job at hand settled her own heart. She knew, for Juushirou had told her, that Kai had been her brother’s classmate, and also a friend of the missing Edogawa Mitsuki.

Deep down, she was sure that the Onmitsukidou leader had come himself for that very reason, rather than dispatch his deputy, but despite that fact, no trace of his own concerns were etched on his dark features. The Onmitsukidou were largely a mystery to Shikiki, shrouded in secrecy and possessed of skills well suited to assassins and spies as well as the normal gamut of shinigami sword skills, but their presence here today made her feel safer. They were trained to kill without question in the face of an enemy — a ruthlessness that sat at odds with the Fourth Division’s pro-life mantra, but which was invaluable to Seireitei all the same.

On the far side of the gate, two Unohana shinigami hovered, relief peppering their expressions when they saw their Captain, and they too hastened forward, glad of someone to take the lead in such an unsettled situation.

“We’re ready to go, Taichou,” one of them, a thin young man in his middling thirties saluted Retsu sharply, and Retsu acknowledged him with a slight nod of her head.

“Be on your guard, all of you,” she said softly. “We have no idea what we might find on the other side, but most of all, we must do nothing to frighten or distress the Plus souls who call the Spiritless Zone their home. They will doubtless be confused if they encounter us, and we are not there to cause them any harm. We will head directly to the location from which the distress signal was sounded. There will be no deviations until we have learned what is amiss.”

Her gaze flitted to Kai at this juncture, who inclined his head. He did not speak, but in that one small gesture, Shikiki knew that he had accepted Retsu’s command as though it had come from his own Captain and would obey it without question.

Retsu pulled her zanpakutou from its sheath, the silver blade glinting slightly in the pale sunlight, then thrust it forward, slicing into the lock that held the specially crafted Senkaimon sealed closed. The filters and barriers that had blocked access to the lock were long since dispersed, and so, with a shimmer of atmosphere, the air began to split apart, opening a dark hole between the trees that soon became big enough for a person to walk through.

“The gateway will only remain open for three minutes,” Retsu said softly. “It is a security procedure and it will self-lock after that time. The lock is timed and will not release again from this side for twenty-four hours. We must go quickly now — step into the gateway and do not stop or look back.”

Shikiki swallowed hard, darting forward into the blackness. All around her she could sense the muffled presence of her companions doing the same as she was, but it was so dark inside the gateway that she could see nothing or noone, not even her own hands before her face. The sound of footsteps and breathing alone gave away the fact she had company, and had not, in fact, been plunged into oblivion on her own. As Retsu had said, the gateway had quickly sealed behind them, and Shikiki wondered momentarily how, if the gate was locked, they would be able to return from the other side. Trusting that her Captain knew the answer, she forced her mind to the task ahead, trying to mentally prepare herself for whatever was on the other side.

Unlike most healing shinigami, Shikiki did not pick up pain and distress signals as keenly as her comrades, her powers more given to healing through other methods, and so when she stepped out into the green and lush landscape of the Hokutan district, at first she could discern nothing of concern. A green field spread out before them, the air clear enough that she could see the rise and fall of the river valley in the distance, surrounded by the mountains that lay far beyond. There was no sign of burning or ravaging, no enemy army waiting to strip them limb from limb, and Shikiki turned to her Captain, opening her lips to make a comment to this effect.

The moment she saw Retsu’s face, however, the words froze in her throat.

The Captain’s gaze was fixed off to the left, her dark eyes clouded and full of consternation, and her normally pale complexion unusually white. Tension rippled through her body, and, with a jolt, Shikiki realised the woman was still clutching hold of her zanpakutou’s hilt, as though considering whether or not to release it. To do so, Shikiki knew, would imply that whatever danger was here overrode the tight restrictions on sword releases within Rukongai, and this fact alone gave Shikiki chills. Whatever Retsu had picked up on, she was willing to throw the whole of the Spiritless Zone’s foundations to hell in order to release Minazuki, and that meant things were as serious as they could possibly be.

“That way,” it seemed like hours, but in reality it was mere seconds before Retsu spoke, her words calm and even, belying the dismay reflected in her face. She raised her free hand to the left, and Kai exchanged glances with his Onmitsukidou companions, flicking his wrist before disappearing into a swift flashstep. The other operatives quickly followed suit, and Shikiki swallowed hard. Were they not going, then? Were they not needed? Was it...?

“We’ll follow them,” Retsu had sheathed Minazuki, letting out her breath in a heavy sigh as though by doing so she could calm her unsettled emotions. “Shikiki-san, you go ahead, since you have the least threatening reiatsu. There are Plus soul settlements nearby, and I can feel their confusion from here.”

She turned to the other two healers lingering nearby, looking troubled for a moment, then,

“Hiroki-kun, Imae-san, please go to them, reassure them that all is well and ensure nobody is hurt,” she said softly. “If you encounter anything of concern, send up a Kidou flare.”

“Within the Spiritless Zone, Taichou?” Hiroki stared at her, and Retsu nodded her head curtly.

“Their lives are more important than applying usual protocol,” she said gently, a faint reproach in her tones. “Go now, and swiftly. I shall make some examinations of my own in this area — there is something in the air here that I would like a moment longer to examine by myself.”

“Yes, ma’am,” Shikiki knew better than to argue when her Captain looked like that, despite her apprehension at being sent on ahead with only the black-clad secret operatives for company, and she slipped into shunpo, following the faint traces of reiatsu trail that the Onmitsukidou agents had purposefully left behind. They had not gone far, and, as she dropped out of her flashstep, she saw that they were at the perimeter of what appeared to be a makeshift settlement — a campsite that resembled those Shikiki had used herself in the field on more than one occasion. She had no time to dwell on this fact, however, for one of the black-clad Onmitsukidou waved her over, gesturing to a crumpled form that lay on the ground.

His words were cold and detached, rankling against Shikiki’s nerves, but she swallowed her emotions, coming across the grass to join him. As soon as she laid eyes on the broken shape, however, she understood the reason for the question, for the corpse was saturated with dried blood, his ripped shihakushou caked to his body and his obi dyed so darkly red that it was impossible to distinguish the shinigami uniform from the casual wear of local peasant peoples. Bending down at his side, Shikiki hovered her hand over his wrecked form, searching for any sign of lingering reiatsu, but there was none, and the body was cold. She shivered involuntarily, then turned back to her silent, impassive companion.

“There’s another over there,” the Onmitsukidou jerked his head towards the shelter of the tree. “Kai-dono’s investigating the heart of the camp. We suggest you stay on the perimeters till he gives you the all clear — the enemy might still be in location.”

With that he was gone, leaving Shikiki to gather her wits at his callous instructions.

She gazed down at the corpse once more, knowing that, in other circumstances she would have shed tears, but, right then, there was no time. Saying an inward apology to her dead comrade, she stepped over his body, moving towards the fallen shape of his companion. This one was more easily recognisable, his chest a mess of blood and bone from a knife wound, his eyes open and sightless, and Shikiki felt her heart ache with grief as she recognised his young features. They had been recruits together, she remembered sadly. He had been so excited when he had been chosen to go to Rukongai... and now...

“Shikiki!”

Kai’s voice cut through her bitter remeniscences and she raised her head, seeing the leader of the Onmitsukidou waving to her from near one of the tents. There had been urgency in his words, and Shikiki’s heart leapt at the implication of this. Was someone alive?

“I’m coming!” she exclaimed, hurrying across the ground towards him and only just managing not to trip over the uneven earth in her haste.

“Madeki-dono, I think,” Kai was knelt at the side of something still and heavy on the ground, but as she moved closer, Shikiki could sense the faintest of pulses, and her heart skipped another beat.

“He’s alive,” Kai’s next words confirmed her hopes. “I can’t wake him, though. I’m not sure what’s happened — I don’t see any obvious wounds, but it could be something else. Be careful... tend him if you can. He seems to be breathing all right, but I don't know whether he's safe to be moved or not yet."

"I'll take care of him," Shikiki was on her knees before her companion finished speaking, chubby hands pulling apart her superior officer's shihakushou and fingers pressing against his ribcage to absorb the rhythm of the patient's pulse. "Did you... was there anyone..?"

"Four, in the tent. Dead," Kai's words cut across hers, and he got to his feet, brushing down the legs of his shihakushou. "I'll leave him to you. There are meant to be eleven — so far we've only accounted for seven."

The words sliced through Shikiki like a knife blade, and she bit her lip, knowing that, bad timing or not, the tears would likely come anyway. At her expression, Kai offered her a grim smile.

"It's not enough to take back yet," he said cryptically. "We need to find them all."

"Yes, sir," Shikiki said softly, and Kai nodded, turning on his heel and heading back towards the blood-soaked remains of the tent. She watched him go, all the time monitoring Madeki's pulse-rate to make sure that it did not falter. Someone else had been here before her, she noted absently. There were lingering traces of some drug in his aura, but it had been mostly neutralised by what she knew was a familiar form of healing Kidou. The spell she knew, but the gentle reiatsu she did not, and she drew her hand back, moving to smooth Madeki's rumpled shihakushou back into place.

Someone else already saved you. That means there's another healer here, somewhere... someone else who survived. Someone who had enough presence of mind to purify your blood and then take the transmitter, setting off the alarm? It's not a reiatsu I know, though. So... who?

She closed her eyes, spreading her senses far and wide across the campsite. Although she wasn't as naturally attuned to others' distress as some of her companions, with focus and concentration she could usually pick out the disturbed spirits of the wounded, and she scrunched up her brow, picking up each living aura in turn and analysing it before discarding it.

Onmitsukidou. The one I spoke to at the boundary... and Kai-dono. I don't sense the other two — I guess they've moved further afield, trying to trace what killed everyone. Madeki-dono is here, beneath my touch — that's what Kai-dono called him, so that must be right, even though it's my first time meeting him face to face. Someone healed him, though...

Something flashed against her thoughts, brief and feeble, yet unmistakably the signal of a third life force, and Shikiki redoubled her efforts, trying desperately to grasp onto its signal before it floated away from her again. It was disjointed and fragmented, the aura of someone who had been badly hurt, and, as she locked into it more closely, she realised with a jolt that it was not one aura at all but two, one suppressed so deeply that, had she not felt the same sensation against Madeki's skin, she might never have located it at all.

The other healer... and one more hurt?

Shikiki's eyes snapped open, and she gazed around her wildly, back towards the entrance of the camp.

There? But we looked there. It was there... surely...

Out loud she said,

"Kai-dono! Kai-dono, are you there?"

"I am," Kai emerged from the tent, casting her a quizzical look, and Shikiki gestured in the direction of the campsite entrance.

"Something... there," she said hesitantly. "I can't see it... but I can feel it. Someone's aura, and something else. I think... someone's trying to hide..."

"Hide?" Kai's eyes narrowed thoughtfully. "Where exactly do you sense it, Shikiki? By the trees? Near the dead guards? Where?"

"Between them. Closer to that thicket, maybe beneath it," Shikiki said slowly. "I'm not certain, but it seems as though... from there."

"Do you recognise the aura?" Kai's hand was already clasped around the hilt of his black-bladed weapon, and Shikiki shrugged.

"I thought I did... on Madeki-dono's body," she said helplessly. "I don't know whose it is, but someone neutralised whatever poison he took in, and it must've been a healer. I know the spell. It was that same reiatsu, alongside something too damaged to make out clearly."

She shook her head in frustration.

"I'm not as good at this as Retsu-sama and some of the others," she admitted. "I can't pick things up so easily."

"Unohana-taichou sent you on ahead because putting bits of people back together quickly is your chief skill," Kai said briskly, slipping his slight form into the gap between her and the shadowed area of thick vegetation she had indicated. "You've mended enough broken bones among my men for me to understand why she chose you. Being here... would distress the others and probably make them far less useful. If you can keep a cool head, you can help. That's her reasoning."

He pulled the sword from his belt, running his fingers through the air near the forest thicket, then, muttering something under his breath, he drew the sharp end of the weapon in a swift horizontal line from left to right. The atmosphere shimmered slightly, and Shikiki's eyes widened as she saw what looked like a spectral curtain fall away, scattering into fragments of broken spiritual energy.

"Kidou," Kai said matter-of-factly, grabbing hold of a nearby branch and pulling it forcibly back to reveal what looked like the remains of a wide animal den dug deep beneath the roots. "You were right. They're in there."

"Kai-dono, please, let me! They're not... I don't think it's..." Shikiki protested, but Kai was not listening to her. He ripped the section of bush out, tossing it aside and dropping down in front of the opening, blue light flickering from his fingers to illuminate the darkness beyond.

"It's all right. You can come on out now, Edogawa," he said softly, his tones gentle as he set his weapon aside, reaching out his right hand into the tunnel as though in reassurance. "It's Kai. Shihouin Kai. Shikiki's here too, and people from the Fourth. Your signal was received. We've come to help."

"Shi... hou... in-kun?"

The voice was weak and blurry, as though the speaker was using all of her strength just to put the words together, and Kai's expression darkened.

"Yes," he said evenly. "Can you get yourself out? You've a comrade in there too, haven't you? We need to get them free too — Shikiki needs to look at them, see if she can help."

"I... I..."

Shikiki saw pale fingers emerge from the hole, trembling visibly as it clawed the air, and Kai grasped hold of it tightly, squeezing the hand as if to reassure its owner. He turned to Shikiki, eying her broad form for a moment, then,

"You look strong. Are you?"

"Strong enough," Shikiki reddened at the blunt appraisal, nodding. "Why?"

"Come help me get them out," Kai shifted his body around so that he was facing the hole more directly, not loosing his hold on the fragile hand for a moment. “Edogawa’s at the end of her tether. She’s not going to get out on her own — we’re going to have to do it for her.”

“Edogawa...” Shikiki’s eyes widened, and she stared at Kai in disbelief. Kai nodded sharply.

“Yes,” he said, his tone preventing any further questions on the subject. “Are you going to help me or not?”

“I am,” Shikiki agreed quickly, squeezing her considerable frame down beside him. “What do you want me to do? I’m trained as a healer, but digging out holes isn’t my speciality.”

“Mine either, but you know, the Gotei gives its own challenges,” Kai said dryly. “Edogawa! Can you move yourself at all?”

There was no reply, and Kai gritted his teeth.

“At your limit, huh?” he murmured, more to himself than to his companion. “Right then. Shikiki, I need one of your barriers. Can you fire it into the hole? Is that possible?”

“Possible, but why?” Shikiki stared at Kai as though he was mad, and Kai clicked his tongue against the roof of his mouth, sizing up the hole once more.

“I’m going to cut through the earth, or at least, try,” he admitted at length. “I don’t want to risk cutting through whoever’s in there, though, too. I can’t tell completely, but from the echo when Edogawa spoke, I think they’ve got through to an underground den or chamber that some animal once used but long since abandoned. They’re safe enough there, but I don’t want to leave them when they probably need help. I can’t tell if they’re both hurt, but you said you thought one was, and...”

“Then we can’t risk making those injuries worse getting them free, and we certainly can’t leave them there.”

Kai turned, scanning the landscape for his stray Onmitsukidou officer.

“Karaki! Find Unohana-taichou, bring her here at once!” he bellowed, and out of the corner of her eye, Shikiki saw the black-clad figure salute sharply, before disappearing into swift, clean shunpo.

“I sent the others to follow a blood trail into the forest,” Kai said blackly. “I should have waited, but it looked as though there was only Madeki-dono here. Healer wits are still better than Onmitsukidou ones when it comes to things like this — I'd forgotten how good Edogawa was at Kidou. Maybe she thought that we were more danger coming, and so she hid."

"The shinigami at the gates were killed by a blade," Shikiki murmured. "Hollows don't carry swords. They were killed by... by people. Souls. Maybe... the people they were protecting."

"It doesn't bear thinking about, does it?" Kai agreed darkly. "Right now, though, our problem is getting out survivors. Aim as best you can. I'll slash through with Meimei Anshi and hope for the best."

"Yes, sir," Shikiki nodded her head, spreading her fingers out towards the hole opening. It was harder, guiding a barrier around an area she could not see, but, as her magic brushed against Mitsuki's aura, she found she could follow the shape of the other's body, realising that it was shielding the form of another. Shikiki didn't know this person's reiatsu either, but she managed to lock onto it enough to spread her protective shell, and, once she was sure it was firmly in place, she gave Kai a nod.

"I'm ready. And they're both alive, just about," she told him. "We can get them out, Kai-dono. I can tell. There's a lot of blood, but I can do something about that one. She's bad, but not beyond me. As soon as I can see what I'm doing, I can put her back together and stabilise her, I'm pretty sure."

"Good, that's what I wanted to hear," Kai said matter-of-factly, swinging Meimei Anshi speculatively a couple of times before driving the sealed ebony blade through the thick dry earth, sending a cloud of dust up all around them as he slashed savagely through the rock and root debris, exposing the ditch that lay below. As he had surmised, the tunnel led to an old animal earth, and, between Kai's efforts and Shikiki's barrier magic, the two sheltering healers were quickly exposed.

Shikiki had known it was bad, but as she laid eyes on the wounded woman for the first time, she felt her heart lurch in her throat. Blood caked the front of her uniform, a jagged slash through the black fabric peeled back to reveal an angrier hole in her gut through which severed bits of organs protruded. The glittering energy of someone's spirit blade also lingered there, struggling to knit the damage back together despite its gravity, and Shikiki saw the hilt of a weapon lying to one side in the dip, proof that the healing had been ongoing as they had arrived.

Her companion, the one Kai had called Edogawa, and who Shikiki now knew was Juushirou's beloved Mitsuki was white as a ghost, her entire body racked with shivers as she struggled to protect her companion from the elements. She had exhausted her own healing powers to keep her companions alive, Shikiki realised with a jolt, to the point where she had forced her zanpakutou to release not only once but twice to try and maintain the gored woman's grip on life. A pair of hazy grey eyes flickered up towards Kai's concerned golden ones, and for a moment, Shikiki saw relief glitter in their depths. Then the lashes fluttered closed, and Mitsuki slumped against the earth, the tension off her now that help had arrived.

"Edogawa!" Kai muttered a curse, slipping down into the ditch and putting a finger to her throat.

"She's fainted," Shikiki told him, moving across to Seri's side and spreading her barrier more firmly over the woman's ripped abdomen. "She's not hurt. This one is worse."

"She overshot her own abilities, didn't she?" Kai asked, and Shikiki nodded.

"I think so," she said soberly. "She used her spirit power on Madeki-dono, too, and I think, from the way this one's bleeding has more or less stopped, she used her zanpakutou a couple of times to try and mend the damage. Then the Kidou to keep them hidden when we arrived — it was all she could do, protect the one she was healing right then, even if it killed her."

"If we hadn't found her...?"

"She might have burned out completely," Shikiki agreed. "Retsu-sama will know better, though I can't see any blood on her that's her own. She's dishevelled, but all of the stains on her clothing link back to this person's reiatsu."

She sighed, shaking her head slowly.

"I don't know her name," she admitted helplessly. "I've never seen her before, although I know she's a comrade. Mitsuki-dono, too. I know who she is, because of Juu-nii... but... this is the first time..."

She paused, glancing at Kai quizzically.

"You came yourself to see if she was alive, didn't you?" she asked curiously. "I know you went to school with Juu-nii, and that being the case..."

"Edogawa is a friend of mine, yes," Kai agreed. "A rum Kuchiki, but a friend all the same. Yes, Shikiki, I did. Professional it might not be, but when I got Unohana-taichou's message, there wasn't any other course of action I was going to take."

"Mm," Shikiki pursed her lips, then nodded.

"If it was Kirio-chan, I'd be the same," she admitted. "I understand... the bonds the Academy creates between people."

"Will that one live?" Kai asked, and Shikiki shrugged.

"Mitsuki-dono's sword has kept her alive so far, but probably my skills are better suited to this kind of thing than hers," she said critically. "I'll do my best to fix as much of the damage as I can, once we're back at Fourth, but right now I'm only rendering her safe to move. Obviously something pretty awful happened here, and if there's an assassin with a sword..."

"Maybe a crazed Plus soul contaminated and on the verge of Hollowfication," Kai ruminated out loud. "I've never seen it like this before, true, but Madeki-dono did send a message about potential contaminated souls just a short time ago. Now this... maybe it's more significant than we think."

"He did?" Shikiki looked blank, and Kai offered a rueful smile.

"That's information you ought to keep to yourself," he said honestly. "It's not meant to be general knowledge."

"Oh," Shikiki frowned, turning her attention to strengthening the barrier around Seri's body. "This isn't as easy as I thought. There was something dark in whatever cut her... maybe even spiritual poison of some kind, I don't think this was a sword, Kai-dono. The wound is all wrong... I think..."

"Hollow?" Kai asked, and Shikiki nodded.

"Yes," she agreed, "and one with a particularly nasty spiritual aura. Maybe a spider... or a snake, or something else with poisonous properties. It's hard to pin down which, but there's definitely some kind of residue that's making it harder to heal the wound. No wonder Mitsuki-dono was struggling to knit it with her sword."

"I see. If that's the case, maybe the soul turned mid-attack, then," Kai reflected, turning to sniff the air. "I'll take your word on the genre of Hollow, although I don't sense that kind of presence here."

"Me either," Shikiki admitted, "but then, there's not enough of her blood here, either. Probably it happened somewhere else. Maybe nearby. I don't suppose that my patient would've been able to walk —

I'd be surprised if she was even conscious."

"In emergencies, souls can do amazing things to overcome death," Kai said sagely. He sighed, getting to his feet and leaping neatly out of the dip onto the side.

"I'll recall my men, and wait for the rest of your people to get here," he continued. "We're still missing a couple of healers, since with Edogawa and this other girl, we've now accounted for nine. Two more, but given the brutality here, it's not a hunt I want Fourth Division doing. It should be left to us to carry out."

"I suppose so," Shikiki chewed on her lip. "None of it makes sense, though."

"We'll worry first about getting the wounded back to Seireitei, and then we'll start a proper investigation," Kai promised, his gaze flitting once more to Mitsuki's white face. "We'll talk to Edogawa, too, when she's more able to speak. Killing healers is the lowest blow of the low, so it won't be forgotten easily. You have my word, Shikiki — whatever happened here, we'll get to the bottom of it."

12. Stalked

Chapter Eleven: Stalked

Tenichi raised a dusty fist, rapping lightly on the makeshift wall of the scientist’s hidden study, deep within the network of rotten barriers and unsteady shelters that in total comprised the heart of Keitarou’s Rukongai lair. It was hardly what the Gotei would imagine when thinking of their most wanted man, he reflected to himself, tapping his toe impatiently against the uneven hunks of gravel that someone had failed to sweep evenly back to create a pathway to the main door. Keitarou’s name was not often mentioned in polite Seireitei society, but when it was, it was with the grandiose exaggeration of the master villain, living the high-life somewhere outside of shinigami reach. There had been many theories bandied about, most across drunken ryokan tables on patrol when the sake had flowed freely, but though the majority placed this elusive man somewhere in the Real World, the reality could not be more different.

Impoverished and desperate, yet resourceful and opportunistic enough to survive and make the best of what he had. That, perhaps, was Keitarou’s true threat, Tenichi mused to himself idly, for even in a land with no resources, he had ways and means to act.

“Keitarou-san, it’s Tenichi. May I come in?”

How long had he been in Rukongai now? He had lost count, the days and nights moving along so slowly and he hardly noticed the rise and set of the sun hidden behind so much thick cloud. He knew, for his distant, if ever obliging babysitter Koku had told him that Keitarou had sent a ransom note to Hirata some days earlier, but nobody had mentioned the matter again to Tenichi since and indeed, they had seemed a lot more preoccupied since that message had been passed. Tenichi’s spirit power was still sealed, but his wits were well about him, and he had noticed how even the few Plus souls who had begun venturing out in his presence since he had helped Natsuko find water had once more withdrawn to their homes. It wasn’t him, this time, who was scaring them, of that Tenichi was sure. Whatever was wrong was in the air, heavy and intangible, and without his reiryoku, he had no way of analysing it any further.

At length there were the sound of shuffled steps, Keitarou’s slightly uneven gait giving away his presence as he crossed the floor towards the cloth divide that acted as a door. The fabric twitched, then was pulled back, and Tenichi found himself face to face with the other man, his appearance somewhat disheveled and his eyes more than a little bloodshot, as though he had been working through the night. Perhaps he had, Tenichi mused, his gaze roving past the slim figure to the chaotic chamber beyond, and at his look, Keitarou laughed, nodding as though guessing his companion's thoughts.

"I'm sorry. I'd fallen asleep," he said apologetically, ushering the young shinigami inside and allowing the cloth to fall behind them both. He gestured for Tenichi to make himself as comfortable as possible, touching his finger to what looked like a basic, handmade Kidou lamp and illuminating the chamber in a fresh layer of light that made it easier to see without straining the eyes. "I've been quite busy these past two days — looking for information for you, as well as other matters. Even so, though, I've delayed and I'm sorry for it. You must be doubting my word very much right now, as so many days have passed and you still find yourself among us."

"Have you heard from my Captain?" Tenichi crossed his legs, leaning back against the wall and hearing it creak slightly under his weight. He hurriedly sat up straight, afraid the whole building might come crashing down around them, and Keitarou smiled wryly at his alarm.

"It's stood here a long time, I doubt you will bring it down," he said softly. "Most of the foundations run quite deep. We commandeered what we could — basic as it appears, it has to withstand some of the harsher weather and the strong winds that rattle through these parts on a regular basis."

"I see," Tenichi hesitated, then cautiously sank back against the wood once more, finding that this time the creak was softer and less alarming. "Keitarou-san, about my Captain?"

"Ah yes," Keitarou's amusement faded and he pursed his lips, apparently debating how best to begin his answer.

"You have heard from him?" Tenichi pressed, and Keitarou's eyes became near slits.

"Your Captain and I have no good memories and less connection between us than most," he admitted honestly. "If he knew I had you, it would bring everyone into the greatest jeopardy. I therefore sent Kurotsuchi to Seireitei with a letter, but with coin and a clear instruction to give the message to a low-born messenger. I assume it reached its destination, but have no way of knowing for sure. All I can tell you is that there has been no activity in Seireitei around the Seventh Division. Kurotsuchi is there now, and sends me regular updates, but so far it seems that the Captain of the Seventh has no interest in meeting our demands.”

“Taichou’s abandoning me?” Tenichi’s eyes widened in dismay. “Over a few supplies and building materials?”

“I didn’t say that,” Keitarou held up his hands. “I said that I had had no response. Without knowing if the message got to him, I can’t say more than that. Besides...”

He schooled his features into a look of consternation, and Tenichi frowned at the shadows that reflected in his mud-slurried eyes.

“Kurotsuchi fed back to me some other distressing news at the same time,” he added, softening his voice as if hoping nobody outside would hear. “I’ve kept it to myself, but I’ll tell you, seeing as it connects to the Gotei. It relates to the Spiritless Zone — you know about that, I think?”

“Indeed,” Keitarou agreed grimly. “Big Sekkiseki walls divide it from us, and those of us possessed of spirit power can’t pass through, even though the resources there are far superior to those here. If we could, probably we wouldn’t need to raid Seireitei so much, but that’s another matter. I don’t know any details, being that the Spiritless Zone is a shinigami domain and I have no interest in crossing shinigami paths if I can avoid it, but I believe there was some kind of distress alert issued around the same time I ordered my message to be delivered. It’s likely nothing — shinigami have those things all the time and most likely it’s just a drill or a Hollow incursion — but they seem to take stuff very seriously. All in all, it’s probable your Captain has other things on his mind.”

“I see,” Tenichi felt some of his hurt begin to fade, replaced with concern over the fate of those deployed within the restricted area. “What kind of Hollow would operate in the Spiritless Zone?”

“I wouldn’t know that. Kurotsuchi isn’t exactly in with the local leaders, and I’ve never been to this secure region,” Keitarou pointed out drolly, and Tenichi flushed red.

“I suppose not. Sorry.”

“It’s all right,” Keitarou shrugged, dismissing it with a flick of his hand. “In any case, that has little bearing on what I want to show you now. I’ve no intention of keeping you here long term, because I made you a promise and whether your Captain pays ransom or not, I will release you back to Seireitei. I want you to know I keep my word, and if you’re to help me bring supplies here, losing one ransom will not mean the loss of any lives. With that in mind, I’ve been going through the bits and pieces of maps I’ve managed to salvage over the years — some from old bases and hiding places that Kurotsuchi’s raided for me, and others which I’ve put together from memory. You wanted to find Daisuke’s grave — and so I’ll do my best to help you find it.”

“Koku said it would be dangerous for you to take me there yourself,” Tenichi murmured thoughtfully, and Keitarou nodded his head, reaching for the nearest and largest of several old, yellowing scrolls and spreading it out on the floor between them.

“It is. It will be,” he agreed matter-of-factly. “I don’t go to Seireitei because my face is known by enough of the higher ranking shinigami to make such trips an unnecessary risk. Looking at the maps, though, I soon realised that too much land has changed since my altercation with my cousin Nagesu, and the area where Daisuke’s body lies is no longer so clearly marked on the more recent maps I’ve managed to obtain. I’m sure I’ll know the area when I see it — but I’m not confident of giving you accurate directions. I want you to trust my word, even if you don’t agree with my past politics.”

He sighed, rubbing his eyes, and Tenichi was struck by the genuine weariness in the other man’s demeanour.

“More than that, though, Daisuke would want to see you,” he said softly, his voice echoing slightly with barely suppressed emotion. “He was like a brother to me, so you and Ketsui are as nephews would be. If I can take you to his final resting place, he’d be happy. For that reason alone, I intend to take the risk. For once, I’m going to come with you — because it’s important that I do this myself.”

“What if we’re seen?” Tenichi was anxious, and Keitarou shrugged.

“I know good Kidou, and I’ll robe for stealth,” he promised. “If anyone happens to disturb us, it won’t be me they see. If they find you, all you need do is tell them you escaped from being held captive nearby, and I’ll slip away while they search the area for clues. I’m good at escaping — better than most, you might say, since it’s that and not a sword blade that’s kept me alive as long as this.”

He smiled, eying Tenichi quizzically.

“Are you concerned for me?” he teased lightly. “Should not an enemy of the Gotei be arraigned and held according to Council justice?”

“Yes...” Tenichi hesitated, then shook his head. “No. I mean, yes, if you had been... if you were trying to hurt people and bring down families, maybe I would feel that way. But... I’ve seen things here... I dunno. You might’ve done things I don’t agree with, but you are looking after these people. They don’t have anything else... and if I took you away from them, they’d probably die.”

“Yes, they probably would,” Keitarou agreed gravely. “I’m glad you realise it, my boy. It means I can rest easy that, when you go back, you won’t tell anyone about your time here.”

“I’d already decided not to. It’s not as though anyone would understand,” Tenichi snorted. “The people here venerate you. You and Eiraki-hime, both of you can do no wrong. There’s evidence all around that you’re the difference between survival and devastation.”

He pressed his lips together, debating for a moment, then, “Keitarou-san, I have one question. If you can’t answer, then I won’t get angry, only... at the edge of the local village, there’s a patch of land that seems, well, especially forsaken. There’s a high fence of dead bush branches blocking the access, mostly, but I’m pretty sure something else lies beyond. Nobody seems to go there, though, and I wondered... what it is?”

“Ah,” After seeing Natsuko’s fear, Tenichi had expected anger or furtiveness from his host, but instead Keitarou smiled ruefully, nodding his head. “I didn’t think you’d overlook something like that — but it’s better you don’t go there. A very sick individual is housed in that building, as its one of the few places in this district which still has a locking door. We keep him separate from the others on account of his disease. He suffers with madness, and we’ve discovered that his ailment is contagious. I have been trying to help him, but I’m not a healer nor a psychologist, and progress is slow. When awake, he babbles incoherence, and when asleep, his nightmares give off such negative vibes anyone in the nearby vicinity is also driven mad with fear or rage. One soul even died, in full view of the whole village, and after that I forbade anyone from going there. Not that any of them wanted to — that’s why it became such an isolated place. I didn’t want to frighten you, so I didn’t mention it — but... perhaps I underestimated what you could handle. In any regard, it’s better to stay away. There’s nothing you can do to help. This is what spirit power does, when it rails out of control and corrupts the very core of

“No, but you’re right, that is the next step in the process,” he said, shrugging his shoulders helplessly. “He has been like this for years — at least twenty — and I have managed to keep the Hollow at bay, but it is hard work and I may lose the battle. If worst comes to the worst, I may be forced to kill him. He is a dangerous individual, death lacing every thought and every word, and I wouldn’t like to guarantee your safety around him.”

“I wasn’t going to trespass,” Tenichi assured his companion. “I was curious, that’s all — but I won’t interfere any more.”

As Natsuko said. It conceals a monster.

He processed this fact carefully, analysing Keitarou’s explanation in his mind and finding that, although Keitarou had given no name, his account more or less matched with what the Rukongai girl had told him.

Keitarou-san didn’t lie to me, or try to stall me. He told me straight away — so Natsuko’s fear must’ve been for the creature inside. Understandable, too, given what she said and what I’ve just heard — a soul broken in madness on the verge of sinking into a Hollow state... but surely even Keitarou-san can’t reverse Hollowfication?

“Maybe you should be careful,” he added as an afterthought. “If this person is so dangerous, maybe they can also poison you.”

“Some would say I was already mad,” Keitarou said speculatively, and despite himself, Tenichi grinned.

“I suppose that’s true,” he agreed, “but I don’t really think so.”

“Ah,” Keitarou’s tired eyes lit up with something that might have been relief, or even pleasure at these casually spoken words. “Does that mean you’ve forgiven me for bringing you here by force?”

“I don’t suppose there was any other way of doing it,” Tenichi sighed. “I don’t like that you did, so no, not entirely. Ketsui will probably be worried, and my Captain and Vice Captain livid. Worse, Kikyue-dono will be on the warpath and I dread to think what she’ll do to me for being stupid enough to get abducted. Even so, though...”

“I guess I’ve begun to remember other things, since I’ve been here,” Tenichi rubbed his brows. “When we were kids, the things you did and the stuff you explained to me about the world around us. If you were the crazy homicidal maniac the Council believed, you wouldn't have wasted so much time with two stupid kids. Nor would you be taking care of however many Rukongai waifs, giving them your food and water when your own supplies are limited and unreliable. Perhaps you might say I've formed a more balanced view of who you are. My memories and everything the Gotei has taught me are rather at odds with each other... now I'm trying to find a happy medium that balances them both."

"You probably won't manage that," Keitarou said pragmatically. "I am the monster the Council likes to label me, and I did kill people. Endou Shouichi died on the end of my blade, and I've never denied it, nor apologised for it. I watched him slaughter hundreds of innocent Urahara, including your father... but the Gotei don't like to weigh those lives as equals when a Clan leader's life is on the other side of the scale. In my mind, Shouichi was the bigger monster — but I've long since learned my voice isn't one that will ever be heard, much less listened to."

"I don't know how I feel about that, yet," Tenichi owned. "I want to know more about Father... about his death."

"I don't think you really do."

"No, I need to," Tenichi made up his mind. "I need to know everything, now. Not just from you telling me, Keitarou-san, but from other places, too. I'm not sure how, not yet, but... after being here with you and hearing your side of things, I know that the official version won't do any longer. I have to find those missing pieces of the puzzle. His grave is the first step, but not the last."

Keitarou chuckled.

"That expression and those words remind me so much of your father," he said nostalgically. "Your brother may have his Urahara appearance, Tenichi, but Daisuke's spirit was partly handed down to you. Maybe it's a selfish motive in among those more altruistic, but I dearly wanted to be able to spend time with you like this. I don't suppose Ketsui was old enough to remember clearly what things were like before you were sent into exile, and his discomfort the last time we met made it clear to me that I probably won't ever be able to reach him on any level. You, though, I had hopes for. Not politically, but as kin, however estranged we have become."

"I'm not my father, Keitarou-san," Tenichi spoke quietly, pressing his lips together pensively. "I'm a shinigami. You won't change that."

"I don't want to," Keitarou assured him. "On the contrary, if people like you can be shinigami, then I have faith that the world is changing and will continue to move towards a more balanced future. When that happens, people like Daisuke won't have died in vain... and he can rest easy in his grave knowing his sons are both making him proud, defending the weak."

"You sound different when you talk about him," Tenichi acknowledged, and Keitarou nodded.

"He was to me what Ketsui is to you," he repeated simply. "I miss him very much. Just talking about him won't bring him back, though."

He set the map aside, folding pale fingers absently together before him as he considered.

"Tomorrow morning, Tenichi-kun — early, if possible, we'll leave this place," he decided. "I have delayed long enough, and it would truly be selfish of me to hold you here longer, much as I've enjoyed having your company. It will take a little while for me to find and break into a Senkaimon without being detected, and I'd like you to be ready to go at a moment's notice, since I won't be able to hold a gate open for very long. It's dangerous for the people here if I risk drawing attention to this location, so I want to make sure we're quick."

"I understand," Tenichi agreed frankly, relief glittering in his eyes. He grasped Keitarou's outstretched hand, shaking it firmly before getting to his feet. "I'll be up and ready, don't worry."

He is going to send me home. He's going to help me find Father and then he's going to let me go home. So long as he does that... I'll keep my word to him too. People in Seireitei might not understand, but they haven't seen the state of the people here. Protecting them is part of my shinigami duty, too — so I'll do what I can for them, even if it means taking a few little risks. In comparison to the life and death struggles of these people every day, it's not that much to do.

He pushed back the fabric divide, ducking his head and stepping out into the night air. The night was quiet, and though there was a certain mugginess in the atmosphere, there was a light breeze that made the walk back towards the hut he had been using as shelter not unpleasant. Maybe he was starting to acclimatise to Rukongai's sparsity, he reasoned to himself with a rueful half smile. Or maybe, just as he was about to leave it, he had gained perspective enough to consider his coming here not so wholly bad.

"Got you!"

The yell came out of nowhere, and before Tenichi could react, something dropped out of the sky above him, knocking him off his feet and pinning him to the ground, trapping his arms against his body with determined knees. A hand ran through his reddish hair, grasping it and pulling it back with a jerk, whilst a second arm snaked around his throat, pressing against his windpipe with just enough pressure to make him gasp.

The words were little more than a hiss against his ear, the rush of hot air of someone’s breath making him shiver involuntarily. Whether it was a man or a woman, he could not tell, but as he struggled to pull himself free, the hold at his throat tightened, cutting off his breath completely for a full thirty seconds before loosening and allowing him to drag air once more into his lungs. Dust and dirt from the ground swirled up against his nose and mouth, making him cough, but whoever sat atop his prone body made no attempt to shift their weight. Instead there was a low, derisive chuckle, and Tenichi realised with a jolt that once more he had been taken completely off guard.

Fear rippled through him. Without his reiryoku, and in such a vulnerable position, how could he fight back?

Was it Kurotsuchi, bent on some nefarious errand once more, or someone else, someone with a deep grudge against shinigami who had watched him wander free around the village from behind the rotting curtains of the mud-splashed shacks?

Koku’s voice cut through the stifling darkness, every syllable ringing with blessed relief in Tenichi’s panicked ears. There was a snarl from his assailant, making Tenichi wonder if whoever had brought him down was actually human or part animal, but the choke hold on his throat was released, the hand on his head tightening its grip around his hair.

“I said get off him, Sakaki,”

Koku’s words held no emotion, nor were his tones hurried or panicked, and Tenichi heard the sound of shuffling footsteps against the dust as someone moved gradually closer. “Keitarou-san brought him here. He’s not someone you can kill, so get off him before you do something you regret.”

“I don’t take orders from you,” the person called Sakaki spat out the response, yet this time the words sounded more sullen and defensive than they did feral or threatening. A glint of something silver flashed out of the corner of Tenichi's eye, and his heart jumped in his chest as he realised the reason the chokehold had been released was because his attacker had needed to draw a weapon. "It's a shinigami. Shinigami don't belong here. I have carte blanche with any who come... that's the rule."

"Tenichi-san is Keitarou-san's guest," Now Koku was right alongside them, and Tenichi heard what sounded like a brief struggle of wills, as Koku clamped his hand around Sakaki's wrist. The clatter of metal against hard earth made him realise that Koku had removed the weapon from the assailant's grip, tossing it aside out of harm's way. "If you kill him, you'll be punished. I don't care if you listen to me or not, but you should listen to Keitarou-san."

"It's nothing to do with you!"

"I'm sure you got the message that Tenichi-san was here. I sent it myself," Koku was unmoved. "I'll say it once more. Get off him. If not, I'll make you do it — and you'll be nursing broken bones."

There was a muttered curse, but gradually, Tenichi felt the jabbing knees shift against his back, then the weight lift off his spine, allowing him to take a proper breath of air into his lungs for the first time in what seemed like an eternity. He scrambled to his knees, drawing deep lungfuls of air into his body, and Koku cast him a glance, his expression pensive.

"Are you all right?" he asked softly, and Tenichi nodded, unable to speak. Koku's eyes shifted to someone — or something — above Tenichi's left shoulder, and his expression became chilly.

"You ought to go and think about this," he added evenly. "If Keitarou-san finds out, you'll be for it."

"I don't like them," now Tenichi could make out the sulky voice, and his eyes widened with shock, swinging around to see his assailant for the first time. Shadowed in the gloom, yet just about visible was the figure of a teenage girl, perhaps as young as sixteen or seventeen, a thick ponytail of dark hair pulled back from her face and angry, predatorial blue eyes boring into him as though he were no more than a rabbit being hunted by a wolf. "They shouldn't be here. They don't belong."

"No, but Tenichi-san won't be here much longer," Koku sighed, holding out a hand to pull the shinigami to his feet. Tenichi took it gratefully, still unable to take his eyes from the slender form in front of him.

“Don’t stare at me like that, else I’ll take your eyes out,” Sakaki’s anger was bubbling up inside of her once more, but Koku slipped neatly between them, folding his arms across his chest.

“Take your katana and go work off your temper in the forest,” he said bluntly. “If you come near Tenichi-san again, I’ll tell Keitarou-san everything I saw, and you know he’ll believe me. Maybe he wouldn’t believe it from Tenichi-san, but if I tell him... you know he’ll listen to me.”

Sakaki bristled visibly, but apparently realised she was beaten, for she stalked indignantly across the barren ground, bending to pick up her katana. Tenichi tensed as her fingers closed once more around the weapon’s hilt, but the teenager had no intention of continuing her assault, sliding it back into its scabbard with very bad grace. This done, she wheeled back towards Tenichi, spitting pointedly on the ground between them before turning on her heel and disappearing into the night.

Tenichi took another deep gulp of air into his lungs.

“Thank you,” he murmured, his voice hoarse. “With cuffs on, I couldn’t sense her... I thought she was going to kill me, until you showed up.”

“Probably she would have,” Koku said bluntly, and Tenichi shot him a troubled look. “Don’t look so bothered about it, though. Sakaki treats everyone like that. She likes violence. She’d kill most of the people here if Keitarou-san let her — only he doesn’t let her, and that courtesy extends to you while you’re here as Keitarou-san’s guest. Fortunately, she listens to him. She knows I’m right and she knew she was pushing her luck. If she thought she could get away with it unseen, that’s one thing — but with a witness, she knew when to pull back.”

“She’s just a kid,” Tenichi turned his gaze in the direction the girl had gone, and Koku snorted.

“Sakaki wasn’t ever a kid, not really,” he replied. “You wouldn’t have detected her, though, even without those cuffs. She has no reiatsu. You can’t trace folk like that, can you? Not here.”

“No,” Tenichi looked surprised. “But... I thought that only contaminated Plus souls lived here. If she’s not contaminated by reiatsu, then...”

“Oh, she’s contaminated, all right,” Koku snorted, shaking his head derisively. “If you were running the Spiritless Zone, would you want a homicidal nutjob like that running riot around your settlement? Not likely.”

He sighed, stretching his hands over his head.

“I don’t think she’ll go after you again, though,” he added. “She knows I know she’s targeted you, so that’ll protect you. It’s a hassle, but seeing you dead isn’t much good, either. Keitarou-san likes you. He’d be upset if you died.”

He offered his companion a tired smile.

“I can’t stay with you, as I’ve other jobs to follow up tonight, but I will walk you back to your shelter,” he decided, “just to rub in the message in case she’s watching us from the undergrowth. Keitarou-san told me you were going to be leaving tomorrow, so you probably won’t ever meet the girl again. Try and put it — and her — out of your mind. There are some damaged folk in these parts — that’s all.”

“Mmm,” Tenichi pursed his lips, remembering Keitarou’s words about the mysterious hut and it’s dangerous resident.

No kidding.

“I’d appreciate that,” he said out loud, nodding his head. “You’re right, tomorrow I’ll be going. After that, I guess I’ve overstayed my welcome... so it will probably be better all round when I’m back in Seireitei.”

“Hrm, maybe,” Koku cocked his head on one side, fixing Tenichi with a thoughtful look, but he did not demur, instead turning towards the main pathway and beckoning for his companion to follow him.

Two days had passed.

Juushirou glanced across the small, plainly furnished chamber, taking in the darkness of the night sky beyond with a weary sigh. It was late, and his work for the day was over, but despite his tiredness, he could not rest — not just yet. Slipping his haori from his shoulders, he folded it and set it to one side, settling himself down at the side of the slim pallet bed that was the room’s most distinctive piece of furniture. Beneath the stark white of the plain-fabric covers lay the slender form of a young woman, her ebony hair brushed back from her face into a loose tail and her dark lashes resting against her cheeks, her soft grey eyes hidden in sleep. She appeared fragile as porcelain, but the gentle rise and fall of her chest was proof enough she was real, and the sight of the covers shifting slightly with each breath reassured Juushirou that his companion was alive, although still very much lost to the world around her.

Mitsuki-chan.

Gently, though not without hesitations, Juushirou brushed a light finger against her pale cheek, drawing his hand back and folding it in his lap. She did not stir, still sunk in the exhausted slumber of one who had given everything and then some to carry out her duty, and, as he watched her, Juushirou felt his heart ache. Mitsuki was safe, and in that first moment when Shikiki had told him his old classmate had survived, he had only felt relief, crashing over him in giddy, jubilant waves. It had been followed swiftly by guilt and self-recrimination, however, as he had understood the full horror of what had occurred in the Spiritless Zone. Mitsuki had lived, but at the cost of seeing her friends and comrades slaughtered around her. What she must have endured, he could not imagine — and though she looked peaceful, he knew that, when she woke, those nightmares would be fresh in her thoughts.

He was happy to see her, but in the circumstances, happiness was not a suitable emotion. Seireitei had been assaulted, its healers violated, and, two days on, the Gotei were no further on in naming those responsible. Members of the Onmitsukidou remained over the divide, still scouring the landscape for the two missing shinigami healers, but Juushirou privately thought there was little likelihood of either turning up alive. It had been too long, and their absence at the crime scene had only increased worries for their safety. He had not known either agent personally, just as, of the Rukongai squad as a whole, only Mitsuki and Madeki counted as acquaintances, but he found he could grieve for those he had not met just as easily as if they had been members of his own squad. They had had lives and goals ahead of them, and those had been stolen away by some unknown evil.

Although at first, all three injured healers had been conveyed to treatment chambers within the Fourth, the scale of the tragedy coupled with the shock and trauma among its remaining members had left the division in a state of busy chaos, and the loss of so many good shinigami had meant workloads being doubled. Seri's condition remained serious, for although Shikiki had repaired a good amount of the physical damage to her organs, the deep, spiritual poison of the Hollow was proving more stubborn, and so she had been put under twenty-four hour surveillance, any change in her condition feverishly reported up the chain of command to the harried Captain at the top. Madeki's condition was less severe, and for the most part, he had been left to sleep off the lingering effects of the anaesthesia, but once the Onmitsukidou had begun bringing back the mutilated bodies, the need for autopsies had overridden time for grief, and in the midst of this, Retsu had asked Juushirou a favour.

"Mitsuki-san has already proven how much she cares for her injured comrades," she had said softly, her gentle voice showing only very faintly the impact of such a horrific event on her nerves. "She is quite exhausted, and needs rest. There are no significant injuries, nothing that needs the attention of a healer. Yuuyugo will recover itself naturally, but I fear that, if she were to rise with all this uncertainty around her, she might try too quickly to throw herself back into the fray. That would be counter-productive — and as things stand, I cannot risk losing any more of my best healers through overuse of spirit power. I would like her to be somewhere well away from Fourth Division when she opens her eyes."

"There's a risk of her burning out?" Juushirou had asked anxiously, and Retsu had lowered her head, sadness in her dark eyes.

"If not for Shikiki-san and Kai-dono finding them, perhaps it would have occurred already," she said gravely. "They prevented that, thankfully, and she fainted, allowing her body to begin its own recovery. I expect her to sleep for some days together, but even when she wakes, her spirit levels will be unsettled and far below her normal ability level. If she were to begin healing again in that condition... it could do her permanent damage. Therefore, if it is not inconvenient, I should like to impose on your kindness and your personal concern for her well-being and ask whether there is a quiet, empty chamber within Thirteenth Division's barracks where she might be allowed to sleep and convalesce without pressure."

"Of course," Juushirou had agreed easily, nodding his head. "If I can help by providing that, then please, feel free to impose. It's no secret that I'm worried about her, and if things are that way, I'll make sure she doesn't have a chance to push herself too far."

"Mm," Retsu had been silent for a moment, then had turned to him, offering him a bittersweet smile.

"Mitsuki-san is sensitive, and I imagine much upset by what has occurred," she murmured softly. "If there is one person beyond Fourth Division who I believe might be able to help her face those things and begin to heal, it is you. I am not ignorant of the kind of bond you two shared as young folk, and I can see for you it remains as strong now."

That is exactly what Mitsuki-san needs in the days and weeks ahead. Thirteenth Division also has Naoko-san, who will doubtless be a comfort, and between you, I know I can count on your Division where she is concerned.”

“You have my word,” Juushirou had bowed solemnly, and that afternoon, with the guidance and supervision of one of Fourth’s remaining senior officers, Enishi and two of the lower seated Thirteenth members had gone to Fourth, bringing the patient carefully and steadily to her current resting place. It had garnered some interest, whispers and stares from the shinigami who knew nothing as yet of the tragic events within Rukongai, but Juushirou had made it clear to all that Mitsuki was a patient from the Fourth who was not to be disturbed and, with their usual loyalty to their Captain, even the most curious of recruits had obeyed the order without question.

Although he could still hear the sounds of his squad going about their last chores, inside of the chamber was tranquil, representing a false peace full of unanswered questions.

They left you alive, but that was more luck than anything else, wasn’t it, Mi-chan?

Juushirou’s hazel eyes softened, taking in every curve and dip of her face, noting to himself what had changed and what had not in the two decades or more since their tearful farewell in the grounds of the Academy. She still seemed almost as young as she had then, though her hair had grown longer and, as he gazed at her, he decided that she no longer looked quite as girlish, her time in the Spiritless Zone having brought her across the threshold into full womanhood. Absently he found himself wanting to meet her eyes, knowing it was irrational but desperate to see whether the years apart had clouded the soft grey gaze and changed the person he still considered his first love.

Maybe you’ve moved past our adolescent affection, but even if you don’t love me any more, you kept your promise. You came back, and that means we can talk. Whatever happened in Rukongai, if I can help, I will help. That might be all you want from me, now, but even if it is, I’ll give it without hesitation. That’s all I can do, since I can’t erase what you’ve seen or what you’ve been through. Rukongai is a place I couldn’t protect you — and I’m sorry for it, even though I know Shikiki was right and you didn’t want my protection.

Naoko slid back the door of the small chamber, causing Juushirou to turn in surprise, and at his consternation, a faint smile twitched at the Third seat's lips.

"She's not going to disappear in the night, you know," she murmured, bringing the rest of her body into the chamber and crossing the floor towards him, a tray of tea and a plate of onigiri in her hands. "I brought you this, since I thought you might be hungry. You weren't in the mess hall, and some of the recruits were talking. I shut them up, of course, but..."

She trailed off meaningfully, and Juushirou took the tray, sending her a grateful smile.

"I'm sorry," he acknowledged. "I was in Ugendou, finishing off reports, as it happens. I've just come down here, now, but I'll keep it in mind. I have been very busy, and I expect I'll get busier, but I don't want to disappear from my squad's line of sight. It'll only worry them, and there's a lot of other things to worry about."

"It bothers you, doesn't it?" Naoko made no attempt to leave, but nor did she sit down, leaning up against the wall of the chamber instead, and Juushirou saw her eyes soften as her gaze rested on Mitsuki's sleeping form. "Seri was definitely gored by a Hollow, and a toxic one, even though everyone else at the encampment was killed by a blade of some kind."

"Of course," Juushirou agreed. "The behaviour of Hollows has been on my mind for a while, now, and I can't figure out why there'd even be one in Rukongai, let alone one hell-bent on killing healing shinigami. There's a lot of things that don't add up about what the rescue party found on entering the Spiritless Zone. Just being grateful Mitsuki was one of the survivors doesn't expunge the need for justice where the others are concerned. If I can help, I want to do so. Do you think that's wrong?"

"No, I'm glad," Naoko's face became shadowed and she sighed, spreading her hands. "Mitsuki aside, some of the dead are distant kin of mine. Seri is my second cousin. I'm angry. Livid, in fact, that anyone would attack healers as though they were disposable vermin. If you'd been determined to keep out of it, I'd have petitioned you to the contrary. I'm not an Unohana any more, of course, and I've no power through those channels — but I'd like to do my bit."

"I see," Juushirou inclined his head in acknowledgement. "I suppose that makes sense. In that case, when the facts are clearer, I'll be sure to keep you involved."

"Thank you," gratitude flitted into Naoko's sharp greenish gaze. "I appreciate that."

“Well, it’s not much, but it’s all we can do, now,” Juushirou reflected sadly. He reached across to brush Mitsuki’s pale fingers gently with his own.

“When she wakes up, who knows what she’ll say?” he murmured. “Who knows what happened to her, or what trauma she’s experienced. Despite that, she was brave enough to use all of her spirit power saving the lives of two of her comrades, although it put her own at risk. It’s our duty, therefore, to take up the fight as much as we can on her behalf as well as for those who didn’t make it back. The Spiritless Zone is a Seireitei project. It has implications for everyone, and it’s something Mitsuki and her poor comrades believed in. That’s enough of a reason to find out who wanted to sabotage it, and why.”

“I agree,” Naoko nodded firmly. “Then I suppose we’re waiting on the official report from the Shihouin’s shadow-troops?”

“If by that, you mean from Kai’s Onmitsukidou...”

“I think that’s what I said,” Naoko observed dryly, and Juushirou shook his head ruefully.

“Even now, you can’t resist a dig at him, can you?” he remarked. “Yes, that’s what we’re waiting for. Two healers are still not found, and they want to have the whole scene canvassed and all the evidence brought back before we jump to any conclusions about what happens. True, I have doubts and theories and things I’d like to know more about, but in this case, I think probably to wait is the right decision. We need testimony from those who were there,’ his gaze shifted back to Mitsuki, “and that can’t be rushed.”

“True,” Naoko pursed her lips together in displeasure, “though I heard that Madeki-dono’s colour had improved. Probably he’ll wake first, so that might take some of the pressure off Mi-chan. He was in charge, so debriefing is his job, really.”

“Maybe,” Juushirou acknowledged. “Mitsuki was the one with Aomori Seri, though, and Aomori’s injuries were unlike any of the others. Shikiki thought that happened to her outside of the camp, because despite all of the blood, there wasn’t much of Aomori’s in the vicinity. It might be that what Mitsuki knows is as important — I suppose we’ll see.”

“Sora’s still chomping at the bit to get here to see her, by the way,” Naoko changed the subject, clearly not wanting to dwell on this more than necessary, and Juushirou sighed.

“I’m sure she is,” he said guiltily. “It’s not my fault, but I’m sure she's cursing me above all people for keeping her out at the moment. Unohana-taichou asked me to ensure Mitsuki was kept quiet, and, her aside, not to allow anyone bar myself and my top seats to enter here whilst she still slept, in case all the spiritual activity around her disturbed her sooner than necessary. Other than me, and of course, Unohana-taichou herself, that limits it to you and Enishi, nobody else. Unohana-taichou was quite clear that she didn't want anyone from outside divisions coming to gawk, and though Sora has better right than most to visit Mitsuki, she also isn't what you might call 'quiet company'. When Mitsuki wakes up, that's different — probably Sora's brand of hyperactivity will be welcome then, but while she's resting..."

"It's all right. I told her pretty much the same, and that it was Retsu-sama who gave the order, not you," Naoko assured him, stretching her arms over her head and stifling a yawn. "She's not happy, but I made sure she knew that Mitsuki was being isolated for her own healing good, and that her life wasn't in danger. It isn't, is it?" this last with a sudden expression of doubt, and Juushirou shook her head.

"No. No, it isn't," he said honestly. "She'll recover, it will just take a little time."

"Then we'll save Sora as the secret weapon for when she's more alert," Naoko said decisively, though relief flickered in her eyes. "In the meantime, I intend on being on hand in case she wakes up sooner than we think and needs a friendly ear. I owe her for all the times she listened to me after Suzuno died... and it's never too soon to repay a debt to a friend."

She moved forward, bending to pat Mitsuki warmly on the shoulder.

"She's a very precious person to lots of people," she murmured, more than half to herself. "Nobody is going to let her fall into danger again any time soon."

"Naoko..." Juushirou murmured, and Naoko shot him a smile.

"I'm going to turn in," she reflected. "It's late, and I'm up at dawn with recruit drill, since Fukutaichou's pencilled in to do some swordwork with Tsukabishi and Kira instead. You shouldn't stay up too late either, Taichou — or am I wrong when I say you're going to talk to Ketsui about Tenichi in the morning?"

"I can't leave it any longer, though all of this has distracted me," Juushirou acknowledged. "I'll do it then, Naoko-chan — and you're right. Hard as it is to leave her, I know she doesn't need me hovering over her twenty-four seven. We both have other duties to attend to, and I can't let them fall by the wayside."

He got to his feet, scooping up his folded haori.

"I'll summon Ketsui tomorrow," he added. "Goodness knows it won't be easy news to break, but it has to be done, and I'm the one who has to do it."

So, Tenichi had found Kohaku's hut.

Keitarou walked pensively between the rows of briars, noting absently as he did so how much more barren and dead this area was from the main village where the bulk of the contaminated Plus souls made their homes. It was as though something dark and noxious had poisoned the air, stealing away the last gasps from any animals that dared encroach here, and the branches of the trees were little more than bleached skeletons, long since surrendering themselves to death. Here and there Keitarou's feet crunched slightly against the fragile bones of fallen birds who had been foolish enough to try and use these trees for perches, and the silence that hung heavily all around him seemed oppressive, and if it had been possible, Keitarou might have thought it had made air thicker, rendering it harder to breathe.

For him, though, this pathway held no fear. Unlike the frightened villagers, he knew what lay at the end of the long, winding track.

He paused for a moment, listening not to the absent sounds of the night but for the traces of reiatsu that told him in which direction Tenichi was currently heading. A faint smile touched his lips as he recognised the feeble flicker of the boy's cuffed presence, moving away from his position.

Koku was guiding him, and this reassured the scientist all the more. I answered his questions as best I could, and he seemed to accept what I said, but in case he changes his mind, it's better someone makes sure he gets to bed safely and to sleep. You always know exactly what I need from you, Koku. There's too much of danger in this place and too much of grave importance. I don't want to drag one of Daisuke's sons into that darkness, not yet. Maybe not at all... we'll see. For now, I need your trust and your faith in me to grow, Tenichi-kun. There's plenty of time for other matters later, if and when they arise.

He stepped past the quietly bubbling puddle of water Tenichi had brought forth by splitting the stone, squeezing deftly between the tangle of dead bushes and onto the narrow stone track that lay beyond. The hut loomed out of the darkness like a monster, silhouetted by the light of the feeble Rukongai moon, and as Keitarou drew closer to it, he reached down to his belt, pulling a silver key from the folds of the old, worn fabric. It was rusting at the fob, the chain that had once held it bent and warped from years of use, but it was still functional and he slid it between the slats of wood into the well concealed keyhole, twitching it slightly to release the mechanism and allow the door to swing open silently.

Blackness greeted him — an oppressive, stifled darkness that smelt of stale air. If things such as fear could have a smell, Keitarou was certain that that too would have formed part of the odour, and he wrinkled his nose, taking a deep breath as he prepared to duck inside the building.

Sakaki’s voice struck out of the darkness like a sudden candle flame, and Keitarou jumped, swinging around to face the angry teenager with a muttered curse of dismay. Sakaki stood in the hazy moonlight, largely concealed by the shadows but still, Keitarou could make out the displeasure on her young features, and the glint of her silvery sword, tapping impatiently against her shins. She would not attack him, he knew that beyond all doubt, but he cursed himself again that he had not heard a single sound of her presence during his approach.

“You really are getting good at stalking, Sakaki,” he said at length, his voice a forced attempt at lightheartedness, but Sakaki’s scowl deepened, and she shook her head.

“I want you to tell me why,” she said flatly. “He’s a shinigami. Okaasama said you wanted him here, and that he’s important to you. She said that, and so did Katsu-nii — but I don’t understand why. He’s nothing to do with us. He’s an enemy. He’s wearing the black shroud of those Gotei people. Do you want him to ruin everything?”

“Tenichi isn’t an enemy,” Keitarou sighed, sliding shut the door of the hut and reengaging the lock as he realised he would have no peace until he had settled his companion’s complaints. “I brought him here because he’s of use to me. To us. He can get things we can’t, even that Kurotsuchi might not be able to reach. And, more than that, it turns out he’s a member of a squad that’s conveniently placed to some other business of mine. I want to use that connection as best I can — and therefore winning his trust is important to me.”

“I don’t like it,” Sakaki was sullen, her lips pouting as though he had just refused to buy her some new trinket. “I want to kill him, but nobody will let me. They said you’d be mad, if I did.”

“I would not be happy,” Keitarou agreed gravely, resting his hands on her shoulders and looking her straight in the eye. “We have an agreement about that, and I wouldn’t like you to break your word. It would upset me very much, Sakaki-chan — and that would not be good for either of us, now would it?”

“I don’t see why he’s so special,” Sakaki muttered, kicking her foot petulantly against the ground. “I don’t remember making anyone any promise about not killing shinigami. On the contrary, I thought that was what you wanted me to do? Isn’t that why you had me trained to use this sword? What was the point of that, if not...?”

“Tenichi is family,” Keitarou said simply, and Sakaki snorted.

“He is not!”

“He is,” Keitarou put a gentle finger to her lips, warning her not to raise her voice too much in the heavy gloom. “He is the son of my cousin, Daisuke — a man I viewed like a brother and a martyr to our cause many, many years ago. He is a Kotetsu — and therefore, he is beyond the scope of your blade. You’re sworn not to kill family, aren’t you?”

“Hrmph,” Sakaki looked dissatisfied. “I didn’t realise it extended to shinigami, though.”

“I am a shinigami, Sakaki, at least in terms of my sword and my skills,” Keitarou reminded her softly. “Would you hold the same view of me?”

“Tenichi’s clothing is the uniform of the Gotei, but we will claim him all the same,” Keitarou’s gaze flitted back to the hut, then, “I have had assurance that that’s the case, and I believe its information I can have trust in.”

“I don’t like it,” Sakaki repeated. “I understood about not killing you or Okaasama, or Katsu-nii. That’s fine. I get that. They’re off limits. And the thing in there... whatever it is...” she swung her sword disparagingly at the building behind Keitarou with a snort that told him she considered the hut’s contents so thoroughly beneath her notice it didn’t merit a proper mention. “I don’t kill the people here because I don’t care about things that can’t fight properly and I don’t have any interest in them, either. But now you keep adding people to the no-kill list. That creepy Kurotsuchi was the start, then that smug idiot Koku, now this Tenichi person. How many more are there going to be, Otousama?"

"There are plenty enough shinigami to keep you busy without concerning yourself with those who live here," Keitarou said reasonably. "Did I not just give you the chance to slash your way through a squad of them in the Spiritless Zone? You can't be hungry for blood again so soon, Sakaki-chan. I've spoiled you already — you shouldn't be so greedy."

"Mm..." Sakaki sighed, and Keitarou saw grudging acceptance in the girl's vivid blue eyes. "I suppose so. That was fun. I enjoyed that. But..."

She paused for a moment, then,

"Katsu-nii goes to Seireitei. He goes there a lot, and he gets to kill there too, as well as play with Hollows," she said bleakly. "I can't do that. If shinigami come to Rukongai, they're mine — but they don't. And when one does... I can't even kill him, so it's frustrating. I hate shinigami. They're the enemy, right? They're the ones who think they're better than us, and therefore they should all be taught a lesson. I can't do that easily here, though. I want to, and I'm better at it than Katsu-nii, but I can't."

"I know," Keitarou patted her reassuringly on the shoulder. "I know, and I'm still thinking about that. I'm sure there is a way, we just haven't found it yet. Between you and I, Sakaki, I would sooner send you to Seireitei on an assassination mission than your brother. You're right when you say that you're better at it than he is, and more attuned to it... that's why you got to train with a sword and he didn't. Just be a little patient, all right? I will find a way... you have to trust me."

"I do..." Sakaki admitted reluctantly. "It just isn't fair, Papa. Katsu-nii gets to have all the fun."

Despite himself, Keitarou smiled, amused at the fond affectation. Sakaki was an adept and ruthless killer, but she was still a child, and sometimes, he mused pensively, she still looked for his reassurance and guidance. Violent as Sakaki was by nature, she was very attached to both of her parents, and no matter how much blood she spilled, he took comfort in the fact that she would sooner die than disobey his orders.

"You won't tackle Tenichi again, will you?" he asked gently, and Sakaki grimaced, shaking her head.

"I promise," she said slowly. "If you say not, then I won't. I don't like it, though. I don't think he can be trusted. He smells funny — like outside. Like the other shinigami. I don't like him being here, it's like he's spying on us."

"Or we're spying on him, maybe?" Keitarou suggested lightly. Sakaki's eyes widened with surprise, and Keitarou patted her on the head.

"You did good work in the Spiritless Zone," he told her. "You made me very proud, you and Katsura both. Having you both return safely, though, that was the biggest relief to both your mother and I. We would not do anything to put you in any danger, my girl. Tenichi will not be able to hurt you. I guarantee that I would kill him myself before I allowed that to happen."

"That wouldn't be fair," Sakaki objected, putting her hands on her hips. "If you killed him, I wouldn't get any of the fun!"

"True," Keitarou laughed, patting her on the back, "but some things are my duty as your father. Now, run along and get some rest, all right? As it happens, I have work to do tonight, since I will be taking Tenichi away from here tomorrow. He's asking questions about this place... so I think it's better he goes before he discovers any more about our Rukongai. I don't believe he'll betray us, but I don't want to frighten him just yet."

"He could use a little frightening," Sakaki said contemplatively, "but all right. If you're getting rid of him tomorrow, I guess I'll do that."

She glanced at the hut, then shuddered.

"If you're going in that place, I'll pass," she added. "I don't want to go mad, thank you."

She leaned over to kiss her father lightly on the cheek, then skipped away into the darkness, and Keitarou rested his hand on the wood panel door, a frown touching his features.

An assassin who can't go to the places where people need assassinating. A problem to which I have yet to find a clear solution. I'm sorry, Sakaki. You'll just have to wait a little longer. I don't want to waste your potential by throwing you into danger too quickly. I need you — all of you. All of you, and...

He moved his hand back down to the key that still hung in the door of the old hut.

I need what lies in here, too. If this time I'm to better the Council and the Gotei at their own game of cat and mouse, I need everything I can get.

13. Daisuke's Grave

Chapter Twelve: Daisuke's Grave

A lingering mist hung around the forest as Keitarou opened the Senkaimon, stepping out into the woodland before turning and ushering Tenichi to follow him. The gaping split in the atmosphere shook and shuddered closed, and Tenichi took a deep breath into his lungs, relishing the fresh, crisp scent of District Seven's fragrant woodland. After the stale, cloistered atmosphere of the Rukon Valley, every breath tasted twice as sweet, and he stretched his hands over his head, enjoying the visible sensation of flourishing life all around him.

It had been more than two decades since a previous Endou leader had ravaged the local villages, razing peaceful stretches like this to the ground in their pursuit of those with spirit power. To the east, Tenichi could just about make out a jagged swathe of savaged earth that, stripped of the ancient trees that had once lived there, new settlers had turned and tilled to farmland, replacing the relics of devastation with the basics needed for survival.

To the west lay the remains of the forest, untouched and beautiful. Tall elms stood proud like dark-skinned sentries, their long branches reaching out to one another to criss cross the sky above them and make the sun's light mottle against the ground in unique and dazzling patterns. Vines clung to the lower reaches, winding their way from tree to tree, whilst the floor beneath their feet was dotted with small shrubs and other plants, many flowering bravely despite the uneven favours of the sun. Around the trunks of some of the trees were clutches of overgrown ferns, their fronds casting the earth in darker shadow, and faintly Tenichi could hear the buzzing of insects darting from bloom to bloom through the greenery.

It was an overgrown paradise, a thick woodland left to its own devices in the aftermath of Shouichi's violent raids, and though in a few areas, Tenichi could just about make out patches of grass, for the most part it was impossible to tell exactly where the forest ended and the earth began.

Tenichi's gaze softened with nostalgia, remembering briefly the trees he and Ketsui had played among with the children of their village before the rogue shinigami had come and set their homes and livelihoods alight. This was not an area of District Seven he knew, yet the layout and the flora were very similar, and so he could almost imagine himself back there, in a time and place before everything had changed.

“It seems peaceful, but we can’t stand here and take in the view,” Keitarou pulled his cloak more tightly around his body, lifting his hood up to cover his face so that his features were cast in shadow. “This is definitely the right location, but it will require us to walk. Whatever fate preserved this stretch of forest, it’s grown up far more since the last time I was here, and I’ll take a minute or two to get my bearings.”

“Mm.”

Tenichi reluctantly drew his thoughts back on topic, nodding his head. “Is there anyone nearby? I can’t sense anyone with these cuffs on.”

“I don’t have the means to remove them, here, and I’d rather not leave any unnecessary evidence lying around here,” Keitarou read the hint in the shinigami’s words, shaking his head. “If I release you, they’ll sense you. Come for you. I can move quickly... but that would be far too great a risk for both of us. It would be hard to explain why you were here in my company, and I have no desire to remind the Gotei that I still exist.”

“I suppose that’s true,” Tenichi acknowledged. “I’m sorry. I didn’t think.”

Keitarou did not reply, but Tenichi was sure he caught the glimmer of an amused smile before the other man turned away, raising a black-robed arm to indicate the path they should take through the trees.

Although his gait was uneven and his steps stiff, Tenichi found that Keitarou was far more prepared for the challenging nature of the landscape, and more than once he himself stumbled and tripped, feet caught by this vine or that trailing branch snaking across the hidden pathway in front of him. Each time he faltered, Keitarou turned to wait for him, no impatience in his aura, and something in this reminded Tenichi once again of his childhood. In the shade of the trees’ reassuring boughs, he could almost see Keitarou as his father, waiting patiently for his young son to scramble over the obstacles and reach his side. Then, he remembered fondly, the plants had reached above his knees, poking at his legs through his thin hakama, and a smile touched his face. It was as though Daisuke’s ghost was there to guide them, for despite Keitarou’s words about finding his way, it was not long before the scientist stopped, bending awkwardly to touch the ground, then nodding his head.

“This place?”

Tenichi stepped forward, resting his hand on the bent, withered trunk of a particularly old tree and scanning the surroundings for any sign that someone had been interred here, but the green carpet that swathed his feet showed not a single break, and it was impossible for him to distinguish this area from the rest of the forest floor.

“You’re sure that this is the place, Keitarou-san? It looks just like the rest of the wood to me — how can you be sure?”

“Time has grown it over, hiding him from prying eyes and returning him to nature from whence he came,” Keitarou’s eyes clouded, and Tenichi’s doubt faded slightly as he saw the genuine pain glittering in his companion’s pale eyes. “This is the place, though. That tree you’re resting against was here then, stooped over me while I dug the hole and protecting me from prying eyes.”

He knelt stiffly on the ground, his hands pressing together briefly as if saying a fleeting prayer, then he sighed, turning so that Tenichi could see his features clearly. There were unmistakeably tears in the muddy brown eyes, and though Tenichi was sure that his companion had better control than to let them fall, something in their raw honesty made the young shinigami feel suddenly guilty for having doubted in this man at all.

Keitarou-san’s feelings for my father — whatever happened before or after, Father was someone he loved... someone he valued enough to risk taking the time to give him a proper, peaceful burial in a place of beauty, and more, enough that he’d risk his safety again to bring me here himself.

“I’m sorry, Tenichi-kun. This was all I could manage,” the Urahara murmured now, bending to brush aside the blades of grass and the delicate blossoms that now crowned the site. “There is no proper memorial to show where your father sleeps his final sleep. Endou Shouichi wanted my life, and I had another, more innocent soul to protect. This was all I could do for him... I realise it wasn’t enough.”

He patted the earth lightly.

“Here is the proof if it,” he added softly, beckoning for his young companion to move closer, and as he did so, Tenichi could see that, hidden beneath the heavy foliage of the determined plants was a jagged slab of dull grey stone, less than a foot long and no more than a few inches across. Moss and lichen had begun to cling to the edges, turning the surface a mottled, grey-green hue, and Tenichi felt sure that if his companion had not pointed it out, he would never have noticed it at all.

“This stone was flat and as smooth as I could manage for a grave marker,” Keitarou continued evenly. “I could not write his name here, of course — if I had, well, you know exactly what would’ve happened. Daisuke was known to the wrong people and they would’ve thought nothing of digging him up and dragging his corpse through the towns in glee. I wanted to remember he was here, though, so I marked this stone with the edge of my sword. To anyone else it would mean nothing, but to me...”

He trailed off, and Tenichi knelt beside the slab, a strange feeling welling up inside him as he placed his fingers tentatively against the damp surface. Though time and weather had worn away much of Keitarou’s carving, with the tips of his fingers he could just about feel the outline of the crude mark, and a lump rose in his throat as he recognised what his companion had written.

“Daisuke was more than just a ‘tomo’ — more than a friend, more than a cousin,” he said sadly. “That is the truth, Tenichi, and I will tell you no other. Whether you hate me or not, I have not lied to you. I promised I would bring you to your father’s final resting place, and I have. This is where Daisuke sleeps, here, deep within Endou land. My being here is dangerous for both of us — but if I want you to trust me, I need you to know I’ll take risks in order to keep my word. Now we’ve renewed our acquaintance, I don’t want this to be the last time we ever speak. On the contrary, I hope very much this will form a beginning, not an end.”

“I already said I’d help you get supplies... but you said yourself, if people saw us together, it would be dangerous!” Tenichi’s head snapped up, and he gazed at Keitarou warily. “We’re right in the heart of Endou land here, surrounded, probably, on all sides by people who wouldn’t hesitate to grab you if they got the faintest hint you were here. I know you and Father worked together, and I remember you coming to our home, bringing us sweets, laughing and joking with Mother. I know that Keitarou-san exists, and I don’t doubt that you were close. Father only knew that Keitarou-san, but... but I’m not him, and you know that. I know another Keitarou-san exists, too, and just bringing me here isn’t enough to make me turn against the Gotei and the life I’ve chosen. If you want supplies, then I’ll help with that — but just then you sounded as though you wanted more from me, and that's more I can't give. The man who is wanted across all of Seireitei is the same person my father trusted. One side must be wrong... and I'm having trouble figuring out exactly which. I thought, if we came here, I'd understand more clearly — but now I'm just more confused. I... I only have your word for it that this is Father's final resting place... and... though you've been good to me so far, you did still abduct me from Seireitei. For all I know, you might have arranged this, too. I have to be sure."

He moved back, half expecting a burst of anger to come from his hooded companion, but instead the scientist chuckled, nodding his head.

"You are a smart boy, but then, I'm not surprised," he said appreciatively. "I know I can't win your trust just with words and pretty promises... perhaps I would've been disappointed if you had not doubted in me. No, Tenichi-kun, you are right to be suspicious. I am a murderer and an outlaw... at least by the standards of the current Council of Elders. I can't make up your mind for you what is wrong and what is right. Daisuke was tortured and killed brutally by the grandfather of the man you now call Captain, but if you have chosen Seireitei's side, then I can't and won't force you to see the world my way."

He rested a gloved hand on the boy's shoulder, but Tenichi pushed it away.

"What will you do to me, then, to buy my peace?" he asked hesitantly. "I've seen you alive and I could go back to Seventh and report all of this to my superiors. They'd come hunting you — I know too much about where you are and I'm dangerous to you. Given that, why would you take this many risks for me? I don't understand... what will you do about me now?"

"Do?" Keitarou seemed genuinely surprised, and Tenichi felt his conviction begin to waver. "Do you think I'd hurt a child of Daisuke's? You were like nephews to me — of course I wouldn't!"

"But I..."

"You knew when I came to see Irie, who I was," Keitarou smiled, shrugging his shoulders. "You could have turned me in then, but you did not. We are family, Tenichi, and family don't betray one another. You and I, we may not believe the same things yet — perhaps we never will, or maybe, as time passes, you'll come to understand my views. I am not sure of that, yet, but what I do know... what I am sure of... is that you will not betray me. Your father died rather than give me up to his enemies... and I am fairly sure you are just like him, deep down beneath that shinigami's uniform."

He laughed at Tenichi's expression.

"Ah, you don't wholly trust me yet," he said lightly, "but Tenichikun, I trust you."

He turned as if to leave, then paused, eying his companion pensively.

"If you doubt my tale about Daisuke, there is one other who can corroborate it," he added, almost as an afterthought. "A young girl called Shikiki was in my care, then, and knew your father well. She was a ward of the Ukitake family, last I heard — I trust she still lives?"

"Ukitake Shikiki?" Tenichi's eyes widened, and Keitarou's lips pursed in humour. He nodded his head.

"A healer, with the power to reverse time within a shield?" he asked, and Tenichi nodded.

"I know her. Kirio knows her. We studied together... at school," he murmured, as fleeting memories of a small girl with wild curly hair flitted in and out of his mind. "Sometimes... she would play with Ketsui and I, when we were small. I had forgotten... I never thought... I didn't know she was with you when you buried my father."

"Shikiki was my ward, Tenichi, not Daisuke's, no matter how much time she spent with your family," Keitarou tut-tutted softly, shaking his head as if in reproach. "She was mine, and I came back for her, after your village was destroyed. She never told you, then, that she was with me after your father's death? I suppose I'm not surprised. I did rather abandon her... but then, she chose to leave me first, so it was a mutual state of affairs. She was eight years old the last time I saw or spoke to the girl — but I don't imagine she's forgotten me, or the day I committed my cousin's body to the soil. She used her magic to cleanse him of his wounds... thanks to her skill, he could be put in his grave with dignity, and left to rest as an Urahara should."

"I never realised," Tenichi swallowed hard. "I knew Shikiki had been in the village with us, and I knew... but so much happened, and at the Academy, she was always more friends with Kirio than with me. We knew each other, but... we were strangers, too. There was a divide between us by that point, something I found difficult to breach. She was part of the Ukitake family, and I thought, after we left, maybe Father took her there before...”

Words failed him at this point, and Keitarou patted him reassuringly on the back.

“Go back to Seireitei and ask her for the truth,” he suggested. “Find all the answers you need, and do so in your own time. I can wait. When you’ve heard her story, maybe you’ll realise that I’m not here to deceive you at all... and if you need to get a message to me, well, there will always be a way.”

“Wait, where are you... what...” Tenichi began to speak, but before he could finish his sentence, Keitarou was gone, his reiatsu swirling and disappearing on the wind as though he had never been there at all.

Alone in the forest, Tenichi bent his gaze once more to the carved stone, resting his hand against it as though trying in vain to locate any trace of his father’s lingering reiatsu. Daisuke’s body would have long since been absorbed into the woodland, and even if Keitarou had told the truth, there would be no clear way to prove it.

But he was free.

Glancing at the cuffs that still encircled his wrists, Tenichi processed this thought with a jolt.

Keitarou had brought him back to Seireitei and left him, in the heart of the land patrolled by members of his squad. He had his sword, and he was unharmed.

Getting to his feet, he glanced around him for any sign of a clear pathway out of the forest, but every direction looked the same, dense tree trunks packed together around a sea of green and brown.

He rubbed at the spirit cuffs absently.

If I could get those off, I could send up a Kidou flare and someone would come find me. If I could just get them free, I could flare my reiatsu and someone would know where I was. Keitarou-san, you could at least have left me with a key. How am I meant to find my way out of here without help? I don't know where I am, and whatever bearings I had when we arrived, I lost as soon as we started trekking through the woodland. I...

A rustle from the trees behind him made him falter, swinging around with his hand on the hilt of his weapon, knowing it was useless to try and release it but unable to suppress the instinct to defend himself from harm. He could see nothing, but worse, he could sense nothing, his blinded spiritual senses confounding him and putting him all the more on edge. Was it a forest creature, harmlessly passing through on its way to find food? Was it a Hollow, lumbering through the trees to attack him? Thoughts raced through Tenichi's panicked mind, and he struggled to get his racing heart in check. Was he going to die here, before his father's grave, without anyone ever knowing what had become of him?

Out of the corner of his eye he caught a brief flash of movement, and he turned again, breathing hard and squinting through the gaps in the trees, trying to make out a distinctive shape. To begin with it seemed he had imagined it, but then, beneath the low hanging branches of one tree he saw a figure, cloaked in heavy fabric, watching him. He tightened his grip on his weapon, preparing for some kind of assault, but the figure simply raised its head, and for the first time Tenichi saw the shadow of a face, young and pale, beneath the heavy hem of the fabric. Two vibrant, silverish eyes stared out at him, meeting his gaze without blinking or flinching away, and Tenichi found himself drawn to them, sucked in by the eerie glow that suddenly seemed to surround him.

He was tired. His body was heavy. He could no longer hold his sword...

Unnoticed, his zanpakutou slid from his grip, falling silently to the leafy floor below. He stumbled, crumpling to his knees and swinging out a clumsy arm in an attempt to steady his fall. His hands would not respond to his brain's instructions, however, and his fingers grasped thin air, his limbs flailing for a moment before dropping like dead weights at his side. Resignation crashed over him, as some irresistible magnetism seemed to pull his leaden torso forwards, and as the ground rushed up to meet his face, he found he could no longer focus on any of the individual plants. Instead, he seemed to be diving into a sea of green, dipping deep beneath their leafy waves and sinking down, down, down into a dark, enticing oblivion.

From somewhere, far away, he thought he heard the sound of footsteps, but he was no longer able to react. Something touched his arm, and then, as the fingers looped themselves around the spirit cuff at his wrist, he lost his battle to stay awake, smothered completely by the gentle dark.

The first thing Madeki was aware of when he opened his eyes was that, instead of the thick canvas of a travel-tent or the bright blue of the Rukongai sky, the sight that greeted him was row upon row of wooden beams, criss-crossed into a network of support for smaller polished panels fashioned in a lighter colour and interspersed with what were unmistakeably the glow of kidou lamps. Blinking a couple of times to steady his focus, he did not attempt to move his body, instead processing the detail he could see from his laid out position, bringing his sluggish brain gradually up to date.

This was Fourth Division. Seireitei. He was home.

The flood of relief that should have invaded his heart at that deduction stalled and faltered, tugged back by something else lurking at the corners of his awareness, and as he closed his eyes once more, he saw her in blurry outline — the young plus soul with the gleaming sword, swinging her blade to slaughter his companions.

He pressed his lips together into a thin line, forcing himself to relive the memory of their confrontation over again. He had taken something in through the blade of his releasing sword — from the dull aching of his head and the weight of his limbs, he suspected it was Houten-yaku, and that the girl had probably obtained it from their own divisional stores. He had not seen any of his comrades lying pooled in blood, but he had not needed to — every life extinguished left an indelible mark on a healer's consciousness, and slowly and methodically Madeki went through them each one by one, working out who had lived and who had died.

The results were not good, and his lips thinned further.

Taichou will want a clear report on what occurred, and I need to bring that girl more firmly into focus. How she got into our camp, why she was attacking us — all of those things will need to be answered. Could I have prevented it? That too. As lead shinigami, I'll take whatever's meted my way in terms of punishment. In the meantime, since I seem to be in one piece, I shouldn't be wasting time lurking around here. I've all my limbs and I don't remember that whelp landing a blow on me. If she didn't kill me outright, she must've thought the drug would do it. Good thing for me that's not the case.

He grasped the edge of the thin pallet bed between his fingers, using his grip as a lever to pull his protesting body into a more upright position. The world around him swayed and spun, making him feel giddy and sick, but he held on grimly, riding out the sensation until it subsided into a dull ripple through his mind. Houten-yaku was swift acting and potent, and from his trembling hands he guessed that the amount he had ingested was well above the normal safe limit.

The door slid back, revealing a chubby young woman robed in shihakushou, wild, wavy hair confined in a thick braid down her back and concern in her aqua eyes. At his confusion, she paused, bowing her head towards him as if acknowledging that it was their first meeting, then she slipped inside the room proper, shutting the door behind her with a slow, sliding click.

“My name is Ukitake Shikiki, sir,” she said, her tones calmer and more formal, and Madeki realised that this was one of the members of his squad, one who had joined and ranked in the years whilst he had been away. Ukitake... the name triggered a faint memory, and absently he wondered if this girl was a relative of the District boy he had helped rescue from a cave during his time at the Academy. “Retsu-sama assigned me to keep watch over you and to make sure you weren’t disorientated when you awoke.”

“I see,” Madeki dragged himself fully into a sitting position, resting his hands on the bed in front of him as he steadied himself, then raising his dark gaze to her anxious one. “You’re a healer with this squad, then? You’ll forgive me if I don’t recognise your face or name, only...”

“This is the first time we’ve met,” Shikiki agreed, her tones still gently polite and deferential. “I was one of the party sent to Rukongai to retrieve you, and so Retsu-sama thought it as well I was on hand in case you needed assistance when you woke up.”

“I need to report to Retsu-sama,” Madeki said succinctly, and Shikiki nodded.

“Yes,” she agreed, “but right now isn’t possible. She’s with Aomori-san, and they can’t be disturbed.”

“Aomori?” Madeki’s ears pricked up at this, hope flickering briefly in his dark eyes. “Aomori Seri? She came back with me too?”

“She did, sir,” Shikiki nodded her head once more, the wild plait bobbing from side to side against her broad shoulderblades as she did so. “She’s badly wounded, sir, and in intensive care, but so far she’s still with us and I think, a shade stronger than she was before. The Hollow did her a lot of damage, but... sir?”

“Hollow?” Madeki paled, staring at the young woman, aghast. “What Hollow? There was no... I don’t... what are you talking about?”

“Aomori-san was attacked by a Hollow, though I don’t know how or where,” Shikiki said soberly. “She hasn’t been strong enough to wake and tell us, yet, but we thought it strange, too. Her injuries are not consistent with... it didn’t seem as though...”

“Our camp was attacked by a girl with a sword,” Madeki said

grimly, cutting through Shikiki's attempts at steering tactfully through the subject. "My comrades were slain by her blade, and she and I sparred a few times before she unleashed Houten-yaku on my sword and knocked me out for the count. I saw her leave the camp, but my memories are blurry and misshapen and at present I can't draw a clear likeness to mind. There was no Hollow, though. I would've sensed it. We would have... sensed it."

"I think Aomori-san was attacked somewhere else, but I don't know where," Shikiki came to sit beside the bed. "She lost a lot of blood, but there's not much of it at the place where we found her. Mitsuki-dono was doing her best to stem it, so wherever Aomori-san bled out, it wasn't at the camp."

"Edogawa..." Madeki put his hand to his chest, registering for the first time the faint glow of another's healing reiatsu against his own. He sighed, rubbing his temples. "Then she is also safe?"

"Safe, but still unconscious," Shikiki agreed soberly. "She's with the Thirteenth at the moment, regaining her strength. She used too much power healing you and Aomori-san, and so Retsu-sama wanted her far from Fourth and the troubles here until she was more able to deal with them. Madeki-dono, I'm sorry. Nobody else at the camp was found alive, and... and two officers are still missing, but... the Onmitsukidou who are investigating have told us to... well... expect the worst."

"Kikuchi Haseyo and Shakano Kazuki," Madeki said gravely, and Shikiki inclined her head.

"Yes, sir. That's what Retsu-sama said their names were, too."

"I sent them... with Edogawa and Aomori... on a particular errand to the borders of Junrin'an," now the trembling in Madeki's hands was less to do with the effect of the drug and more to do with his own anger and frustration. "If Edogawa and Aomori made it back alive, then that probably means you are right. Edogawa was given charge over the team and she would not have left injured comrades behind. She would not have. She would have found another way to send a message. Bringing Aomori back here is indication that the others were beyond her help. And, most likely, the cause of that was this Hollow you mentioned — because we certainly saw no sign of any such beast in Hokutan."

The bile rose in his throat at the thought and he closed his eyes, swallowing hard.

"Please, rest, sir," Shikiki had obviously seen his sudden pallor, for he felt a gentle hand on his arm, another one against his back as she carefully encouraged him to relax against his pillows. “You are still healing yourself, and everyone is worried about you.”

“Mm,” Madeki did not fight against her ministrations, but his expression remained clouded and troubled. “I was in charge of them. Protecting them was my duty. In light of that, reporting my failure to my Captain is something I need to do.”

“Nobody thinks this was your fault, sir,” Shikiki protested. “Kaidono said that the scene was a horrific one, and that...”

“Ukitake Shikiki, you said your name was?”

“Yes, sir,” interrupted in mid-speech, Shikiki blushed, as if realising she had been about to go off on a tangent to a superior she had only just met.

“What rank are you, Shikiki?”

“Twelfth seat, sir,” Shikiki answered sheepishly, and Madeki nodded, mulling it over.

“I have not encountered a healer with such an aura before,” he said at length. “Where is your zanpakutou?”

“I don’t use one, sir,” Shikiki admitted. “I... I heal with my hands, and fight with them, too.”

“You mean with kidou?” Madeki was taken aback, and Shikiki shook her head.

“No, sir,” she responded honestly, holding her palms up to him and spreading her thick fingers wide. A pinkish glow began to glitter around the edges of her skin, then a wave of the same hue spread gently out from them, reaching tentatively but resolutely towards his upper body and encircling it in a warm haze of energy. As the barrier strengthened, Madeki’s eyes opened wide, disbelief in his expression as he felt his nausea fading away.

“That isn’t kidou,” he murmured, and Shikiki smiled.

“No, sir,” she agreed brightly. “It’s something I’ve always been able to do, since I was a child. I don’t know how — I can’t remember a time before I could do it, so I guess it was just born into me. Retsu-sama says that it’s very rare, and there aren’t many like me these days — in fact, I’m the first she’s trained. I’m not so good with sensing things as healers are, because I suppose I’m not one, not naturally. Whatever’s inside my barrier, though, I can mend it and turn it back to how it was before.”

“I see,” Madeki lifted his finger to touch the pink haze, then, “and you used this, did you, to help Aomori and Edogawa come back here alive?”

“I healed Aomori-san’s wounds, but I couldn’t remove the Hollow’s poison,” Shikiki lowered her hands with a sigh, the barrier fragmenting and disappearing into shards of light. “I’m not so good still with spells like that, since I’ve had to learn how to sense so many things manually instead of instinctively like most healers do. I try to help, though... and Retsu-sama says that, with more time and more experience, I’ll probably be an irreplaceable part of the Fourth’s emergency rescue team.”

“Well, you’ve certainly steadied my stomach,” Madeki allowed himself a humourless smile. “I think I can stand, now — and if Retsu-sama is with Aomori, I would like to go there too, please. Will you take me? I’d tell you it was an order, but I suspect Retsu-sama’s instructions already override my own.”

Shikiki eyed him for a moment, then nodded her head.

“Yes, sir,” she said evenly. “Aomori-san is sleeping three rooms along the hallway. Retsu-sama put a barrier around the chamber to prevent it from disturbing you, but since you’re up and awake, I’m sure she’d want to hear from you. If you really feel well enough to walk... I’ll take you there now.”

“Thank you,” Madeki shot her a grateful glance, reaching out a hand to the wall and using it to lever himself to his feet. He was still unsteady, his body heavy and lethargic from his unwelcome dosing, but he felt less scattered than he had moments before and, as he pulled the fresh robe down from the hook beside his bed, he found himself grateful to the young stranger for her strange yet effective spiritual power. He pulled the robe around his body, tying the sash loosely over his night clothes and glancing around him for his zanpakutou.

‘Retsu-sama confiscated it,’ Shikiki seemed to guess his motives, for she offered him a sheepish smile. “She said that it was better you didn’t imagine yourself ready for active service before she had decided you were ready.”

“She said that?” Madeki paused, staring at her suspiciously, and Shikiki grinned.

“Word for word, sir,” she said promptly. “She took your sword herself, but I don’t know where it is now. Fukutaichou has Aomori-san’s sword, so perhaps she has yours also — but I don’t think Retsusama wants you collecting it just yet.”

“Some things don’t change,” Madeki muttered, but inwardly he was reassured by his Captain’s decisive instructions and apparently unruffled reaction to the crisis that had splintered their midsts. The Fourth were well used to violent injuries, but not among their own people, and so Madeki knew that, as he and Shikiki walked side by side along the empty hallway, the subdued atmosphere all around them was not his imagination.

Although it had been more than twenty years since he had set foot here, Madeki found that little he saw had changed very much. True, he reflected, glancing at Shikiki, the faces around him may not be the same as he remembered, but the building was as sturdy and firm as it always had been, laid out in utilitarian halls and passageways that intersected across one another in the most direct manner possible. Healing chambers lay set back from the wall in each direction, and, as Shikiki led him down a corridor to the left, Madeki ran his finger absently against the slats of wood that had probably been there as long as the division itself had had land here. It had once been part of the Unohana’s designated Clan property within Inner Seireitei, modified and adapted to suit the requirements of the growing Division’s several members, but Retsu had always been forward thinking and had therefore planned her barracks and her healing station from the start with capacity and facilities for far more than initially it hosted. The Division had doubtless expanded since Madeki’s stationing in Rukongai, and, apparently, had begun taking on District individuals, for Madeki knew beyond a shadow of a doubt that Shikiki had not been born of any Clan.

Ukitake Shikiki, huh. The world is becoming an interesting place... I wonder what else has passed me by during my long time away.

“Please, sir, wait here a moment whilst I report to Retsu-sama that you’re here,” at length, Shikiki stopped, turning to offer him a smile. “I know she can probably sense you are, but I ought to tell her, just in case.”

She bowed her head towards him, then pulled open the door of the small healing chamber, disappearing inside. She moved very nimbly for someone so broad-set, Madeki mused absently. More proof that the old adage about judging by appearance was founded in some wisdom.

This was the heart of the Division’s Intensive Care complex, with four or five individual chambers so close to the heart of the Fourth that they were easily accessible during either night or day. The walls for these rooms were generally thicker, a further narrow corridor separating the hallway from the room's proper entrance to ensure the minimum amount of noise travelled in from the world outside. Along the wall to the left of the panel door Shikiki had disappeared into were long, oblong windows, cut approximately four feet horizontally and two feet vertically into the smooth bamboo-slatted wall. The glass had been imported especially from District Three, treated in some way Madeki did not fully understand so that the room's inhabitants were visible from the outside hallway, but for anyone standing within the chamber, it appeared no more than a glinting mirror reflecting back into the room itself. It was an innovation Madeki still remembered discussing before he had been stationed outside of Seireitei, and he still marvelled at the efficaciousness of it now. Patients did not react well to being gawked at by every passing individual, yet this way it was possible for a healer to keep a strict watch on their charge without increasing the patient's stress levels unnecessarily.

He moved towards the glass, resting a hand casually against the smooth surface as he peered within the room.

A thin, pale form lay on the bed, swathed in a golden sheen of Kidou and muffled in blankets up to her chin. Her face was greyish white, her lips faintly bluish, and one stick-like arm protruded from the covers from elbow to fingertip, wrapped in what was clearly a monitoring device designed to measure the levels of poison still in her system. She was breathing, for Madeki could see the blankets moving slightly, but the small, insubstantial gasps of air being taken into her lungs were far from reassuring, and Madeki felt a pang of guilt as he took in his subordinate officer's fragile state.

Shikiki said she was improving, but it really looks like she's only a shade or two from death.

Bent over the figure, on the far side of the bed was the black-and-white robed figure of the division Captain, Retsu's dark hair in its usual immaculate braid, and, as Madeki watched, a door behind her opened, revealing the young girl who had guided him thus far. At her entrance, Retsu raised her head, no apparent surprise in her features, and a few words passed between them before Retsu's gaze flitted to the glass divide, meeting Madeki's eyes for a brief moment through the one-way glass. Madeki drew back, startled — though he knew that it was probably coincidence, and that Retsu would surely not be able to see him through the mirror-surface, the comprehension in her dark blue gaze had made him wonder, just for a brief moment, exactly what his Captain was really capable of.

Retsu turned away, nodding her head and saying something softly to Shikiki. Shikiki bowed, then knelt beside Seri's bed, and Retsu stood, smoothing down her robes and moving towards the door. She cast a brief glance back at Seri, and Madeki saw the deep concern lurking in his Captain's eyes. Then the moment was gone, and Madeki leaned back against the wood-panel walling, waiting with apprehension for his Captain to emerge.

"Madeki-dono," the greeting was soft and gentle, as even and calm as he remembered it, despite the tragedy, and Madeki turned towards her, lowering his head.

"Taichou," he murmured, and Retsu moved towards him, resting her hands on his shoulders.

"This is not your fault, and I will not have you assume the blame," she said quietly, and Madeki's head shot up, surprise glittering in his eyes. At his expression, Retsu nodded, patting him lightly.

"I can feel it," she confirmed softly. "It swirls from you like a beacon, child, but you are not to blame. I have had reports from the Onmitsukidou and Kai-dono is quite certain whatever attacked your camp took you all completely by surprise. You can help none of your comrades by letting their deaths weigh you down. Instead I need you to help me — and all of Seireitei — be their justice instead."

"Yes, ma'am," Madeki mumbled, words suddenly thick against his tongue, and Retsu offered him a sad smile.

"There is much we don't understand," she admitted, taking him gently by the arm and leading him along the hallway towards the cluster of chambers which comprised the Captain's and Vice Captain's office. The door of the Vice Captain's office was slightly ajar, and, as they walked past it, Madeki could just about make out the slender form of Unohana Eriko, dark, tousled head bent studiously over a large pile of documents and writing brush clutched tightly in inky fingers. Eriko was Retsu's first cousin, a woman ten years the Captain's junior but Madeki had always had the impression that she was older, her narrow, wiry frame aging her and the constant furrow of her brow behind thick-rimmed glasses only adding to the effect. Eriko was the youngest sister of three, plain and studious where her older siblings had been gregarious and beautiful and so, by mutual consent she had been dispatched to Retsu's care, proving to be an immediate hit among the junior officers on her appointment as division Vice Captain twenty seven years before. She had a severe look about her that often made those who did not know her think her frightening, but Madeki knew that Eriko had one of the kindest hearts in the whole Gotei and, if he sensed tension from her now, it was because the Vice Captain was still ruminating on the slaughter of some of her precious lambs.

“Eriko has your sword,” catching his glance, Retsu paused, nodding her head. “It is quite undamaged, though clearly it was splashed quite liberally with Houten-yaku. The concentration of the drug was quite heavy... given the amount remaining in your bloodstream when we brought you back, it would’ve been impossible for you to pursue the attacker... or attackers... or mount a decent offensive against them.”

“I only saw one.”

The Captain unlocked the door of her own office, sliding it back and ushering Madeki into the cool, brightly lit chamber. Like Retsu herself, the room exuded calm, and as he stepped over the threshold, Madeki felt some of the tension leave his body. Retsu was an understanding leader who would listen to everything he had to say, regardless of how illogical it might sound. She would be able to help fill in the blurs and gaps in his thoughts, and, between them, surely they could piece together enough to act against those who had attacked the encampment so brutally.

Retsu knelt on a cushion, gesturing for him to follow suit, and he did so, offering her a respectful smile of gratitude.

“I would like to hear what you can tell me about this one,” only once he was comfortably settled did Retsu speak again, her features thoughtful. “Kai-dono believes... and certainly, from our initial examinations of the poor souls cut down, I would concur... that the encampment was attacked by someone with a sword. Would you agree?”

“Yes, ma’am,” Madeki agreed bitterly. “A girl with a sword, and long dark hair.”

“Could you describe her in more detail?” If Retsu was surprised, none of it showed on her face, and Madeki grimaced, shaking his head.

“Not yet,” he admitted, frustration lacing his tones. “I know I saw her... spoke to her... crossed swords with her before she drugged me, but at the moment all I see is a blur of black and a glint of her sword. I know she was young... but that’s all. I hadn’t seen her before.”

“Is there anything else you do recall?” Retsu asked gently. “If not her appearance, perhaps some other feature?”

“She had no reiatsu,” Madeki said slowly, and the Captain’s eyebrows twitched slightly, as though he had said something of great significance. “That part of it makes no sense to me, Taichou — how so many people could be killed by a Plus soul with a katana is beyond me, but even so, I'm quite sure that's what she was. She left no trace at all — even when stood right in front of me, she resonated nothing.”

“A soul with no reiatsu is not uncommon within Rukongai, but one with killer instinct is,” Retsu rubbed her chin pensively. “Those who lose their wits and become mad are usually contaminated, en-route to Hollowfication because of spirit power they can't restrain. Yet this young girl had no signs of that? There were no indications that she had become damaged in such a way?”

“You read my report,” Madeki realised, and Retsu inclined her head.

“I did,” she agreed with a sigh, “but perhaps too late to be of material use. Nonetheless, the information in it concerned me. I wondered if, perhaps, this assassin had been one such soul?”

“I don't think so,” Madeki chewed on his lip, tasting blood. “We had encountered Plus souls with faint levels of contamination, but nothing of a level strong enough to cause Hollowfication. And I'm quite certain, Retsu-sama — the girl I confronted had no signs of that at all. She was completely without spiritual aura. A proper Plus soul — behaving very improperly.”

“I see,” Retsu tut-tutted sympathetically, folding her hands in her lap. “I must confess that the bodies of your companions would seem to support your claim. Not one of them bears any spiritual signature except their own. Slashed with a blade in such a haphazard way, I would have expected fragments of foreign reiatsu — but so far it seems they were cut with a normal weapon, not a spirit sword. More, whoever did it... left no trace of themselves. If the injuries were not so contradictory, it might be thought that these shinigami had somehow killed themselves.”

“They were murdered, Taichou,” Madeki said darkly, and Retsu nodded.

“I know,” she said simply. “Healers do not choose death against life, especially without any justification. Besides, Kai-dono's men found tracks leading into the woods. They stopped abruptly some way in, and whoever was there isn't there now. One of the Onmitsukidou officers is examining this scene more thoroughly... though it's expected that the blood found will belong to our slain.”

“The girl who brought me to you... Shikiki... she said that Aomori was attacked by a Hollow.”

“Yes,” Retsu agreed. “This surprises you?”

“It does,” Madeki nodded. “Aomori wasn’t with me when we were attacked. Nor were Edogawa or the two who still remain missing. I’d sent them into Junrin’an to follow up a lead of my own, relating to the report I sent you. I don’t know whether they did or didn’t discover anything of import, but if Aomori was attacked by a Hollow, it didn’t happen in Hokutan. I would’ve sensed a Hollow — we all would. The attack on us isn’t the same as what happened to them — and I’m pretty sure, Taichou, that if Edogawa returned without them, it means the other two are dead.”

“We believe that to be likely, too,” Retsu agreed pensively, and Madeki saw a flicker of real sadness in her gaze. “The Onmitsukidou have searched Hokutan without success and have expanded their search to include Nakaken. Now I know Mitsuki-san and her companions were dispatched to Junrin’an, I will advise them to search more carefully along the Southern road. If there is further evidence to be brought back, I should like to have it — although it is just as possible the Hollow incident was not connected to the assault on your group.”

“We had fought several Hollows in the last few weeks, leading up to my report,” Madeki agreed. “It might just be that someone took advantage of us being split apart to attack the main camp and cause confusion. I had thought of that too, Retsu-sama — but it doesn’t make the burden of it any easier.”

“Mitsuki-san has not roused yet, and when she does, I hope she will be able to tell us more about what happened in Junrin’an,” Retsu reflected. “Seri-san is healing, but very slowly — it would help to know precisely what kind of poison Hollow she encountered, as the remedies we are using are working, but not at the speed I would like.”

“Will Aomori live?”

“Her chances are still fifty-fifty,” Retsu owned, looking weary. “I am glad to see you risen, Madeki-kun. In a time of crisis, and even despite your own trauma, I’m very afraid that the division will need its Third Seated Officer in the days and weeks to come.”

“You... don’t intend on disciplining me for what happened in Hokutan?” Madeki asked hesitantly, and Retsu shook her head.

“I have no evidence to suggest you were at fault,” she responded. “Like I said, it is better now to look to finding justice, not laying blame. If your camp was attacked by someone who gave no warning of their presence, then even the most skilled shinigami would be put at a disadvantage. One who even a healer cannot detect... is a concerning thing indeed. This girl you saw is the one lead we have, and your testimony vitally important to resolving this matter. The Spiritless Zone will be on hiatus until we can assure safety to any officers deployed there — and that means finding the real culprits, not pointing fingers among ourselves.”

“She was good, with a sword,” Madeki sat back, relief coursing through his veins at his companion’s matter-of-fact appraisal. “I could hold her off, though, and if I’d been able to release, I would’ve caught her. She fought like a savage, as though any method was valid as long as it got her where she wanted — but I don’t think she was insane. Not in the way of a tainted Plus soul, anyway. When I asked who she was and what she wanted, all she said was that she wanted us dead. No reason, no motive, just that. Then she launched the Houten-yaku at me, and after that it becomes a blur.”

“Houten-yaku from our own pure supplies, concentrated to a lethal level,” Retsu remarked. “It is fortunate that Mitsuki-san returned to the camp when she did, as without her interference we might have lost both you and Seri-san before we were able to intervene. It seems almost a certainty that Mitsuki-san was the one who sounded the alert to bring us here — though whether she knew the protocol for communicating with Seireitei via your transmitter, I’m not sure. When Shikiki-san and Kai-dono found them, Mitsuki-san was huddled over Seri-san, obviously trying to keep her alive, so I imagine she probably discarded the transmitter the moment she realised she might yet lose her friend. She was very brave, Madeki-kun... I am very proud of her, yet also worried for her.”

“Edogawa is a powerful healer,” Madeki mused, running his hands against his ribcage once more. “Shikiki said that she’d healed me, and I could feel it, faintly, then. She’s wasted in Rukongai, Taichou — especially now, with so much happening here. Her skills are valuable and ought to be utilised more on the front line.”

“There is time, yet,” Retsu replied. “For now, I shall wait and see how she recovers from this particular episode. Mitsuki-san wanted to go to Rukongai, and more, wanted to remain there when given the choice to return. You are right about the level of her ability, but she is not an Unohana, and it may take more time and experience in the field for her to fully prove her spurs to those who haven’t worked so closely with her as you or I. This is still, sadly, a very Clan-stifled world. But for that...”

She sighed, breaking off in mid-sentence, but Madeki suspected that, if left to his Captain alone to decide, she would have not only Mitsuki but also the Twelfth Seated Shikiki at higher rank among her division. He wisely said no more, turning the subject back to the matter of the mysterious assassin.

“I will do my best to remember more about the girl who attacked us,” he said quietly. “I am quite certain she was a stranger, and not someone from any of the local villages we’d been patrolling and protecting, but it isn’t impossible that she might have been someone there who I overlooked. Have any of our records been brought back from the camp yet?”

“They have,” Retsu agreed, “though I have had little time to go through them yet. Some were badly stained with blood, but I have had Shikiki-san use her unique skills to clean them, and so I believe we have recovered most of the important documentation relating to your time in the Spiritless Zone. I will not trouble you with it now, for I can see you still need to rest, but when you are feeling fitter, I should like you to go through them with me. I don’t know if there are any clues there to what happened — but I am concerned by this talk of Hollows in what should be a protected area.”

“In that case, you are dismissed,” she said firmly, “and under orders to rest and recuperate your strength. Eat a good meal and get some sleep. We will talk again tomorrow, if you are feeling up to it — perhaps by that time, Kai-dono’s Onmitsukidou will have finished compiling their report into what happened, and we can compare notes.”

Madeki opened his lips to protest that he was quite all right to begin work, but a certain look in Retsu’s dark eyes silenced him before he could say a word and he closed his mouth, bowing his head towards her instead.

“Yes, ma’am,” he said softly. “I’ll do that, and hope that before long Edogawa too can add her evidence to the discussion.”

So, Kohaku had been right.

Keitarou slipped deeper into the trees, pressing his body close against the ground as he watched them filter out of the shadows, little more than ghosts flitting across his line of site. They moved silently, each one cloaked in heavy fabric that hid their faces and concealed both age and gender, yet Keitarou was under no illusions as to who they were.

Kitsune.

A faint smile toyed at the edges of his lips.

Just as I expected. I don't need you to hand them over to me as tribute or as part of a deal, Hirata — I just need to be one or two steps ahead of your game. This is your land, and these woods are barely flanked by any local settlements, left untouched even by the ravages of Shouichi-dono's regime. Well, of course they were. These began as Misashi's people, didn't they? Protected by him, I'm sure he had some power to send his Father's attention elsewhere. I wondered when I saw the maps Kurotsuchi gave me, and compared them with the older ones of my own. Why, when so many places were razed and destroyed, did this particular region survive untouched? There had to be a reason... and now, coming here for myself, I can see exactly what that reason was.

His expression became ugly, his eyes cold.

Places like Daisuke's village, perhaps. Places like that, where other, less favourable Urahara were trying to live their lives. If I had known then that these turncoat people were living so close to this land, I would never have brought your corpse here, my cousin. Too late, now — but at least bringing Tenichi here has served some purpose. Perhaps you guided me — if such a thing is possible.

Beneath the earth of the forgotten forest sleeps the one who protected, to his bed the foxes come. Swathed in shadow, they claim Heaven for their own, spirited away to a world without day or night.

The words rippled through his thoughts, strings of characters slashed in black like ink on canvas at the back of his mind. They were not his words, yet they burned into him anyway, imprinting themselves deep into his soul and resonating as though each character was imbued with some form of magic. It was true, he reflected pensively. Words did have power — but only now did he realise just how much power they could have.

Heaven. Heaven is Tenichi. Ten for heaven, ichi for first. The name Daisuke gave him, to celebrate the miracle of his first son's life. Daisuke always protected me, and died doing so — and this is the place he sleeps. Everything as you said it would be, my son. Everything just... as you said.

As though hearing his thoughts, one of the cowed figures paused for a moment, turning a hooded head in his direction, and Keitarou held his breath, suppressing his reiatsu down yet another level and keeping his body completely still beneath the barrier of Kidou he had chosen to swathe himself in. He could no longer run with the speed or agility of his youth, and using too much shunpo or magic would give away his presence to bigger predators than these silent shadows, but he had no mind to be seen by them, either, not if he could help it.

There was a moment when nothing seemed to move, then the figure turned away, and Keitarou let out his breath in a rush. From where he was, huddled down beneath the useful cover of a particularly sprawling azalea bush, he watched the four or five figures gather around Tenichi's crumpled form on the ground, apparently examining him and conferring among themselves. No words were spoken, but Keitarou saw a number of fluttering hands convey short, sharp signals and, as one man, three of the dark clad shapes positioned themselves at Tenichi's head, middle and foot, lifting him up carefully and securely in their arms.

He did not resist, and Keitarou realised that they had done something to him to knock him out, preventing a struggle that might attract attention to their location.

True secret agents, then, skilled with hidden arts in order to cover their tracks.

Keitarou's expression became derisive.

They won't hurt him, though. He's a shinigami — he belongs to their master, and therefore they'll take care of him, before returning him for a reward. Once Tenichi is safely away from here, that's the time for me to act. I won't let him connect me to any attack on these people — whether he knows who they are or not. If I could send Sakaki, it would be simplest, but I can't do that at the moment. That means I need to think again, and that will take time. Hollow puppetry won't work with people like this — but so long as they're here, they pose a threat. I'll take pleasure from finishing them off, each and every one — safe in the knowledge that in doing so, I'll protect Kohaku and therefore our entire cause.

His gaze flitted across the forest, but as swiftly and silently as they had come, the figures had gone, fading into the mottled scenery like ghosts on the wind.

Well, Tenichi. You've given me more than I thought, and I thank you for that. You're being useful to me already.

Keitarou got up stiffly from his hiding place, brushing down his clothing to remove the dust and leaf litter from the fabric.

I should get out of here. I imagine those traitorous vulpines will contact someone in authority soon enough, and I don't want to be anywhere near here when they come. It was worth the risk, though, to see for myself the area in which they hunt. Now I just need to plan a little hunting of my own — carefully and methodically, with just the right amount of distraction to throw curious folks like Ukitake Juushirou off my scent.

His eyes crinkled in amusement as he remembered the hot-headed idealism of the white-haired student he had crossed paths with more than two decades before.

It's not that I don't want to meet you again, and see how you've grown up, Juushirou — but I suspect you'll disappoint me. In any case, such a pleasure can be postponed for now. I have other things that take priority. If you had any idea of the kind of weaponry I have at my disposal... but of course, you don't know. You can't possibly see all the things I can, or realise the scope of what I can do. This time, Soul Society really will capitulate, and it will happen from the direction you least expect it. Sharpen your blade, my District friend. Prepare for war, because a war is coming.

He pulled the tantou knife from his belt, carving it swiftly through the air to reopen the illicit Senkaimon.

Don't think I didn't know that one of those healers Katsura and Sakaki slaughtered was a friend of yours. I haven't forgotten the name Edogawa Mitsuki, nor the way she turned on Eiraki and rejected her. Till now, she wasn't important enough for me to kill — just a fringe Kuchiki fighting against the tide — but this time, her death serves two purposes. Firstly, to get those overly sensitive healers out of Rukongai for good — and secondly, to distract you and your penetrating, probing obstinacy onto other things. You see, Juushirou, I remember you. I remember that you have a lot of fondness for your old friends. I remember a battle in the snow when you were so reluctant to kill that Kyouraku boy — and that is your weakness. Burying one of those friends will derail your other investigations nicely and buy me time.

He stepped into the black abyss, swinging his blade behind him to seal up the gateway.

Yes, everything is going very well indeed. I'm glad to have touched base once more with your eldest son, Daisuke. I think it's going to be a more than profitable friendship.

14. Beneath The Earth

Chapter Thirteen: Beneath The Earth

The wooden shiro stood on the mount, the land around it jutting out over the flow of a winding stream. As Mitsuki made her way across the familiar bridge towards the front mon, she thought she caught a glimpse of guardians watching over the manor's peaceful terrain from afar. The castle was normally quiet and serene, its perfectly crafted wooden structure both reassuring and familiar, but this time it was impossible for the young healer not to see the scorch marks that charred the outer walls, the tears in the bamboo screens and, in places, the shattered roofs that indicated the one who lived within had come under direct attack.

Her heart weighing heavily in her chest, Mitsuki crossed over from the outer to the inner courtyard, making the now-familiar trek through the rows and rows of cherry trees that never ceased to bloom. Hidden within the swathe of pink was a small, delicate structure, the core of the shiro and the chamber of its sole inhabitant. Mitsuki could feel the apprehension welling up inside of her as she approached, uncertain of the reception she would receive or what she might find behind the wooden screens, but knowing she could not pull back.

Beyond the divide sat a young woman, her long, straight dark hair flowing loose and silky smooth to her waist. Mitsuki could only make out the vaguest outline of her body through the slatted screen, although the array of pastel colours of the woman's long, heavy sleeves fell through the gap, hinting at the rich silk used to weave the cloth together. Mitsuki pushed back the sliding door with some trepidation, unsure what she might find when she stepped within.

The room was empty except for the young woman robed in the juunihitoe of a high born court hime, with sugimi in delicate pastel shades of lavender, wisteria, powder blue and creamish white. These were covered by uchiginu in a pink so delicately pale it was almost white and embroidered with clusters of tiny sakura blossoms. Behind her, almost framing her slim form was a folding screen woven in green and cream, an image that changed each time Mitsuki came. The last time she had visited, it had shown a valley of flowers and trees stretching out for miles beyond the shiro's walls, but today there was no flora, and, despite the spring blossoms outside, Mitsuki could make out the shadows of winter trees, branches devoid of leaves as though they had shed them in mourning. Beneath the hazy trunks Mitsuki could see the indistinct shape of what might have been a memorial, and her heart constricted. She bit her lip, shifting her gaze to the room's occupant instead.

Today she was paler than usual, her wan complexion greyish white and her eyes somehow huge in her tiny face, her features drawn down by tiredness. The thick layers of fabric belied her fragility, for the silk spread out around her kneeling form like a pool of colour, but as the woman raised her face to Mitsuki's, the shinigami felt a flicker of guilt rush through her body.

"I'm sorry, Yuuyugo," she whispered, tears glittering in her grey eyes. "I asked so much of you, and yet..."

"Shh," the woman raised a ceramic white finger to her lips, gently motioning with her other hand for her companion to sit down, and Mitsuki did so, kneeling properly across the other side of the bamboo framed chamber. There was little natural light, the whole of her surroundings closeted away from the outside world, but a cherry branch lay before Yuuyugo on the ground and, as Mitsuki watched, the spirit ran her finger over the wood, making the drooping petals of the sakura glimmer and spread with life once more.

"Give me a little more time," she murmured, in her gentle, formal Japanese. "Give yourself more time, too, Mitsuki-hime. You must heal and so must I... only then can you heal those outside."

Mitsuki opened her eyes as the shiro chamber flew away, replaced by the more mundane wood and panel structure of a very different room. Disorientated, she blinked, feeling the dampness of tears against her lashes. That alone, then, had been real — the pain reflected in her inner world cast into real grief that was impossible to fully hide.

"Mitsuki-chan?"

The voice was familiar, yet for the first few moments Mitsuki could not place it, so long had it been since she had heard it. She turned towards the noise, her body aching and twinging from her over-exertion, and she winced, cautiously trying to pull herself up onto her elbows so that she could bring the speaker into focus. There was the sound of steps, then a tall shape robed in black and white moved into her line of sight, thick auburn hair wound back from her face in a utilitarian tail and greenish eyes bright with anxiety and concern. As she met that familiar gaze, a rush of nostalgia ran through Mitsuki's battered body, and for a moment all memory of the horrors in Rukongai faded from the forefront of her mind as recognition and disbelief flooded her heart.

"N... N... Naoko... chan?" she whispered, and Naoko's eyes lit up with joy at the hesitant words, nodding her head and moving to sit down on the edge of the bed.

“Yes, it’s me,” she spoke gently, in soft tones Mitsuki had not heard her friend use before. “I wondered if you’d recognise me — it’s been such a long time, so I wasn’t sure that you would.”

“Naoko-chan,” Mitsuki’s tears trickled down her cheeks, and Naoko hugged her tightly, stroking her muzzy dark hair soothingly. There had only ever been two years between them, but in those few moments Mitsuki was reminded of how strong and decisive Naoko had been back in their school days, at times when Mitsuki had been tongue-tied or reticent, unable to defend herself from the curious and sometimes unkind comments of others. That memory comforted her, and for a little while she allowed herself just to be hugged, taking reassurance in not being alone. The memory of the empty, cold campsite surrounded by the spectre of death lingered like a bad taste on her tongue, but here... wherever here was, even if it was just a dream... here she was not alone. More, she was safe. However it was possible, she was with friends and she was alive.

At length, Naoko detached her hold, pulling back to look at her friend at arm’s length.

“You still look tired,” she remarked, “but I’m glad to see you wake. Retsu-sama said you would, by yourself, because you were tired, not hurt — but we were worried.”

“Nao-chan,” Mitsuki reached up to wipe away the trickled tears, taking a shaky breath of air into trembling lungs. “Am I really awake? After so long... the first person...”

“You’re awake,” Naoko squeezed her hand, nodding her head. “You’re back in Seireitei. Retsu-sama got you alert and people from Fourth and Onmitsukidou came to find you. Do you remember? Shihouin Kai was one of those who found you, apparently...” she wrinkled up her nose, “though I’m sure you probably wouldn’t want to remember that.”

Despite herself, a faint smile touched Mitsuki’s lips at the derision in her companion’s voice.

“You... still don’t like him, do you?” she realised, and Naoko snorted.

“Chalk and cheese. Oil and water,” she said succinctly. “He was there, though. Still is, I think — but that’s another matter. They’re not to bother you till Retsu-sama says so, so you needn’t worry. Nobody’s going to crowd in on you and harass you about anything, not yet.”

She indicated a pale blue vase stood by the window, fresh blooms decorating its rim.

“I came to bring fresh flowers to brighten up the room a little and I felt your reiatsu change, so I thought, if you were going to wake, I’d stick around.”

“I don’t remember help coming,” Mitsuki shivered despite herself, and Naoko cursed, hurrying to pull an extra blanket over her friend’s shoulders. “I remember... getting back to camp and setting off the alert, but after that...”

She jerked her head up, staring at Naoko in dismay.

“Nao-chan! What about Madeki-dono? Seri? What about them?”

“They’re both alive.” Naoko assured her. “Seri is still pretty sick, but she is doing better than she was. Madeki-dono is up and about, though grey as a ghost if you ask me. He’s all right, though, so you needn’t worry. You aren’t to worry about them or anything, not till you’re well. That’s why Retsu-sama sent you here. She wanted you away from the Fourth, because she knew you’d start trying to heal people before you — or Yuuyugo — were ready.”

“Yuuyugo...” Mitsuki bit her lip, remembering the fleeting glimpse she had had into her inner world and her sword spirit’s fatigued form. Slowly she shook her head. “I don’t think I can, not at the moment. I tried so hard to keep Seri alive, Nao-chan. I know I pushed myself, but I couldn’t let her... I didn’t want to...”

Her voice shook, and Naoko pressed a finger to her lips.

“Not now. Later,” she repeated. “There’s time to deal with everything when you’re feeling better. For now, you should take it easy. Retsu-sama was relieved that you came back safely — but she doesn’t want to overwork you before you’re ready.”

“Mm,” Mitsuki sat back against the wall, processing her friend’s words over in her mind. She ran her gaze over Naoko’s appearance once more, absorbing the neat black shihakushou swathed at the waist with a spotless white obi. At her waist was the distinctive form of the sheathed zanpakutou, Dokushou Houshi, and as her gaze strayed across the chamber, she saw Yuuyugo’s hilt and scabbard lying on a tray beside the window, the blade still not even in its sealed form, let alone able to go into shikai.

Drawing her thoughts away from this, Mitsuki turned her attention back to her surroundings, realising with a jolt that, in her relief at recognising Naoko, she had not realised that the chamber she was in was entirely foreign. Naoko had said she wasn't at Fourth... but where was she?

"Where... exactly is this?" she asked softly, and Naoko's eyes widened, then she smiled, looking faintly sheepish.

"You've never been here, so of course, you wouldn't know. You won't know anything, probably, given where you've been," she mused. "This is my division's barracks, Mi-chan. The Thirteenth Division."

"Thir... teenth?" Mitsuki blinked, looking blank, and Naoko laughed, nodding her head.

"Yes," she agreed lightly. "You left the Academy early, so you never knew about it, but Genryuusai-sensei was working to set up a new division and it began the year after we left school. We went to Seventh District, first, to help train the Endou into something resembling human beings — and then we came here, to our own proper barracks as an official division of the Gotei. True, we're smaller than most of the others, but it's nice like that — it's a good division, and a safe place for you to rest up."

Her eyes twinkled slightly at this, faint mischief in their depths, and Mitsuki frowned.

"I didn't know anything about it," she admitted. "A Thirteenth Division? Your division? And it's been here for the whole time I've been gone?"

"Mm, pretty much," Naoko nodded her head, red waves bobbing. "I'm it's Third seated officer, by the way."

There was pride in her tones, a different kind of pride from the hime's arrogance and austerity the Naoko Mitsuki had first met had often exhibited, but from the contentment in the older woman's eyes, the healer knew that her friend was happy with things the way they were. "Of course, a big part of the reason you came here was because of the Taichou. He was very agreeable to the idea of it, in fact, and nobody else will bother you, since if they did, Retsu-sama would kill them herself."

"The... Taichou?" Mitsuki repeated dazedly. "Nao-chan's... Taichou?"

"Yes," now there was no hiding the mischief in the green eyes, an expression so uncharacteristic of the Naoko Mitsuki remembered yet somehow one that gave her friend added life and softened her occasionally strident features, accentuating her natural beauty. “Oh, but I won’t need to explain any more. He’s coming here... looks like he realised you woke up, too. He’s come to see you -which will probably be my cue to go tell Sora you’re back with us.”

“Sora... chan... too?” Mitsuki’s heart skipped a beat, and Naoko nodded, getting to her feet.

“She’s at Eighth. Desperate to see you, but nobody would let her till you woke up, so expect a whirlwind,” she warned. “You’d think being Vice Captain for a couple of decades would have calmed her down — but if anything, she’s twice as hyperactive as she ever was when it comes to things that matter to her. She was hopping all over the place when she learned you’d come back in one piece — so I’ll go tell her, and maybe you’ll let her see you, later?”

“I’d love to see Sora-chan,” Mitsuki nodded quickly. “Wow... I feel like I’ve stepped through some kind of time warp. Nao-chan is a third seated officer, and Sora-chan is a Vice Captain. So much time has passed, it feels like a lifetime — but then again, it seems like nothing at all. I... I missed you both so much, Naoko-chan. And... and I’m glad you were here when I... woke up. I know... you know those people too. Seri... I know she’s your kin. You understand maybe best... so thank you.”

“Don’t mention it,” for a moment, Naoko’s pretty eyes became grave, then she sighed, patting Mitsuki reassuringly on the shoulder.

“Taichou’s here,” she said softly. “Sit tight and talk to him, if you can. He’ll be happy to see you so responsive, so don’t hold back.”

“But wait, why would I...” Mitsuki’s expression was one of complete confusion, but before she could finish her sentence, the door of the chamber slid back, and her words died in her throat, eyes almost falling out of her head as she recognised the thin figure that stood in the doorway. The white hair was longer now, tied in a loose tail at the nape of his neck with black ribbon, and the shihakushou that hung from his skinny frame was in starker contrast to his sallow complexion than the white and blue school uniform he had worn the last time they had met. His face was still pale, cheeks hollow yet hazel eyes bright with life beneath determined black brows, but it was not these things that drew the little gasp from Mitsuki’s lips. The figure that stood before her was her old friend, her confidant, even the man she had first confessed to loving — but about his shoulders he wore the unmistakeable haori of a Gotei Captain, and, as he hurried towards her, Mitsuki’s sluggish brain processed this with difficulty.

“Naoko’s... Captain?” she whispered, and at her words, Juushirou faltered, staring at her uncertainly.

“You didn’t know...” he murmured, and Mitsuki shook her head wordlessly.

“I’ll go to Eighth. I promised Sora as soon as I knew, she would,” Naoko glanced between them, then excused herself neatly, disappearing from the chamber and sliding the door shut behind her, leaving the pair of them alone.

“Juushirou... kun?”

Disbelief still laced Mitsuki’s words, and Juushirou smiled, scratching his head awkwardly as he came to sit down beside the bed.

“I guess you wouldn’t know,” he acknowledged, his expression apologetic. “I should have come without... it. I mean, it would’ve been less of a shock. You’re meant to be resting, and I didn’t mean to...”

He broke off, pursing his lips, then,

“Let’s try that again. I’m glad you’re awake, Mitsuki. I’ve been worried — we all have — ever since you came back.”

“Juushirou-kun is a Captain,” Mitsuki breathed, swallowing hard against the lump that suddenly rose in her throat. “Of all the things I expected when I came back to Seireitei... why didn’t I expect this?”

“If it bothers you that much, I’ll take the haori off,” Juushirou looked apprehensive, and Mitsuki shook her head, tears glittering once more in her grey eyes.

“No, not at all,” she whispered. “I just... was thinking... how proud I was of you. How glad... you managed to achieve...”

That was as much as she managed, for the tears overwhelmed her, and wordlessly Juushirou bent to slip his arms around her, holding her tightly to him. Mitsuki allowed herself to collapse against him, giving in to the raw grief and desperate relief that rent through her senses, the reassuring sense of her old friend’s reiatsu coupled with the strong rhythm of Juushirou’s heart acting as a soother to her wrangled nerves.

“I missed you so much,” she gulped out at last, raising sorrowful grey eyes to his. “I missed you so much, and for a while I thought... back there, I thought... maybe I’d never see you again.”

“You promised me you’d come back,” Juushirou’s words were calm and even, but one look at his eyes told her that he was not. “I believed you, and you did.”

“Mm, but...” Mitsuki shuddered, closing her eyes, and Juushirou let out a heavy sigh.

“When you want to talk about it, I’ll listen,” he said quietly. “We’ve been apart a long time and a lot has happened. I know... how I think of you hasn’t changed, but I also know you’ve been through a lot. I’m your friend, first and foremost, and if that’s as much as you want right now, it’s all I’ll be. As a Captain, I want to help get to the bottom of what happened to your squad — but my first priority is you and making sure you’re all right. You’re my responsibility while you recover — mine and Naoko’s, of course — and so whatever you need, you let me know, all right?”

Mitsuki managed a little nod, and Juushirou stroked his fingers through her hair.

“Unohana-taichou wanted me to ask you one thing, and one thing only, about what happened,” he added reluctantly. “I know you probably aren’t ready to remember too clearly, but she wanted to know what kind of Hollow took down Aomori. They’re trying to neutralise the Hollow’s poison, and so... if you remember...”

“It was a scorpion,” Mitsuki’s eyes snapped open. “Seri was poisoned by it? No wonder Yuuyugo...”

“I’ll make sure the message gets to Fourth as soon as I leave here,” Juushirou did not give her a chance to dwell. “I wish I could stay here longer, but I really can’t. If I hadn’t felt your reiatsu change, I wouldn’t have come here now — but I have a list of things to do that’s getting longer by the second, and if Naoko’s buzzed off to find Sora, I can’t pass any of it over to her.”

“Naoko... is your Third Seat?” Mitsuki asked, and Juushirou nodded.

“An irreplaceable one, as it happens. I’d be lost without her — we all would,” he reflected. “Enishi too. You remember Houjou Enishi, of course?”

“Of course,” Mitsuki frowned. “Why wouldn’t I? I’ve been away, but I haven’t forgotten a single one of my friends. He’s here too, then? In your... Thirteenth Division?”

“Mm, sorry, I guess that was a bad question,” Juushirou scratched his head again. “Yes. He’s my second, has been from the start. Genryuusai-sensei set up Thirteenth as a place for District graduates to go, so that’s how all this came about. I wish I could’ve told you — but I didn't know anything about it till after you'd gone. None of us did — I wouldn't have kept it from you otherwise."

"It doesn't matter," Mitsuki shook her head. "I'm just... glad. Glad you're here. Glad you're well. Glad Naoko and Sora are, and that everyone... everyone else is... well."

"Everyone is fine, so you do your best to get there, too," Juushirou told her. "In the meantime, since I have to go, are you hungry? I'll have Kira or someone bring you something, if you are — someone who won't bother you too much, but leave you in peace to eat."

"I... I'm not very hungry, yet," Mitsuki admitted, her gaze straying to Yuuyugo, "but if I don't eat, that won't ever recover itself. I probably ought to... though to be honest, Juushirou, I don't want to be on my own too much right now."

She eyed him doubtfully.

"Can I still call you that? Do I have to call you Ukitake-taichou, now? Naoko called you Taichou, so... since I don't even have a division rank, surely..."

"In public, maybe," Juushirou admitted sheepishly. "Otherwise folk might talk... a lot. In private, though, no way. I'm still the same person I was when we last saw each other — just a bit older and, maybe, a shade or two wiser with it. A lot has happened, but I'm still Juushirou."

"And I'm still Mitsuki. I hope," Mitsuki buried her head in her hands, weariness rushing back over her. "A lot is going on in my head at the moment, but... seeing some friendly faces has helped. I don't feel quite so bereft, somehow. It can't... undo what happened, but... at least I know that there are people here for me."

"And, unless I miss my guess, another one of them has just descended on Thirteenth's courtyard," Juushirou said dryly. "Sora's arrived. Hopefully Naoko's told her to tone it down, else I'll be having words with her myself."

He patted Mitsuki lightly on the shoulder, then,

"I'll go send a message to Fourth about the Hollow, and make sure you get some food brought up," he added. "If I've time, I'll poke my head around the door again tonight before I head back to my room, but if you want to see me for any reason, send a message for me. I'll come as soon as I can — you have my word on that."

With that he was gone, the flap of a white haori disappearing into the corridor beyond, and Mitsuki bit her lip, sinking back against the wall once more.

Juushirou is a Captain. Juushirou-kun... my Juushirou-kun... is...

She swallowed hard, unsure what to make of the swirl of emotions that now rippled through her traumatised body.

Once he would've stayed here, as long as it took... he'd have waited at my side, regardless. I suppose a Captain can't do that. Not when so many people rely on him.

She pulled the blankets more tightly around her body, already able to hear Sora's familiar voice drifting allong the passageways towards her chamber.

What's with this heavy feeling? Get a grip on yourself, Mitsuki! Yes, you've been through some awful things, but that doesn't mean that you should expect him — or anyone — to drop everything to rush to your aid!

“MII-TSUU-KII!”

The door was flung back at that moment, and a black and white clad figure barreled into the room, grasping Mitsuki excitedly by the arms and giving her a little shake. “You are awake! You are here! You are real! I don't believe it — it's been way too long, but here you are!”

“Sora...” Mitsuki mustered a smile despite herself, and Sora sent the amused Naoko a dark glare.

“Thirteenth Division have been hoarding you away, and it's not been fair,” she added pointedly. “I've been worried out of my mind, ever since I heard what had happened.”

“Mi-chan probably doesn't want to talk about that, not yet,” Naoko leaned up against the wall of the chamber, folding her arms across her chest. “Give her some room to breathe, Sora. I feel the same way you do, but the girl's still delicate, and if you shake her around like that, you'll hurt her.”

“I'm all right,” Mitsuki assured her friend, even as Sora fixed her with a stricken look. “Really, I am. Just tired. Tired and... Nao's right, not ready to talk it through yet. I will be — I'll have to be, but for now... I'm just... happy to be back in Seireitei. And... to be with you both again.”

She grasped Sora's eager fingers in hers, then, “I'm not dragging you away from division duties? Naoko said you were a Vice Captain now, Sora-chan — is it okay for you to be here?”

“Shunsui’s my Captain,” Sora replied succinctly, as if that explained everything. “He’s happy for me to be here, since he knows I’ll report back to him when I get there.”

She sighed heavily.

“Besides, I spent the whole morning putting his office back into some kind of order after he decided to begin a sort out and then lost interest halfway through,” she added expressively, rolling her eyes to emphasise her frustration. “If I don’t keep his folders in order for him, they end up mislaid in the weirdest possible places, so in the end I kicked him out of his room and Kaoru, Shizuka and I tidied it up from top to bottom. He owed me, so he let me come as soon as Naoko appeared.”

“Kaoru? Shizuka?” Mitsuki looked lost, and Sora dimpled, nodding.

“Eighth Division’s Fourth and Tenth seated officers,” she explained. “It’s fun having subordinates — it makes doing tasks a lot easier, when you can delegate the dustiest bits to them and call it experience.”

She squeezed Mitsuki’s hand.

“Have you seen Juushirou, then? Nao said he was here with you, but... he doesn’t seem to be right now.”

“He said he had a whole pile of things he needed to do, but he’d come back later and if I needed anything, I should send a message,” Mitsuki pressed her lips together, and at her expression, Sora and Naoko exchanged looks.

“He is very busy, lately,” Naoko said thoughtfully. “He wasn’t so well earlier in the week, and so a few things got pushed onto the back-burner until he was able to look over them. He spent a night with the Fourth, and Retsu-sama wouldn’t let him come back till she’d checked his temperature personally and cleared him to leave. Then, of course, he’s been investigating a few things of his own in Seireitei, as well as assuming responsibility for you. Thirteenth isn’t as populated a division as some of the others, but it still has a fair number of duties to dish out, and he can’t pass all of them to Houjou and I to look over. We don’t have a Fourth Seat at the moment — our last one was killed in action three years ago, and Taichou only promotes people when he thinks it’s time to promote them, not to fill gaps. Atsudane’s a good officer, but he’s only just earning his spurs at Fifth seat, and Kirio’s way too inexperienced still to jump up from Sixth to Fourth... so we’ve got four officers doing the work of five, really.”

She shrugged her shoulders.

“I take on as much as he’ll let me, but he seems to have this bizarre idea that I’ll burn out,” she added ruefully. “Houjou takes the bulk of the kenjutsu and drill, and it all works out — but it means we don’t get as much time to ourselves as maybe we’d sometimes like.”

“Life in Seireitei goes on, huh?” Mitsuki murmured forlornly, and Sora sighed, hugging her companion impulsively.

“It goes on with you, too, now,” she said firmly. “Naoko and I are still your friends — your best friends — and we’re not going to let you talk us into otherwise. We’ve a lot to talk about, and I’m sure you do too, so when you’re fit and well, we’ll go out, the three of us, into Inner Seireitei, have some drinks and share some girly secrets like we used to — it’ll be fun. In the meantime, though, you need to heal and we need to find and kick the asses of whichever lowlife caused havoc in Rukongai. That fact itself is giving everyone headaches, and nobody is gonna get away with putting you through all that!”

Something in Sora’s impassioned declaration made Mitsuki laugh, and Sora shot her a confused glance.

“Mi-chan? Are you all right?”

“Yes, just realising how glad I really am to have you around me again,” Mitsuki tried in vain to stifle her amusement, but it was no use. “Naoko’s right. You haven’t changed at all — and I’m so happy that’s the case.”

“I haven’t — but other people have?” Sora arched an eyebrow. “People like Juushirou, maybe?”

“What do you mean?” Mitsuki’s eyes took on a look of dismay, and Sora sighed.

“You wanted him to stay with you, but he didn’t — right?” she demanded. “You’re hurt. I can tell you are, even though you didn’t say it. You wanted him here, but the idiot left you and went back to work.”

“Juushirou’s a Captain. I can’t interfere with that, it would be selfish and unfair,” Mitsuki objected. “Naoko said it — the division has been busy, and he’s got a lot of other things to do. I’m just one unranked officer from a foreign squad... in the big scheme of things, I’m less than important.”

“If you think that anything is taking priority in his mind over you, Mitsuki, you’re being foolish,” Naoko said categorically. “The other night, when we got word about what had happened in Rukongai, he was the first out of the doors, hurrying to Fourth to find out details

despite the fact he was running a fever. Nobody could stop him, and Houjou and I had to take charge of the squad in his absence. He spent the night at Fourth because anxiety about you and Rukongai made him push his body beyond its limits and he more or less collapsed. He's putting the division first because he has to — as Captain, we all need him to. But he's thinking of you every moment of the day, and don't think it's otherwise. Whatever your thoughts on the matter might be, he's as much in love with you now as he was when you said your goodbyes. He wears that pendant of yours all the time, pretty much — more than anyone, the Taichou is glad you're going to be okay."

"Maybe I'm being silly, but after being apart so long, it's hard to know for sure," tears of relief glistened against Mitsuki's fair skin. "Thank you for saying it, Nao-chan, though it shouldn't need to be said. I understand that the division should take priority. I'm just... a bit... wrenched about at the moment. I suppose... I don't want to be alone more than I need to, whilst I process everything that happened. It all moved so quickly... I'm still reeling from losing so many people who'd become like my family."

"Well, we're here now. We're here, Juushirou's here, and it will be fine," Sora said firmly. "I already told Shunsui, if we can get involved in investigating this thing, we should, and he agreed. Thirteenth are already involved, because you're here. That means Nao and I are right behind you, backing you up, and we'll get to the bottom of it. That's a promise. We won't give up until we do, no matter how long it takes."

Mitsuki was probably back on the other side by now.

Katsura rested his chin on his hands, his gaze seeing nothing of the battered landscape before him. The entanglement with the Hollow still weighed heavily on his mind, and, not for the first time since his return to Rukongai, he found himself plotting it over again in his mind, dissecting each and every decision he had made in the search for the moment he had moved away from his usual brief and hurried to the rescue of one of the black clad death gods.

What had made him do it? Now, back in such familiar surroundings, he understood it less and less. Did he love her? He dismissed this at once. He had liked her, yes, and admired her plucky spirit in the face of so much devastation, but there had also been a fragility about her — a gentleness that had reached out to the local citizens and reassured them. In a fight, she was no champion. That much had been painfully clear. Yet despite the fact each time must put her in considerable danger, she still chose to put on the uniform and carry the sword.

Why did this bother him so much?

He grimaced, burying his head in his hands. The truth was, he had simply never thought about anything from a shinigami's perspective before. Seeing the pain of her comrades' deaths, and the frantic way in which she had tried to save them had, for the first time, made him see the enemy as something other than objects to be cut down. He had felt guilty for causing that pain, and, though they had had the most fleeting of acquaintances, as he thought back on it, he realised that he would hate for her to look at him with those eyes, knowing what he had done to her and her squad.

It was not a feeling he liked, nor clearly understood. Whilst defending his family and the people of Rukongai was second nature to him, he had never once felt guilt for the death of a shinigami, and it ate away at him more than he wanted to admit.

Almost like they were people... people like us, not... not really monsters at all.

"This is an unusual place to find you,"

The sound of Koku's voice made him glance up, ready with a quick and witty retort, but it died on his lips as he registered his companion's pallor, taking in the younger man's hooded eyes and the faint lines of pain that ran like furrows across his brow. As he shuffled up to make room for his companion on the dry stretch of narrow river bank, Koku dropped down beside him with a sigh, his hands trembling slightly as he smoothed out the rough fabric of his dusty clothes, making himself as comfortable as he could. He did not speak for a moment, and Katsura sent his companion a sidelong glance, wanting to probe gently at his thoughts but holding back, waiting for Koku's signal that it was okay.

"Not now," Koku murmured, answering the unvoiced question with a slight, tentative shake of his head. "Give me a few minutes — just let me settle."

Katsura's eyes narrowed into slits, but he reluctantly pulled back, leaning back on his hands and gazing up at the clouded, colourless sky that hung heavy over their heads.

"You didn't sleep much last night, did you?" he asked at length, and Koku flinched slightly, then sighed, shrugging his shoulders in a gesture that Katsura recognised as grudging admission.

"I had to take Tenichi back to his shelter, to make sure Sakaki didn't gut him," he responded with a grimace. "And after that..."

He trailed off, but Katsura read the unspoken message in the younger man's expression, and his expression darkened.

"I don't know why you let him make you do so much," he muttered. "I've never understood that. We both know... it's hard on you. You need to rest too, and he's been making you run around after this shinigami, then on top of that..."

"It's not that big a deal," Koku assured him, shooting him a wan smile. "Don't look like that, all right? I have to be of some material use, don't I? There's no sense me being here, otherwise. It's all right, so don't fuss. I'm just a little tired today, that's all."

"It was... a hard night?"

"There have been worse," Koku was vague, his gaze turning away, and Katsura grimaced.

"You can't hide it that easily. You're pale, shaking and you look like you're about to heave your guts all over me," he said bluntly. "At least tell me if that's the case, all right? I don't have many more clothes to wear this month, not with everything else that's gone on, and it's not as though washing them clean is easy in this dried up wasteland of a place!"

"I promise I'm not going to throw up on you," despite himself, faint humour glittered in Koku's dark eyes. "I'll be all right, seriously I will. It's passing, and the fresh air is helping clear my head."

"Fresh air, huh?" Katsura sniffed, then snorted, shaking his head. "This isn't fresh air, Koku-kun. This is fetid, dry and stale air, full of decay and people's dissatisfaction. I don't know how you can breathe it and say you feel better — honestly, sometimes it just makes me claustrophobic."

"Well, I haven't been travelling in the places you have, so I guess I make do," Koku said contemplatively. "Speaking of which, are you going to tell me exactly what happened on the other side of that stone wall? Everyone's been pretty closed-lipped on it, but Sakaki was covered in gore and, now Keitarou-san's taken our unexpected guest back to the place he belongs, I figured it'd be all right to discuss it. Nobody here will hear us, and there aren't any shinigami in the wings any more."

"You're going to miss your babysitting duty, huh?" Katsura asked keenly, and Koku laughed.

“You’re changing the subject,” he pointed out, “and no, not really. It was nice in one way, having someone new to talk to, and finding out some things about shinigami I didn’t know — but on the whole, it was difficult. Too much enforced company is draining after a while — I’m not as gregarious as you are, and his being here caused tensions every which way.”

“I am changing it,” Katsura agreed. “What happened in the Spiritless Zone isn’t for you to worry about.”

“I do, though,” Koku admitted. “I worry that he’s sending you there to blood your hands on his behalf, and I don’t like that he is. It’s not fair on you, either, you know — Sakaki is one thing, but you’re not a killer, not by nature, and...”

“You’re worried about me?” Katsura arched an eyebrow, reaching over to ruffle his companion’s messy dark hair, and Koku winced, pushing him away.

“Oww... don’t! Don’t, my head... it’s not up to that kind of thing yet!”

“Oops, sorry,” Katsura looked contrite, withdrawing his hand almost immediately. “Are you all right? I didn’t make it worse?”

“No, I guess not,” Koku sighed, resignation in his expression. “I want you to tell me though, Katsura. It’s not as though I haven’t worked it all out for myself — but I want to hear your side of it. I am worried about you. I always am, when you go flitting off on one of Keitarou-san’s errands. Whilst I don’t doubt it’s all about keeping us safe, sometimes...”

He frowned, a shadow crossing his expression.

“Sometimes?” Katsura pressed, and Koku shook his head.

“No. Nothing,” he murmured. “Well? It would take my mind off my headache if you were to share a little bit with me. I know Sakaki killed people. I’m going to guess you did too.”

“I manipulated a Hollow...” Katsura said slowly, “and two shinigami died. Maybe three. They were fighting it — but it was stronger than they were. It was a fair fight, Koku — I made sure that it lured them out and no local people were hurt. They knew what they were facing — there were no sneak attacks.”

“Three shinigami died,” Koku murmured softly, closing his eyes for a moment and an indescribable expression crossed his features. An awkward silence fell between them, and Katsura was just debating sending another psychic probe to poke through his companion's defences when Koku's eyes snapped open again, fixing him with a penetrating stare.

"I thought there were four."

"Oh, dammit, stop it with the psychic reflection," Katsura groaned, massaging his temples in frustration. "Ever since I first discovered I could speak to you telepathically, you've been doing this to me — pulling my skills back on me and reading bits of my thoughts instead of just what I send across to you. It creeps me out and I don't like it — this is my spirit power, and you shouldn't be able to do it. It's not fair play — it's bad manners, digging into someone else's mind!"

"You dig into other people all the time," Koku said calmly. "Besides, it's as you said. We have that bond. You established it in the first place. It's only natural that I should be able to manipulate it sometimes, too."

"I don't dig into your thoughts when you don't want me there," Katsura objected, and Koku let out a hollow laugh.

"Yes, and I'm sure I can guess at the reasons why," he remarked darkly. "Well? So there were four, then? Not three? What about the fourth?"

Katsura glanced around him, his expression one of consternation, and Koku reached out a pale hand to touch his arm.

"Keitarou-san's not here," he murmured. "He won't hear you, and there's nobody else nearby. You know that. You can sense them, even better than I can. Tell me what happened in the Spiritless Zone, Katsura. I need to know... it's bothering me."

Katsura ran his fingers through his muzzy dark hair with a heavy sigh.

If you say a word of this to Father, you're dead meat.

He sent the message across the divide psychically, seeing his companion wince slightly as the psychic impulse vibrated through his aching brain, and he sighed, feeling guilty.

I'm not talking about it out loud, so if you want to know, it will have to be this way. I never know when one of his people is around, especially since Kurotsuchi is so fond of spying on anyone and anything if it carries favour with the boss.

Are you afraid of Keitarou-san's reaction, then?

Koku's expression was pained, but he nodded in acquiescence, returning his own question across the telepathic bond.

You sound like you are... as though what happened was a big deal.

I don't know if it is or it isn't, yet. I'm still trying to figure it out for myself.

Katsura groaned, flopping back on the ground and gazing up at the sky with a sigh.

The other one was a girl, Koku. A shinigami, sure, but a girl.

A girl, huh?

Koku pursed his lips, a knowing smile twitching at his lips.

A pretty girl?

She was, but that wasn't... I mean... it wasn't...

Katsura stalled, unable to find the words he wanted, and a sigh wafted across the psychic link.

If you have a weakness, it's for a pretty girl. Here was I thinking that there was doom and gloom tied up in this, and all that happened is you lost your heart all over again.

No... no, it wasn't like that...

What was it like, then?

Koku rolled over onto his stomach, resting his chin in his hands and fixing Katsura with a penetrating look.

If you let her get away from the Hollow, it must've been something, right?

I don't understand it myself.

Katsura grimaced, closing his eyes briefly and picturing Mitsuki against his thoughts.

Is that her?

Koku asked curiously, and Katsura's eyes shot open, indignation flaring in his dark eyes as he wheeled on his companion.

"Hey, I never meant you to peek into that!" he exclaimed, and Koku held up his hands in mock surrender, an apologetic smile on his face.

"It slipped over. It wasn't on purpose," he said sheepishly. "My brain isn't as focused as it usually is, and it's picking up signals from all over. I'm sorry. I'm not really trying to pry."

Katsura sighed, tension flooding out of his body and he dropped back on the ground.

Yes, that was her. Her name was Mitsuki. Edogawa Mitsuki. I don't know exactly why, Koku, but I didn't want to let her die.

Mitsuki?

Koku's brows knitted together, his lips thinning.

The beautiful moon... huh.

Yeah... so?

Katsura cast his companion a quizzical glance.

What does that have to do with anything?

I don't know... yet.

Koku sighed, shrugging his shoulders and offering a smile.

Sorry. I'm not really as clear as I should be this morning. I didn't mean to zone off like that. You liked this girl, though? Even though she was a shinigami?

It wasn't like the others.

Katsura rolled onto his side to face his companion, toying absently with the dry pebbles that littered the stream bank.

I liked her, and she was pretty, but it wasn't because of that. She was helping the Plus souls... and when the Hollow came, her first instinct was to protect them, not herself. I felt it radiate from her, like a beacon, when the Hollow was bearing down on her. It was going to kill her for sure, but she didn't run away from it, and because she was frightened, she projected her thoughts out into the atmosphere. I saw it... how much she cared about those villagers. I couldn't let the Hollow kill someone like that. She sounded like she cared about the same things I did... so... so I stopped the Hollow from hurting her.

You stopped it?

Koku looked suddenly anxious.

Did she see you?

Katsura didn't respond for a moment, and Koku groaned, rubbing his temples.

She did. You spoke to her, didn't you? She's seen you.

Well... yes.

Keitarou-san is going to kill you. I'm serious. You let a shinigami see you — what the hell do you think he'll say about that?

A lot, which is why I'm not telling him.

Katsura snapped back, his dark eyes defensive.

I didn't tell her my name, and it's not as though she knows anything about me. She thought I'd come from Seireitei, so even if she looks for me, she'll never trace me back here. It's fine, Koku. Really. It's not going to bring danger here. I just... I didn't feel like killing someone who wasn't hurting anyone else. That's all. I don't know why we were sent to take out that squad, and I assumed they must be doing damage of some kind — but I don't think Mitsuki was part of that, and so I decided to let her live. Is that so very bad, really?

You know how I feel about killing people. Of course I don't think letting her go was bad.

Koku responded wearily, the lines of pain across his brow deepening as he contemplated his companion's words more carefully.

Letting her see you, though, that was bad. Speaking to her, that was bad. You might be right, but... I don't know. I have a bad feeling... you really shouldn't have done that.

I don't feel great about it, myself.

Katsura groaned.

It's done now, though. Done and past and over with. I don't intend to look for her again. I didn't fall for her, or anything stupid like that, and she didn't seem like the kind of girl who'd be pulled in by my lines or my powers, either. She was older than me... and I could only read her thoughts when she let her guard down and was panicked or unconscious. Trying to form any kind of understanding with her would be impossible and far too dangerous — plus, Father wouldn't like it if I decided to take up with a shinigami all of a sudden. You needn't worry that I'll try and see her again. I won't. It's done.

Mm.

Koku didn't respond at first, and Katsura shot him a sidelong glance, taking in the tension that rippled through his companion's young frame. Despite himself, he felt guilty.

You really are afraid of Seireitei and its people, aren't you?

No... not exactly afraid.

Koku answered cautiously, shaking his head.

I just don't believe in taking unnecessary risks. I don't want anyone hurt. We have a tough enough life... it doesn't need to get any worse. We could have a better one.

So Keitarou-san believes, but I'm not sure whether or not he's right, not yet.

Koku clicked his tongue against the roof of his mouth.

Maybe Seireitei is a better place, or maybe it isn't. I just think the risks outweigh the benefits. We belong here. This is our world. We get by. I help, because I want to be useful — but sometimes I think things would be better left alone.

That's only because you haven't seen Seireitei. You don't know enough about it to know how much better life there would be.

Maybe I know too much about it, and that's why I don't want to go there.

Koku tilted his head on one side, as if considering the best way to phrase his next statement.

If I go there, everything will change. If I cross the border like you do, there's no going back. Beyond the Sekkiseki divide, everything is alien, and when it's done, it can't be undone. That bothers me most of all.

He stretched, stifling a yawn.

I need to sleep, but I don't suppose I'm going to, not now you've given me new things to think about.

Sorry.

Katsura looked sheepish.

It's your own fault, though. You asked.

I know.

Koku frowned, turning his head towards the direction of the village.

Someone coming?

Katsura instinctively spread his senses, scanning the surrounding area, but he could not pick up any trace reiatsu or the flicker of another's thought processes, and he sent his companion a quizzical look.

Are you sure? I don't sense anything.

Koku nodded.

It's Sakaki. Time to talk properly... and about something else.

His message was brisk and to the point, and Katsura felt the psychic link sever, as his companion cut through it on his side, flinging up mental barriers to prevent the conversation from continuing. It was a necessary precaution, Katsura knew — for although Sakaki could not penetrate their telepathic conversations, she was smart enough to realise when people were talking about her behind her back. Although he could pick up graphic images from her thoughts, Katsura had never been able to forge a psychic communication link to his younger sister. It was a fact she strongly resented, and so, to keep the peace, he had resolved to use the power as little as possible in front of her.

“Okaasama's been looking for you,”

Instead of any kind of greeting, Sakaki's first words were laced with an accusation, and she planted herself square in front of Katsura's line of sight, ignoring Koku as though he were not even there. “I told her you were probably doing something important, but you're just hanging out doing nothing. Just because he's not here, it doesn't mean there aren't chores to do and I'm not doing your share for you."

"I didn't know she was," Katsura said mildly, offering her a smile. "I'll go see her now, if that's how things are. She's probably just worried, though. He's gone on a dangerous trip, and she'll be fretting about him coming back safely."

"He'll be fine," Sakaki said matter-of-factly, "but you're probably right. In any case, it was you she wanted, so I said I'd at least go hunt you down."

"Most people don't mean the 'hunt' in that phrase as literally as you do, Saki-chan," Katsura patted her gently on the arm. "All right, I get the message. I'm going. I was only talking to Koku, anyhow. As you said, nothing important."

"I don't know why you bother talking to him at all," Sakaki's lips puckered into an unattractive scowl, which she flung Koku's way. "He's just a drone. One of Keitarou-san's lackeys, and that's all. He's nothing. He's not like us. You shouldn't waste your time with him, or you might wind up as pointless as he is."

"Saki-chan..." Katsura began, but Koku held up a hand, shrugging his shoulders.

"I'm sorry if my presence offends you, Sakaki," he said evenly. "As it happens, Keitarou-san didn't leave me with any particular jobs to do this morning, so if there are chores that need doing, I'm more than happy to do my share."

"Suck up," Sakaki growled, sending him another derisive look, then turning back to her original target.

"Well? Are you going? She said now, and I don't want the blame if you keep her waiting."

"I'm gone," Katsura got to his feet reluctantly. "Are you coming with me, to make sure I don't stray? I'm sure you don't have anything nice to say to Koku, so there's no reason for you to stay around here."

"I don't have anything to say to him," Sakaki said bluntly, turning and poking out her tongue in the hapless Koku's direction. "He never treats me with any respect — you either. The only person he listens to is Keitarou-san, and then he sucks up and sucks up and follows every order he gets just so that he can get special favours among the other villagers. It's not like that changes what he is any at all. He'll never be anything different than another Rukongai drone, and that's all. He's not like us, so you shouldn't waste your time hanging out with him."

I'm your sister. He's just some kid Father found and took in because he thought he looked useful."

"You're not supposed to call Keitarou-san that, not even with me," Katsura chided lightly, and Sakaki scowled.

"He isn't here to hear it," she snapped back. "Only his minion, and I don't care what he thinks. Keitarou-san is my father. Yours too. That's what makes us special."

Katsura sent Koku a troubled glance, but the younger man laughed, a wry look in his brown eyes.

"Go," he said simply, waving his companion away. "Sakaki's right. You should spend some time with her today. I'm going to go back to my shelter and read for a bit, anyway. If anyone needs me, that's where they'll find me. Sakaki, you can tell Eiraki-san that if she has any duties she'd like me to attend to, I'll be willing — but I wouldn't dream of intruding on your family time."

Katsura hesitated for a moment, but Sakaki snorted in triumph, her long, delicate fingers closing tightly around his arm.

"We're going, then," she said decisively. "Leave the worm to dig around in his own dirt for a while."

I'm sorry, Koku.

The transmission was faint and fleeting, and Katsura did not dare look back, sure Sakaki would pick up on the sensation and realise what was going on.

Don't mind me. I'm fine. Being alone is probably better for now, anyway.

I mean it though. What she said... I am sorry.

Not your fault. Let it be. I'll talk to you later.

Koku sounded comfortable, even relieved with this arrangement, and Katsura let out a little sigh.

Don't worry. I won't tell anyone what you told me. I think it's better that nobody else knows about it, probably not ever, so I'll keep your secret. You can trust me.

I know. I always do.

With that, Katsura reluctantly broke the link, allowing his sister to lead him up the worn pathway that led to Eiraki's quarters.

"You shouldn't talk to him like that, you know," he murmured, and Sakaki sent him a quizzical look.

“Who? Koku? Why not?”

“Keitarou-san trusts him. That’s why not.”

“He trusts Kurotsuchi, too, but you don’t spend so much time fussing around him,” Sakaki pointed out frankly.

“That’s not the same thing at all.”

“Looks like it from where I’m standing,” Sakaki retorted, and Katsura groaned.

“Fine. I’m done. Let’s not argue,” he said at length. “I’ll come see what Mother wants, and try and put her mind at ease about Father. You come too — it’ll probably take the both of us, anyway.”

“I wasn’t going anywhere else,” Sakaki informed him archly, releasing her hold on his arm and stalking up the path ahead, turning back to glare at him. “Well? Get a move on, slow coach — I’m not taking the slack for you being late!”

It was a cold, bleak world, deep beneath the earth of District Seven.

Arched ceilings carved deep into the granite grey of the rock gave the feeling of space and air, though the chambers were self contained with false entrances and passageways leading off at every angle to confuse anyone who chose to stray into the darkened den. At first glance, the high ceiling and densely packed floor appeared crafted by professional artists, though on closer inspection the scars of the chisel and the pick gave away the fact that this was the remains of an abandoned Sekkiseki mine from District Seven’s more prosperous economic past. New mines had begun to spring up all over the Seventh, but the population were still recovering from the decimation of previous regimes. Few records remained outside of the Clan’s hands as to the location of the old mines, several of which had been exhausted when the original Sekkiseki divide between Rukongai and Seireitei had been constructed, and though a thin layer of the impure rock gave the walls of the chamber a strange, almost mottled effect, the majority of the raw Sekkiseki ore had long since been removed.

What remained in the crude pillars that supported the dips of the uneven ceiling was enough to conceal the spiritual presence of those who called this home. The halls were dark and dusty, now, indicating how few of the Kitsune people still chose to live in the security of the underground world, but, since the receipt of Souja’s urgent message, many had returned to their safehouse, and the sound of chattering children and whispering adults could be heard throughout the domain.

They were a resourceful people, moving swiftly and decisively in times of crisis, and ready to discard everything of material use in order to protect their lives and the lives of their loved ones. Bonds between the Kitsune were stronger than strong, the kinship of people who had seen generations of threat and hardship and had faced them together, so there was no sense of panic despite the fact someone was clearly hunting them down.

An occupational hazard, in fact.

The young man with the silver hair cast a quick, cursory glance around him at the makeshift settlement that had sprung up once more in what had been for several years an empty great hall, food being shared out in small but effective rations and families huddled together, the older ones telling stories to palefaced young ones about each and every symbol the chamber's ceilings bore. Some of the little ones would be unused to the Sekkiseki, he mused, and would suffer from the classic lethargy and nausea that afflicted them all to begin with, when so closely surrounded by so much stifling spirit-stone. The Sekkiseki protected them but also killed them, and even in his short life he had seen many succumb to what the Kitsune referred to as Sekibyou or "Stone Sickness". His own parents were both among the dead, buried deep in the most hidden corner of the underground village, as well as two uncles, his grandparents, a cousin and even an infant brother.

Life was short and harsh, but that made it worth having, and he had never resented his lot. Karma had wished this life on the Kitsune, and they had accepted its terms with equanimity.

"Joumei-dono, we've returned."

As he crossed over the engraved stone floor towards the rear tunnels that led to a more private set of chambers, a man with shaggy red hair appeared beneath one of the arches, his body swathed in the black hooded robes that all of them wore when above ground. Though Joumei was the younger of the two, his companion bowed his head quickly, acknowledging the other's alpha position. Joumei had already seen the apprehension in the man's greenish eyes.

"I see," he said softly, then, "and?"

"We brought him back here," the redhead chewed on his lip, clearly agitated. "Izumi-hime said we should, and that you'd want us to... but..."

He faltered, and Joumei sighed, coming to rest his hands on his companion's shoulders.

"This fear of shinigami must stop, Hiko," he said, faint reproach in his tones. "We are protected by shinigami. We live because of shinigami. It is not shinigami who are our enemies. You must stop fearing them, lest it puts you in danger in the future."

"I know," Hiko grimaced, looking ashamed of himself. "I understand that, Joumei-dono, but it's difficult. I remember what my sister said happened to Mother and Father, and after that..."

"You still came back here, when you could have fled far away," Joumei offered him a gentle smile. "You came back to your people, and we will protect you, too. This shinigami is very likely the one that Souja-dono and Hirata-sama are seeking, anyway. The report I received said he was youngish, fairskinned and tall, with reddy gold hair and that fits the description of the officer abducted from Inner Seireitei. If we can return him safely to where he belongs, we will not be punished, will we?"

"No," Hiko agreed cautiously, "but he will see us. This place. Souja-dono never... this is our safehouse, and if even one low ranking officer knew where to find us..."

"If Izumi brought him back, she will have taken care of that," Joumei said wryly. "He won't remember the route he took to come here, and when we return him, we can take the same precautions. We won't let him roam free here, Hiko, don't worry. He may be our guest and a victim of a crime — but among the Kitsune, foreigners are also prisoners and I have no intention of making any exceptions."

He clapped Hiko on the back, then,

"I'll go see my sister now, and see this shinigami for myself. I trust she took him to the usual place?"

"Yes, sir. I came to report to you — am I otherwise dismissed?"

There was no hiding the hopefulness in Hiko's voice, and Joumei grinned, nodding.

"Yes, you are. You can leave it with me, and I'll deal with it from here," he promised.

"Yes, sir," Hiko bowed his head again, making to disappear back into the shadowy tunnels, but then he paused, turning to fix quizzical eyes on his leader.

"Don't you think it's convenient, though, that the missing man turns up here, now?" he asked softly. "We looked, they looked, and yet he was here, on Endou land, all the time?”

“The simplest explanation is that he wasn’t here, and he’s been released here now for a particular reason,” Joumei said candidly. “Almost certainly that means he was abducted by the person who wants to find us, and he was left as bait, hoping we would bite.”

“But...” Alarm flooded Hiko’s expression, and Joumei tut-tutted under his breath.

“A crude manipulation not worthy of acknowledging,” he muttered. “Our duty to the Endou outranks our will to protect ourselves, but that doesn’t mean we won’t succeed at both. Even if such a thing was done, no outsider can find their way in here. Even if they did, they would be sorely disadvantaged. We are used to the Sekkiseki, but unwanted visitors are not. They would not leave here alive, Hiko — I am very sure of that.”

“Some of the people are saying that moving further south would be safer,” Hiko admitted. “There are only forty or fifty Kitsune in total who answered the call this time, and some of them have very small children. It’s been said that the southern mine is a safer place for young ones, less likely to be found than here... is that true?”

“It may be,” Joumei said frankly. “In truth, I would rather have those families away there just to be on the safe side. It will probably come, but not just yet. Too much movement, even underground, may have the opposite effect and draw attention to us, not away. Be patient and trust me. I don’t intend on rushing into anything. Father never would have... and I take the safety of every single life very seriously indeed.”

“Yes, sir,” Hiko nodded, looking relieved, and as he disappeared into the black, Joumei sighed, clicking his tongue absently against the roof of his mouth.

The Southern Mine isn’t yet safe enough. The collapse of that chamber two years ago still requires work to make it stable and habitable again, and when I do give the order for the families to go, I have to be sure that they have all they need. You’re right, Hiko — this shelter is probably more exposed and therefore so are we... but I can’t leave here on a whim. It has to be the right time — and whilst we have a shinigami here, that’s clearly not it.

His lips thinned as he turned on his heel, ducking his head to enter a tunnel to the right, placing his feet carefully over smooth steps cut into the hard base rock. Kidou lamps did not function so deep within the Sekkiseki, but nonetheless there was enough light for him to see his way, the glass half-jars affixed at intervals along every wall glowed with an eerie bluish light. Where magic had failed them, science had not — and Joumei had long since thanked his stars that he had come from a creative, innovative people who had always seen hardship as a challenge, not an obstacle to life.

Sekkiseki dust reacts with certain compounds to give off light, and, if trapped in the right conditions and if all air is removed, the reaction continues exponentially, fuelling and refuelling itself and providing light.

A faint smile touched his lips as he reached the foot of the stairs.

Basic chemistry, yet I still remember the surprise and awe with which Souja-dono viewed these lamps the first time he visited our domain. If the world of the Shinigami remain so dependant on their spirit power for every small thing, no wonder they have so many loopholes in their system. No wonder Hirata-sama still needs us, if the Gotei disdain their environment in favour of their spells.

At the foot of the stairs, round a tight, twisting corner was a large block of wood, cut exactly to fit the proportions of the old mining tunnel. He rapped on it three times, paused, then twice more, and after a moment he heard the sliding of a bolt before the door swung open to reveal a small, circular chamber beyond. This had once been a store-chamber, housing mining equipment, but now it was empty except for a flat, marble bier in the centre. The walls were carved with more of the symbols and characters that covered the columns and walls on the higher level — protective charms and ciphers intermingled with the long forgotten family crests of the original Kitsune who had fled here in fear of their lives over a hundred years before. None of them still lived, nor their children, but the distinctions of rank and status between the Kitsune families was still as solid as it had been back then. Of all of those who had sought exile and sanctuary before Keitsune's arrest, Joumei's family had held the highest rank at court, and so, some several generations later it was Joumei, young as he was, and his sister who held the reins of control over the whole underground tribe.

Hiko is right. Only forty or fifty answered the call this time. Others have integrated, found homes and settled outside of our protection. They sought normality, and perhaps, till this, I thought they could have it. Not everyone has as pure Urahara blood as Izumi and I. Hiko's mother was an outsider, and he's not the only one. Red hair is not an Urahara trait. Perhaps one day the Kitsune will be as everyone else — mixed and intermingled in with other kinsfolk and no longer identifiable nor threatened by those seeking an ancient revenge. Maybe that wouldn't be such a bad thing — better than see them killed for crimes committed by those they never knew.

He reached up to finger the uneven ends of the silvery hair that hung loose around his shoulders.

Unfortunately for me, silver hair only runs in one particular Urahara Clan line. All of that family were condemned by Urahara Rikiya as traitors and permission was granted to kill us on sight. I can't imagine that Nagesu-sama seeks to hunt us after so long — but there are others who would know who we are if they saw us — know and want to kill us to avenge old wounds.

At his entrance, the room's occupant glanced up, the dark cowl of her hood still heavy around her head. She met his gaze for a brief moment, offering a smile, then turning her attention back to something huddled and black that lay sprawled out across the bier.

The shinigami?

"Is this him?" Joumei crossed the room in quick, even strides, and without looking up, the girl nodded her head. Her pale fingers drifted across the unconscious man's cheek and then his chin, pausing at his throat before running over the dusty seams of the black shihakushou. Without a moment of hesitation, she began to loosen the cloth between her delicate, fairy like hands, pulling the pieces of the hakamashita apart to reveal the shinigami's chest.

"Wait," Joumei rested his hand on hers, and she glanced at him, a question in her eyes. At her expression, Joumei laughed, then slowly shook his head.

"He's not a test subject. We can't dissect him," he said softly, his tones light and joking, and his companion snorted, pulling away from his grasp and returning her attention to the man's clothing. Turning back the folds of the hakamashita, she gently teased out the small greyish tag of fabric that bore the 'Shoubu' flower of the Seventh Division, then released her hold, allowing the cloth to fall back across his skin. The shinigami did not stir, and Joumei knew that he would probably continue to sleep for some time.

"You don't fool me," he said wryly. "You weren't just looking for that tag — you wanted to take skin samples, didn't you?"

The young woman didn't answer, instead reaching up to knock back the hood of her cloak. A cascade of fluffy silverish curls fell out across her shoulders, several strands of it woven with gold and blue beads bought at local markets and engraved by hand with the same symbols that hung over their heads and on the walls. Her cheeks were pale, though her brows and lashes were dark, and when she smiled — a rare thing, Joumei reflected — she dimpled, giving her the almost cherubic prettiness that always took strangers off their guard. She was petite, built on a much smaller scale to him, possessing all of her mother's tiny but perfectly formed features. A gust of wind might blow her away, their father had often joked, but Izumi's angelic appearance masked a razor sharp brain and a shrewd wit. Izumi did not speak — though nobody had ever been sure whether it was because she could not or simply did not, and so her only form of communication was via hand signals which few of the other Kitsune understood. To Joumei, sometimes even these were not needed, for he knew his sister's mind better than anyone else. At twenty years old, she was his most precious treasure — and the thing he had sworn to his father as that man had lain dying that he would protect above all others.

“He belongs to Souja-dono and Hirata-sama. He's not ours to dissect,” Joumei said now, turning his gaze back to the shinigami's features. “I know why you wanted to — but that's the exact reason why you can't. Souja-dono told me the missing shinigami's name was Kotetsu Tenichi. He's an Urahara... just like us.”

Izumi looked thoughtful for a moment, then turned to scoop up Tenichi's right arm, pushing back the fabric of the shihakushou with the disinterested composure of a scientist or physician who undressed strange men on a regular basis without a single thought. She held it up, tapping her finger against the spirit cuff, then grimacing as though she disliked what she saw. She thrust the arm out towards Joumei, Tenichi's fingers dangling limply back and forth, and the young man frowned, squinting at the metal and then nodding his head.

“Rough metal, crude workmanship — functional but not pretty,” he agreed. “What do you think? Someone who didn't know his trade but muddled through? Or someone who knew his trade but lacked the proper resources to give it proper finish?”

Izumi pressed her lips together, then held up two fingers, and Joumei nodded.

“Yes, I think so too,” he agreed, taking the arm in his grasp and indicating for her to release her hold. “It's working rather too well to be the former, unless it happens to be a very lucky coincidence. I can't sense the slightest flicker of his own reiatsu, though he's not hurt or damaged in any way and seems quite healthy, if a little thin and dusty. Even given the Sekkiseki, I'd be inclined to say whoever made it designed it with security in mind. It could almost be an Urahara — that kind of caution suits us.”

Izumi's head shot up sharply, and Joumei's jaw tightened grimly.

“Maybe,” he agreed, the unspoken question hanging in the air between them, understood by both at once. “Izumi, while he sleeps, there is something we ought to find out. Hiko said it, and I thought it too — his being here like this, now, so close to our forest is a little bit of a convenient coincidence. He’s covered in dust and grime — if you want to take samples of something, take samples of that. I’d like to see where he was being held originally, if we can nail down a location — and also, any foreign reiatsu that’s seeped into his shihakushou during his stay there. It will probably take some time to get results, especially now we’re under curfew, but I want you to do it anyway. Souja-dono said that none of the other abductees left a trace of spirit power anywhere about them — but something tells me that this one isn’t like the others. Whoever took Tenichi-dono asked for us as the trade. They also let him go near where we are, which bothers me.”

Izumi’s fingers fluttered silently, a question in her eyes, and Joumei shook his head.

“I’m pretty sure this has nothing to do with a dissatisfied strand of the Endou, but that doesn’t mean that it’s not tied up with District Seven somehow,” he said at length. “Take as many samples as you need, even if that does mean cutting bits from his clothing.”

He set down the arm on the bier, flicking a finger disparagingly at the grimy, frayed remains of the shinigami’s obi.

“No Captain will let him wear that on parade again, so you can take as much as you like from it, I expect,” he concluded. “Leave him decent, but take what you can. If he’s like the others, he won’t remember where he’s been, and I’d rather he slept while we investigate. I’ll send word to Souja-dono when it’s safe to — but for now, if someone’s hunting us, I’d like to know who and why.”

Izumi nodded her agreement, reaching down to pull a sharp knife from her belt.

“Don’t hurt him, though,” Joumei cautioned her. “If he is Kotetsu Tenichi, then hurting him would be unforgivable.”

Izumi’s lips twitched down slightly, but she made no demur, instead reaching for the abused obi and beginning to slice sections off in a calm, methodical manner.

“You didn’t see anyone else in the forest, by the way?” Joumei asked casually, and Izumi paused, tilting her head on one side as if considering the question carefully. At length she sighed, then, reluctantly, she shrugged her shoulders. With the free fingers of her left hand she twitched a brief, abbreviated message.

“Kidou?” Joumei’s eyes darkened. “You’re sure it was Kidou you sensed?”

Izumi nodded her head, returning her attention to the obi.

“Well, if so, it certainly wasn’t this guy who fired it — not with cuffs like that,” Joumei sighed, rubbing his temples. “Whoever it was didn’t want to be seen, which probably meant they came here to see. Find out what you can from his clothing, Izumi, and then, when you’re done taking samples... wake him up. Seal him in here, but wake him. I’ll speak to him and find out what he knows. Whatever he tells us, though, and even if he is Kotetsu Tenichi, some things can’t be helped. He stays within this room and he sees nobody he doesn’t need to see until Souja-dono comes to claim him and take him back to Inner Seireitei. If someone is playing games with us, I’m not going to leave them a paper trail. Whether they took Tenichi-dono for their own gain or to sniff us out, they’re not going to find these foxes so easy to ensnare.”

Author’s Note

Cookies for anyone who spotted the anachronism in this chapter ;)
Also, observant folk may have noticed some characteristics in Izumi’s appearance that are somewhat familiar to someone in modern canon...

Name Kanji :)

Since we’ve a few characters lurking in this story who are new or newish, and others whose names might become relevant as time goes on, I thought I’d give a quick kanji rundown of some of these individuals. The last few chapters have confirmed what has been hinted at up to this point — that is the biological bloodlines between Keitarou and some of the other characters. As I think I’ve said before, Keitarou’s name 敬太郎 means “respectful first son” or ‘respectful great man’, whilst Eiraki’s 永瀧 means “eternal waterfall”. The ‘raki’ kanji is a more unusual reading of the word ‘taki’ (waterfall) usually reserved for names, which in simplified modern Japanese is normally written as 滝. I think I may have previously referenced her name with the modern kanji, but I think given the era I’m setting this, it’s more appropriate to use the original character as given above.

All Kei and Eiraki’s children are all named after trees. I don’t really know why, except that they provided good solid imagery for another theme of the story. So far we’ve seen a fair bit of Katsura 桂 (Judas tree, or Laurel). I don’t know if people know this, but “Aizen Katsura” carries another meaning in Japanese, using different kanji for Aizen than that chosen by Kubo Tite. Kubo’s ‘Aizen’ means ‘dyed indigo’, but there is a tradition in, I believe, Nagano Prefecture at one of the temples of a Katsura tree which is famous for the making of romantic vows. This is known as the Aizen Katsura (the Love Vow Laurel/Judas tree) and a novel was written about it, as well as film adaptations made. There are, so I've read, other 'aizen katsura' trees in other parts of Japan, including the Oosaka region. Katsura's rather fated meeting with and continued interest in Mitsuki, then, can perhaps be seen in this light — although it's far from a romantic connection in the traditional sense. The katsura has another reference in Japanese literary imagery and, perhaps, cultural folklore. I really don't wholly understand where it comes from, but there's an old story about a laurel tree in the moon... well, Mitsuki's name is beautiful moon... and so there is that connection again. Finally, there is the more boring western interpretation in the name "Judas" tree...

Oh, yes. Katsura also means "wig", but erm not using this kanji ;)

We've also seen a lot of Sakaki 榊. Her name means 'sacred evergreen', and the kanji for her name is actually made up of a combination of the characters for 'tree' and 'god'. There is no real connection between Sakaki's character and any legends or history surrounding the tree in Japanese tradition, and I chose it largely because it had a very old provenance in keeping with the setting of the story.

Attentive people will have noticed the references to a mysterious third name, Kohaku 杞白 (white river willow), who Keitarou referred to as "son" in the previous chapter. Kohaku is also the Japanese word for amber (琥珀), as one reader has already pointed out to me. I don't want to spend a lot of time explaining my reasons for choosing to write the name like this instead of with the 'amber' kanji, but suffice it to say the willow seemed a suitable tree for the character in question. The 'haku' or 'white' can also be read as 'shiro' and is sometimes translated/interpreted as innocence. This character has been referenced before in my fanfiction, though I'm not saying how and where ;).

As regards the others lurking in Rukongai, I haven't decided quite yet how many characters from my rough notes to involve and include, and so only a couple have properly introduced themselves to the audience. Koku's "黒" was explained in an earlier chapter, whilst Kurotsuchi Masaya's name 正夜 means "true night"

I feel I ought to explain here that the name Kurotsuchi actually means "black earth", but the kanji that Kubo used for the canon character's name is not pronounced 'Kurotsuchi'. Instead, the character's name is a combination of the Japanese for black, "kuro 黒" and the Japanese for earth, "tsuchi." The kanji Kubo chose to use is the character 涅. Maybe I'm reading too much into this, but that kanji appears often in religious themed words relating to the death and rebirth of Buddhist figures, as well as being the first character in the Japanese word for Nirvana, "Nehan."

The kanji's actual meaning is "black earth", but I'm sure that Kubo had other reasons for using that particular kanji. For the purpose of this fiction, therefore, it can be assumed that Kurotsuchi Masaya is probably not my character's birth name but a name given to him by Keitarou after Keitarou saved his life, effectively "reincarnating" him as his servant.

Finally, the Kotetsu boys need a mention here, too. They have appeared already, back in Third Chronicle, of course, in the refugee village, and it was their mother that Shunsui spoke to about Keitarou when they were first gathering information. Now grown, both are obviously shinigami. Their family name, Kotetsu, is taken from canon. Tenichi 天一 means "Heaven's first", and Ketsui 決意 means "resolve."

Hikifune Kirio (曳舟 桐生) belongs to canon ;)

15. Kai's Report

Chapter Fourteen: Kai's Report

“...In conclusion, there seems very little doubt that the members of the Fourth Division's squad in Rukongai were murdered, most likely by a dead blade wielded by one of the Plus Soul residents.”

Kai addressed the sombre chamber, his golden eyes guarded yet the tension in his compact frame giving away the deep anger and indignation he felt about what he was saying. It was the next day and, at Retsu's behest, a Captain's meeting had been convened — although any prior agenda had been thrown out of the window the moment the subject had turned to the Fourth Division's plight. For once, every single Captain was present, the long white haori of each squad leader in bright contrast to the heavy dark robes each shinigami wore beneath. Although several of those present were also Clan leaders, within Inner Seireitei's Gotei boundaries, the rule was that shihakushou must be worn when on duty, and for once, nobody had tried to flaunt the ruling to show off their noble status. Even Shunsui had shed his familiar pink haori for this meeting, feeling that such bright colours would be in poor taste when so much of Seireitei was in mourning, and so it was a sober group of individuals who stood in silence, listening to the Onmitsukidou leader give his report.

Kai stood at the head of the chamber in the full formal black and gold of the Shihouin Clan. Although the active Vice Captain of the Second Division, on this occasion it was his position as head of the Secret Operative Forces that required his presence, and as such, he had discarded his adjutant insignia, preferring to attend the meeting in his Clan robes instead of his squad ones. Somehow this only added to the gravity of the occasion, and although his voice had not deviated from its calm and objective explanations, nobody in the room was fooled by his disinterested pretence.

“Are there any leads as to who this resident might have been?” the Captain of Second Division, Shihouin Midori, Kai's older sister and a ruthless swordswoman in her own right was the first to break the silence, fixing her brother with a sharp, questioning look that gave no hint whatsoever that she was addressing a much beloved kinsman. Kai grimaced, shaking his head.

“No, not as yet,” he admitted, “although I've left two of my officers in the vicinity to speak to people and, I hope, pick up some clues. There was a trail of blood leading into the woodland, but the trail went cold about halfway in and there's no sign of where the assailant might have gone next, nor any bloody weaponry or clothing concealed thereabouts. The victims at the camp site in Hokutan have all been examined both by my people on site and then Unohana-taichou's own people back under proper medical autopsy conditions, yet no trace of foreign reiatsu was found on any of them. I've spoken myself to Madeki-dono on my return here this morning, and taken a description of the person he remembers attacking them — but so far, none of the local citizens in Hokutan match the profile we're seeking."

"A dead end, in fact," Shunsui murmured, pressing his lips together in consternation. "Madeki-dono's witness testimony is concerning, though. A young girl — barely more than a child — with no discernable reiatsu and no special blade ripped apart good and well trained members of a reputable squad, leaving most of them dead, then disappears into nothing as though she were never there?"

"Do you think my officer is mistaken in his account, Kyouraku-taichou?" Retsu's voice was soft, but it carried a warning edge, and Shunsui shook his head, holding up his hands in mock surrender.

"No, not my meaning at all," he said quickly, a rueful look in his dark eyes. "I'm sure that Madeki-dono's testimony is correct simply because it sounds impossible — besides, he's not an officer given to exaggeration or panic. What he's told us is consistent with the evidence Kai's just given a summary of, too — but it's the very fact of it that's bothering me. A young girl is someone no shinigami would suspect of doing something of this nature. It's perfectly possible that that fact itself led to her being able to enter the Fourth Division compound."

"You mean, by pretending to be harmless — perhaps, even, hurt?" Juushirou asked sharply, and Shunsui nodded.

"It's possible, isn't it?" he glanced across at Kai for confirmation, and the darkskinned officer inclined his head.

"We're working on a similar theory," he agreed. "Madeki-dono didn't see her arrive, and so we've no surviving witnesses to how she managed to gain entry — but that seems a very plausible ruse to me. According to Madeki-dono, she was quite willing to use whatever methods she could to achieve her aim, and though good with a sword, he didn't call her exceptional. Whoever we're looking for is willing to resort to anything if it gets her ahead, and that could well include pretending to be helpless in order to lure her victims in."

“What about Aomori Seri in all of this?” Shiba Kyouki, Captain of the Fifth Division interjected, a questioning look in her bright green eyes. “The girl was attacked by a Hollow, correct?”

“A scorpion Hollow,” Juushirou confirmed gravely. “Mit... Edogawa isn’t yet well enough to give formal testimony to anyone, but she did confirm that Aomori had been attacked by a Hollow in scorpion form. Where or how this came about isn’t yet clear — but it doesn’t seem to have been part of the same incident at all.”

“Madeki-dono said that he sent Edogawa and three companions on an errand in Junrin’an,” Kai said grimly. “Aomori is still battling for her life, but the Onmitsukidou will need to speak to Edogawa soon, Ukitake — as will the Fourth, no doubt. Once I heard where Madeki-dono had sent them, my people split up to search the southern road and its near vicinity. There, we discovered the bodies of two shingami agents. Unohana-taichou has this morning identified them as the missing members of her squad, meaning that now all eleven are accounted for. They, too, were slain by a Hollow. There are clear signs of meshed reiatsu at the scene, indicating a fiercely pitched battle between them and it.”

“On Kai-dono’s request, Third Division dispatched three scientists to the Spiritless Zone to process and record each different aura for further analysis,” Urahara Nagesu, head of the Urahara Clan and Captain of Third Squad added quietly. “We hope to have a clear report in a few days, but it will take a little while to untangle the different flares of spirit power. From initial observations, though, it looks as though a Hollow attacked a local settlement in Junrin’an and the Fourth Division members headed it off. Two were killed in battle and Aomori sustained a serious injury. Somehow, she and Edogawa escaped, and it seems as though the Hollow was destroyed — but I can’t see any obvious connection between that happening and what Kai-dono describes in Hokutan.”

“I think it unlikely we will find a connection,” Kuchiki Guren, head of the Kuchiki and Captain of the Sixth rubbed his chin pensively. “A Hollow attack — albeit a rarity in the Spiritless Zone — in the southern region and a sword attack by a spiritless child in the northern region seem to have nothing to connect them together. More likely the first incident is a consequence of these tainted souls Madeki-dono sent a report to us about a short time ago — and it was mere coincidence that the assassin chose this time to attack in Hokutan.”

“With all respect, Guren-sama, I don’t like the probability of coincidences like that,” Shunsui murmured.

“It’s probably not a complete coincidence,” Shiba Hakubei suggested. “Fourth were split into two camps. Maybe the girl took her chance when numbers were less, fancying she had a better likelihood of succeeding if they weren’t all in one place. She couldn’t have known a Hollow would take on the others — but I think I’m right in saying that among the officers stationed there, Aomori Seri is one of the stronger Fourth Division fighters with a sword. With her away from the main camp, that left Madeki-dono as the only real sword fighter capable of holding his ground against a katana-wielding assassin.”

“Hakubei-dono may well be correct,” Retsu said sadly. “The strongest sword users among those dispatched to the Spiritless Zone were with Edogawa Mitsuki in Junrin’an. Whilst all of the officers at the Hokutan camp were capable of using their blades to heal, and had competent levels of Kidou, Madeki-dono was the only one with above average combat ability when it came to swords. Healers are not always the best fighters, and none of us anticipated an attack of this nature.”

“Perhaps that’s something the Fourth Division need to look at more seriously,” Midori pressed her lips together. “I realise now is not the time, Retsu-sama, but if, when things are less fraught, you want help from the Second in training your operatives to defend themselves with swords more effectively...”

“Your offer is appreciated, Midori-sama,” Retsu bowed her head in acknowledgement of her junior’s words. “As you say, when things are less fraught, Eriko and I will give it serious consideration.”

“If Edogawa and her companions were sent to route out Hollows, Madeki-dono dispatching the people he did to the southern area makes good strategic sense,” Kyouki reflected. “Like Retsu-dono says, nobody can account for a Plus soul losing her wits and launching a random, brutal attack like that out of the blue.”

“On the contrary, Kyouki-sama, we don’t believe it was random at all,” Kai said blackly. “More to the point, Madeki-dono was quite adamant that the attacker wasn’t mad, nor was she a soul in the processes of turning Hollow. She had an agenda and she fulfilled it. What that agenda was and how to explain it, that we don’t yet know. However, I — and my people — are treating this whole thing as premeditated murder, not insanity-driven manslaughter. More, if we have to question every settlement in the Spiritless Zone, we will find out who was behind the attack and we will stop it from happening again. I already have more officers assembled to enter the Spiritless Zone when the time-seal on the Senkaimon can be released to admit them entrance.”

“The Spiritless Zone project is in shambles,” Midori reflected. “Even when we get to the bottom of this, it will take a long time and much money to get things back on track.”

“That could be seen as a motive,” Shunsui pointed out, and Minachi Atsushi, silent up till that point snorted, shaking his head in derision.

“You think that a Plus soul has the ability to comprehend where he or she is, let alone the political acumen to understand what the Spiritless Zone project is about?” he demanded, derision lacing his tones. “It’s one thing, accepting that some of the ragged folk in the Districts have fleeting grasps on literacy and policy, but for someone in Rukongai? Impossible. There are no ties between the ingrates there and the ones here. There is no way an urchin from that side of the Sekkiseki wall could begin to comprehend the complexities of Gotei law.”

“I think that assuming such a thing is impossible is a dangerous thing to do, Atsushi-dono,” Shunsui said casually. “They have a connection to us through the people of Fourth Division, and so it’s not possible to say they know nothing about the Gotei. It might be unlikely — but not impossible.”

“Those things are speculation,” the head of the Yamamoto interjected firmly, shooting Atsushi a glance to ensure his kinsman didn’t make any further inroads into the subject. Atsushi curled his lip in obvious displeasure, but he did not speak out against his family’s leader, and it was Hirata who finally broke the silence, his expression grave.

“Speaking of connections, is nobody going to raise before the Captains the matter of the missing shinigami?” he asked quietly.

“Missing...” Hakubei blinked at him, confused, and Hirata nodded his head.

“Two in Eleventh,” he agreed levelly, ignoring the black glare Atsushi sent his way. ‘One from Ninth,’ here Anabomi Seizuku reddened, avoiding Guren’s gaze studiously, “and one of mine, taken here within the confines of Inner Seireitei. Kotetsu Tenichi has been missing several days now. We have received demands that we cannot meet from individuals we cannot identify. It might be coincidence — but it seems odd that an attack be launched on the Spiritless Zone at the same time as members of the Gotei are being kidnapped and held to ransom.”

“You think there’s an organised, underground group at work here, don’t you?” Kyouki eyed him sharply, and Hirata shrugged his shoulders.

“It’s a possibility that needs looking into,” he agreed.

“You said your man was taken in Inner Seireitei, though,” Hakubei pointed out. “The Fourth were attacked in Rukongai. Not just that, but secure Rukongai. We can’t get through the Sekkiseki divide without the highest possible level of security clearance, and I mean that literally — that wall is a very effective spiritual repellant. Your own District supplied the stone, so you should know that, Hirata-dono.”

“True, but the timing...” Hirata rubbed his brow. “I don’t like it. It feels wrong.”

“If I may ask, Endou-dono, what demands were made of you that your Division cannot meet?” Seizuku found his voice, still avoiding Guren’s gaze and fixing Hirata with his attention instead. “The Ninth and Eleventh were asked for rudimentary supplies, food and such like. Surely Seventh could easily supply the same?”

“Seventh Division do not ignore the District people we uproot,” Hirata’s voice was soft, but there was a glint of the hawk in his eyes, and despite himself, Seizuku took a half step back. “The demands made on us related to secure information that, if released, would put the lives of trusted individuals in grave danger.”

“In short, they wanted Endou Clan secrets in return for this Kotetsu boy?” Kyouki clicked her tongue disapprovingly against the roof of her mouth. “Sly and underhand — no Captain Clan leader could possibly disclose something that would put his or her kin in peril, no matter what the risk.”

“I want to retrieve Tenichi unharmed, but so far searches have proven fruitless,” Hirata continued. “We will continue, but my concern is that the people responsible are getting bolder. Whether the attack on the Fourth is or isn’t connected, it shouldn’t be allowed to eclipse every other matter of concern. What if the next person targeted is someone’s Third seat or Vice Captain? If these people have access to Inner Seireitei, it suggests an internal leak... and if there’s an internal leak, who’s to say that the attacks on Rukongai are separate?”

“I am working on that,” Hirata said simply. “I am not making any accusations, Nagesu-dono. I have no leads as to who such a leak might be, or what connection or benefit they might have in any of this. All I know is that one of my division members was abducted between Thirteenth and Seventh one evening, and nobody saw anything. I was away at my Clan holding at the time, but Tenichi’s ransom note only arrived as I returned to my barracks. It seems as though someone knows or anticipates our movements. Although I have no suspects in mind, the logical conclusion is the involvement of someone within Seireitei.”

“When he puts it like that, Hirata-dono has a point,” Hakubei scratched his head. “It does sound like that.”

“Until we have proof, we’ve no benefit in chasing down that alley,” Guren shook his head. “It’s enough that the matter has been raised and noted as a concern. We will all be much more on the alert with our members, of course, and in looking for dissent within Outer Seireitei. At present, though, the pressing concern is resolving the murders in the Spiritless Zone. Eight officers lost their lives and one is still fighting to keep hers. Whilst I am not dismissing the value of the Kotetsu boy’s life, we have no idea where he is, nor do we have any evidence he’s been hurt. Our resources are strained — and for the sake of this world’s balance, we must resolve and repair the Spiritless Zone project as soon as possible.”

“Agreed,” Nagesu inclined his head. “Mareiko, I’m going over Madeki-dono’s report on soul contamination with a fine tooth comb as we speak. If you can spare time to come to my barracks, I would like your second opinion on the data, as time is of the essence.”

“I can manage that,” Sekime Mareiko nodded her head, wild blond hair flapping around her face. “I’m curious to see it myself. I didn’t think Hollows could get in, so if they did... I want to know why, too.”

“The Onmitsukidou will continue to investigate as long as is necessary,” Kai said softly.

“Thirteenth Division also volunteers its services, on both counts,” Juushirou added. “Firstly, Edogawa-san is in our care, and therefore we are involved. Secondly, my Third seat is kin to some of the hurt and deceased, and she is very keen to be actively involved in finding them justice. Finally, if there is unrest in the Districts, I believe members of my squad to be best placed to understand and mediate with them. It’s possible we might have better luck in locating Tenichi, and I feel some responsibility for the boy’s safety, being that he was one of my recruits.”

“Sora and I also intend to volunteer Eighth to whatever investigations pan out,” Shunsui nodded his head. “I have a few District souls myself, and I’ve sent Shizuka and a couple of recruits out into Outer Seireitei this morning to see if they can pick up any negative vibes. I can’t do much in Rukongai without explicit clearance, but we’ll do what we can to assist.”

“Those are our priorities, then,” Midori rubbed her chin. “Find the Rukongai killer and the Seireitei kidnappers, and teach both where they stand. Then we can look into how to rebuild the Spiritless Zone — and get Rukongai back on track.”

“I have a strong feeling it won’t be so easy as that sounded, Midori-sama,” Shunsui reflected ruefully, “but yes, that’s what we’ll do. When Mitsuki-chan is able to speak, maybe we’ll learn more — but for now, I suppose we’ll just have to return to barracks, read Kai’s report and try to pull together the threads before it becomes a far worse situation.”

When Tenichi opened his eyes, it was to find himself in yet another unfamiliar chamber. All around him was a smothering grey darkness, the imposing oppressiveness of stone walls that, as his eyes became accustomed to the dim light, he realised had been cut out of rock, rather than put together from finely chiselled slabs. A strange smell, a mixture of dust, human presence and something familiar he could not quite put his finger on pervaded his nostrils, not strong enough to overpower him, but present enough that it tickled at his nose, making him sniff. Somehow he prevented himself from sneezing, pulling himself unsteadily up into a sitting position. His fingers brushed against the hard marble of the slab on which he had lain, and he glanced down at it, a faint shudder running through his body as he realised how much like a funerary bier it appeared.

Funerary herbs. Embalming herbs. That was what he smelt in this chamber. The delicate scent of death — and, with a jolt, he realised he recognised which herbs, for, when his mother had passed away, Kirio had helped to gather them, preserving Irie’s worn body so that she had appeared to be simply sleeping as they had lowered her beneath the earth. Tenichi remembered this particularly, because he knew that his father had been so dead set against any form of cremation and, in the village in Seventh, had often used similar herbs to preserve the loved ones of his neighbours when they had passed out of this world. When Irie had died, he had struggled in vain to remember what particular blend of leaves Daisuke had so often selected, but Kirio had known, and it was that same perfume, the one that reminded him of his long dead father, that lingered in the darkness around him.

Someone had prepared bodies for death here, maybe not recently, but recent enough that the scent had not completely faded away. Someone had used the same herbs as Daisuke and Kirio to send a soul's corpse to the next world, and for the first time, Tenichi found himself put on edge by this, uncertain whether he had been brought here to be dispatched in some ritually sacrificial way.

Pushing this thought out of his mind, he got to his feet, looking for some greater clue as to his surroundings, but the room did not contain any furniture other than the bier. On the floor beside it was a metal tray, containing a plate of roughly pushed together onigiri and a mug of what looked like tea, although when he picked up the vessel cautiously, it felt cold. Sniffing it, he decided it was indeed tea — and had been sitting here for some time, waiting for him to wake.

How had he got here?

He had been with Keitarou, in the forest, at Daisuke's grave, and then...

Frustrated, he shook his head.

I'm making a habit of this. I swear, when I get back to Seireitei — if I get back to Seireitei — I'm going to ask the Taichou if I can study with the Onmitsukidou a while and improve my ability to react in unforeseen circumstances. Obviously I'm a sitting duck — and someone keeps shooting arrows at me.

He set the mug of cold tea back down untouched and rubbed his wrists, realising that the cuffs still remained, the edges started to dig a reddish line against his pale skin. Struck by a sudden thought, his right hand flew to his waist, but the sword was no longer in its sheath and, as he glanced around him in panic, looking for it, he registered the fact that this time, unlike the last, it had been taken away. The scent of herbs taunted at his senses, and he gritted his teeth as an unwelcome swell of panic encircled his heart.

Did that mean he really had fallen into more hostile hands this time around?

Tenichi swallowed the lump in his throat, mentally adding Hakuda training to the stealth lessons. He was a strong fighter, but prone to relying on his sword more than his fists, and whatever had overpowered him had managed to bring him here with little or no trouble. Unlike in Keitarou's village, there was no way of seeing his outside surroundings, for the room had no windows and everywhere he looked the walls were carved with eerie, unsettling symbols, slashed and cut over and over again into the rock as though engraved there by desperate hands. If he squinted at them sideways, one or two of them looked like crude renditions of what might have once been a family crest, but they were in the minority, and he found the odd, angular gashes somehow unsettling.

I'm not eating or drinking anything until I know where I am and who I'm dealing with. For all I know they could be laced with poison.

A sound from the door made him turn, seeing the heavy divide slide slowly back just enough to admit a slim, black-robed figure. From her physique, Tenichi was certain that this was a girl, though her features were covered from the nose to the chin by an additional length of black cloth, and only two eyes, penetrating and curious peered out for him over the hem of the fabric mask. Her head was covered, but stray wisps of hair peeked out around the folds, and two or three beaded strands fell casually across her shoulders. Her hair was silver, and, Tenichi realised with a jolt, so were her eyes, a strange, ethereal colour that made him feel giddy if he tried to meet her gaze. Despite the gilted shade of her hair, there was nothing in the girl's eyes or her posture that suggested excessive age, nor particular physical strength. She did not appear to be armed, and Tenichi was just gauging whether he thought he could overpower her and make a run for it when a shadow behind her told him she had not come to visit him alone. The man was a different prospect, lean but taller and Tenichi had seen those like him among his Gotei companions, not built up with muscle but capable of physical skirmish if the need arose. He too wore a mask over the lower part of his face, his head covered by a hood, but the blue of his eyes also glinted with a metallic, silverish sheen and Tenichi thought he could make out stray wisps of matching silver hair brushing lightly against the pale curve of his brow.

Kinsfolk, then.

"Who are you?"

The question was cliché and pathetic, but Tenichi asked it anyway. "Why am I here — and where is here? Why did you bring me here — what do you want?"

"That's a lot of questions, Tenichi-dono," the pair exchanged looks, but it was the man who spoke, the woman drawing back against the carved wall of the chamber as though her duty was to watch and witness rather than participate in whatever was about to take place next. "Unfortunately, they're not questions we can answer."

“You know my name,” Tenichi flinched, staring at the man in consternation. “Why would you know that?”

“News travels,” again it was the man who spoke, shrugging his shoulders as if the matter wasn’t all that important to him. “What’s more important is what you’re doing here, not what we are.”

“I thought I just asked you that,” Tenichi snapped back, and the man laughed, his voice muffled behind the cloth.

“I meant, what you’re doing in such a remote part of District Seven,” he said softly, moving closer until he stood less than a metre from his companion. They were about the same height, Tenichi realised, or maybe the stranger was a bit taller, but with the young woman there as well, he could not be sure that, if he launched an attack, it would be one he could win. He rubbed at the bracelets absently. Such a nuisance, at a time like this!

“You should be glad of those,” the man caught his movement, and although Tenichi could not see his lips, he felt as though his companion had smiled. “The bracelets, I mean. Because of them, your spirit power is sealed. Loose spirit power isn’t very helpful in a place like this.”

The woman turned her head, shooting her companion a meaningful glance, and the man sighed.

“All right. I know,” he agreed, leaning up against the bier and folding his arms across his chest. “I can’t answer your questions, but I will tell you the reason for mine. I and my companions are agents of the Endou Clan. We serve your Captain, Endou Hirata-sama. We are, therefore, very interested in your activities in the last few days.”

“Prove it,” Tenichi glared back. “You can say anything you like when I can’t even see your faces and I don’t know what kind of place I’m being held in. If you’re really the Taichou’s people, prove it.”

The young man glanced at his companion, who sighed, but slid pale, perfectly formed fingers into the folds of her cloak, producing a small metallic object which she held out. The man took it, rubbing it briefly to remove any stray specks of dust, then set it down on the bier, indicating for Tenichi to look at it. At first the shinigami was convinced it was some kind of a trap, but, after a moment he acquiesced, inching towards it cautiously and running his gaze over the small, rounded item.

His eyes widened in surprise.

“But that is...”

“The emblem of the Endou hunting bird, the insignia of the line that rules in District Seven,” the man agreed calmly, retrieving the trinket before Tenichi could scoop it up in his own hands. “It was given to us by the Lord Misashi when he first took charge of this region, and now we serve Hirata-sama as loyally as all who live here do — or should. That brings me back to my original question. You have been missing from your barracks for several days. Why, of all places, did you materialise here?”

“I can’t answer that. I don’t know,” Tenichi closed up, shaking his head impatiently. “Just like I don’t know how I came to be here.”

The girl’s fingers twitched and fluttered suddenly, and the man’s eyes narrowed.

“You came to see your Father’s grave,” he murmured pensively. “When my people discovered you were here, you were in the vicinity of Kotetsu Daisuke’s burial place. You were unfettered, except for your spirit bracelets, and you were certainly not unconscious. You arrived in our jurisdiction with your wits fully about you, and you did not come alone. I shall ask the question again, Tenichi-dono. How did you come to be in this remote part of District Seven?”

Tenichi stared at him blankly, his heart racing in his chest. Had one of these people seen Keitarou? Despite his uncertainty over the exile’s methods and politics, he had seen kindness in his time in Rukongai and he knew that, no matter what, he could not speak to anyone of what had passed between them during his few days absence. It wasn’t just about Keitarou himself, but the well-being of those the scientist protected, and Tenichi’s own refugee memories were still real enough for him not to want to bring fire and brimstone down on innocent, impoverished souls.

“I don’t know what you mean,” he said at length. “The first thing I remember was waking up surrounded by trees. That must have been here, but I couldn’t tell you exactly where. I stumbled around for a bit, and then... nothing. Now I’m here. You said I’d been missing for a few days? I don’t remember anything since I was at Thirteenth with Kirio, looking for my brother.”

“Kirio?” Suddenly the expression in the man’s eyes changed, and Tenichi saw him exchange another glance with his young companion. She shrugged, clearly answering an unspoken question, and Tenichi bit his lip. He had not meant to let his friend’s name slip into the conversation, but it was too late now.

“Are you talking to each other telepathically?” he demanded. “It’s not fair, I can't follow what you're saying if you do that."

"We're not. We don't read minds," the man seemed amused, shaking his head. "You should be glad of that, I think, since I suspect you know more about where you've been than you're telling us."

"I don't even know for sure you work for my Captain," Tenichi snapped back. "You might have stolen that monshou, and nothing you've told me so far proves you're in his confidence. I was born in District Seven, too, so that doesn't make you special in any way. I have no reason whatsoever to trust you — even if I did remember, which, for your information, I don't."

"I see," the man let out a heavy sigh. "That will be your answer no matter what we ask, won't it?"

"It will," Tenichi said succinctly, "since I have no other answer to give."

"Very well," the young man moved away from the bier, crossing the floor towards the carved wall and running his long, elegant fingers through the cracks and jagged symbols. "Tell me, Tenichi-dono, do you read or recognise any of these signs?"

"Why should I?" Tenichi frowned, surprised and wary at the sudden change of tack. "They aren't Japanese."

"No, no they're not," the man's fingers slipped away from the stone and he turned back to face his prisoner. "They're ancient symbols — supposedly protective spells against outside invasion. Of course, it wasn't the symbols that protected the ancient people who lived here, but the very nature of the place itself. This is a haven and a hell, my friend — if you think that anyone from outside will come and find you here, you will be disappointed. I do work for your Captain, as it happens, but I have not yet informed him that you're in my custody. I can delay that a while longer, to give you time to think about what you've said. I'm sure you'd rather face my interrogation than that of the Wind Hawk... ah," as Tenichi's eyes widened in dismay, "so you have encountered Hirata-sama's sword in the past?"

"I've never seen it released, but I've heard plenty enough to know I don't want to," Tenichi said blackly.

"Wise sentiments," the young man agreed. "It is not a soul you wish to cross, and nor is Endou Hirata."

"Are you threatening me?"

"Of course I am," the man replied simply. 'I want to know what you know, and I want to find it out via the quickest method. I'm not given to torture, so you needn't worry about losing limbs or breaking bones whilst under my care. I also don't stoop to poisoning precious supplies of food, so,' he nudged a foot towards the abandoned tray, "I suggest you eat what you're given, unless you want to starve. Your life is in no danger from me or any of my companions — you belong to Hirata-sama, therefore we would not harm you. However, if you were to lie to us, that might be considered lying to him. If you lie to him, that constitutes betrayal. As Hirata-sama's loyal subjects... we can't possibly accept that."

"Then tell me who you are. Show me your faces," Tenichi entreated. "I can't trust people who appear before me like shadows and tell me nothing at all."

"If we did, lives may be lost," the man touched his fingers regretfully to the black cloth. "I'm sorry. Until I know the reasons for your being here, I can't let you see my face or know any more about me."

Tenichi was silent for a moment, considering.

"I came here as I said I did," he said finally. "I was left here. Abandoned, if you like, by those who took me. They left me cuffed, so I could not read their spiritual signatures and track them through the forest."

"You remember nothing of your time in captivity?"

"Nothing," Tenichi gathered his courage, meeting the questioning pale gaze with resolute eyes. "Perhaps, if I think very hard, I remember brief sounds or smells but nothing familiar and I saw no faces. I remember no names. Something grabbed me in the darkness as I walked back from Thirteenth to my own barracks, but I did not see that person's face. They used some kind of magic, and I passed out. The next coherent thoughts I have were here, among the trees. I am from District Seven, it's true, but not from this part. The forest is very overgrown, and I wandered aimlessly through it."

There was a faint snort from the girl, and Tenichi stared at her, watching her fingers dance and twitch in what he suddenly realised was language.

"My companion thinks it an amazing coincidence that you happened to stumble right up to your father's grave," the man pressed his lips together, turning his gaze back on his captive thoughtfully. "It's well hidden, and few know of it. If you had no idea where you were, I wonder that you found it so easily. She thinks you had help — someone to guide you, someone who concealed themselves with spells, but who was with you nonetheless.”

“With... me?”

Tenichi groaned, burying his head in his hands, his fingers tugging agitatedly against his reddish gold locks.

“I was told it was here,” he said reluctantly. “Before I was kidnapped, I did research on my father’s burial place. I came to Seventh Division in the hope of finding it and paying my final respects. In Seireitei... in Seireitei is a person, a former classmate of mine, who was present when my father was buried. She told me where to find him.”

“Her name?”

“Ukitake Shikiki.”

Inwardly Tenichi thanked his lucky stars for Keitarou’s testimony, hoping against hope that the scientist had told the truth and that this part of his story, at least, would pan out.

“I see. Go on,” the man nodded at his companion, who made a note of this information on a sheet of parchment that had suddenly appeared from within the folds of the voluminous cloak, then turned his attention back to his original subject. “This girl told you where your father was, and when you found yourself here..?”

“I had studied maps enough to realise where I was. I knew the forest more than I should have, but if you’re working for Endou-taichou, he might discipline me if he knew I’d been digging into things in his District and his family’s past without permission,” it was amazing how suddenly the lies began to flow, meshing together and flying easily off the end of his tongue into a believable, plausible explanation. “I don’t want to face Tsumi no Fuuhi, so I lied and pretended I didn’t know where this place was. I did know. I always knew. Father was killed by Shouichi-sama, though, and because of that I thought Taichou would be cross. My father was considered a traitor, so... because of that...”

“Hrm,” the young man deliberated this for a while, apparently turning it over in his mind as he looked for flaws or loopholes. “And you saw nothing of those who kidnapped you?”

He gestured to the young woman, whose parchment had once more disappeared.

“My companion felt certain she detected kidou when they found you, but with those cuffs, it couldn’t have been you that fired it,” he added. “They were there, watching us — watching you. You weren’t aware of this?”

“No,” Tenichi’s surprise was genuine this time. “I thought I was alone. With the cuffs on, well, anything like kyokkou, I wouldn’t be able to trace, would I?”

“True,” the young man acknowledged. “All right. Parts of your story do ring true with what I know about Daisuke-sama’s death and burial. The name Ukitake Shikiki is known to me. Perhaps you have told us the truth.”

“Daisuke... sama?” Tenichi blinked, and there was the muffled sound of laughter behind the black mask.

“Men of noble birth deserve titles befitting their rank, do they not?” came the cryptic response. “Daisuke-sama was an Urahara. Buried in common earth he may be, married he perhaps was to a local girl and his children considered District refugees... but he was born an Urahara. Not all forget that fact... respect for the dead is a valuable trait to have.”

“Respect for the...”

“We do not judge those who have passed before us,” the man cut across him, holding up his hands as if to indicate the conversation was over. “The dead have no voice, so we cannot hear their stories. I do not believe Kotetsu Daisuke-sama was a cruel man, therefore I see nothing wrong with respecting him or his right to sleep in our forest.”

“Does Endou-taichou know you feel that way?” Tenichi asked acerbically, and the young man shrugged.

“Probably not, but that’s all right,” he said pragmatically. “Some things are just a matter of logic and reason and require no explanation. Just like your quest for Daisuke-sama’s grave. Finding it is your right. All sons should know where their fathers lie, and be able to pay respects to those fathers. In that regard, at least, we operate on the same wavelength, Tenichi-dono.”

“Then will you tell me who you are, now you’re satisfied with who I am?” Tenichi demanded.

“Servants of your Captain. For your own well being, more information is not wise,” the man responded simply. “Your time here will be of short duration, in any case. I will go directly and send word to Seventh Division that their missing member has been found. This room isn't the nicest of places to be, but I advise you get some rest. You are probably still tired from your ordeal — and as I understand it, the Gotei is a frenetic place of late."

He turned to go, but Tenichi lunged forward, grabbing him by the sleeve of his robe.

"Wait, what did you mean by that?" he demanded, confusion in his eyes. "The Gotei has been frenetic — why?"

"Ah, so you haven't heard?" the man pondered. "Some shinigami were attacked in Rukongai not so very long ago. Some killed, I believe."

"Killed?" Tenichi's face drained of colour, and at his expression, the man's eyes softened.

"You really didn't know, did you?" he asked gently, and Tenichi shook his head.

"How could I?" he asked, throat suddenly dry and his thoughts racing to the conversation he had had with Keitarou only a couple of days before.

"It's likely nothing — shinigami have those things all the time and most likely it's just a drill or a Hollow incursion — but they seem to take stuff very seriously."

Keitarou-san's never been to the Spiritless Zone, and he said himself that he wouldn't get all the details, even through this Kurotsuchi of his. He thought it was nothing — but it wasn't nothing. It was something very serious — no wonder the Taichou was too distracted to worry about me. In a crisis situation like that... and... oh God...

As another, more horrific idea occurred to him,

What if it wasn't the Spiritless Zone at all? Maybe Keitarou-san wasn't involved in it, but that girl... that Sakaki girl with the killer's instinct in her eyes. What was it she said about killing shinigami? What if it wasn't a Hollow? What if it was her?

His thoughts trailed off, and he shivered involuntarily, suddenly cold as his brain absorbed fully the implications of his train of thought. Maybe it had nothing to do with Keitarou's casual words or Sakaki's silver blade — but the twisting unease in his gut told him it almost certainly was.

"Where in Rukongai?" he managed at length. "What happened?"

Who..."

"I don't know the details. I'm not privy to that level of data," the man replied, gently shaking Tenichi's grip free. "It was in the area that the shinigami have shut off from everywhere else. I heard a Hollow had been involved... but I don't really know for sure."

"The Spiritless Zone... wait, a Hollow?" A mixture of emotions swirled through Tenichi's heart — apprehension, fear, then relief which he fought to conceal in his expression.

If it was a Hollow, then it wasn't that girl. If it was the Spiritless Zone, then it wasn't near Keitarou-san's terrain. Maybe Keitarou-san was wrong to dismiss the distress call as something minor, but at least I can rest assured he wasn't involved. Not that he should be, considering how much of a risk it would be to kill that many shinigami and still stay hidden. I'm letting my prejudices dog my common sense again where he's concerned. He's protecting those villagers and if he drew attention to them, it would all be over for everyone. No, this is something else. Those villagers are safe... at least for now, and I shouldn't be so automatically suspicious. Even if there is a mad-woman among Keitarou-san's coterie, it didn't sound like she was allowed to go killing people at will, and she certainly wouldn't have managed to get into the Spiritless Zone from the wasteland Rukon. Keitarou-san might be able to do it, but he was with me... not in the Spiritless Zone. He has spirit power, like me... and they'd detect him in a place like that as easily as if he were standing right in front of them.

He grimaced at the swiftness with which he had doubted his own convictions about Keitarou's motives.

I thought I'd decided to trust in him a little... so I will.

"So I understand," his companion agreed now, bringing Tenichi back into the main conversation. "All right. I suppose we're done here, now."

He cast his companion a look, and the young woman nodded, moving forward to take Tenichi gently around the wrists. Tenichi opened his mouth to ask further questions but, as his gaze met hers, the words became heavy and fragmented, sticking in his throat. He tried to pull his thoughts together, but he was suddenly tired, too tired to even remember what he had been talking about in the first place. If he could just sleep, just for a while... surely...

He was vaguely aware of someone catching him as his body fell towards the ground, lifting him and lowering him down on something hard and flat.

"I'll send a message to Souja-dono," he heard, the words so faint and distant it was as though they were from another world. "I'll leave him to you, Izumi."

Izumi.

The name nestled for a moment in some part of his subconscious, before it too was overwhelmed with the urge to sleep. He tried belatedly to fight it, struggling to hold on to this one clue at least, but it was to no avail, and the darkness consumed him once more, sending him into the world of dreams.

"That wasn't the nicest of meetings to sit through, was it?"

Shunsui settled himself down on the roof of the Eighth Division barracks, leaning back on his hands and gazing up at the blue wisps of cloud that dotted the heavens overhead. "I don't think I saw so many grim faces, nor such a well attended Captain's gathering. You didn't even get to raise your concerns about the Hollows, Juu — I'm sorry."

"I know," Juushirou leaned against the railings, his own expression troubled. "In light of this, the behaviour of a few Hollows seems secondary. I'm happy that Mitsuki's back in Seireitei, you know, but I feel guilty for being even a little bit relieved she's all right. I went to Fourth Division this morning to ask for the latest news on Aomori Seri — so I could tell Mitsuki when I saw her this afternoon — and the mood there is unlike I've ever known it before. Madeki-dono is up and about, but white as a sheet and even if he's physically fit, I'm not sure he's mentally well enough to be resuming his duties. Eriko-dono looked like she hadn't slept in a week — which she probably hasn't, given that she's been given the chief task of overseeing the autopsies — and when Shikiki took me to see Aomori — just through glass, you understand, I wasn't allowed in her room — I never saw anything so tragically pathetic. If she lives — and it's not for sure yet — it will be a long convalescence. She may never take active service again... and she's supposedly one of the lucky ones. In light of that... how can anyone think about Hollows?"

"I know what you mean," Shunsui agreed, shielding his eyes from the sun and turning his head to look at his friend. "I am surprised, though, to find you here exchanging gloom and doom with me rather than hovering around your belle's sickroom. You needn't feel guilty that she lived and they didn't... but more to the point, she probably feels it and would no doubt benefit from your support telling her she shouldn't."

"Naoko's spending the morning with her," Juushirou said simply.

“I’m not the only one with claims on her time, and what happened over there has hurt Naoko too. Aomori is a kinswoman of hers, and I thought it might be better to give her a morning off active duties and let her take charge of Mitsuki’s needs for a while. I’m going there this afternoon — but for now, there are other things I need to look at.”

“That’s annoyingly mature of you,” Shunsui observed. “Are you trying to convince me you’re not thinking about her when you should be thinking about your duties? If so, it won’t work with me. I know you too well, and that lovesick, worried look in your eye isn’t all about the Fourth’s tragedy.”

“Is it that obvious?” Juushirou groaned, dropping down onto the roof top with a thump and eying his friend plaintively. “I haven’t seen her in years. When we parted, I wasn’t sure how I’d cope a day without her — but I have coped. Now, she’s here, and I... I want to protect her all over again. I know I can’t — I have other people to protect now, just like you do. I don’t want to smother her... but I don’t really know what I should do instead.”

“I should’ve known you’d say that,” Juushirou massaged his brow wearily. “You’re supposed to be helping me, not telling me what I already know.”

“If you know, do something about it and let me sleep,” Shunsui closed his eyes, turning his head so that the sun’s warming rays brushed over his skin. “I come up with my best divisional policies when I’m drowsing, and I have to work out what orders to give Sora when she comes screaming for me. She’s been distracted by Mitsuki’s return, but she’ll realise soon enough that I’ve left a hefty pile of admission applications on her desk and I know she’s not going to be amused when she finds them.”

“You shouldn’t put so much work on her,” Juushirou smiled despite himself, and Shunsui shrugged, opening one eye lazily.

“I don’t,” he said pragmatically. “Some of it I give to Kaoru-chan to handle.”

“Shunsui!”

“I thought you were the one who insisted that when in uniform we should be professional and call each other strictly by family names,” Shunsui remarked benignly. “Is forgetfulness a symptom of lovesick mooning, or did you forget about that already?”

“In public, I do and I will,” Juushirou was unmoved. “We’re not in public, though, we’re on top of your roof — which, incidentally, is strange enough considering you have a perfectly good private chamber beneath us, not to mention a fully fitted office. Why are we up here again? Are you hiding from your Vice Captain?”

“Nah. Sora will come here if I’m not in the other two places, so it’s hardly well hidden,” Shunsui shook his head, closing his eye once more. “I just like to sun myself. And, whether you believe it or not, I do my best thinking up here. Sleeping really does help my brain function — that and sake, but with the current mood around Seireitei and after the sobriety of that meeting, I’m abstaining today as a gesture of mourning.”

“You didn’t even wear Riri’s robe this morning,” Juushirou reached across to brush his fingers across the fabric of Shunsui’s stark white haori. “You hardly ever do that.”

“A little jolly for the occasion, so it’s in my room,” Shunsui responded languidly. “I might wear it to tease and provoke some of my less fond colleagues, but mock the Fourth? Not a chance. Aside from not wanting to be slain alive by Dai-senpai...”

“I don’t think you can be slain dead, Shunsui.” Juushirou interjected facetiously, and Shunsui’s lips twitched into a smile.

“There it is again,” he murmured, “Shunsui. You’re going to have to be careful — you might find yourself doing it in front of your juniors.”

“A lot has changed, hasn’t it, since graduation?” Juushirou’s tones became pensive, and Shunsui nodded slightly.

“A lot has, and a lot hasn’t,” he agreed. “You’re thinking about Mitsuki again, I trust?”

“Mm,” Juushirou folded his hands absently in his lap. “A lot’s been going on here lately. The Hollows. Tenichi’s disappearance. Now this. I’ve wanted Mitsuki back for so long, now she’s here, and...”

“Ukitake Juushirou, if you dare go along the lines of blaming yourself for this tragedy on account of the fact you wanted Mitsuki home, I will slice your head open with Katen Kyoukotsu and pour some common sense directly into your brain cavity,” this got Shunsui’s attention, for his eyes snapped open once more and he grimaced, pulling himself into a more upright position. “There’s absolutely no connection. If you want the truth, I wanted her to come back with the last bunch of Fourthers, too... but you don’t see me blaming myself for them getting hurt.”

“I think you’re confusing common sense with Clan sake,” Juushirou returned neatly, “and I wasn’t going to say that. Give me some credit for growing up. I’m just not sure how to approach her right now. I want to be there for her, but only if she wants me to be. I realised the moment I saw her that it hasn’t gone away. I’ve squashed it down and got on with things, but as soon as I saw her it all came flooding back. I’m in love with her and I’m worried that will cloud my judgement as a Captain. No, I’m worried that it already has. My actions the night the news came through were irresponsible. If Naoko and Enishi hadn’t been on hand...”

“You had a lovesick tizzy and staggered off in a fever, it happens,” Shunsui said dismissively. “True, it happens more to you than to most folk, but you usually pull yourself together in the end.”

“But as a Captain...”

“As a Captain, you helped subdue the rampant bigotry of the Endou and turned some of them into quite nice people,” Shunsui cut across him. “As a Captain, you’ve managed just fine since Mitsuki went away, and your division all worship the ground you walk on. That doesn’t mean you can’t have personal feelings, too. All right, I grant that your immediate reaction was impulsive, but you were sick and it was a shock. That’s why you have subordinates — to delegate. And, if you’re concerned Mitsuki is going to compromise your leadership, you need to hash it out with her and find out where you stand. That way you’ll know... and you can both get on with things with the air clear.”

He arched a suspicious eyebrow.

“You’re worried, of course, that talking to her will elicit a response you don’t know how to deal with,” he added acidly. ‘In this respect, it seems, you haven’t changed much at all. It’s almost word for word the same conversation we used to have over and over again at the Academy. At the risk of turning the line into a cliché by the amount of times I repeat it, talk to her. I can’t read her mind. You can’t read her mind. The only person who knows how Mitsuki-chan feels right now is Mitsuki-chan. And, if I may say so, foisting the problem off on Naoko is cowardly. I realise Nao-chan has a claim on her too,’ as Juushirou opened his mouth to protest, “but the real reason is you’re afraid to be alone with your himein case you find out Rukongai’s changed her.”

“It just isn’t the right time for that conversation,” Juushirou retorted. “She’s lost her friends in the most grisly circumstances possible, and you think I should go and ask her if she still loves me? I don’t think so. I have some tact. Yes, it’s bothering me, but I’m not holding off on it because I'm afraid to ask. I'm holding off because she's hurting and I don't want to make her hurt more. I'm trying to think of her... and using you to vent."

"What about thinking of me sometimes?" Shunsui asked plaintively. "You've completely ruined my late morning nap, and I can sense Sora's reiatsu heading back towards the barracks. I won't get a wink of sleep now — why is it your consideration extends to Mitsuki's rest and not mine?"

"You sleep more than enough for two Captains," Juushirou sent him a wry smile. "Don't look like that. I've known you too long to be fooled, and Sora won't buy it, either."

He sighed, slipping his fingers into the sleeves of his haori and folding his arms tight to his chest in contemplation.

"This Rukongai business bothers me," he added after a moment, and Shunsui cast him a curious look.

"In what way?" he asked. "I assume you mean beyond the fact eight good officers were murdered."

"Yes, beyond that fact," Juushirou agreed. "Kai and his companions haven't found this Plus Soul. I'm wondering if they're looking in the right places."

"Meaning?"

"I don't know, yet," Juushirou admitted, "just, when Kai talked about the blood path disappearing into nothing, it made me think. It reminded me... of something else. Something from the past... but I can't put my finger on what."

"Something from the past," Shunsui frowned. "Our past? I barely remember yesterday, let alone before that."

"You don't remember yesterday because Tokutarou-sama made the mistake of sending you some expensive sake as a gift and you felt the need to sample it," Juushirou reminded him. "That probably explains your resolve to abstain today, too, since I'm fairly certain you probably haven't got all of it out of your system yet... you were very lucky not to be late to the meeting this morning, and if Sekime-taichou hadn't tripped over her sandals and knocked over a bunch of Kai's files, you probably would've been scolded. Besides, yes, I mean our past. Something... like this... but not like it."

"Oh, because that narrows it down," Shunsui chuckled. "Look. Whilst you're probably right, a few more details wouldn't hurt. In the meantime, how about the Tenichi matter? From what Hirata said, nothing new has come up?”

“Not yet, not as far as I know,” Juushirou looked grave. “I spoke to Ketsui, and he took it very calmly, but I’ve never seen anyone go quite so pale just from a conversation before. Tenichi is his brother but it’s more than that — he’s the only kin Ketsui has left, now that Irie-san has died. I want to find him, Shunsui. There are no leads at all, but I want to all the same.”

“Ketsui is lucky. He has an understanding Captain,” Shunsui observed. “Tenichi’s disappeared into thin air, though, or so it seems.”

“Just like the Rukongai assassin?”

“Ooh. Interesting connection,” Shunsui’s eyes glittered suddenly, as his shrewd brain knitted the ideas together. “Do we think there is one, then?”

“Tenichi definitely left our barracks. Kirio is quite sure of it,” Juushirou responded grimly. “Apparently the Eleventh did a late patrol that night, and would’ve been just heading back to base around the same time Kirio thinks Tenichi left us. I got Enishi to check with Ikata about it, and Ikata agrees that six or seven of his men were in the area, but none of them saw anything. Enishi asked each one of them individually but they all said the same. They patrolled, saw nothing, went back to base.”

“Meaning?”

“They didn’t see Tenichi pass by, either, which implies that he disappeared between us and the Eleventh. In short, around about the Twelfth.”

“And you suspect them of being the guilty agents, now?”

“No. I know that I was the one who raised the idea of an inside job, but the more I think on it, the more difficult a theory it seems to bear out in fact,” Juushirou shook his head. “I wish I hadn’t said it around Hirata, since from what he said at the meeting this morning, his thoughts are obviously heading in the opposite direction to mine, but when you look at it, there’s no real indication that anyone here in Seireitei conspired to get Tenichi kidnapped. More, what would the motive be? It would make no sense.”

“Nothing much here makes sense, at least at first glance,” Shunsui reflected. “Did you forget, too? We’ve discussed it before, but the Twelfth are an Urahara squad — and those people of Hirata’s were Urahara, weren’t they?”

“That’s true, but in a way that makes it even less likely to be them involved,” Juushirou shook his head. “It would be too obvious a connection, and besides, we’re talking about a generation of Urahara that are long since dead and buried, aren’t we? Nagesu-dono’s Urahara Clan isn’t big on vengeance, and although Twelfth is a separate squad, he was actively involved in selecting the current Captain and Vice Captain by giving his formal recommendations. Looking at those individuals, well, Michihashi we know from school days, and he’s a reasonable, rational, sane person who wouldn’t get messed up in anything untoward. More, I can’t imagine him letting any of his subordinates do anything to bring his squad or his Clan into disrepute. As for Sekime-taichou...”

“Ah, yes. Mareiko-chan,” Shunsui rolled his eyes. “Apparently Michihashi missed a Vice Captain’s meeting recently because she’d managed to spell-lock herself in her laboratory.”

“Exactly,” Juushirou pulled a face. “Subtle and underhand don’t really roll off the tongue, do they? No, I don’t suspect the Twelfth. However, Tenichi disappearing around there may still be significant. Because so many crazy noises and lights and explosions come from that area, I’d guess that most folk wouldn’t bat an eyelid about unusual spiritual behaviour in the vicinity of Twelfth’s barracks. Sekime-taichou is working very hard on these Kidou combinations and spells the Council and Nagesu-dono passed her way, so stuff like that is almost par for the course. Since mostly Twelfth keep to themselves and don’t pay attention to anything beyond their boundaries unless told to... it seems like the perfect place for an abduction, doesn’t it?”

“I could buy into that,” Shunsui agreed. “I’m a mite concerned, though... it sounds like, by eliminating Seireitei’s Urahara, your thoughts are heading back in the direction of another less popular member of that Clan.”

“Keitarou?” Juushirou looked troubled. “It would be easy to blame it all on him, wouldn’t it?”

“Easy in theory, but there’s literally nothing to indicate it’s that way at all,” Shunsui responded with a grimace. “It’s a good theory, and I’d subscribe to it willingly, but its not a presentable one since the Council would expect folk like you and I to start screaming hysterically about Aizen conspiracies the moment something bad happens. We’d need proof, and we really have none to speak of. Worse, if we focused on that angle and were wrong, the real culprits might gain ground. I believe he’s alive and so do you, but there are a fair number on the Council who think Kinnya-sama’s heroics finished him off twenty odd years ago. We'd have to find evidence he'd survived drinking the reidoku and jumping into the Senkaimon— and since he apparently destroyed the Gate after him, we've no way of knowing where he ended up. If he did flee to the Real World, like most folk think, finding him would be next to impossible."

"Not only that, but there are so many threads," Juushirou groaned. "I can believe Keitarou to be behind the abductions — maybe all of them, but particularly the last one, since he'd have something to gain by the demands in the ransom note. Killing the shinigami in Rukongai, though, that serves no purpose — his enemies are here, in Seireitei, and, aside from Tenichi, nobody here has been threatened, let alone attacked or killed in cold blood. The Hollows have been behaving oddly, but Naoko has been monitoring them and you heard her say it for herself — there's no sign Chudokuga was at all involved in those events. To all intents and purposes, it looks like a vigilante District group with an unnatural level of spirit power might be behind most of what's going on, and, I don't know, something unrelated and strange has happened in the Spiritless Zone. It's no good to link Keitarou's name to crimes just because I want to see him guilty of them — and I'm worried that that's what I'm doing."

"Let's keep his name to ourselves for now and wait and see," Shunsui suggested. "The only thing for sure where he's concerned is that he will resurface at some point or other, so keeping on the alert and keeping an open mind doesn't hurt. More than that, we can't do, so for now we should put it aside and focus on what we do know. I want to see Keitarou caught as much as you — but till we can link any of this directly to his handiwork, we've no choice but to look at other angles."

"All right. Agreed," Juushirou nodded. "So, going back to Tenichi, if we're ruling out an inside operation by someone in Inner Seireitei... what do we have? Someone lurking in the darkness waiting to grab him unawares?"

"But an abduction that happened between your very alert division and an active Eleventh implies at the very least shunpo," Shunsui pointed out. "Otherwise someone would've seen something and clearly they didn't. The kidnappers must've been able to shunpo out, surely?"

"Mm," Juushirou agreed. "Or..."

"A Senkaimon," Shunsui's eyes became near slits. "That was slow of me. Maybe that sake of Nii-sama's had an effect on my brain after all — I should've seen that possibility sooner."

“Well, I didn’t either, not till Kai started talking about the assassin in the greenwood, so to speak,” Juushirou admitted. “I was trying to think how a Plus soul could vanish into thin air, and then it dawned on me how Tenichi must have. There used to be a gate between us and the Twelfth, but it was de-activated when some of the Twelfth’s barracks had to be rebuilt following one of their explosions and never reactivated again afterwards. That must’ve been more than a decade ago now — not long after Sekime-taichou received the haori, if I remember rightly — so I’d forgotten completely that it was there. Just because we’re no longer using it, though, I suppose it doesn’t mean others might.”

“Fine for Tenichi’s case, but do you think the assassin in Rukongai also escaped through a Senkaimon, when she has no spirit power of her own to call on?” Shunsui questioned. “Surely Kai and company would have picked that up real quickly. Unusual spiritual emissions in that part of Rukongai wouldn’t be easily missed, and there was a blood trail leading right to the spot.”

“No, for that reason, probably not,” Juushirou agreed. “In Inner Seireitei, though, it’s another matter. There are lots of gates here, now, and plenty of folk with spirit power to activate them. It’s not the protected science it once was. I’m willing to bet that Tenichi was snatched via Senkaimon and dragged off to some part of Seireitei where nobody would logically consider looking for him. On the current gate map, there’s no gate between us and the Seventh Division, but I had Enishi dig out an old version from our archived files, and I remembered right. It was situated almost right in front of the Twelfth — and that must’ve been the area Tenichi was when he was taken. With it being taken off the map and out of service, it’s easy to overlook. Especially given the state of Twelfth Division’s general habit of atmospheric pollution.”

“Have you told Hirata this?”

“No, but I will,” Juushirou responded. “I’m trying to work out a way to discuss it with him without him getting angry and demanding to raid the whole of Seireitei.”

“If anyone can do that, it’s you,” Shunsui reflected, “but you’re right. He’s taken it extremely personally... especially since that note came.”

“He wants to protect them,” Juushirou said simply, and there was no need to explain who ‘they’ were. “It’s a matter of honour and trust and he takes it seriously. So he should. I agree with him. The demands are unreasonable, but so is the sacrifice of Tenichi’s life.”

“Do you think he’s dead?” Shunsui asked after a moment, and Juushirou sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

“Hard to know when you don’t know your enemy,” he admitted. “I’m hoping not. Praying not. I guess the important thing is finding him, though, so we know either way.”

“Mm,” Shunsui’s insouciant features became grave. “Tell Ketsui I’m doing what I can to find him, too. I’ll hear Shizuka’s report later — maybe she’ll have found some clues. Sending girls is always better than sending guys for that kind of mission.”

“Shuunsui!”

Before Juushirou could respond, an indignant yell rattled through the air, sending a flock of startled birds who had been nesting in a nearby tree squawking into the air.

“Sounds like my Vice Captain’s made it back,” Shunsui reflected, and Juushirou laughed, getting to his feet.

“I suppose she found your gift,” he said, amused. “I’ll leave you to calm the mutiny — I’ve things of my own that need doing and I really do intend on seeing Mitsuki this afternoon, so I must get them done.”

“You’re not going to protect me from her wrath?” Shunsui looked wounded. “Some friend you are.”

“I’m not getting involved in a Divisional domestic,” Juushirou returned neatly. “I’ll see you later — what’s left of you.”

“All right,” Shunsui sighed, but nodded in resignation. “I’ll try and survive till then, somehow. Give Mitsuki my best and tell her I’ll drop by to see her when I can.”

“I will,” Juushirou agreed. “And I’ll think some more about what I said.”

“So will I, if I get the chance,” Shunsui promised. “I think you might be onto something, and it’ll stand deeper investigation.”

“I thought so, too,” Juushirou agreed. ‘And here’s Sora,’ as the door to the roof balcony was flung back, revealing an angry looking Vice Captain, “so I’ll take my leave. I’m sure she’d rather not have witnesses, and I’ve not had my lunch yet. I don’t need my appetite ruined!”

Before Shunsui could respond, he had slipped into shunpo, darting through the streams of light towards his own division. Once there he dropped out of the step, walking slowly and pensively across the cobbles that led to the Thirteenth Division's main entrance. As he neared it, he paused, turning to glance around him, trying to place where the deactivated Senkaimon had once been. Further along was the Twelfth Division barracks, but the newer buildings meant the pathway now bent and twisted out of plain sight, and, with a sudden jolt, he realised that its layout would be to the advantage of any would-be kidnapper who knew Seireitei's geography.

Inner Seireitei was constructed this way after Keitarou was exiled or killed or whatever happened to him when Grandfather inflicted those wounds. He wouldn't know how to find his way around here, so maybe that proves I'm grasping at straws. I don't want to think of it as an inside job, though, either. The Twelfth is a mostly Urahara Division — just because Sekime-taichou and Michihashi aren't suspicious doesn't mean... but even so... it's making a leap when we've absolutely no proof, and Michihashi keeps a close eye on his members. I doubt they'd manage to do anything under his nose.

Juushirou pressed his lips together thoughtfully.

At least it gives me something else to dwell on beside Mitsuki. Whether Shunsui is right or not, I need to be a Captain first and anything else second. Right now, people are jittery and upset. I can't be either of those things, else everything here will fall apart. Looking into Tenichi's kidnap is important, too, so I'll deal with that for now. Mitsuki needs time to rest and readjust... and maybe... so do I.

16. Childhood Bonds

Chapter Fifteen: Childhood Bonds

It was not the time for paperwork.

Souja chewed on the end of his brush, gazing down with a mixture of rebellion and resignation at the stack of neat white papers piled up before him on the desk. Since Hirata's return to the Division, the Captain had taken a much more active duty with his squad members, reminding them, Souja was sure, who was really in charge of Seventh and why. Souja hadn't minded ceding authority to his father, but the flipside of doing so had been relegation to his office for, in Hirata's absence and with the aftermath, the routine paperwork had become neglected to a point things were starting to become difficult. When two angry members of the Endou Clan had sent direct missives asking why their sons had not yet received communication from Seventh Squad about their eligibility for the Division, Hirata had decided that someone needed to see to the office work and, as the junior party, that person had been Souja.

Kikyue had begun the day in the office with him, sorting the stacks into piles in order of priority, but she had quickly become bored. Souja had soon seen the unpredictable, slightly impatient symptoms of Kikyue's Endou temper begin to flare up around the edges and, after she had managed to slash one important document in two whilst practicing warm-up parries with her sword in a quiet moment, he had dismissed her, certain he could get the job done more quickly alone. She had not made any complaint, and had hurried off to do her father's bidding, buoyed by the hope that it involved something more actively stimulating than filing parchment.

Still, she had been subdued since Tenichi's disappearance.

Souja swept his brush across the page, reaching for his personal seal to formalise the document before putting it to one side. Rubbing his aching wrist ruefully, he reflected on the fact that, despite her sometimes unorthodox reactions, there were probably few in Seventh Division who took squad loyalty more seriously than his younger sister. Events like this reminded him of the three year age gap between them, but, more significantly, of the fact that Kikyue had never had the benefit of an Academy education to bolster her confidence and show her the way. She was still very young in many ways Souja was not — and though the squad feared her sharp tongue and impulsive blade, to him she was still little more than a child who, having grown into her spirit power too soon, was still trying desperately to be seen as an adult.

The division had heard nothing new relating to Tenichi's whereabouts since the initial ransom demand letter that had made Hirata so on edge. For Souja, whose gentle countenance masked a shrewd Endou brain, this was more alarming than the receipt of more threats, for it was a silence that neither Hirata nor the family as a whole had any control over. Protecting division members was a matter of strict Clan pride — members of the Seventh Division rarely died in open conflict because of the team-play ethics Hirata had instilled into them, and many of the squad's principal members had trained with the Thirteenth Division in the time of the interdict, learning new skills and policies as the entirety of the region overhauled its image. To have a member abducted had created shockwaves through the barracks, not least because, since Tenichi's transfer, he had become well liked among his new peers. The bonds between Thirteenth and Seventh had never been entirely broken, and Tenichi had been born in Seventh District, making him almost like a brother coming home to many of the lower ranking Endou officers. Even those of higher blood had acknowledged him as a worthy and solid member of their squad, for his sword skills were above average and he had not been reticent in sharing tricks and techniques with his new bunkmates that had come into good use in practical exercises. His abduction had made everyone indignant and uneasy, on edge about what might happen next. As Souja had heard one recruit say to another in the mess hall that morning, if someone with Tenichi's skills could be taken without a trace, what chance did those of them at low rank stand of escaping?

For Souja, although Tenichi's disappearance itself was troubling, the demands in the letter had added a whole new layer of concern. Unlike Kikyue, who knew nothing of the Kitsune's presence, Souja had grown up with the expectations that one day he would inherit the Clan, and therefore, all of its secrets. Hirata had not kept things from his only son — on the contrary, as soon as Souja had been old enough to hold a sword and swing it around experimentally, he had begun bringing his son to the Seventh barracks, introducing him to the life of a shinigami and, when on Clan soil, the secrets and spy networks that operated behind closed doors. The Kitsune were some of the Endou's most trusted agents, even though they were not of proper Endou blood. They had a blood debt of loyalty and honour to Misashi, who had shielded them for a long time in secret during Shouichi's regime and had ensured they were not purged when the rest of the Urahara were slaughtered. They had had a common enemy, not just in Shouichi's violent policies but also in the actions of Urahara Keitarou, for they were the descendants of people who had turned against Keitarou's father, and Keitarou's reputation was of a man who did not ever forgive a betrayal. Though nobody knew where Keitarou was now, or if he even still lived, the Kitsune were always aware of the possibility of attack and this made them sharp, cautious agents, capable of stealth and secrecy that, on occasion, would rival the Onmitsukidou.

Souja had met members of the Kitsune throughout his childhood, but it was now, when the previous leader had passed away and left his son Joumei in charge, that the threat was all the more personal.

A wry smile touched his lips and he set the brush aside, remembering the first time he and Joumei had met face to face.

It had not been a friendly encounter. He had been seven or eight, full of his own importance and robed in the fine colours of the Endou, a young peacock preening for all to see. Hirata had taken him to the forestland beyond the manor, ostensibly to meet with an old and trusted friend, and, as they had moved deeper and deeper into the undergrowth, Souja had found his horse becoming separated from the rest. He knew now, for Hirata had told him so, that the separation had been deliberate. The Endou Clan leader and his Kitsune counterpart had been testing their children, bringing them into forced contact without the political ramifications and waiting to see the results.

Startled by a creature from the undergrowth, Souja's horse had reared up, depositing his finely clothed burden in a neat heap on the ground. As he had picked himself up, he had heard the sound of laughter from the shadow of the trees. If he closed his eyes, he could still see it now, the mottled greens of the landscape flanking him on all sides, and that voice, eerie and disembodied, mocking him from somewhere out of sight.

He could see nobody.

"Come forth!" he exclaimed in reedy, indignant tones, clenching his grimy fists against his body and wishing that Hirata had thought to let him ride with his training sword that day. His father had vetoed the idea, telling him that until he could use the weapon with confidence, he would not use it outside the manor grounds at all, but in that moment he would've liked to have had it at his side, the glint of metal in the sun telling whoever had dared mock him that he was not just any child going for a ride through the woods but the one who, one day, would be the guardian and overlord of all he surveyed.

“Come out and show yourself to me, coward!” he demanded, not caring how imperious his young voice sounded in the strange atmosphere of the cloistered forest. “I want to see the face of one who dares mock the heir to the Endou Clan!”

“If you’re heir to the Clan, you ought to have a better seat on your horse,” the voice was calm and even now, no trace of laughter in his words, and Souja swung around in anger, seeing a young boy of his own age duck his head beneath a branch and step into proper view. He was roughly dressed, a length of dusty fabric forming an obi at his waist and the folds of his hakama falling to uneven lengths, the hem of one leg loose and trailing against the grass. His hair was silver, a messy, unevenly cut mop that covered his head and brushed against his shoulders in feathery ends, and his cheeks were grimy, his skin ash pale as though he had not seen the sun in some time. He raised his head, meeting Souja’s gaze without an ounce of fear, and Souja’s temper would’ve been needled further by the glitter of humour in his companion’s expression if it had not been for the unusual shade of the child’s eyes.

They were almost certainly a pale shade of blue, but in the shade of the trees they appeared as silvery as his hair, not the dark, distinctive grey of the Kuchiki but a pale, almost metallic shade that seemed to shimmer unevenly beneath the mottled canopy of green and brown. For a couple of minutes Souja just stared at his companion, then, realising he was further embarrassing himself by his show of curiosity, he tossed his head, adopting the best superior expression he could manage and attempting to look down on the other boy — though the difference in their heights was actually a half inch in the stranger’s favour.

“Who are you?” he demanded, putting his hands on his hips and hoping he looked as imposing as his father could when facing down insubordinate members of the Endou council. “Why are you here, and how dare you make fun of me?”

“Fools are there to be made fun of,” the boy told him calmly, reaching up to push the long fringe of silver hair out of his face. His nails were ragged and uneven, Souja noticed with contempt, as though he had chewed on them like a wild animal starving for food. “You must be Souja. Father said you would be coming by here today.”

“Souja-sama to you,” Souja snapped back stiffly, Endou pride glittering indignantly in his pale eyes, but the boy only laughed.

“Earn that title and I’ll give it to you with pleasure,” he said, his tones playful and teasing, as though he considered Souja his equal, rather than his superior. “My people aren’t Endou, our loyalty is earned. Your father earned it, and so did your grandfather, but you haven’t, not yet. Prove you're worth my loyalty, and I'll give you it with pleasure, but right now you look like a muddy idiot who can't sit up on his horse when it rears and bucks."

"How dare you!" Souja lunged for his companion, but the other boy was too quick, darting back into the trees and zig-zagging between the trunks as though he had been running through these woods for the whole of his life. He was barefooted, Souja realised with a jolt of dismay, and swift-footed, for as the young Endou heir gave chase, he found that his own sandals restricted his movement, getting caught on this bramble or that briar and at length he kicked them off in a fit of temper, hoping that his mother would never know he had done such a thing in front of a commoner. The silver-haired boy merely laughed at his pursuer's discomfort, leaping up into the branches of the trees with confidence and swinging his body onto the lower branch, using it as a spring to launch himself up the tree to a higher vantage point. Souja circled the base of the tree, glaring up at his prey, but unsure as to how he should reach them. If kicking off his shoes would make his mother squeal with horror, he thought darkly to himself, climbing a tree and wrecking his clan robes would almost certainly make her pass out with shock.

"What's the matter?" the boy's voice came down from amid the branches, slightly muffled by the foliage and taunting in its tones. "I thought Endou were birds of prey. Are your wings clipped?"

"Climbing trees isn't something Clan heirs do," Souja shot back, and there was a rustle of leaves before a cheeky silver framed face appeared between two lengths of wood.

"I think you're afraid to come up after me," he observed. "I think you're scared. You're a coward who fell off his horse and who now can't even climb a little tree."

"Shut up, I am not!" His mother's horror forgotten, Souja had launched himself up towards the lowest branch before he knew what he was doing, scrambling and scrabbling at the wood in an attempt to pull himself in the other boy's direction. For a while, his companion watched, as if fascinated by the spectacle, then he let out a laugh, disappearing back into the foliage.

"You'll have to work harder than that to catch me, Clan boy!" he exclaimed, and Souja's heart leapt in his throat as he saw a shadow shift below him, realising with a lurch of dismay that the stranger had moved from one tree to the next, easily passing between branches as though it were as simple as running on the ground. He glanced down, and immediately regretted it, for in his pique he had climbed several feet and now the grass seemed a long way below.

But, as his father often told him, Endou did not run away from challenges. They faced them and dealt with them and therefore brought honour to their families and themselves.

He gritted his teeth, determination flaring in his pale gaze and he grabbed the wood firmly in both hands, inching carefully along until he saw the bough of the next tree that his unexpected playmate had used to shift across. He followed suit, his footing less sure than his companion's, but he had no intention of backing down now. His hakamashita caught and tore on a stray twig, but he paid it no attention, his mind now firmly focused on the hunt. Though he was still just a child, Souja was an Endou at his core, and deep within him pulsed the predatorial instinct, telling him that he could not let this urchin get away.

That impulse made the transition between boughs suddenly easier, and he found himself moving with greater swiftness, drawing closer to his target with each swing of his arm. His cheek was streaked with blood from where branches had scratched his skin, but he ignored both the sting and the dirt, intent on catching up those few last feet.

Eventually he realised his prey had descended the trunk of the final tree, moving as nimbly as a monkey across the ground. Adrenaline surged within his young body, and he leapt forward, covering the three or four feet to the ground in one movement and reaching out a dirty hand to grab hold of the flapping fabric of the other boy's tunic. Both went down, rolling on the grass and mud, as fists fought to make contact and silk and rag became torn and muddy, streaked with stains from the grass with neither child caring about the state in which they now appeared. They grappled for a few minutes, then Souja, breathing hard, got the upper hand, pinning his skinnier companion with a whoop of triumph and staring down into those unusual silver eyes.

"I caught you," he said unnecessarily. "What do you say to that, now? Am I still a coward and a fool?"

"I guess you're not," the boy acknowledged, a rueful look on his face. "I yield. Please, get off me. I won't run off again."

"Tell me who you are, first," Souja did not make any attempt to move. "If I had my sword, I might slit your throat for your rudeness, so you can at least tell me your name."

"Your father wouldn't let you kill me, and nor would mine," the boy didn't seem frightened by Souja's show of victorious bravado, "but my name is Joumei. Ichimaru Joumei."

"Ichimaru..?" Souja's eyes widened with recognition, and Joumei nodded his head slightly in confirmation.

"The man your father came to meet? Yes, he's my father. You didn't realise that? Maybe you are a fool."

"I'm a fool who's sitting on you, and so that makes you the bigger fool," Souja snapped back, and Joumei began to laugh.

"True enough," he agreed, and there was something less mocking and more friendly in his tones now. "I beg pardon. I acknowledge your victory. Now, please get off me. You're heavy and I'm starting to struggle to breathe."

"I guess so," Souja shuffled back reluctantly, sinking down onto his haunches on the ground, and Joumei slowly picked himself up, rubbing his chest ruefully.

"You Clan sons eat too much fine fare," he reflected, then held out a grimy hand to his companion, "but I acknowledge you as the Endou heir. From hereon in I'll call you Souja-dono. I can't call you Souja-sama, because father says we only call the Heads of the Clan that, and that's not you, yet. But, when it is, I'll call you Souja-sama. I'll do as you tell me to do, like Father does for Hirata-sama."

"Who exactly are you?" Souja, slightly mollified, eyed the dishevelled boy with a critical, curious eye. "You look like a village peasant, but you don't speak to me like it. You talk as someone with pride of your own — please, will you tell me, from what family do you come?"

"I told you. I'm not Endou," Joumei twitched the fingers of his waiting hand again, and, with a moment of hesitation, Souja took it, allowing his new acquaintance to haul him upright. "My family are Urahara, going back generations. Father says our people are Clan born and should only bow heads to this Clan if they prove worthy. We have had enemies and allies among your people, so we have to be sure the masters we serve here are the right ones."

"Urahara?" Souja looked surprised. "From District Three?"

"Originally," Joumei agreed. "I was born here, though. So was Father. We came here a long time ago, when bad things happened in our own Clan. Our line is the highest born, and so Father is the head of our people, now. Misashi-sama protected us, and then, so did your father. He still does, and in return, we help him. We provide information to the Clan and he keeps us safe from those who might still see us dead. It's a complicated situation — so we can't trust just anyone."

He grinned, and Souja was faintly disturbed by the simple and matter-of-fact way his new acquaintance spoke of such heavy things.

"They call us 'Kitsune'," he added, "though it's a secret. Hirata-sama brought you here, so he wants you to know about us now, but you mustn't ever tell anyone else about us. Not ever. Not even your family."

"Not even my mother?"

"Nope, not her, and not your sister either," Joumei shook his head decisively. "It's a Clan secret, between men of honour. You must keep it, because Hirata-sama and Father say so."

"All right," Souja frowned, but nodded his head. "I'll keep it. I have honour, and I won't tell."

"Then I guess Father will let you meet our people," Joumei observed. "Follow me and I'll take you to where they are."

Souja opened his eyes, nostalgia glittering in his expression. That had been their first meeting, but from then on, Hirata had taken him often to his meetings with the Kitsune and, as both fathers had hoped, the two boys had built up a strong friendship that surpassed the bounds of class or Clan. Souja had learned with regret how living underground and in close proximity to the Sekkiseki reduced the lifespans of the Kitsune people, but Joumei and his father had both always been pragmatic about it, and so he had never pitied them for their plight. On the contrary, when Joumei's father had died, he had offered his condolences, but had known that of all his acquaintances, Joumei was best prepared to deal with the situation and move on. They were a close people with tight bonds, yet a transient people who could drift in and out of each other's lives over the course of several decades. Their existence was hidden from all but the most high ranking Endou — so if someone wanted to hunt them down, that person was almost certainly from outside.

From the Urahara, perhaps.

He sighed, turning his gaze back to the paperwork with a resentful eye. Hirata had forbidden him from going to the forest or from making any kind of attempt to meet with Joumei, in case they brought the Kitsune under threat, and the enforced distance was a trying one. The Kitsune were used to being hidden people, and were better at protecting themselves than anyone else was at protecting them — but still, he was worried for them, knowing that there were many young children among the families that made their homes in the old Sekkiseki caverns.

Joumei will have thought it all through, though. He's always been more grown up for his age, probably because life is so short for them — they can't afford to waste time in idle things like childhood.

Souja rested his chin in his hands.

I wish I could ride there, just once, to make sure, but crossing Father is not something a wise man does. I haven't got through half of these documents, either. He'll probably skin me when he comes back if they're still undone, the mood he's been in of late.

He reached reluctantly for his brush, but, as the tips of his fingers touched against the wood, the dull hum of spiritual energy that prickled against his awareness made him pause, his brow creasing in confusion. He turned, catching sight of something small and black fluttering in through the open window of the chamber, and he let out an exclamation, all thought of work forgotten as he recognised the distinctive form of a Hell Butterfly.

Not just any Hell Butterfly, though. As he held out his finger to allow the insect to land, he caught sight of the silverish tinges to the tips of the insects beautiful, spectral wings, and his heart skipped a beat.

From Joumei. Not from Father or from anyone in the Gotei, but from the Kitsune.

The insect fluttered its wings, releasing the message it had been carrying into echoes of spiritual energy.

"Souja-dono,"

Joumei's voice was clearly recognisable, and Souja let out his breath in a rush, realising his friend was likely both well and safe.

"I'm sure you don't need me to tell you who this is from. In light of your Lord father's message to us regarding the safety of our people and the absence of one of your own. We've not come under any attack, but we have acquired an unexpected guest. Kotetsu Tenichi is currently in our custody. Please have Hirata-sama send someone to remove him as soon as you can, since his presence here is something of a hindrance."

The insect fragmented, disintegrating into glimmering shards of spiritual ash, and Souja shook his head in amusement at his friend's brief yet faintly ironic message.

The Kitsune have Tenichi. I wonder how that came about... sometimes the skills Joumei's people have for finding things out frighten even me. But they have him, and best of all, it doesn't sound as though the Kitsune have been put in harm's way. I must go report this to Father at once — maybe, if Tenichi is safe, he'll let me go retrieve him.

His eyes narrowed as he got to his feet, straightening his papers before scooping up his zanpakutou and moving towards the door.

No, he'll have to let me go. Nobody else knows where the Kitsune hideout is, and nobody else is in their trust. Father can't go himself — there's too much to be done here — so that leaves me. I'd better start preparing my argument to travel, then... since he was quite explicit in his orders and he won't like changing them. Still, if it's the only way... and once Tenichi is safely back here, Seventh can investigate fully whoever was behind his abduction. No, I'm sure Father will send me, when he hears, even if he does grumble, since the longer Tenichi is with the Kitsune, the more chance he'll see or hear something that might put him in danger and them at risk. If I go, too, I'll be able to get a good idea for myself what the situation is — and hopefully, we can start putting the lid on this whole unfortunate incident.

The Thirteenth Division seemed strangely quiet that day.

Mitsuki set aside her book, glancing at the cover with a sigh. The volume had been brought to her by one of Juushirou's subordinate officers — a girl called Kirio, she remembered — in the hope that it might break up the tedium of her convalescence, but she had been staring at the same page for the past three quarters of an hour. Normally peace and quiet was exactly what she needed to focus, but that day it was too quiet, putting her on edge and straining her already shattered nerves towards breaking point. She was still weak and shaky — she had tried getting up that morning, but the sight of Yuuyugo's hilt still missing its blade had been enough to sap all the strength she had managed to muster and she had sunk back down onto her covers, frustrated and resigned to her fate. Retsu had known what she was doing, she mused darkly, consigning her to rest. She had given her everything to save those she could save, but it had come at a cost. The words of the healing Kidou spells still lingered on her lips, but she could not cast them, and, with Yuuyugo still in such a precarious state, she did not dare try. Fourth Division needed her to get well — and so she would try and do as her Captain had instructed, however hard it might be to be kept away from those who needed help the most.

A faint sound at the door made her glance up, cautiously allowing her senses to extend to beyond the divide as she tried to identify the reiatsu that lingered beyond. Relief flooded her expression as she recognised this one — since she had regained consciousness, only a few familiar auras had mingled among what had seemed like an army of strangers passing back and forth outside the door, but this one she knew and its ragged unsteadiness gave her reassurance.

The divide slid back hesitantly to reveal Madeki, and, at the haggard, tired look on the older man's face, Mitsuki knew she was not the only one suffering from the memory of what had happened in Rukongai.

"I wasn't sure if you'd welcome my visit," he observed, by way of preamble, standing in the doorway and making no attempt to enter the small bedchamber, "but I needed to come and see for myself that you were all right. Nobody's let me near here till now — but Shikibu said you were awake and recovering, so I decided to stretch my legs and walk to Thirteenth. It's a nice day, out, and most of Thirteenth's lesser members seem to be on manoeuvre with Houjou, so I thought now was as good a time as any."

"I'm glad to see you," Mitsuki assured him, offering her squad leader a faint smile and gesturing for him to come into the room proper. He did so, pulling the door softly shut behind him, then crossing the two or three feet of tatami mat until he reached the end of the bed. He paused for a moment, a little awkwardly, then dropped his frame down on the seat at her side, letting out a heavy sigh.

"Fourth isn't a good place to be at present," he added, as if answering an unspoken question, and Mitsuki's smile faded. Slowly she nodded her head.

"So Ju... er... Ukitake-taichou told me," she agreed sadly. "I should be helping, but I'm not much use to anyone at the moment."

"You're better off here. We need you fully fit," Madeki assured her. "Retsu-sama was the one who sent you to Thirteenth to convalesce, so I'd wait for her orders before you return. We're short of people, true enough, but she won't take chances with your spirit power or anyone else's. Her judgement is sound, so trust it."

"I intend to," Mitsuki sighed, stretching her arms up above her head. "Part of me wants to be there, helping, but there's another... more cowardly part of me that's... relieved to be away from it. I know how bad that sounds, but I can't help it."

She shuddered, closing her eyes briefly.

"I'm sure you see them too," she whispered, opening them again and raising them up to her companion. "You can't not see them, or feel it, over again."

"Yes," Madeki agreed darkly. "I don't suppose I'll easily forget, any more than you will."

He hesitated for a moment, then,

"Coming back here is like stepping through a hole in time, with so many things that have changed in our absence,” he observed thoughtfully. “I’d never set foot in the Thirteenth Division before today, but it’s a busy, thriving division and well established by all accounts. Most people seem to take it for granted that it’s here, whilst I’m still getting my head around to counting to Thirteen instead of Twelve.”

“I’m a little like that myself,” Mitsuki owned. “There are a lot of new people... it’s like being a stranger in your own world.”

“Yes,” Madeki mused. “We’ll have to get used to it, though. Retsu-sama seems certain that we won’t be allowed to return to Rukongai for a while. Maybe we never will — it’s hard to tell.”

“Would you want to go back?” Mitsuki asked doubtfully, and Madeki nodded his head.

“That was the job I chose to do, and I want to continue doing it,” he said frankly. “More than ever now, knowing that there are violent folks there who might cause harm to those who can’t defend themselves. Of course, we can’t go back in exactly the same vein as we were before — but yes, if I was allowed to choose, I’d go back.”

“I wonder if I would,” Mitsuki reflected. ‘Part of me wants to. Part of me loves Rukongai, and the people, and doing my job by them. The other part though,’ she shuddered, “is still drenched in blood. I can’t stop replaying the fight with the Hollow in my mind... and so long as that’s true, I’d be a liability in the field.”

“Moving on is a difficult thing to do,” Madeki agreed, “but as military officers and professionals, it’s our duty to do it, Edogawa. For their sake, we have to — honouring them is our duty, too.”

“Mm,” Mitsuki murmured. “I know it is.”

“Aomori is doing better, by the way,” Madeki changed the subject slightly, resting his hands on his knees and gazing at her pensively. “Retsu-sama thinks her convalescence will be a long one, but she’s not in any danger of her life, now. She opened her eyes for a short few minutes this morning — she’s still very sedated, and we’re keeping her that way, but she asked about you and we told her you were fine. She doesn’t know about the rest, yet. That can wait until she’s stronger — but I thought you’d like to know she’s turned the corner.”

“Oh!” Relief glittered briefly in Mitsuki’s grey eyes. “Thank you for telling me. I was so worried about her, out in the field, because she kept going down and I couldn’t...”

“Your sword saved her life, that’s beyond doubt. Your kidou saved mine, too,” Madeki interjected frankly. “Don’t start regretting what you couldn’t do, Edogawa. You did everything you could out there and nobody thinks otherwise. It’s the opposite, in fact. You did well.”

He smiled slightly.

“For my part in it, I’m grateful,” he added, rubbing his chest pensively. “I wouldn’t be here if not for you.”

“I just did my job,” Mitsuki pinkened, looking embarrassed. “I don’t think I was all that brave. It was more a case of... instinct. That... and not wanting to be... alone.”

“Yes,” Madeki agreed gravely. “Coming back here alone would be... harder. I was very relieved when they told me you and Aomori had come back, too.”

“I suppose we’ll all adjust to the changes together,” Mitsuki reflected. “In truth, Buchou, seeing you here like this has made me feel a lot less anxious. Everyone I’ve spoken to wants to understand what happened, but you actually do understand. It’s not a feeling you can put in words — but I can tell you feel it just the same way as I do. Somehow, sharing that memory, horrible as it is... gives me some strength to overcome it.”

“We need to talk about it, though, if you don’t mind,” Madeki said gravely. ‘Your experiences, what you saw, and most critically, how Aomori got hurt and the others you were with killed. Oh yes, we’ve retrieved their bodies,’ as Mitsuki flinched, a question in her eyes. “We’ve brought everyone back to Seireitei, now. You, Aomori and I are the only survivors, and Aomori’s far too fragile to be interrogated yet. That leaves you and I, and they need our testimony. I’ve given mine, as best I can — what about you? Are you up to talking about it?”

“I don’t know, but I have to,” Mitsuki smoothed the bedsheets absently under her fingers, her apprehension clear from the trembling of those pale, slim fingers. “J... Ukitake-taichou hasn’t pushed me to talk about it — nobody has — but I have a duty to my division mates, too.”

She bit her lip, then,

“You know it was a Hollow, don’t you? Ukitake-taichou was asking me about the type, so that Seri could be better helped.”

“Yes,” Madeki agreed. “Aomori’s wounds were consistent with that, and you and she obviously faced something in Junrin’an that killed the other two.”

“A scorpion Hollow,” Mitsuki shuddered, swallowing hard as the images of Kazuki and Haseyo’s broken bodies once more taunted her consciousness. “I wasn’t... with them when it happened. I mean, when Kazuki and Haseyo were killed, I was... I wasn’t there.”

“Weren’t there?” Madeki blinked at her, confused, and Mitsuki nodded, memories of the event flooding back over her senses. She drew a shaky breath into her lungs, forcing the waves of rising panic back as best she could.

“We were about to head back to Hokutan,” she said softly. “We’d seen nothing amiss, and so we were going to report back. Has... Haseyo was talking about... the flowers, like it was peaceful and calm and all was going to be all right. We... we were about to set out when I felt something over in one of the local settlements. I... I sent Haseyo and Kazuki on ahead, then Seri. I stopped back in the settlement to make sure nobody was hurt. There had been a Hollow, but it had let Kazuki and Haseyo lure it away so the people there were unharmed.”

“Were these contaminated people, or not?” Madeki questioned, and Mitsuki shook her head.

“They were not.”

“All right, continue,” Madeki’s eyes narrowed thoughtfully, and Mitsuki knew he was digesting this carefully.

“I’d just finished making sure that nobody was hurt when I felt...” she faltered, clenching her fists against a fresh wave of panic, then, “I felt the Hollow kill Kazuki and Haseyo. It was quick, intense, horrible... and I knew I had to go after them, even though it was too late. I shunpoed as quick as I could, but I guess I was still reeling from the shock of it. When I got to the clearing, I saw the monster for the first time. Kazuki and Haseyo were beyond my help and I couldn’t see Seri. She’d hidden, but when I appeared, she fired Kidou at the Hollow. I thought... maybe we could take it down, but... but she was hurt, too, and she collapsed not long after I got there.”

She closed her eyes, tears bright against her lashes.

“I can’t fight with a sword like she can,” she whispered. “If I could, maybe none of this would’ve happened.”

“We’re not assigning blame,” Madeki rested his hand on her shoulder. “Retsu-sama gave me that lecture and I’m passing it on to you. I have six lives on my conscience, Edogawa, not to mention the responsibility for sending you and the others into that region. Let me take that burden, and just tell me what happened next.”

“I’m not completely sure,” Mitsuki admitted slowly. “I remember raising my sword, but it’s all patchy and all over the place. I was worried about Seri, and I couldn’t focus on the Hollow attacking me.”

She paused, her gaze flitting to the door as a familiar reiatsu pervaded her senses.

“Ukitake-taichou,” she whispered, and Madeki pursed his lips.

“There’s no harm in him hearing this,” he assured her. “Thirteenth have already volunteered full cooperation with the investigation, so far as they’re able.”

There was a light knock at the door, preventing Mitsuki from answering, then the divide slid cautiously back, revealing the white-haired Captain, his haori conspicuously absent for once from about his shoulders. With a jolt, Mitsuki realised it was for her benefit, and faint colour rose in her cheeks.

At the sight of Madeki, Juushirou paused, lowering his head apologetically towards the Third Seated officer. Though Juushirou was the higher ranked shinigami now, Mitsuki too remembered the days when Madeki had been their school senpai, and, in Juushirou’s case, part of a rescue party that had come and retrieved both him and Shunsui as first years from a mountain cave. As a result, Juushirou held the officer in high esteem, and there was warmth to the grave smile he gave the visitor.

“Madeki-dono, I’m sorry to interrupt,” he said politely.

“No, it’s all right,” Madeki shook his head. “You want to hear Edogawa’s account too, don’t you? This way she’ll only have to repeat it once — probably that’s better for her as well as for us.”

“Do you mind, Mi... Edogawa-san?” Juushirou asked quizzically, and the colour in Mitsuki’s cheeks deepened at the more formal use of her name. She shook her head.

“Not at all,” she assured him. “Truthfully, once is more times than I’d like to relate it, so if its no more than that...”

“Understood,” Juushirou sat down on the end of the bed. “Thirteenth are mobilising to act whenever they’re called upon, and we will get to the bottom of this.”

“Edogawa was telling me about the Hollow’s attack on her and her companions,” Madeki quickly brought Juushirou up to speed, and Mitsuki watched the plethora of emotions that flickered across her old friend’s thin features. At the mention of the Hollow’s attack, his brow creased, and he glanced at Mitsuki quizzically.

“The Hollow attacked a village full of pure Pluses?” he asked softly. “Is that normal, in Rukongai?”

“No, it isn’t,” Mitsuki shook her head, running fingers through her fine dark hair. “There have been Hollows, lately... but all the settlements they’ve attacked have had some kind of... well... pollution, I suppose is the right word. The souls have reiatsu, so it makes them targets. We think that the Hollows are turned from people who’ve somehow become contaminated, whether in Rukongai or in the Real World when being soul buried — but none of us really know for sure.”

“Normally, in the Real World, the spiritual pressure of the surroundings is so feeble a Hollow will target a pure Plus soul because it is the only source of condensed spirit matter for a wide radius,” Madeki supplemented. “In Rukongai, though, even in the so-called Spiritless Zone, much of the atmosphere and the general surroundings are comprised of stable spirit energy. Though they don’t give off much in the way of emissions, it’s generally enough to mute the presence of most Plus souls where Hollows are concerned.”

“Meaning that Hollow should not have attacked the settlement, but did anyway?”

“Yes,” Mitsuki confirmed, and Juushirou’s gaze darkened.

“I see,” he murmured. “I’m sorry. Please go on.”

“I thought it odd, too,” Madeki admitted. “Edogawa, do you remember anything else about the Hollow that attacked you all?”

“Yes... one thing, though I’m not sure if it was my panic that made me see it that way,” Mitsuki twisted her fingers together. “It didn’t seem interested in consuming spirit power. It didn’t attack any of the villagers, just roughed some of the buildings and when it had killed Haseyo and Kazuki, it just... left them there, as though they no longer were important. Seri, too — when she went down, the Hollow lost interest in her and came after me. It was as though it wanted to kill... not feed.”

“It attacked you directly?” Juushirou kept his tones level, but there was no suppressing the anxiety that briefly flooded his hazel eyes at this, and, seeing it, Mitsuki felt slightly comforted. She nodded.

“What happened next is still a blur,” she admitted. “I should be dead, but I... I’m not.”

“Did you slay the Hollow?” Madeki asked, and Mitsuki shook her head.

“I can’t. I never was very good at that,” she admitted miserably. “I’m a healer, Buchou, I’m not a reaper. I want to mend souls, and Hollows are beyond my mending powers. When it came at me, it flung me completely off balance. Everything just overloaded inside of me — Kazuki’s death, Haseyo’s death, Seri’s injury... and then the creature’s reiatsu on top of that. I couldn’t even remember how to fire a spell... all I could think of was that it was going to kill me and then... then it might hurt the village, and...”

“But it didn’t,” Madeki interjected quietly, breaking off what was fast becoming a hysterical speech. “You’re still here. Alive. In one piece. So what happened to the Hollow?”

“He killed it,” Mitsuki whispered, tears trickling down her cheeks, and Juushirou twitched, casting Madeki a sidelong glance as though realising that in the presence of his friend’s superior officer, it would not be a good idea to follow his first instincts and gather her up in a close, comforting hug.

“He?” Madeki echoed, apparently oblivious to the Captain’s inner emotional turmoil. “What he are we talking about now?”

“If I knew that, I’d tell you, but I don’t,” Mitsuki buried her head in her hands, fragmented pictures of her rescuer flooding her thoughts. “I never saw him before, and he didn’t tell me his name. He appeared just as the Hollow was going to cut me down — and he used some kind of condensed spirit power to destroy it.”

“Kidou?” Juushirou asked sharply, but Mitsuki shook her head.

“No, it wasn’t Kidou,” she replied. “He said he didn’t really know what it was — just spirit power he sometimes could use when the need arose.”

“Someone in the Spiritless Zone who could use spirit power at will?” Madeki’s eyes became slits. “Someone who wasn’t a shinigami?”

“If he was, I didn’t know him, but I don’t think so,” Mitsuki replied wearily. “I thought he looked vaguely familiar, but I couldn’t be sure why or how. He wasn’t particularly distinctive to look at. Friendly features. Dark blue eyes. Dark hair. Rough clothing. I thought he came from Seireitei. He said he didn’t, but I thought he did. He seemed like he did, and his spirit power wasn’t like any of the contaminated souls we encountered in Hokutan. I thought maybe he’d got into some trouble over here and that’s why he didn’t want me to know who he was.”

“How on earth would someone like that get into Rukongai?” Juushirou asked. “That shouldn’t be possible, should it?”

“It shouldn’t, but with the pollution of souls and the Hollows, I’m wondering if there is a leak somewhere that we haven’t found,” Madeki grimaced. “Some parts of the Sekkiseki wall between us and the abandoned areas of Rukongai aren’t as solid as they should be. If you were determined, maybe you’d get through them. Thing is, there’s nothing on the other side of that barrier. A wasteland, certainly no food and very little water. Anyone who found himself there would quickly starve. The walls between the wasteland Rukon Valley and the Spiritless Zone aren’t as thick as the ones between Seireitei and Rukongai, though they should be secure. Still, it’s possible we missed something... I’d like to say it’s impossible, but I suppose we can’t completely rule it out.”

“If random souls are running riot around the Spiritless Zone, no wonder the Pluses are becoming contaminated,” Juushirou said acerbically, and Madeki nodded.

“We’ll have to investigate that,” he agreed tiredly. “Kai-dono’s Onmitsukidou haven’t found any souls with particularly significant reiatsu over there, but that doesn’t rule out their existence.”

“This man existed,” Mitsuki said flatly. “He existed, and he saved my life. He waited to make sure I was all right, and then he helped me bring Seri back to camp. I couldn’t carry her, so he did. Only, when we got there, and everyone was killed... he disappeared. I guess he didn’t want to be caught up in it... since if he was already a fugitive, it would look bad.”

“On the contrary, though, it’s a long walk from Junrin’an to Hokutan,” Madeki pursed his lips. “His being with you would automatically count him out of the attack on us... besides, I saw our assailant. It was a young woman, not a man at all. A woman with a blade — a Plus soul.”

“A... Plus... soul?” Mitsuki was stunned, and Madeki nodded.

“I’m as foxed as you are,” he agreed, “but Kai-dono’s men and the autopsies of our comrades agree with me. The killer left no reiatsu on any of her victims... and she attacked them with mundane, physical methods — a sword or, in my case, our own supplies of soporific medicine. No spells, nothing like that — just a slashing blade and quick reactions.”

“Is it normal for Plus souls to carry weapons in the Spiritless Zone?” Juushirou asked quizzically, and Madeki shrugged.

“Some arrive with them,” he admitted. “They’ve used them all their Real World lives, and so they manifest them over the divide. They’re feeble implements — not even asauchi... we generally refer to them as ‘dead blades’ because they have no spiritual presence at all. It’s never really been a problem till now. I suppose we assumed that any trouble we could quickly overpower with our own force — though that may have been an overestimation. In all the time I — and Edogawa — spent in Rukongai, though, we weren’t ever attacked by a pure Plus soul wielding a dead sword.”

“Kai called her weapon a dead blade at the Captain’s meeting,” Juushirou rubbed his chin thoughtfully. “I thought it sounded odd then, but now I understand what he meant. A sword that isn’t in any way connected with the kind of swords we use, correct?”

“Yes,” Madeki inclined his head. “They’re just tools... far inferior to what we have and for the most part, the Plus souls keep them for show and comfort. They don’t often remember how to use them, not when their memories are wiped or blurred — but some subconscious need inside of them makes them feel more comfortable and safe with the weapon as part of their death attire. It’s not an uncommon phenomenon, and one that hasn’t created problems before in our time in Rukongai.”

“Buchou is right,” Mitsuki agreed. “They don’t want to harm us. They want and need our help.”

“Not this one, clearly,” Juushirou sighed, “and so far, it doesn’t sound like Kai’s found any trace of her, either. Not to mention the young man who saved Edogawa-san’s life.”

“Maybe we should be trawling the records of the Lower Seireitei eyre courts, even the Clan courts, and see if we can find anyone who fits Edogawa’s description,” Madeki reflected. “It might be like looking for a needle in a haystack, but if you could give a clear and detailed description, Edogawa, we might find someone good with a brush to sketch a likeness. At the very least, absconded prisoners can’t be that common. If we find a record that looks like a match, then maybe we can track down the man who helped you.”

“If he’s escaped Seireitei justice, he doesn’t want to be found,” Juushirou pointed out, and Madeki shrugged.

“He still risked his life and his freedom to rescue Edogawa,” he said simply. “I think in those circumstances a deal could be made. If he turned witness and helped with our enquiries, the Council might put pressure on whichever District he came from to drop the charges against him.”

“Even if those charges included murder?” Juushirou asked, and Madeki nodded.

“We need all the evidence we can get,” he admitted.

“I don’t think he’s that kind of person, anyway,” Mitsuki murmured. “I know I only met him briefly, but... when he helped me, I passed out. He had plenty of chance to hurt me, but he didn’t. He didn’t touch me. He sat and waited for me to wake up, and then he helped me get Seri back to camp, even though it meant putting himself at risk if Buchou saw him. If he has outstanding charges, I don’t think they’re likely to be major ones like rape or murder. Maybe petty theft — something like that.”

“Well, if I take a description, I can have Ketsui and a couple of others go check through records,” Juushirou did not seem overly convinced, but he nodded his head. “Ketsui needs a distraction, anyway.”

“Naoko told me one of your members was missing,” Mitsuki remembered, and Juushirou shook his head.

“Former member,” he corrected. “Tenichi transferred to Seventh a while ago — but he still seems like one of mine, and I’m worried about him. We all are — especially Ketsui. This will be a good chance for him to put that out of his head. S... Kyouraku-taichou intends to help investigate things as well, so maybe I’ll send Ketsui with a message to the Eighth barracks, asking for assistance in digging through files.”

“I’ll go back to Retsu-sama and relay what you’ve told me to her,” Madeki got to his feet, smoothing down his crumpled hakama and shooting Mitsuki a smile. “I’ll take Aomori a message, too, if you have one. Retsu-sama doesn’t want you anywhere near Fourth just yet, so you can’t come visit with her at the moment, but if there’s anything you’d like her to know, I’ll try and slip in when there’s a moment and speak to her.”

“I guess... just to get well soon, and to keep fighting,” Mitsuki pursed her lips. “I like Seri. She’s someone I care about, and I want her to get better as quickly as possible. She was so badly hurt... but if you say she’ll live, then that’s a weight off my mind.”

“I’ll do that,” Madeki grinned at her. “Her first concern was for you, not herself, so I think she's starting to come back to her wits now. Try not to worry. Everyone's been working round the clock to build on what you did in the Spiritless Zone, and now those efforts are paying off."

He bowed his head towards Juushirou, then withdrew from the room, shutting the door once more behind him and leaving the two old friends alone.

"Aomori Seri is a kinswoman of Naoko's, isn't she?" It was Juushirou who broke the silence, and Mitsuki nodded.

"Second cousin," she agreed.

"Maybe Unohana-taichou would let me send Naoko to see her, then," Juushirou rubbed his chin thoughtfully. "Claims of kinship are strong things, and she might. Fourth Division are too busy to run back and forth with status reports, but I'm sure, if it was Naoko, she'd be able to find out anything Madeki-dono wasn't aware of."

"If you're sure it's not a bother," Mitsuki looked surprised, and Juushirou sent her a warm grin.

"Aomori's your friend, and the cousin of my Third Seat. Thirteenth therefore have an interest in her recovery," he said pragmatically. "Meantime, you look better this afternoon than you have done. I'm sure talking about it was horrible — but you seem as though it's lifted a weight from your mind."

"I suppose... I was afraid of being blamed for what happened to Haseyo and Kazuki. Seri, too," Mitsuki toyed with her sheets, dropping her gaze. "I was put in charge, Juushirou. I feel responsible... but Madeki-dono made it seem... like it wasn't so much my fault."

"The Hollow behaved very oddly," Juushirou looked troubled. "There have been like incidents of that over this side of the divide, too. Hollows attacking only shinigami, or destroying villages yet not hurting a single citizen despite the fact some have reasonable levels of spirit power."

"Do you think someone is controlling them?" Mitsuki's eyes widened with alarm, and Juushirou shrugged.

"With Fourth and the abductions, there's no longer any time to investigate that," he admitted. "It might just be the way the Hollows are evolving — the Real World is a violent place at the moment, wars being fought all over, and that might have made the creatures more bloodthirsty when they turn. Seireitei's never been peaceful, either... and I'm not an expert on Hollow-Shinigami scientific principle. What is and isn't possible is a grey area to me."

"It would be hard, manipulating a creature like that," Mitsuki said thoughtfully. "They're so full of hate and rage and despair. There was something odd about the one that attacked us, definitely... but... I couldn't say that something was controlling it. It just seemed extra-specially violent, and more interested in spilling blood than feeding. Perhaps it had been sated, and maybe, in life, it was a particularly aggressive warrior or something, reverting to type. I don't know... honestly, I don't even know if the man who saved me purified it or simply killed it."

"This man..." Juushirou frowned, then, "did he say why he helped you?"

"Because I helped the villagers, and he felt we shared values," Mitsuki frowned. "He said that he grew up in a village not unlike the one that was attacked, and so, because I wanted to save it, he decided to save me. He wouldn't tell me his name, though. He said it was somewhere in the forest — but he might have been joking. He was trying to distract me from the deaths of the others as we walked. I didn't know what was happening at the main camp, or I'd probably have tried to shunpo — but I was pretty exhausted after the battle, and, well, I didn't want to leave him with Seri, since he obviously didn't know anything about healing."

"You trusted him?"

"I only met him briefly," Mitsuki objected. "Trust is a strong word. I wasn't afraid of him, though. I didn't find him threatening. He could've hurt me and Seri both, and didn't. Maybe he did escape from some District court system somewhere, but whatever his crime was, I'm sure it wasn't severe."

"Hrm," Juushirou's lips thinned, and Mitsuki could read the obvious displeasure in her companion's eyes.

"It's not like you to be so suspicious," she chided softly, and Juushirou started, staring at her sheepishly.

"I don't know. I'm plenty suspicious of a lot of things, these days," he admitted ruefully, tucking a stray wisp of white hair behind his ear. "Maybe I've spent too long in Shunsui's company. Just, a lot of very odd things are happening at the moment. On their own they're troubling enough, but they're occurring at the same time. That bothers me more than it should."

"Coincidences are possible, albeit highly unusual," Mitsuki pointed out. “What happened in Rukongai is proof of that. Buchou was attacked by a Plus soul and we were attacked by a Hollow. There’s no way a pure Plus could manipulate a Hollow — even a tainted one with spirit power would have trouble not getting eaten by it — so the two events happened coincidentally. We were unlucky — or maybe, the assassin took advantage of our split camp to launch her attack — but although they happened at the same time, the two matters are so different finding a connection between them is the more unlikely scenario.”

“Perhaps...” Juushirou sighed, “but I don’t really like it. Strange men turning up to save you just in the nick of time... it seems... funny to me.”

“Juushirou, are you jealous of this guy?” Mitsuki’s eyes widened, and Juushirou’s cheeks reddened, a faint, guilty smile touching his pale lips.

“Horribly,” he owned. “Is that terrible? I’m glad he was there, and that he saved you, but...”

“Because he did, I’m here now,” Mitsuki reached over to grasp his fingers loosely in hers, offering him a brave smile. “I’m sorry, Juushirou. It’s been a long time, hasn’t it?”

“Too long,” Juushirou agreed, “and in these circumstances, too.”

“I know,” Mitsuki squeezed his hands, then loosed her hold, meeting his gaze with a sad one of her own. “They were my friends — almost like my family. When you’re around the same people so much and rely on them for your survival, you form bonds like that. Seri was probably my closest friend in Rukongai, but Haseyo and I were close, too. Keiko, too — and others. I’m back in Seireitei now and surrounded by old friends, but I’m all too aware that I’ve come back almost alone. I don’t even know how my feelings are at the moment — and that means I can’t say anything to reassure you, either.”

“I told you I’d wait for you to be ready and I will,” Juushirou said matter-of-factly, though she could see the pain in his eyes. “I’m in the same place I always was. My feelings haven’t changed.”

He fingered the pendant at his throat, pulling it from beneath the folds of dark fabric so that it glinted faintly in the light.

“I’ve kept it safe ever since you left,” he said, by way of explanation, as Mitsuki’s eyes opened wide with surprise and recognition. “You said I could give it back to you when we were reunited — I suppose that would be now, wouldn’t it?”

“No... for now, you keep it,” Mitsuki shook her head, reaching up to push his hand gently away from the pendant’s clasp. “It’s a Kuchiki pendant, and I don’t know that I’m ready to be a Kuchiki hime again just yet. Maybe I never will be ready — I don’t know, it’ll take time after all I’ve seen and done. Besides... I like that you have it.”

She grinned, though there was a bittersweet expression in her soft grey eyes.

“You kept it safe all these years, and so I know you never forgot about me,” she murmured. “That means a lot to me at the moment, knowing I was always in your thoughts.”

“Idiot, of course you were,” Juushirou snorted, allowing the pendant to fall back beneath the black hakamashita. “I hope you weren’t doubting me.”

“No...” Mitsuki faltered, and Juushirou arched an eyebrow.

“But?” he pressed.

“I don’t know Seireitei any more,” the healer murmured. “The names, the faces, even the fact that there’s a brand new Division and that all of the Gotei now have formal barracks here in Inner Seireitei, rather than operating out of manor land. You’re a Captain, Sora’s a Vice Captain, Naoko’s a Third Seat... its as though I’ve stopped moving, but everyone around me’s kept on going. I don’t know where I fit in with all of you, yet. Even less do I know where I fit in with my family. Father is still alive, Naoko told me that, but would he see me? I’ve had messages from Shirogane-senpai and Ryuu in Sixth, wishing me well and asking me to come see them when I’m able — but I feel like a stranger in a world everyone else knows. It’s disorientating and... lonely.”

She sighed, sinking back against her pillows.

“Everyone is busy. You’re busy. Naoko and Sora, too,” she added. “I have nothing much to do here except sleep and think about what happened. I don’t have a job or a position or, really, a specific rank. I don’t know all of the members of my own division, let alone the members of any other. It’s unsettling, Juushirou. You say that your feelings haven’t changed... but... everything else has.”

“I’m sorry,” Juushirou looked stricken. “I didn’t want to smother you or harass you when you weren’t up to it, but I didn’t realise you were feeling like that.”

“It’s not your fault,” Mitsuki reflected. “It’s something you accept when you go somewhere with closed borders for a long period of time.

I expected it to be strange when I came back, but I didn't really think it would be like this. I thought we'd all come back and it would be easier to integrate back into normal Gotei life."

She let out a feeble laugh.

"When you come to think on it, I've never been a part of normal Gotei life," she realised. "I've been in Rukongai from the start, so no wonder I'm so disorientated."

"That doesn't mean you can't become a part of it," Juushirou's voice softened. "I am sorry, though. Shunsui ripped holes in me yesterday about falling into the same traps as I did when we were younger, assuming I knew how you felt and acting on my assumptions. I shouldn't do it, and you hate when I do, but right now I want to protect you as much as I can. I know it hurt you, talking about what happened, and if I didn't know you had to talk about it, I would've asked Madeki-dono to leave. My duties and my feelings are conflicting a little at the moment. My responsibilities to my division have to be foremost, but I'm spending most of my time worrying about you."

"I will be fine," Mitsuki's grey eyes held the faintest glimmer of a smile. 'Maybe at the moment it's all right, if you want to protect me a little. Just a little,' as Juushirou's eyebrows arched, "while I'm figuring things out. Retsu-sama was right to send me here — I think she knew that of everyone, you'd probably be the person I wanted most to see."

She reached out to brush the dark sleeve of his hakamashita.

"The haori threw me, but today you're not wearing it, and I find it looks wrong," she added. "You are a Captain and you don't have to pretend otherwise just to placate me. Your Division should come first. That's how we agreed it, isn't it? We'd follow our own paths and achieve the things we wanted to. I... I don't regret going to Rukongai, even though I'm hurting now. And you..."

"I don't regret it, either," Juushirou admitted. "I missed you, and I'm glad to see you, but staying here was the right choice for me. Now, though, with Rukongai how it is... you don't need to think about going back. There may never be a chance to go back — and you need... to try and belong here as well. We need to find justice for your friends, and then, for their sakes, Fourth Division needs to regroup."

"I agree," Mitsuki nodded with a sigh. "It's easier to say than do, but you're right. Madeki-dono told me that we wouldn't be going back to Rukongai for a while, and I'm not sure yet if I will go, even when things are more stable. I need to work through this, and the best way of doing that is solving the mystery and getting whoever is behind it.”

“Starting with your mysterious hero, since he’s obviously a witness,” Juushirou remarked.

“You really don’t like him, do you?” Mitsuki was amused despite herself. “He saved my life, Juushirou. You can’t look on him negatively, when without him I’d not even be here.”

“I’m grateful to him for that, but no more than that,” Juushirou leaned across, kissing her very gently on the forehead before getting to his feet. “If he’s an escaped felon, I’d like to know what he did before I decide whether we can trust him or otherwise. He was in a place he shouldn’t have been, and that was to your advantage, but it doesn’t forgive his being there. Remember, something was contaminating those souls. Your hero might not be a shinigami killer, but he’s a wildcard spirit with no formal training in an area he shouldn’t be. You said he didn’t know how he used his power, and it was just condensed energy, not kidou at all. If he’s been using that kind of reiryoku heedlessly, he might have done more damage than you think.”

“That’s not impossible, but I think you’re just determined to dislike him,” Mitsuki reflected. “If you want me to help give a more detailed description to someone who can draw, that I’ll do with pleasure. I know you’ll treat him fairly, even if you don’t want to, so I’m not worried about you hurting him if you brought him into custody. Better you than Shihouin-kun’s people — I don’t know much about the Second Division’s Onmitsukidou, but I don’t imagine they’re too cuddly.”

“And I am?” Juushirou arched an eyebrow.

“Sometimes,” Mitsuki returned neatly, then she smiled, eyes lighting up properly for the first time since they had begun their conversation. “Ah, but I’ve missed all the sides of you. Even the grumpy, moony one and the half-dead with fever reckless and impulsive one. I wanted to see you, Juushirou. I’m really happy... that I got to do that. When you think you’re going to lose your life... things like that become all the more important.”

“No kidding,” Juushirou’s expression clouded. “I have to go, I have orders to give out and inspections to cover, and I need to report what you told me down the chain to my high seats as well as to Shunsui and Sora, so they can act on it, too. Will you be all right on your own? I’ll need Naoko for a bit, and so...”

“I’ll be fine. I feel a little better than I did,” Mitsuki assured him.

“Less alone, too, now that we’ve talked a little and blown out the cobwebs. We’ll talk more when things are less crazy, but for now, I’ll be all right. You go back, Juushirou. I mean it. You never asked me to sacrifice my dreams for you — I won’t ask you to sacrifice yours for me.”

Juushirou’s eyes softened, and he nodded.

“I know,” he agreed, “that’s why we get along so well.”

With that he was gone, and Mitsuki lay down, closing her eyes and listening to the retreating sound of his sandalled steps against the wooden floor.

Whatever she had faced in Rukongai, she was no longer alone in protecting those she cared about. She wasn’t simply a refugee, but a member of the Gotei, and, like Madeki had said, she had a job and a duty to those who had died as much as those who had lived.

From tomorrow, I’ll try and be more useful. I’ll help as much as I can, even if I can’t use my healing abilities just yet. I’m not going to be just sheltered and looked after, but I’m going to help get to the truth. Juushirou’s preoccupation with his Division isn’t him neglecting me, but him supporting them. I have my own division and I need to stand up for them, too. I can’t just hide here, fret and cry. I’m a shinigami, whether in Seireitei or Rukongai, that hasn’t changed.

The internal pep-talk, coupled with the good news about Seri helped settle her heart a little and she soon slipped into a comfortable, dreamless sleep, her nightmares for once abated by the reassuring presence of Juushirou’s aura so close to her body.

“But why don’t you want me to go?”

Souja paced across his father’s office, turning to send the Seventh Division Captain a look of frustration that, for him, bordered on insubordination. “Otosama, please, stop and be rational about this! Joumei sent the Hell Butterfly to me, so he expects me to do something about it. More, one of us has to go — and right now, Seventh would miss you a lot more than they would me. Joumei wouldn’t send me a message like this if he wasn’t sure he had Tenichi, and given the circumstances...”

“I thought we had an agreement about the Kitsune, Souja-kun,” Hirata put in, looking up from his desk, and interrupting his eldest child’s tirade mid-flow and fixing him with a calm, even glance. “Us going there, on any premise could bring them into harm’s way.”

The discussion had been looping around in the same circle for the best part of an hour, yet despite his best attempts, Souja was making few inroads into his father's firm decision. Although he had related Joumei's message word for word, Hirata had apparently been unmoved, and had reiterated his insistence that his son stay close to Seventh's barracks until further notice. It was not common for Souja to raise his voice against his Captain, nor was it at all usual for him to lose his temper but, at that moment, his blue eyes blazed with the closest thing to anger he could muster. He was still on duty, and so up till now he had managed to bite his lip and remain polite, but his aura was prickling with uncharacteristic tension, pushing him closer and closer to the limits of acceptable behaviour.

"I know that," he objected now. "I know, and I don't want bad things to happen to them either, but if Tenichi is there..."

"He's safe enough with them," Hirata interjected softly, "as you well know."

"He is, yes. He's fine, because they know he's ours," Souja muttered. "Joumei's message was pretty short, but he gave the impression that he'd rather we removed the man sooner rather than later, though. Their secret won't be kept long if he discovers who they are and what their relation is to us. It doesn't benefit anyone, letting one of our lower ranked officers run wild in Kitsune territory. Sending me to go get him is far less of a risk. All the Kitsune know me, and I'll be careful and discreet."

"Probably you will," Hirata acknowledged, "but so has whoever's been after shinigami been so far."

"You think I'd become their next target?" Souja looked incredulous. "With respect, Otousama, that's ridiculous. I'm not going to be taken hostage by anyone, not under any circumstances."

"You might be able to defend yourself, my boy, but what of the Kitsune, if they were to be caught up in your battle?"

"Joumei wouldn't let that happen. He's smart and resourceful and they aren't without skills of their own," Souja banged his hands down on the desk, fixing his father with a beseeching glance. "Please, Otousama. Everyone here is on edge still, and bringing Tenichi back unharmed would be a boost for them, as well as kickstarting the investigations into what happened to him. The whole of the Gotei is in disarray with one thing or another... even if there was someone else who could be trusted with their secret, there isn't anyone else to be spared."

Hirata let out a heavy sigh, removing his spectacles from their perch atop his nose and setting them down on his desk. He rubbed his brow as if trying to rid it of a tension headache, and for a moment he did not speak. Then, at length, he rested his hands on the desk before him, meeting Souja's urgent gaze with a sad one of his own.

"The Kitsune are people I swore to protect," he said quietly. "I swore it to Joumei's father, and I swore it to Joumei. My father did the same, and, when you inherit from me, so will you. It is a bond and a burden that belongs to the Endou Clan leader, and one of the few I prize, since it's founded in honour and distinction, not blood and war. I want to bring Kotetsu Tenichi back here safely, of course, but not at the cost of that promise or those lives. You understand as well as me how young some of the newest generation of the Kitsune are."

"Yes," Souja groaned, sinking down onto the floor before the desk with a grimace. "I know, I've seen them. Played with them. Watched some of them take their first steps — I know. Joumei's very proud of how peaceful their lives have become — more and more of the group are spreading outside of the Sekkiseki caverns, and establishing new lives for themselves on the outside without being persecuted. In the long run, it's what he wants for all of them — and if I'm reckless, I could jeopardise all of that. I understand the risks, Otousama, but I'm not the Head of the Endou yet. I'm the Vice Captain of the Seventh Division, and I took charge of this matter from Kikyue when she reported it to me. Retrieving Tenichi is my division duty, and not to do so would be in contempt of my appointment as Seventh Division's adjutant."

"Why did I have to have a son who thinks things through so logically?" Hirata looked pained. "No wonder you always topped your classes in Sakusen and pleased Genryuusai-sensei so roundly at the Academy. He used to say that he saw elements of me in you, but I can't imagine what elements those are — I'm sure I'm not half as stubborn or tenacious as you when you have an idea in your mind. You've always been that way — if you fail from one angle, you find another and attack with all you have. As your Captain, I could give you an order to stay here, but I don't think you'd obey me, would you? You'd face my discipline and go anyhow — because retrieving Tenichi is the right thing to do and that's that as far as you're concerned. We can keep having this conversation over and over, but you've already decided what you're going to 're just hoping I'll cede to your line of thought, so you can go with your Captain's blessing."

"Maybe... that's a little bit true," Souja acknowledged slowly. "I don't want to go in contradiction of my orders. A Vice Captain owes absolute obedience to his Captain and a son owes filial loyalty to his Father. You're both of those things — so yes, I would much rather go with your permission than without."

"But if I don't give it, you'll go anyway, regardless of how much that would undermine my authority in front of the rest of the squad?" Hirata asked archly.

"I... suppose I would," Souja reddened slightly. "I wouldn't mean it that way... but... I don't understand why you're so insistent on me staying put. We know where Tenichi is, and where he is is logistically problematic. It's up to us to resolve that — isn't it?"

"Yes, yes it is," Hirata conceded wearily. "Our responsibilities towards the Kitsune include making sure their secrets aren't exposed to the outside world."

He buried his head in his hands.

"This is what I get for letting Juushirou spend so much time with you and Kikyue when you were small," he muttered. "I should have known his idealism would've rubbed off on at least one of you."

"This isn't about Juushirou-dono," despite himself, Souja grinned at his father's wry remarks. "It's my will, Otousama. I take responsibility. I'll use cloaking Kidou and I'll move swiftly. I'll go under cover of darkness, if you prefer, since it'll draw less attention to my movements and even the Seventh won't have to know I've gone, then. I'll bring back Tenichi safely and hear Joumei's report for myself. We need those things to happen — if we've retrieved Tenichi without paying the ransom, it means that he must've escaped on his own, and probably can tell us something about who took him."

"Or they let him go, in the hope that it would lure the Kitsune out," Hirata raised his head suddenly, and Souja frowned, biting his lip.

"You think that's possible?"

"Of course I do," Hirata nodded. "If I was planning a strategy and I wanted to find someone, that's how I'd do it, too. If keeping him hostage doesn't get them the information, perhaps letting him free in Seventh land will."

"In that case, then, whoever it is might already know where the Kitsune are," Souja's eyes narrowed. "That makes it even more imperative that I go, Otousama. I need to warn Joumei and a Hell Butterfly could be intercepted. My reiatsu senses are good, and I'll pay careful attention to make sure I'm not followed by anyone, if that's your worry. Whatever you say, it won't change my mind. Please, Taichou, give me authorisation to go into Seventh to get our Eighth Seat and bring him back here!”

Hirata’s expression was unreadable for a moment, then he lowered his head in a reluctant nod.

“Kikyue is the one with the temper, but arguing with you is always much harder,” he remarked bleakly. ‘All right. Under cover of darkness. Be careful,’ he added, an admonishing note in his usually even tones. “I’m not happy about it, but your arguments make sense and I can’t ignore them. We do need Tenichi’s testimony if we have a chance of finding out what’s going on with these kidnappings and whether there is a connection of any kind to the incident in the Spiritless Zone.”

“Do you think there is one?” Souja looked surprised, and Hirata’s pale blue eyes darkened.

“The only thing I’m sure of is that there’s an inside link,” he said blackly. “Tenichi’s abduction was almost certainly aided and abetted by someone inside Inner Seireitei — though I don’t know yet who or why. What happened in Rukongai may well have been the same thing. It’s hard to say at the moment what happened — but if the rumour is true and a Hollow went rogue there, just like Juushirou’s mentioned happening in Lower Seireitei... that’s enough for me to make it a connection. For that reason, I want you extra-specially on your guard when you leave. I know you said you would be, but it must be perfect and you mustn’t let anyone track you, no matter how innocent their interest might seem. Whoever has taken these shinigami has known far too much about Divisions, their manoeuvres and where particular people will be at any given time. Until we find out who the leak is, everything has to be done with express care.”

“I didn’t know you’d been discussing those rumours with Juushirou-dono?” Souja looked surprised, and Hirata shrugged.

“Not yet, not in detail, but the pieces go infuriatingly well together, and I’m sure he’s seen the links, too,” he responded. “All right. You’re dismissed. Make sure you finish all the paperwork you’ve got outstanding before nightfall, so I can go over the bits I need to. I want you to report to me before you leave for Seventh, and make sure you hand your duties over to Kikyue before you do. She doesn’t need to know where you’re going — on an errand for me, that’s enough, understand?”

“I’ve kept the Kitsune a secret from her for this long, Father. I can certainly keep her off the scent a while longer,” Souja assured his Captain, relief in his blue eyes. "Thank you, sir. I won't let you down, I promise."

"See you don't," Hirata warned, but there was no real severity in his tones, and Souja shot him a grin, saluting sharply before withdrawing from the office and shutting the door carefully behind him. He had not expected his father to be so reluctant, but, as he reflected on the conversations, he realised that he understood the Captain's deeper concerns.

The Kitsune are ours to protect, and have been since Grandfather first shielded them. It's a matter of pride and honour that must be upheld.

He quickened his pace, covering the short distance between the Captain's office and his own in a matter of minutes, and unlocking the door, gazing at the pile of unfinished papers with undisguised dislike. He didn't forget about giving me all of those, though. If I didn't know better, I'd think he was sending me at night to make sure I didn't wriggle out of finishing that first. Oh well. I guess I did get my way, albeit with a slight compromise, so the least I can do is catch up with Seventh's papers.

"Oniisama?"

He had not sensed Kikyue's approach, so her greeting made him jump, almost dropping the black writing brush he had just retrieved in surprise. At his reaction she snorted, stepping into the chamber with a derisive shake of her head.

"You shouldn't be startled by me, Fukutaichou," she said reproachfully. "I'm a subordinate officer. Just because I happen to be your sister..."

"You came in and addressed me as Oniisama, so quite clearly right now you consider us to be off duty," Souja said evenly. "What's the matter, Kiki-chan? I have to finish these by nightfall, since Father's sending me on another errand for him then."

"So that's what all the shouting was about?" Kikyue looked thoughtfully, coming to stand beside the desk and scooping up the top sheet of the pile. "You're still going through these? I thought you handled them already... wasn't this what you were authorising when I was with you earlier?"

"Yes, but I have other duties besides signing documents," Souja set the brush aside with a sigh. "What shouting?"

"You tell me," Kikyue retorted. "I don't eavesdrop on people's conversations, but you definitely raised your voice at least twice. Father must've been in a better mood, else he'd have savaged you. Is the job he's sent you on so bad that you begged out of it and lost the argument?"

"Something like that," Souja agreed, glad that his sister had not heard any of the specifics. "Captain's orders, though, so I'll go. I'm to hand over all of my other duties to you for the evening, by the way. That's also his orders."

"Including those?" Kikyue eyed the paperwork dubiously, and Souja shook his head.

"Fortunately for you, no," he admitted with a regretful sigh. "I'll go when I've done them — so I don't really have time to hang around and chat."

"I could always come with you on this night-time mission," Kikyue suggested speculatively.

"Are you bored?" Souja arched an eyebrow, and Kikyue groaned, sinking down onto the floor with an emphatic nod.

"Horribly so," she agreed darkly. "Father's not trusted me with a single task of responsibility since he came back from the manor, and though he hasn't said it, it's almost as though he holds me responsible for Tenichi's disappearance. I have done my best to find him, and it wasn't as though he was in Seventh when it happened, but..."

"I don't think Father feels that way," Souja reassured her. "He likes piling tasks on me because I'm his second and his heir. One day I'll have to do all that he does, and there's no room for hesitation or weakness when dealing with this squad or this Clan. It's no slight against you, Kiki-chan. Father has a lot of faith in you, and so do I. Don't look so downcast... it doesn't suit you."

"So I could come with you..?" Kikyue asked hopefully, and Souja sighed, shaking his head.

"Not this time," he said regretfully. "This time, Father said specifically that he wanted you here to take charge of everything in my absence. I got the feeling he might not spend the whole evening in Seventh — he didn't say as much, but he did mention Juushirou-dono, so I wondered if he might set out for Thirteenth to compare notes there. If that's the case, you're needed here. It wouldn't be fair on anyone for us all to leave and for there to be nobody in command."

"I suppose that's true," Kikyue acknowledged pensively. "If Father said that, I guess he does trust me, still. All right, Oniisama. I'll do my best. I don't deal with my subordinates in the same way you do, so I hope they can handle that for one night."

“They’d better, because if any of them play you up, I’ll find them in pieces when I get back,” Souja said, amused. “It will be fine, and if you’re okay with it, it means I can go and complete my task with a lighter heart.”

“You’re not going to tell me what this task is, though, are you?” Kikyue’s eyes became slits. “This is one of those Father-Son things that him don’t get to play a part in.”

“Afraid so,” Souja reached across to ruffle her hair as though she were still a small child, and she yelped, shuffling back and glaring at him in indignation.

“Don’t treat me like a kid!” she protested. “I’m not that much younger than you, and I’m plenty capable of taking your sword in a fight!”

“I’m sorry,” Souja laughed, his heart somewhat lightened by the familiar banter with his closest sister. “It’s easy to forget, when you sit there and look at me like that. You’re not always so demure and receptive to what I have to say, unless I’m giving a formal squad order — so it’s quite nice, for once, to just talk like this.”

“Oniisama, are you going on a dangerous mission tonight?” Kikyue was nothing if not sharp-witted, and Souja looked rueful.

“I trust not,” he murmured, “but you never know. A lot is going on in Lower Seireitei at the moment. I don’t foresee any complications — but I’ll be going on my guard, just in case.”

“Good,” Kikyue’s eyes darkened, “because it’s bad enough one of our shinigami got taken out of the blue like he did. If anyone dared mess with our Vice Captain, I’d slash them down with my blade myself, without a moment’s hesitation.”

“You imply I can’t defend myself,” Souja said lightly, and Kikyue shrugged.

“I fight better than you, you strategise better than me,” she said philosophically. “That’s just how it works. I didn’t waste however many years it was studying how Hollows attack from all angles and psychoanalysing why they get the way they are. I spent time with my sword, perfecting my skills and learning the best ways to slash them open without anyone else getting hurt.”

“True enough,” Souja grinned. “I’m not anticipating going into a fight this evening, though, so you can put your mind at rest. Now, can you give me some space? I have papers to finish, and unless you want to be helping all over again, I suggest you make yourself scarce.”

“I’ll go,” Kikyue agreed with a shudder, getting to her feet and grimacing at the substantial wad of documents. “That’s one Father-Son thing that you can keep. I’m going to go take my lower seats through a basic kenjutsu drill, and see how many of them can keep their footing this time. Last time one of them wound up crying, so I figured there’s more work to be done.”

“Don’t kill anyone,” Souja warned, and Kikyue dimpled, shrugging her shoulders.

“Not in the gameplan, but that’s really up to them,” she responded carelessly. “You can’t learn to fight with a sword if you’re afraid of getting hit by one. Later, Oniisama. Don’t work too hard — and don’t worry, I’ll take over your duties later for you, no problem.”

With that she was gone, and Souja pursed his lips, getting up to close the door she had left ajar.

Maybe I’ll bring Tenichi back with me, and then you’ll have a full set of subordinates to drill.

He sighed, resting his hand against the wood for a moment, before returning reluctantly to his desk.

Maybe then you won’t drill the others so hard. I know you’re trying to make sure none of them get taken, but I’m not sure they understand it from that perspective.

He picked up his brush, reaching for the next document.

Oh well. I daresay it will balance out in the long run. For now, I can’t spend too long worrying about it, anyway. I have to get through these so that I can go this evening and answer Joumei’s summons.

Author’s Note: This chapter makes me sad...

17. Black Earth

Chapter Sixteen: Black Earth

The town of Haruna-chou on the border that ran between District Two and Three was a busy checkpoint town, bustling with trades and well known as much for its wide array of wares as its diversity of population. The land nearby was fertile, fed by the flood plains of the river that wound itself between several of the villages nearby, and, though some of the area's older properties bore the faint scarring of the long ago war between the Urahara and the Shihouin, these days the two Clans were, if not formal allies, on friendly enough terms to have dropped most sanctions and allowed each other's people priveleged access to trade. Haruna was unique among its neighbours, for the border cut directly through the middle of the settlement. It had been carved up that way by ancient Clansfolk settling a tricky land dispute and had been one of the most hotly contested regions in wartime, but these days neither Midori of the Shihouin nor Nagesu of the Urahara favoured spilling the inhabitants' civilian blood. Consequently it was a magnet for people from all over both Districts and, though some communities could be insular and exclusive, anyone and everyone was welcomed into Haruna's busy streets with open arms.

It was the perfect place for a traveller to take a break out of his journey, and also, the perfect place for someone who should not be anywhere to blend in.

Masaya had been to this area many times before — in fact, another lifetime ago he had grown up here, and therefore knew the hills and valleys that flanked the river like the back of his hand. He was familiar with what traders sold where on which market days, and was on good terms with several of the local inhabitants, but although he had come here many times for Keitarou in the previous eighteen months, none who had seen his face had recognised him as a local boy.

Well, it was hardly surprising, was it?

Masaya allowed his thin lips to twist into a rueful, empty smile, reaching a gloved hand up to touch the smooth skin of his face. It wasn't his original skin, of course, nor were the deposits that replaced the bones in his jaw and cheekbones native to his body, their hard, slightly uneven shape giving him a uniquely nondescript expression that made him appear far more sinister than he ever had before. Beneath the dark robes he wore hid more evidence of his change of identity, though some scars had been impossible to hide. As he viewed his reflection in the gentle ripples of the river, he mused to himself that, had she still been alive, his own mother would not have known him.

Of course, his mother was no longer alive.

His eyes darkened at the memory, before closing off to the emotion as though shutters had been brought down across a window, blocking out all of the light from outside. It had been a difficult and unhappy time, and he preferred not to think of it. That life was behind him, now — that identity belonging to a dead man, and he was here, with a new drive and purpose — to change Seireitei once and for all.

That was the reason he had come here, though visiting a place with such deep connections to his past gave him little pleasure. Keitarou had sent him to meet with someone, and Keitarou was not a man who was easy to disobey. Ten years ago, Masaya's life had been saved by this enigmatic, genius scientist, his body literally put back together piece by piece and his native spiritual abilities enhanced and harnessed with some chemical formula Keitarou's late father had created. Rukongai was not always the most pleasant of hunting grounds, but it was at least free, and Masaya relished this most of all — after so long locked in a close, dark cell, with only death before him, he had been given a second chance to taste life.

He would not throw it away foolishly by betraying Keitarou's trust.

He ducked beneath the low-hanging welcome sign that had been slung over the entrance arch to Haruna's main market square, its writing faded and peeling but its message of "Everybody welcome!" still as comforting to him now as it had been when he had been just a boy. Though several sellers tried to get his attention touting their wares, he paid the majority of them no heed, making a bee-line instead for a weaver's stall that stood a little to one side. A young woman was here, dressed in simple pale pink robes and with her dark hair pulled back in a simple, unadorned gathering behind her head. She was deep in conversation with a customer as he approached but, at the sight of him, she quickly completed the sale, giving the unsuspecting patron a wide smile and eliciting a promise from him to call back again. Masaya allowed himself another droll smile. She was almost as good an actor as he was.

"Well?"

As he approached, the smile disappeared from her lips, her brow twitching together warily.

"I've warned you about coming here too often. Someone will recognise you. You need to be more careful, or else..."

"I'm fine. Nobody ever has — they only see what they choose to see, and they don't choose to see the dead," Masaya dismissed her warning with a flick of his hand. "More importantly, I didn't come here to listen to you fuss or fluster. I came from Keitarou-sama — and you know what that means."

"He wants us to act again on his behalf?" the young woman looked pained. "Does he think it's easy, taking heedless shinigami hostage and keeping them doped up with poppy juice and strong soporifics until the ransoms get paid? It's a lot of risk, and if we were to be caught..."

"Keitarou-sama lets you keep ten percent of the ransom, and that's not an ungenerous settlement," Masaya reminded her unsympathetically.

"You only ever take his side these days," the woman pursed her lips, the faintest flicker of regret in her gentian-blue eyes. "I wonder, sometimes, if you really remember me, Naoto, or whether I'm just another fleeting ghost of a memory, lingering in fragments behind Keitarou-sama's wall of rhetoric."

"Naoto is dead," Masaya snapped, grabbing her by the arm and pulling her away from her stall, his eyes glittering with annoyance. "I've told you enough times, that isn't my name now. Naoto was put to death. He's gone. Dead. Finished. If you say that name around here too often... that's when people will start to remember. You try to warn me about my safety, woman, and then you say things like that!"

"I'm your wife," the woman pulled her hand back from him coldly, glaring at him in defiance. "If I can't call you by the name your Ma gave you, who can?"

"Nobody, not even you," Masaya said blackly. "You're Naoto's widow, Minami, not my wife. How many times have we been through this?"

"Not enough, evidently," Minami looked suddenly weary, sinking back against the wall of a nearby building as if the fight had run out of her. "I know. I'm sorry. I see you so little, now, that's all. You've changed so much, but every time you come here, I hope that a little bit more of you has come back. I hope for it, but goodness only knows why. You're not the man I married, but I can't help it. He's the only person I've ever loved, and even if you're not quite him any more... I can't let you go."

She pressed her lips together for a moment, getting a hold of her emotions, then,

"Well? What does Keitarou-sama want from me this time?" she asked acidly. "I hope he's considerably further on in his scheme to destroy the Shinigami heartland from the inside out? I want to see them burn, and I'm getting mighty impatient with waiting. They took from me the most valuable things I had — my husband, my home, my self-respect — and it can't be too soon for them to feel exactly what that's like. Tell me that he's got something better in the works than simply grabbing small fry and messing them up a bit?"

"There aren't to be any more abductions. At least, not here, and not for now," Masaya shook his head. "Keitarou-sama thinks it's too risky, since some of the shinigami have begun investigating leads and we don't want to lead them back to you and your companions hereabouts. It would be bad if word got out — we wouldn't be able to protect you."

"Would you still protect me?" Minami asked bitterly. "Naoto would have, with his life, but I'm not sure about Kurotsuchi Masaya."

"Then don't ask the question," Masaya returned bluntly. "It's immaterial, anyway. Keitarou-sama says you're to be protected, and so we will. He's taking action. A few days ago, he sent agents into the Shinigami-run section of Rukongai, and slaughtered all the members of the squad stationed there."

"All of them?" Minami looked curious. "How did he manage that?"

"If I told you things you didn't need to know, you'd know too much and that would be dangerous for you," Masaya responded. "I've come here to tell you not to abduct any more shinigami, but to be ready and to make sure all those who act with you know it, too."

"Hrm. All right. If that's what Keitarou-sama says, I can't pretend I'm sorry to stop taking the risks," Minami rubbed her hands absently against the sleeves of her kimono. "As it happens, I have some news to bring to you, too."

She gestured her hand in the direction of the man she had just served, who was now having a heated debate with the trader at the sake stall about the cost of bottles.

"He's a travelling musician, been coming this way from the Eighth," she continued. “On his travels, he’s heard a bunch of rumours. When he broke the Second border, over from First, he overheard a couple of Shihouin guardsmen talking about that underground group of theirs — the Onmitsukidou. Apparently they’d been mobilised — I thought you’d like to know.”

“Onmitsukidou?” Masaya’s eyes became like slits, and Minami nodded.

“I thought that would get your interest,” she said dryly. “It sure got mine. If I hate shinigami, I despise the special ops. Anyway, he didn’t know his spies from his spices, but what he did say was that he thought they’d been sent in somewhere remote — something to do with a distress call and an emergency. If what you told me just about Keitarou-sama and Rukongai is the truth...”

“It’s probable they went there,” Masaya’s lips twitched downwards in displeasure. “I see. That was very fast of them. Even if your customer only just arrived here today, that would still mean he’d crossed the border not long after Keitarou-sama sent his people into Rukongai. If they’d all been killed outright, it should’ve been longer before the crime was discovered... if a distress was sent up, it implies...”

“Someone botched their job? Left a witness or two choking in their own blood?” Minami nodded. “Perhaps you ought to look into that, rather than worrying about round here. We’re fine. We know what to do, and we keep our heads down. The resentment against the shinigami has grown since the Hollow attacks increased, so probably there’ll be a sizeable number of disaffected District people to call on if and when Keitarou-sama ever gets around to taking real action. In the meantime, since he relies on you to find information and cover his dirty work, I’d head off and see what you can find out from your old friends. If the Onmitsukidou are investigating, you know they won’t waste any time in giving their verdict, no matter how accurate it happens to be.”

“Indeed,” Masaya agreed grimly. “That’ll mean slipping into Inner Seireitei again, won’t it? Damn. I hate being there, and I’d hoped I wouldn’t need to go back. It’s always too risky — nobody here would recognise me, but someone there... they might. Still, you’re right, and I’m glad you told me. I ought to get to the bottom of this. If there are survivors, Keitarou-sama will need to make sure his people can’t be placed at the scene or identified — more to the point, he’ll need to know that someone messed up, and, probably, get them to fix it.”

“I’ve given you plenty to do, then, by the sounds,” Minami stretched her arms over her head, stifling a yawn. "If you don't mind, though, I'm going back to my stall. I've things to sell and a roof to keep over my own head, since my husband's no longer around to do it for me."

There was bitterness in her words again, but Masaya paid her no mind. His thoughts were fixed on what she had told him, his quick mind racing through the possible explanations for the Onmitsukidou's quick deployment.

They suspect something is up, and so reacted that way from the start. This could be problematic... I'll have to find out more.

"Hadou no sanjuu ni — Oukasen!"

The flare of golden light burst out across the Thirteenth Division's training arena, illuminating it briefly in its dazzling glare. The ball of compact energy cannoned into the target, immolating three quarters of it on impact and, as ashes and shards of fragmented Kidou drifted up from the aftermath of the explosion, the shinigami lowered his hands, a grim look of determination in his pale eyes.

"Your aim is improving," from the other side of the arena, a diminutive shinigami who, at first glance might have appeared to be both younger in age and inferior in rank to his companion shifted nimbly across the arena, pausing to examine the target with a careful, critical eye before nodding his head. "You were maybe a few inches too much to the left still, when you launched. I think it's a matter of stance more than the shape of your hands, though. You have a habit of shifting your weight forward slightly as you call the spell, and it sends your Hadou a little wide."

"Is that what it is?" The one who had fired the spell glanced at his charred fingers thoughtfully. "I keep trying and trying to get that spell right, Tsukabishi-san, but I never seem to manage to get it as precise as Shakkahou or Soukatsui. I thought it was something to do with my focus, but if you think it's not..."

"Fire it again, Ketsui-kun, and let me watch you a second time," Tsukabishi Tsunemori, Thirteenth Division's Ninth seat instructed, taking a step back and indicating with a slim, narrow hand towards a second target. "Fukutaichou just received a bunch more of those from supplies, and he told me we could use as many as we needed, so don't hold back. Taichou has a special arrangement with one of the carpenters in District Six, so getting more is never a problem."

"Taichou has a lot of connections with a lot of people," Ketsui murmured, nonetheless obediently readying his stance once more, blowing the residual ash from his fingers before pushing his palms together ready to summon the spell again. "I'm always amazed by that — even though he came from the Districts, he seems to be able to call on anyone for anything."

"I suppose it's because everyone knows if they need to call on help, Taichou will be the first to answer that call," Tsunemori replied with a slight smile. "You give what you get... something like that. You reap what you sow — and all this Kidou practice will help you improve against Hollows and such like, Ketsui-kun. You really are improving — if you carry on like that, you'll be outranking me."

"Some hope of that," Ketsui snorted, shifting his feet slightly against the worn dirt, for despite his diminutive size and unimposing appearance, Tsunemori was well known across the Gotei for his fondness for and expert ability in shinigami magic. He was someone who, in the midst of a crowd, might be easily overlooked, but his memory for spells and incantations — even obscure ones — was second in the Thirteenth Division only to the Captain himself. Born to a nomadic mother who had been killed by a Hollow, Tsunemori had entered the Academy as a weeping, illiterate youngster who had spent most of his time hiding, but, although he was never one to take the lead and speak his mind, these days he rarely backed away from a challenge and, as Ketsui and many of the lower ranking Thirteenth Division members knew only too well, if you wanted a Kidou trainer, there were none better to have than Tsukabishi Tsunemori. Patient, understanding and clear in his explanations, his ability and confidence to mentor those younger than him had blossomed since his promotion to the top ten ranks, and it was rumoured that even some of the Clan-led divisions would have liked to have stolen him away for their own squads had Juushirou's claim on his loyalty not been so strong.

"Your Kidou is on a level of its own," Ketsui continued now. "Kirio-neesan reckons that, if ranking was done on Kidou alone, you'd be threatening her seat. You're really a very good teacher, too. Thank you for spending this morning going over this with me. I'm sure you have a lot of other things to do, but you explain everything so clearly that I feel like I understand so much better."

"I had nothing important on my schedule, and I like training with other officers like this," Tsunemori's smile widened, but there was a faint flicker of sympathy in his often sad eyes. "Especially you, right at the moment. You're thinking of your brother, and you're frustrated that you can't do anything to help him."

“Is it that obvious?” Ketsui looked stricken, and Tsunemori nodded, shrugging his shoulders.

“Kira-san and I were discussing it this morning, when you were at the baths,” he agreed. “I don’t know that everyone else notices quite so quickly, but Kira-san and I share quarters with you, and, well, it’s harder to hide things like that from those you live with most closely. Besides, we’ve all felt like that, at one point or another. We’ve all had someone we’ve felt too weak to save. But we don’t know Tenichi-kun is dead, yet. He’s strong and he can fight his corner. I have faith that he’ll come back to Seireitei alive — and so should you.”

“I do. I do believe it,” Ketsui’s brow creased in concentration, and he closed his eyes, muttering the words to the incantation once more. A second, slightly curved blast of golden light flared forth from his hands. It barrelled through the spiritually charged air towards the second target, hitting it almost dead on and splintering through the wood with its force and density.

“Not bad,” Tsunemori observed approvingly. “You didn’t shift your aim so much that time. It was much more accurate.”

Ketsui let out a sigh of satisfaction.

“Good,” he said, relieved. “I know it’s stupid, but even though I believe my brother is okay, I’m still frustrated that I can’t do anything about helping him. He’s always raced ahead of me — he’s always had that much more confidence than I have. If I knew where he was being held, I think I’d hesitate before going after him, and I hate that part of myself. I want to find him — but I might waste time worrying about how best to go about it, and...”

“Strategising isn’t a bad trait to have,” Tsunemori assured him. “Besides, I don’t think you would hesitate. You’d go after him, whether Taichou wanted you to or not. Me training with you this session means he knows where you are — and if I improve your Kidou proficiency, if you did hare off to the rescue, you’d be more likely to come back alive. Your sword skills are good, but you need more confidence in your spells. Kidou’s a matter of self-belief — and that’s really all.”

“Fukutaichou would beg to differ,” Ketsui rubbed his blackened fingers against his hakamashita with a rueful smile. “Not everyone is as instinctively good at it as you or Taichou are.”

“We all have our strengths and our weaknesses,” Tsunemori said sensibly. “I think you’ve managed the best you’re going to do for today, though, with Oukasen. How about taking a few moments break and then we'll talk about Haien? You need to settle your reiryoku a bit before we start on anything else, and Haien isn't the kind of spell you play with carelessly."

"No kidding," Ketsu pursed his lips, his gaze flitting to the fencing that surrounded the training ground. Most of it had been there for years but two or three panels had been replaced within the last ten years and, if you looked at them carefully, you could see faint marks of charring in the surviving sections that flanked the new ones on either side. The damage had been done by Tenichi when he had been in the lower ranks of the Thirteenth and he had never been allowed to live it down, after firing a Haien spell that had flared badly out of control. Though the grass had now grown back around it, Ketsui recalled how black and barren the area had been for several months afterwards, and several jokes had been made about it being "Heaven's Fireplace."

He sighed, rubbing his temples to clear the memory.

"I wish Ten-nii had never left the Thirteenth," he murmured, more than half to himself. "He had friends here, and if he'd been here, he wouldn't have been going anywhere the night he came to see Kirio-neesan. He would've been staying here, so he'd have been safe. Plus, if this was an attack on Seventh, well, Ten-nii belongs here, not there. I wish he'd never gone there. I wish he'd never asked to transfer."

"You can't change what's already happened, unfortunately," Tsunemori said matter-of-factly, moving to pluck the folorn remains of the targets out of the ground. "Tenichi-kun decided to go to Seventh for a new challenge, and, probably, for your sake, too."

"Shizuka-chan said that," Ketsui grimaced. "Nii-chan never told me himself, but she said that he probably went because if he and I were in the same division, I would always look to him to help me and he'd always want to be there to do that. We needed to be apart, he said — but I still don't like it."

"You have improved a lot since he moved, though," Tsunemori remarked. "You've applied yourself far more to your Kidou, you've been promoted to Tenth seat — I think he did the right thing, Ketsui-kun. More, I think he's alive and well and will find a way to get word to Endou-taichou if he needs help to get back here. He's not someone who's easy to kill, your brother, and a lot of people care about finding him."

"Yes, true," Ketsui acknowledged. "It's different for everyone else than for me, though. Ten-nii is my brother. He's my only immediate family... he's all I have left."

"Yes.." Tsunemori's expression became pensive, faint sadness in his gaze once more. "Yes, I know, but Thirteenth Division is also your family. Taichou told me that when I first enlisted here, and I've always had complete faith in his ability to make that true. A lot of us have no family to speak of at all — but that doesn't mean any of us are really alone."

"Good words, Tsunemori," Juushirou's voice from the entrance of the training arena made both shinigami turn, Tsunemori looking sheepish as he realised his Captain had overheard his remarks. "I do my best, and I'm glad you feel that way."

He glanced at the burnt targets Tsunemori held in his hands. "I see you've been busy. I thought I sensed someone firing Oukasen down here."

"Tsukabishi-san was helping me improve my accuracy and my concentration," Ketsui bowed his head hurriedly towards his Captain. "I was having some trouble with it, but he's helped me a lot."

"I'm sure," Juushirou grinned, moving across the training ground and resting a hand on the shoulders of each young man. "I want you now, though, Ketsui — Tsunemori, I'd like you to go to Houjou's office. Atsudane and Kira should already be there. We've had a Hell Butterfly to say that there's some Hollow activity not far from the Inner Seireitei boundary, and its fallen to us to deal with it. From the reports, it sounds like the kind of creature who'd benefit from some Kidou subjugation. I'm sure I can rely on you?"

"Yes, sir," Tsunemori replied immediately, bowing his head and scurrying from the training ground as though he were still the first year student Juushirou had once rescued from both spiritual monsters and school bullies. Ketsui had not been at the Academy during those years, but he had heard the stories many times — and he understood that, in Tsunemori's mind, Juushirou and Enishi were both people he looked up to with absolute faith and confidence.

"What about me, sir?" Ketsui turned his gaze on his Captain now, questions in his eyes.

"I want you to do some research for me," Juushirou eyed him gravely. "I know how you're feeling, Ketsui, and I can't do anything about it except give you work to do. I don't know whether this has any correlation to your brother's disappearance — it probably doesn't, but I think you'll need to trust that to the hands of Endou-taichou and I, since we don't know what kind of forces we're dealing with. In the meantime, I want you to do something else very important. You've been firing spells for some time, and so a paper-based job for a few hours won't hurt... are you game?"

"If it's an order, sir, then of course I am," Ketsui was surprised, and Juushirou let out a chuckle at his response.

"It's not an order, it's a request, but one that I hope you'll follow up anyhow," he said, amusement twinkling in his eyes. "It's a matter that, for now, I hope you'll keep somewhat quiet — although I don't want you to investigate alone. This is a joint matter between the Eighth and Thirteenth, following up something that Edogawa-san told us when making her report. You're to go to the central archive and investigate records of recent judicial proceedings in Lower Seireitei — perhaps over the last couple of years."

"Judicial..." Ketsui's eyes widened with confusion. "I can do that, sir, but... why?"

"I'm not sure, yet," Juushirou was apologetic. "We're trying to piece together all the leads we have relating to Rukongai, and that means following the things that don't seem to connect to the murders as much as those who do. We have to eliminate all possibilities. What I want to know is whether any petty criminals escaped justice in the not so distant past. Young men, approximately your age, perhaps younger — with dark hair and dark blue eyes. We want a name... even better, a location and a history, perhaps a place of origin. It might not be easy to find — but you have good attention to detail and so I thought I'd send you."

"And to distract me from thinking about Ten-nii?" Ketsui asked quietly. Juushirou nodded.

"That, too," he agreed. "This is something Kyouraku-taichou and I are both investigating, and I can't spare anyone else from Thirteenth now that the Hollow alert has come in, so I want you to go there and find yourself a study buddy. You spend enough time visiting there that I'm sure you can manage that — am I right?"

"Yes, sir," Ketsui nodded his head, his expression still mystified. "I'll ask if Shizuka-chan is free to help me, and I'll go right away."

"Good lad," Juushirou seemed pleased, clapping him gently on the back. "I look forward to hearing your report — be as detailed as possible, all right?"

“I understand,” Ketsui did not fully understand, but he knew better than to question his leader when the man looked at him like that, so he bowed his head again, hurrying back towards the barracks’ main building to retrieve his zanpakutou from his room — since Tenichi’s abduction, no shinigami had left their home barracks without the reassuring backup of their sword, although Ketsui was sure that his brother had probably had his with him the night he had disappeared and it had been to no avail.

Thirteenth Division’s dorm system was a haphazard affair, partly on account of the fact most of the barracks had been constructed on an as-and-when basis. The division that had first come to Inner Seireitei had been some amount smaller than the one it currently housed, and, consequently, most of the dorm quarters were grouped into much smaller chambers than most divisions, with rooms of two, three and four shinigami rather than wider spaces that could house six, eight or even ten. A brand new block had been constructed across the yard from the main hall a mere fifteen years earlier, but the oldest chambers belonging to the top ten seated officers were housed here, in what was the original Thirteenth Division barracks building.

On the main hallway that led towards the koi pond and Juushirou’s own Ugendou were the private chambers of the Vice Captain, as well as the rooms allocated for those ranked in third to fifth place, each of whom were the envy of all other divisions on account of having private space, however small and poky that space might actually be. Between the doorway to Atsudane Makoto’s room and the currently vacant one reserved for the fourth seat was a narrow corridor that forked at the far end, leading to two distinct chambers. One was a twin room, the province of sixth seated Kirio and her roommate, the Eighth seated officer Konoe Mae. The other, slightly larger room held provision for three officers and it was here that Ketsui, along with Tsunemori and Kira slept.

He was fortunate, he reflected, as he pulled the dark blue sheath of his weapon from its perch beside his bunk, pausing to check it before slipping it through his obi. His roommates were both unimposing, but kindhearted and intelligent fellows, people with whom he could talk without being intimidated and from whom he had already learned a good deal. What Tsunemori had said was true, he knew — he had progressed and grown as a shinigami since Tenichi’s departure.

It doesn’t mean I like that he chose to go, though. Perhaps it was for both of our benefit, but right now it really doesn’t seem like it to me.

He sighed, stepping out of the chamber and closing the door firmly behind him. Private quarters within Thirteenth were rarely locked — the code of honour and trust among its members meant that they very seldom needed to be.

Part of him was frustrated that he was being sent on such a mundane task — though he had always been a keen reader and a good academic, his current restlessness made him want to be out there in the heart of the action, looking for clues and hunting down those responsible for causing so much distress. Yet, underneath his annoyance was a level of grudging understanding. Juushirou had assigned him to a desk task to make sure he did not stray into danger searching for his brother — and he realised that his Captain understood his thoughts and motives extremely well. Though he was not as impulsive or confident a character as Tenichi, he had not been named ‘Ketsui’ for nothing, and, once he had formed a particular resolve, he rarely, if ever, backed away from it.

Taichou won't let me do that, though. Whenever my mind strays that way, he pushes duty and responsibility under my nose and I remember how much I owe Thirteenth Division. I can't let him or them down — they've all been good to me and Tsukabishi-san is right. I am part of a family, here. I just preferred it when my brother was also part of my division family — it meant a lot less in the way of conflicting loyalties.

He took a short cut through the back of the barracks, aware of the sounds of the recruits at sword drill in the main yard as he slipped out of the rear entrance, tracking around the side of the building towards the path that led to Eighth Division. The grass was worn down in places now from the number of times he and other members of the Thirteenth had taken the quickest route to reach what made up the most central part of Inner Seireitei's Gotei land, and Ketsui felt certain that Juushirou had taken the path himself on occasion, for it was no secret that he was great friends with both the Eighth Division's Captain and Vice Captain.

Ketsui pressed his lips together thoughtfully, a faint wistfulness in his pale eyes.

He had never been as forward as his older brother, who had commanded a wide circle of friends during his time at the Academy. The older Kotetsu boy had secured the rank of Anideshi in his final year, and Ketsui could remember with nostalgic fondness how all of his own classmates had revered Tenichi as though he were already a squad shinigami in his own right. He had not been the best at everything, but his charisma and natural leadership skills had always drawn people in. It would've been easy to have resented a brother like that, Ketsui reflected, but he never had. Tenichi had always looked out for him, protected him and stood up for him whenever it had been needed, and so, just as much as his comrades, Ketsui had admired and adored his brother for everything he did.

His own progression through the Academy had been slower, dogged by a lack of confidence and, at the end of the second year, the fallout from what had been a nasty training incident involving a dummy Hollow. He had missed enough of the syllabus to be held back a year when his classmates had progressed, and he had found it a difficult blow from which to recover. Never as effortlessly gregarious as his brother had been, Ketsui had struggled to make new friends in a class of students who treated him kindly but who had already found their own friendships and who had little interest in adding one more. As his isolation had grown, so his grades had slipped, and by the time he had scraped through the end of his Third year, Tenichi had been certain he would never reach the top class, let alone graduate.

Then, in the first class of his Fourth year he had encountered Shizuka, and after that, everything had changed.

Magaki Shizuka was District-born, the daughter of a prostitute who had died young, leaving her the ward of an old childhood friend. She had come from ignominious roots, yet her foster mother had an illegitimate link to the Kyouraku Clan and for that reason, nobody had ever ridiculed her for her origins or her background. A sunny, friendly young woman, Shizuka's spirit power and ability to learn had proven so potent and rapid that she had swiftly been moved up from the Second year to the Fourth, a petite, startling pretty young woman who could turn into a ruthlessly intelligent warrior the moment a sword was placed in her hands. From the start, Ketsui reflected, Shizuka could have befriended every and any member of the class she wanted, but of everyone, she had chosen him. And, though most of their male classmates had paid her attention at one point or another, she had generally laughed and dismissed them with a flick of her hand, apparently unconcerned by the concept of popularity.

Thanks to Shizuka, Ketsui had found the confidence and the motivation to finish his training and join the Gotei. Even Tenichi had never known how close his heart had come to wavering, but with Shizuka's help and support, he had revived his determination, and had finally graduated third in his year. Although they had joined different divisions after leaving school, their friendship had remained as strong and solid as Tenichi's had with Kirio and, although Ketsui had never looked at Shizuka in romantic terms, he was well used to the members of Eighth — the Captain included — teasing him about his frequent visits.

It was for this reason that, when Juushirou sent Ketsui to Eighth to find a helper, it was almost an automatically understood fact that the helper would be Shizuka.

Eighth Division was bustling with life as he entered the main courtyard, recruits scurrying this way and that as they tried to complete a long list of chores before being summoned for evening drill. Some of them knew Ketsui by sight and bowed to acknowledge him as he passed, but he did not stop, casting them brief smiles as he hurried through the archway to the cobbled area beyond.

“Well, well, come a-courting again, have we?”

Shunsui’s lazy voice came from up above, and Ketsui faltered, gazing around him in confusion as he tried to pinpoint where the Eighth Division Captain was. At first he could not see the man anywhere, but then he caught the faintest flicker of movement from the chamber that overlooked the yard, and, as he turned towards it, Shunsui’s tousled head appeared at the window, a tail of muzzy brown hair falling unheeded over his shoulder.

“I expected you,” he remarked, offering a casual smile. “You always come here with such eagerness, Ketsui-kun — it warms my heart to see it.”

“Kyouraku-taichou, Ukitake-taichou sent me here on a particular errand,” Ketsui was well used to the teasing by now, and so he did not even flinch, meeting the Captain’s gaze with an earnest expression. “I’m to go do some research in the archive, and I wondered if I might have Shizuka... Magaki-juuseki to help me. Taichou seemed to think you’d know about it, so he thought it would be all right.”

“Spiriting her away from me now, I see?” Shunsui’s expression was amused. “Yes, by all means. I know what Juus... Ukitake’s landed you with, and I don’t envy you, but I’m sure you’ll do a good job and the company of a pretty girl always makes a tiresome task seem lighter, doesn’t it?”

“Kyouraku-taichou, Magaki-juuseki is my friend, not anything else!” Ketsui returned neatly, knowing he was repeating himself for the umpteenth time and also realising as he spoke the words that it would make no difference to Shunsui’s will to tease. Shizuka’s foster mother was Shunsui’s sister, albeit by illegitimate blood, and for that reason Shunsui had always paid particularly close attention to the young girl’s progress. If not for that, Ketsui mused, Shizuka would probably have joined Thirteenth on graduation, since most District shinigami still took that path, but Shizuka's situation never had been clear cut, and Shunsui, despite his genial, easy-going nature, had proven himself many times as a difficult Captain to argue with.

He grinned now, an unrepentant, insolent grin that on any subordinate officer would probably have incited a flogging.

"You'll have to check the training ground," he said now, waving a languid hand in the direction of Eighth Division's expensive and purpose built training arena. "I sent her there to work off some steam after she returned from a little errand of my own. You're welcome to her, Ketsui-kun — just be a good boy and bring her back to me in one piece, all right?"

"Kyouraku-taichou!" Now Ketsui's cheeks did burn, but Shunsui merely laughed, disappearing from the window before anything else could be said.

Realising he had lost the battle, Ketsui turned reluctantly on his heel, following the direction the enigmatic Captain had indicated. He could sense Shizuka's reiatsu as he drew closer, along with that of the Eighth Vice Captain and a couple of lower officers he didn't know, and he quickened his pace, pushing back the wood-slatted door and stepping inside.

A scene of some chaos greeted him, for Sora was haranguing two forlorn looking shinigami, an irritated look in her eyes, whilst, a safe distance away, Shizuka was on her hands and knees, examining what were unmistakably the splintered remains of an expensive and well polished bokken. At his entrance she glanced up, a rueful smile touching her lips and she got to her feet, dusting her hakama down with deft hands and reaching for the broom that stood propped against the wall.

Even with her shihakushou blotched grey in places with dust and the broom in her hand, it was difficult to see Shizuka as anything other than a hime. She had never been extremely tall, though she matched Sora more or less exactly for height, with long, curly brown hair that she tied back with a loose ribbon just beneath the nape of her neck. Her eyes were also brown, a dark, chocolate colour that sparkled when she was happy, but appeared almost black when she headed into battle, dark with focus and determination for the mission ahead. A light dusting of freckles covered her nose, sprinkling faintly across rose-touched cheeks, and when she smiled, she dimpled, making her appear all the more youthful and innocent. Ketsui had met Shizuka's adoptive mother only once, but had been struck by the strong resemblance between them. He had commented on it, but Shizuka had simply laughed and shaken her head, as if she had heard the same thing many times before. She did not talk much about such things, either in public or in private, but Ketsui felt sure that some genetic connection must exist between the two women, or an amazing coincidence had taken place. Shizuka's brother Inori bore very little resemblance to his sibling, nor did he have the potent spirit power that hinted at much grander blood connections, but it was a subject on which Shizuka preferred not to linger, and, as her friend, Ketsui respected her right to privacy. After all, as he knew to his own cost, there were many in the Districts with complicated Clan connections lurking like skeletons in their closets.

"We had a small accident," she said unnecessarily now, gesturing to the scattered fragments of wood. "I don't suppose you came to help me clean up?"

"No, I came with an errand from my Captain — and he wanted me to ask for your help," Ketsui shook his head, stepping into the chamber proper. "What on earth happened? Those are bokken, right?"

"They were. Now they're firewood," Shizuka said pragmatically, sweeping them up into a pile with a swish that emphasised her point. "A couple of the recruits thought they'd do some private sparring without proper permission and without checking their equipment over first. As you can see, it didn't go all that well. It's a pain, because I wanted to use this area for some training of my own — but I wound up on clean-up duty instead, thanks to Fukutaichou."

"I heard that," Sora broke off mid-rant, turning to shoot Shizuka a warning look. "Oh, hello, Ketsui-kun. What brings you here?"

"Taichou's orders," Ketsui explained, bowing his head very properly towards the Vice Captain of the Eighth Division. "I'm sorry to interrupt — I didn't realise that erm, you were quite so..."

"Annoyed?" Sora's expression became rueful. 'It's all right. Shizuka's not really involved in all of this, so take her by all means. Someone else,' she paused, eying one of the quailing recruits meaningfully, "will finish up the sweeping, since it's better they learn right away that they clean up their own mess."

"Thank you, Fukutaichou," Shizuka's expressive face took on a look of relief. "I'll not be back late, I'm sure. We're only going to the central archive, so if you or the Captain need me for anything..."

"I'm sure we can spare you for a little while, but I'll keep it in mind," Sora assured her, waving her hands towards the door. "Go on, shoo, the pair of you, before I find you both chores to do. I've other things on my agenda for the day and I have someone I want to go visit before dark falls, so I don't have any time to waste fussing over you."

"We're going, we're going," Shizuka dimpled, grabbing Ketsui by the arm and pulling him back out into the courtyard. Once outside she sighed, flinging her arms around him and hugging him tightly, taking him off guard.

"Hey, what was that for?" he demanded, amusement in his eyes as he disentangled himself from her impulsive grasp. "We're going to the archive, remember? It's not going to be all that exciting."

"I know, but Sora-dono was very cross, and when she gets cross, she gives out the oddest and most annoying chores to the most random people she finds," Shizuka sighed, rolling her eyes. "I don't mind coming with you, since it'll be a break from everything here. This morning, Taichou had me checking out things in local villages but we didn't come back with anything — then, of course, Sora-dono is extra stressed since the Fourth Division officer you guys have convalescing at Thirteenth at the moment happens to be an old school friend of hers... so yeah, she's a bit rattled one way or another."

She dimpled.

"When she gets like that, she buzzes all over the place," she added pensively. "I can really believe her sword spirit is a firefly, when she's in one of these moods."

She paused, eying her companion quizzically.

"Are you all right? Shunsui-dono didn't say anything odd to you again when you came here, did he? I keep asking him to stop teasing you like you're my illicit lover, or something, but he finds it funny and then there's no reasoning with him."

"He did, but it doesn't bother me," Ketsui offered her a grin, inwardly sure that Shizuka was one of the few people who dared speak her mind to her Captain without being worried about repercussions. Shizuka had known Shunsui since she had been four or five, and had always considered him like proper family, a bond that had been reciprocated when her spirit power had begun to flare. After a couple of near misses with Hollows, she had gone to him for help, and Shunsui, true to his word, had brought the then eleven year old Shizuka more into his world, helping her to control her reiryoku and then, when she had reached fifteen, encouraging her to enrol at the Academy. Shizuka had been unsure at first whether or not to go, but Shunsui had convinced her and, glancing at her now, Ketsui knew he was eternally grateful to the Eighth Captain for that perseverance.

“He knows there’s nothing like that between us,” he added frankly, shrugging his shoulders. “He just likes to tease.”

“Mm,” Shizuka nodded, looking weary. “I know he does. I’m sure that, if he thought you or anyone was seriously after my attention, he’d be a lot less flippant about it. He likes to protect me from harm as much as he can, and sometimes it’s a good thing, but other times it’s downright annoying. I love him to death, of course — he’s the closest thing I’ve ever had to a father figure, and he did a lot for Inori-nii and I growing up — but sometimes having someone like that as your Captain is hard work.”

She shrugged, dismissing it with a flick of her hand.

“Well? Then it’s Tenichi-san that’s on your mind, then? Still no news?”

“Nothing,” Ketsui grimaced. “Everyone’s keeping me busy and telling me not to worry, but it’s impossible not to let my mind wander to worst case scenarios. I believe he’s all right, Shizuka, but...”

“I know. It’s like that, when you’ve no real proof of anything,” Shizuka agreed sympathetically. “So this is an errand to keep your brain busy, is it? I see. I’ll do my best to distract, then — though I’m not sure how successful I’ll be.”

“Taichou wants us to find out information about criminals in Lower Seireitei,” Ketsui reflected, as they left the Eighth barracks, crossing the short distance between it and the entrance of the Seireitei Central Archive. They paused to identify themselves to the guards on duty, before heading up the flight of steps and through the doors into the big, airy entranceway. “I don’t fully understand why, but I think it was something Edogawa-san said. You know, the lady from Fourth? Taichou seems to think it’s important, so probably it is.”

“It seems a bit of a stab in the dark to me, but I’ll run with it,” Shizuka’s expression became thoughtful. “Juushirou-dono has some far out ideas sometimes, but they usually pan out.”

“Yes,” Ketsui agreed, “though even he said that this might not have anything to do with anything important.”

“One way to find out,” Shizuka shrugged her shoulders, offering her companion a playful smile. “We’d better go dig through some books. Let’s see what the down-and-outs in District Seireitei have been up to, shall we?”

The Inner Conclave of Seireitei's Gotei Forces was surprisingly peaceful that afternoon, and, as the sun began its drop in the sky towards evening, Masaya paused to examine his route of entry a second time, ensuring that it was truly safe to cross and not a trap set for unsuspecting infiltrators. His suspicious and wary nature had been deeply ingrained into him by his years of service within the white-stone walls, but, although that life and that identity were long since considered dust, some shreds of self-preservation still lingered like instinct, automatically halting him before each obstacle.

They would not be able to see him. Camouflage had always been his greatest gift, and, since falling into Keitarou's hands, his skill had increased tenfold, to the point that now he could hide himself in plain sight and not be seen. A dark, humourless smile touched his thin lips at this thought.

If he'd had such skills when he'd been properly alive, he would never have been struck down in the first place.

Carefully he put gloved hands against the white wall that flanked Inner Seireitei's official main exit. Guards stood on duty on the inside, protecting the gateway from those who should not be there, but Masaya was knowledgeable enough about both them and their routines not to see them as a threat to his plans. Spreading his hands across the wall, he watched as, very gradually, his fingers began to turn to white to match the stone, slowly at first but then with growing speed as he pressed his entire form against the solid divide. At length all that remained was his eyes, two goldish orbs in a chalk-pale face. These were always the hardest thing to turn, he mused grimly, redoubling his efforts and focusing all his energy on bringing his rebellious features to heel. They were the last remnants in many ways of the old him, and, like that man, they lacked the flexibility of his new existence. It was as though they were stubbornly hanging on to their native colour, clinging to their pride despite the fact they were more a nuisance than a source of honour.

At length they relented, the irises paling as though someone had poured milk into them, blotting the true gemstone colour from view. Once done, he took a deep breath into his lungs, then, very slowly, he inched his chameleonic body across the divide, step by step, shuffle by shuffle until he was clearly in the guardsmen's line of sight.

They did not blink, intent on some card game that told Masaya more than anything how quiet the day had been. They did not notice the slight warping and shuffling of light against the high marble walls, nor did they see the shadow that peeled itself away from them as he reached the end, darting under cover of a nearby building and adjusting his appearance so that, in the shadow, he appeared as just another stretch of dark.

He could see the towers of the Second Division compound from here, its gold-gilt roof tiles announcing to the world that this was the pride of the Shihouin. If he squinted hard enough, he could make out the curve of the crescent moon that adorned the family's badge, and he pressed his lips together derisively, reminding himself that, despite their boasting and grandeur, there was nothing particularly exceptional about the family at all.

I am more stealthy than all of them, now, thanks to Keitarou-sama. I am the one who can slip in and out undetected and discover what I want to know at will, because of him. You don't know anything at all, Shihouin-ke, and you will pay for that ignorance. If Minami is right about the rumours she heard, I hope you'll pay quite dearly. If so, I wonder if Keitarou-sama will let me be in the vanguard. I have some things to settle with men of that Clan.

His golden eyes narrowed.

No, I must not become distracted. Those concerns are not Masaya's concerns — they, and any sense of vengeance belong to a dead man.

Revenge drove other people, warping and distorting their perceptions of the world until they made fatal mistakes. Masaya had learned from those things, and now, steered well clear of them. He would listen, watch, follow orders, but nothing more than that. He would play a part in Keitarou's revenge, kill, invade, spy, kidnap and much much more if it fitted Keitarou's plans, but he had no drive to begin a battle of his own. His only interests were in maintaining this free existence now he had found it, and in repaying Keitarou for giving it to him in the first place. As Minami had correctly said, these days his interests and his ambitions revolved around the exiled scientist, with all other concerns left to fall by the wayside.

I have higher orders now — and things I must find out. There's no time for nostalgia... I need to know whether Minami's words are true.

Pulling back the square wooden cover that concealed the underground sewage system from view, he slid his body deftly between the cracks, twisting and cracking his bones into a more fluid shape so as to slide down without removing the cover completely. They were alarmed, he knew, for the network connected to waterways beyond the white walls and, when the system had first been put in place, paranoid Council officers had seen it as a means for folk to slip into Inner Seireitei unannounced. The moment a cover was pulled completely from its resting place, a bell would sound, but Masaya only needed a gap of a few centimetres to slide his willing body into the inky blackness.

Despite being regularly cleaned by members of the Fourth Division, the dim tunnels smelled strongly of waste and dead animals, and Masaya wrinkled up his nose at the odour. Above ground, he reflected acidly, the Shinigami were fastidious about keeping things clean and polished but here, in this enclosed space, they went to the other extreme. The tunnel was divided into two slender walkways that flanked a greenish trickle of grimy water, which, for a reason he could not fathom, always smelled strongly of rotting fish. At intervals, ladders woven from rusting wire and wood hung, indicating a return path to the surface, though all the turns looked the same and there were no signs to tell someone down there which exit they had managed to choose. As he picked his way carefully along the narrow path, Masaya discovered the corpses of rats lying alongside discarded apple cores and other things he preferred not to spend time identifying. Glancing around him, he mused to himself how much more pleasant the abandoned Rukon valley was, if just for the fact it was less full of such toxic fumes.

Still, he was used to these tunnels by now, and for a short time at least, he could bear their pollution. Though they held no distinguishing features nor maps or guidelines, he knew that thirty paces north on the first tunnel would take him beneath the central concourse of Inner Seireitei and, if he took the first right there, a further ten and a half paces would lead him to the ladder that emerged in the most seclusion — behind the wooden barracks of what had once been the Council's assembly hall. Fifteen years ago, in keeping with all the changes that had seen Inner Seireitei become more and more the Gotei's central base, the powers that be had decided to waste money on building a new and sumptuous chamber for Council meetings and, as a result, the old one had been turned over to storage, the first floor being entirely re-partitioned to form what had quickly become the Gotei Library. Now, instead of documents being filed away within the core of each Clan, a copy of each important writ, report or genealogy was by law required to be held in this central location and, as a result, it had grown quickly, forming what was without doubt the biggest library and archive anywhere in Soul Society.

Because it was not a military barracks, nor the province of one particular Clan, it had less guards assigned to it, and these tended to stay at the front, monitoring the entrance as a token gesture of security. The rear of the building, where once Clan servants had lingered awaiting their masters from the meeting hall had now become overgrown and ignored, the sewer entrance all but hidden in the grass. This opening had not been fitted with an alarm, and it was this loophole in Seireitei's security system that Masaya's keen brain and sharp eyes had quickly picked out when he had first begun making these trips.

Entering Inner Seireitei was not without risks, and for that reason, Keitarou had only ever entrusted such missions to him, a fact he clung to with stubborn, singleminded pride. Masaya knew that Keitarou had at least one ally on this side of the wall, an informant who was better placed to give detailed Gotei information on a regular basis, but, try as he might, he had not worked out who this person was. Though he understood Keitarou's need to keep tabs on multiple things at once, Masaya was jealously resentful of the existence of this other who could walk even more freely than he among Soul Society's bigwigs. He would dearly like to confront them, even frame them in order to get them out of the way, but he had restrained himself, not wanting to alienate the one man who had believed in him and given him hope.

Keitarou did not need anyone other than him to do jobs like this, though, and he clenched his fists unconsciously, vowing to himself that, if this double agent ever put a foot wrong or looked like betraying Keitarou's enterprise, he, Masaya, would take a weapon and strike them down himself, regardless of consequences.

For now, though, he had other matters to attend to.

Emerging into the daylight, he hesitated for a moment, listening all around him for any sign that his infiltration had been detected. He could hear nothing, however, and, satisfied, he got to his feet, blurring his body once more against the wall of the old building and inching his way carefully around from the back to the front until the main courtyard was in view.

The archive was not just a place of study for the shinigami, but, Masaya had quickly learned, it was a place of gossip, too. Whilst slipping in and out of individual divisions was possible, he had soon realised it had higher risk and less profit than if he were to lurk around the public areas, eavesdropping on conversations between shinigami from different divisions, and putting together tidbits of information to report back to his master in Rukongai. This time, he reflected to himself, the slaughters in the Spiritless Zone would doubtless have sent shockwaves through every division, and, if he listened hard enough, he was sure that he would find out what he wanted to know. This was not a direct order from Keitarou, so it would not do to get caught — therefore the archive was the best place to begin his observations.

Two shinigami were approaching the complex now, he noted, both dressed in identical black and white, though the girl's shihakushou was peppered with dust as though she had attempted to clean it but not quite succeeded in making herself fully presentable. Her companion, pale eyed and fair haired struck him for a moment, so familiar was his appearance, and it took another couple of heartbeats before he understood that this young man, despite his appearance, was not an active member of the Urahara Clan. They were talking among themselves, unaware of his beady eyes watching them from the safety of his camouflage, and, as they mounted the steps, Masaya heard snippets of their conversation drifting across towards him on the wind.

Criminals from lower Seireitei, huh?

The golden eyes narrowed briefly for a moment, digesting this tidbit of random information, then, the next minute he heard a name.
Edogawa?

Masaya pressed his lips together, hardly able to conceal his triumph.

So someone had survived the rout, and more, it was someone Keitarou had not only known by name but deliberately planned to target.

Edogawa, huh? How ironic. To think that, most of all the healers, Keitarou-sama wanted her dead, and yet here are these young ones, talking among themselves about her in a way that indicates she among her companions must have survived. Someone was careless... doubtless someone will get punished when I report back.

He made to leave, then hesitated, sliding his eyeballs back in the direction of the retreating shinigami.

No, not yet. I know who lived, but I don't know what the shinigami are looking for or why, not yet. I ought to discover that before I go, else Keitarou-sama will just send me back to dig it up. Besides, if I can get one or both of those children of his into trouble, so much to the good. They may be his blood descendants, but they are by no means superior to me in any regard. If they made foolish errors, as children do, it will be my pleasure to report that fact in full to Keitarou-sama and allow him to deal with it as he sees fit.

A faint, humourless smile touched his cold features as he prepared himself to follow the fair haired shinigami and his brown haired companion into the archive.

Well, let's see what these young ones have to offer. Minami's lead is proving to be very interesting... I won't lose this chance to make Keitarou-sama see how much more reliable an agent I am than any other.

Author's Note: Magaki Shizuka

I wonder if anyone remembers her from Meifu? If not, let me refresh memories. Shizuka was the little mite being raised by Shunsui's half-sister Riri in the village in Eighth District. She was the daughter of one of Riri's close prostitute friends, and she and her brother had lived with Riri for most of their lives. Now, however, she's an adult and, as was hinted at in Fourth Maki, she has spirit power that far surpasses that of her brother or her foster mother. Consequently, although Riri is her mother figure, Shunsui has taken on a lot more of her mentorship since she hit puberty and the two have a very close bond.

Now where did all that mysterious spirit power come from, I wonder? ;)

Some readers might think that Shizuka's appearance is just a bit of random continuity from the Maki story, but actually her creation has a far deeper and more significant meaning. I'm not sure whether I'll get to cover it or not in this story — I guess we'll see — but let's just leave it at the fact she's significant to the future of Bleach canon in a rather emphatic way...

18. The Shadow In The Library

Chapter Seventeen: The Shadow in the Library

“Your Captain wasn’t kidding, was he, when he talked about it being a possible wild goose chase?”

Shizuka let out a heavy sigh, shutting the heavy volume of court records with a grimace and reaching up to rub her neck and shoulders ruefully. “I haven’t found anything of any use in District Four’s most recent records — seems like a pretty quiet region for crime, and certainly nothing like what you told me we were looking up.”

Across the table, Ketsui’s nose was buried in an equally thick, dusty tome, his brow creased in concentration as he read through passage after passage from District Six’s eyre court roll.

“Most of these records relate to petty thievery, or mundane crimes,” he said now, not even looking up from the book. “District Six’s legislation is making my eyes go a bit funny, to be honest — or maybe it’s my brain. The Kuchiki have so many hereditary land-holdings and traditional or customary regulations that it must be really easy to be in breach of one without knowing one even exists. I know Taichou grew up there, and he seems fond of the place, but honestly, reading this is making my head spin.”

“Let me see?” Shizuka leaned across the table, peering at the report. “Yeesh. The script is bad enough to begin with. The scribe must be verrrry highly educated, to insist on using all that fuddy-duddy kanji instead of kana like the rest of us normal people.”

“Well, I can about read it, but it isn’t helping,” Ketsui agreed, meeting her gaze with a pensive one of his own. “I guess there’s something to be said for Clan education over District — Mother did her best, and Father, before he died, and Ten-nii, and all the reading I did at the Academy increased my capacity, but there are still plenty of other characters I’ve never studied.”

“Most folk call those surplus to requirement,” Shizuka dimpled, shrugging her shoulders. “Shunsui-dono taught me to read and write, since Riri-nee was still learning herself when I was growing up, and he always intended for me to go to the Academy when I was old enough, even if I wasn’t sure about it back then. He taught me everything he thought I’d need to have, and he said at the time that he’d been forced to study at least half as many characters again, just for the sake of sating Clan pride.”

“Kyouraku-taichou isn’t a conventional Clansman, though,” despite himself, Ketsui grinned. “Anyhow, this isn’t getting us through the records, is it? Nothing I can see for Sixth, not for the last six months, at the very least. Taichou was very clear that the person we were looking to find was young or youngish, dark haired and male. Several of these records involve young women, and this one is a middle-aged alcoholic, so I don’t think we’re looking for him.”

“At least we can discard those records at a glance.” Shizuka agreed. “What exactly did Juushirou-dono say he’d done? Or is that the point?”

“I think that’s what we’re trying to find out, though don’t quote me on it,” Ketsui ran his finger down the edge of a yellowed page, skimming the contents before turning it over with a shrug. “Nope, definitely nothing in this one. He said that this felon — whoever he was, if he exists — escaped his bonds somehow and ended up in Rukongai.”

“How does that happen?” Shizuka pressed her lips together in consternation. “I thought you couldn’t get into Rukongai, let alone the Spiritless Zone, without special clearance.”

“I’m not sure that the security’s so tight on the bits they haven’t cleared for the Spiritless Zone project yet, but Taichou said it was information Edogawa-san gave him,” Ketsui shrugged. “I don’t know much about her, or whether she’s the kind of person that easily imagines stuff or gets them confused under stress, but he seemed to think it was worth checking out anyway.”

“Shunsui-dono told me about Edogawa-san,” Shizuka said thoughtfully. “He went to the Academy with her — they were classmates, like you and I, so he knows her quite well. Or, maybe, knew her — she’s been away a long time, so it’s hard to know which tense to use. I got the impression they were close friends, though, and he’s a pretty good judge of character. Probably there’s something to it.”

“Close? How close?” Ketsui pushed the Sixth District book aside, reaching for the next in the pile, and Shizuka laughed, tapping him playfully on the head before resuming her seat across the table and selecting her own book to read.

“You’re such a secret gossip, under that reserved, quiet exterior,” she teased him, amusement dancing in her dark brown eyes. “Not that kind of close. In fact, I got the impression that it was Juushirou-dono who was particularly close to Edogawa-san when they were at school. All unsubstantiated rumour, of course, and Shunsui-dono would never tell me anything like that about another Captain, not even unofficially.”

“Taichou has seemed very concerned about her,” Ketsui looked surprised. “I thought he was just being attentive, because what happened in Fourth was horrible. Is that why she ended up at Thirteenth, then? I thought it was because of Naoko-san being our Third Seat, but...”

“I wouldn’t like to speculate,” Shizuka said frankly. “The romantic intertangles of your and my superior officers are best left off-limits, to be honest. But I will say one thing — and that’s that our Vice Captain was ranting and railing about not getting in to see Edogawa-san right away. Shunsui-dono said that Sora-dono was Edogawa-san’s best friend at school... so if she wasn’t allowed access... but Juushirou-dono was...”

She trailed off meaningfully, and Ketsui pursed his lips.

“I guess sometimes it’s easy to see your Captain’s world as being everything in the Division,” he mused. “Ukitake-taichou is so focused on all of us and on making the Division like a family, I never thought he might have anything like that outside it. If that’s the case, though, of course he’ll trust her word. That means we need to try our best to find something — even if it’s just a confirmation that no such record exists.”

“Agreed,” Shizuka nodded, brown curls bobbing. “I’ll take Second District. You take Third.”

“Got it,” Ketsui assented.

“You never think of that as home, by the way?” As their reading progressed, Shizuka broke the silence once more, curiosity in her dark eyes.

“See what as home?” Ketsui put his finger against a line of characters to keep his place, shooting her a confused look.

“Third,” Shizuka responded. “Your Pa was from there, right? Don’t you ever feel a genetic tie to the Urahara and District Three?”

“Shizuka, I barely feel a connection to District Seven, and I was born there,” Ketsui said grimly, shaking his head. “I have no ties to the Urahara and it’s far better that way, considering there aren’t many among that Clan who’d want to acknowledge us anyway. Father was only a baby when his mother took him and left, and so even he didn't remember anything about what life was like there. Most of my life was spent in District Eight — and that's a fair distance away, not to mention completely different in terms of culture."

"I suppose that's true," Shizuka rested her chin in her hands, digesting this carefully. "It's interesting, though, how different people travel and spread their cultures and ideas across new areas. Nii-chan was all gungho about finding out who fathered him a few years back. Riri-nee wasn't all that keen on him doing it, and she told him there wasn't much chance of him getting a result, since she didn't know herself who Nii-chan's Pa was, but Nii-chan said he wanted to know. He'd had some conversation with traders when he was working at the market and it had made him wonder."

"Did he find anything out?" Ketsui asked, and Shizuka shrugged, shaking her head.

"Not really," she admitted. "He did find someone who'd lived in Teika-chou a long while... they remembered a young man passing through when Mother was working, and it would've been about the time Inori-nii was conceived. Didn't know much about him — thought he was involved in the fabric trade, though. No name, nothing like that... but it seemed to make Nii-chan feel better, to think that his Pa was a good upstanding citizen who just happened to spend a night with a courtesan when visiting the town."

She grinned.

"Good thing for Nii-chan that the guy did, else he wouldn't be around," she added matter-of-factly.

"You don't bother about things like that, do you?" Ketsui observed, and Shizuka's expression became sheepish.

"I know where I came from," she said simply. "I don't need to know more than that. I don't need to go chasing off around the country trying to fill in blanks. My roots are in Eighth, and everything I care about is from there. You are, too, in a way — you said yourself that you grew up more in Eighth than anywhere else."

"That's one of the things I like about spending time with you," Ketsui reflected. "I spent a lot of time as a small kid with a complex about the way I looked. People called me Urahara, and that was something bad when we were refugees — Kaa-chan used to get me to cover my head, so they wouldn't see and attack me. I never understood why having fair hair like Father was bad, not till I was a lot older. Maybe that's the strongest reason why I don't feel any part of me connects with District Three. As a kid, I was made to feel as though my appearance was a bad thing. Growing up in Eighth was hard but in many ways it was a relief — nobody there ever looked at me and considered me anything other than what I was.”

“Well, Eighth District is the best District, that’s why,” Shizuka said flippantly. “I may be a bit biased, but I can’t help it. I identify with there.”

“I guess I do too, though I remember living in Seventh,” Ketsui responded.

“It’s a different place now,” Shizuka reflected. “I expected it to have the biggest volume of criminal reports, but actually, it’s one of the smallest.”

“That’s because Endou-taichou’s zanpakutou is meant to be scary,” Ketsui said dryly. “I’m not really interested in finding out whether the rumours are true, and I’m sure the people of District Seven feel much the same way.”

“They do say prevention is better than cure,” Shizuka said primly, then she laughed, flicking pages over in her book. “I find it interesting how certain crimes crop up again and again in particular areas. This whole first section is about traders committing import infractions and not paying the proper dues to the Shihouin authorities.”

“That’s interesting?” Ketsui looked doubtful. “I’m reading about pick-pockets in the North of District Three... and it doesn’t really excite me.”

“Okay, so maybe interesting was the wrong word,” Shizuka conceded, “but who would’ve thought Second had such issues with illicit smuggling and underground trade? I wouldn’t have thought that Shihouin-taichou or Kai-dono would stand for anything like that.”

“People are always looking to be opportunists, though,” Ketsui said sensibly. “I guess they exist in every District — not just in Second.”

“True enough,” Shizuka agreed, idly turning back towards the very beginning of her volume. “I’m not finding anything in recent history that matches what Juushirou-dono wants, though. It would help to have more to go on. Even a name would help, but I guess Edogawa-san didn’t give that?”

“Nope, not as far as I know,” Ketsui chewed on his lip.

“Well, then how about this?” Shizuka frowned. “It’s a bit older than what your Captain said, and it doesn’t have a lot of details, but it does talk about a prisoner who escaped custody and disappeared.”

“Aging is subjective, depending on a lot of factors,” Ketsui cocked his head on one side thoughtfully. “How old is it, Shizuka-chan?”

“Ten years, give or take — do you think that’s too far back?” Shizuka looked doubtful. Ketsui sighed, shrugging.

“Dunno,” he admitted. “Give me the details, and I’ll see whether or not any of it rings true with what the Captain said.”

“All right,” Shizuka smoothed the sheet beneath her fingers. “If it is this one, though, probably we ought to just hand it over to Juushirou-dono and Shunsui-dono and stay out of it. It connects to the Onmitsukidou — and by connects, I mean it looks a lot like... an internal affair.”

“Someone dared betray the Onmitsukidou?” Ketsui looked stunned, and Shizuka nodded.

“And then some,” she agreed grimly. “Yeesh, and they believe in dry lists of kanji here, too. Listen to this. ‘Shihouin Central Court of Justice, Summer Convening. Presiding officer: Shihouin Kai, Onmitsukidou Soushireikan, oyobi Keigun Gudanchou. What the heck does all of that mean?’”

“Something to do with his rank, I imagine,” Ketsui said sensibly. “Soushireikan is the Shihouin’s own title for the head of the Onmitsukidou, I think — and I guess the other is the section he’s most directly involved in. What about the case?”

“Well, to summarise the long lists of people’s ranks, names, and goodness knows what else, one of the members of the Onmitsukidou — and not just any member, but an, erm... what was that word again? Oh yes, a Gudanchou, was arrested on suspicion of being involved in illegal trade rackets and other unspecified crimes in the region of Haruna-chou and the Third Division border,” Shizuka squinted, running her gaze up and down the page. “He was arrested, and tried for the crime... they found him guilty, and he was sentenced to death. He escaped custody, and was pursued. In the chase he was injured, but they never did manage to retrieve his body. Apparently Kai-dono was tied up with Clan stuff at the time, so this hearing was to fill him in on everything that happened in his absence. The report was given by someone called Kounou — I’m guessing that he was Kai-dono’s second in command, or something, judging by the ranks given here.”

“So a member of the Onmitsukidou tried to turn a quick profit, got caught, and managed to slip justice?” Ketsui looked thoughtful.

“No real detail at all. Not even a name, just the officer’s rank — ‘Riteitei Gudanchou’, whatever that means. Like I said, this is just a hearing. It’s not from the Onmitsukidou’s own judicial court, but from the official Shihouin-run one in the heart of Second District,” Shizuka shook her head. “It looks like Kai-dono summoned Kounou and some of his fellows to explain what happened, and, being that it was the Shihouin court, it had to be recorded in the public records — but in as few words as possible. There are probably more detailed records somewhere — but we’d almost certainly have our eyes poked out if we went looking for them. The Onmitsukidou is a scary organisation with way too many secrets to keep count.”

“Well, we can take it to Taichou and see what he says,” Ketsui pressed his lips together pensively. “It’s all we’ve found, after hours of going through records, so it might be worth digging into. To get into Rukongai, and to keep yourself hidden, you’d need to have pretty good reiatsu control, and that is something members of the Onmitsukidou tend to have — but I’m not sure. It doesn’t totally sound right to me.”

“It’s the best we got,” Shizuka said matter-of-factly. “Here, give me some of that spare parchment and I’ll copy out the salient points. My writing is neater than yours, and I want to make sure we report accurately.”

“Sure,” Ketsui pushed the pile of parchment across the desk. “I’ll put the other books back, while you’re doing that. It’s going to get dark soon, and, in light of everything, I’d prefer us both to be back at base barracks before the sun sets.”

“I know Tenichi-san is still missing, but it doesn’t mean we should hide. Quite the opposite, in fact,” Shizuka scolded. “I’ll walk back with you, though, if it’ll put your mind at rest. I’m not sure who’ll be protecting whom, but there’s safety in numbers.”

“Mmhm,” Ketsui pressed his lips together, but made no comment, instead turning his attention to filing the books back in their proper neat order on the shelves.

“I mean it, Ketsui-kun,” Shizuka glanced up from her writing, shooting him a reassuring grin. “Nobody’s getting kidnapped tonight, and we’ll nail the people who took Tenichi-san. I’m certain he’ll come back safely, so keep faith. All right?”

“I am,” Ketsui said shortly, ramming the rest of the volumes in place and dusting off his hands. “Look, just write it up and let’s get going, huh? I want to report to Taichou what we have or haven't found, so he can talk to Edogawa-san again, and I don't want to be seen to be wasting time. If all I can do at the moment is my duty, I'm going to do it right."

"Men," Shizuka sighed, but obediently bent her head to the parchment once more, scribing the characters briskly and neatly in her characteristic curved hand. "Almost done... there. Finished. All right, Mr Impatient — let's go deliver this to the powers that be and discharge that duty properly!"

Well, that had been informative.

Masaya pressed his body against the wall of the library, keeping entirely still as he watched the two young shinigami leave. They had not detected his presence, not even a little bit, and he had felt a flickering of contempt for their lack of observation skills. If he had wanted to, he could've tackled either of both of them, probably taking their lives before they had realised that he was even there, but Keitarou had not given him any orders to kill in Seireitei, and he had no mind to be drawing unwelcome attention to himself while he tried to get to the bottom of the rumours circulating in District Two.

The fair haired boy's distinctive appearance had continued to tweak at his mind, and he had rummaged around in his memory for a match, he had eventually dredged forth where he had heard the name Ketsui before.

Kotetsu Ketsui. The Tenichi boy's brother. The other one — the one Keitarou-sama chose not to bring to Rukongai.

Masaya's eyes twitched slightly, processing this.

He seems a shadow of his brother, and not like someone who would easily put up a fight. I risked injury bringing Tenichi-dono to Rukongai, but I'm sure I could have brought the other one with little risk. Still, Keitarou-sama's reasons are his own and I won't question them. Probably the fact the older one has spirit is the very reason he was chosen.

He slipped his gaze carefully from right to left, making sure that there was nobody within view, then letting out his breath, allowing his body to peel itself away from the wall and back into the chamber proper. Keeping his senses on the alert, he moved to the shelves, touching the books the young shinigami had been reading with gloved fingers.

The Shihouin Court, huh.

Fleeting memories, broken and piecemeal flooded his senses, but none of them sparked anything like the depth of feeling he had seen in Minami's eyes when she had spoken of the Onmitsukidou. If he thought very hard, perhaps he could remember Kai, but the faces of the others were slashed and broken into unrecognisable pieces, each one the same as the last.

His hand dropped back to his side.

I am not here for this. The Onmitsukidou and I have no connection, and I have no reason to go there. Coming here was a better idea. I've found out all I needed to know just from listening — people always talk more freely in a place they consider quiet and relaxed, and I've often learned useful tidbits about everyday life here without putting myself or my mission in any danger. It is still the best place to come for answers, without alerting any particular suspicions from those who come in and out. Keitarou-sama will be pleased — at least, with me.

A faint smile touched his worn lips.

My instincts were right about the name Edogawa. As I thought, she's the healer that Eiraki-sama once knew, and a person of interest Keitarou-sama has mentioned more than once. If the girl's gossip is true, I can understand why he wanted her dead so badly. She has a connection to Ukitake Juushirou, the Captain with such a reputation for meddling, and the man who's been investigating most strongly the behaviour of the Hollows. The attack in Rukongai has almost certainly distracted him, but not necessarily in the right direction. More, it sounds very much as though she saw her attacker. Given the kind of person those kids were looking for, it seems fairly evident to me where the blame belongs.

He slipped into shunpo, allowing his body to slide effortlessly through the channels of spiritual energy towards the Sekkiseki divide. He had no fear of being detected, for he had long since perfected the art of moving freely between locations without leaving the faintest trace of his presence. It was one of the more positive things he had taken from his past life, but, thanks to Keitarou's help, he was able to conceal himself entirely from prying eyes, ears and spiritual senses. I only bring Keitarou-sama the information he needs, and that which he asks for. If someone else gets into trouble because of my report, that's no concern of mine.

He spread his hands, watching as a narrow slit of shadow opened up between the fingers of his gloves. It was starting to get dark, and soon, he knew, the moon would rise in the sky over Inner Seireitei, casting the illustrious surrounds in its eerie silver glow. Masaya would not be here to see it, though. He had other things to do, in a place where sun and moon rarely deigned to show their faces at all.

If you can't carry out a task correctly, Katsura-sama, you should bow your head and offer your apologies to your father properly. There's no room in Keitarou-sama's plans for failure, and I am not going to protect you.

"I wondered how long it would be before you came."

As he slipped out of shunpo on the edge of the forgotten forest, Souja saw Joumei was waiting for him, his long silvery hair pulled back from his face in a loose braid from which wisps had been teased free by the evening breeze. Despite the fact they were in open territory, Joumei had taken no precaution to cover his face, and as the two men met gazes, Joumei smiled, a rueful expression on his pale face.

"Sometimes being a hooded nonentity makes you more obvious than if you just look like everyone else," he explained, reading Souja's question before it was asked. "I went to the local town for some supplies earlier, and decided to settle here and wait for you on my way back. You didn't send any word, but I thought you'd probably come after nightfall. There are less people abroad at this time — and I've scoured the perimeters. We're quite alone, I'm sure."

"You don't exactly look like everyone else, even dressed in ordinary peasant attire, but I guess it doesn't matter," Souja grinned, moving to clasp his friend's cool fingers in his. "I'm glad to see you, though. I was worried, ever since Father took that note."

"Mm," Joumei's brow twitched slightly, then he nodded his head. "First things first. Let's go below, shall we? We can talk more freely there. There's nobody abroad at the moment, but that doesn't mean nobody will cross through this way. Innocent or guilty, there's no reason for them to take note of your being here. You're obviously an Endou lord, even if you've removed all of your squad and Clan insignias, and a Clansman holding discourse with a peasant is likely to raise eyebrows in this region."

"You never do tame your tongue when talking to me, do you?" Amused, Souja obediently followed his companion into the dense woodland, allowing the more experienced Kitsune to lead the way deeper and deeper into the trees until it was difficult to see anything but wood and vine all around them. At the last minute, when Souja was sure they were about to become hemmed in by the greenery, Joumei grabbed him by the arm, pulling him down into the hidden tunnel entrance that led to the heartland of Kitsune territory.

"I never had to," he answered now, in response to Souja's teasing. "You're not my lord and master yet, in any case. Hirata-sama is that."

You're my ally, and, I hope, my friend — and I prefer not to stand on ceremony with my friends. As far as I'm concerned, we're of equal birth. I'm as pureblooded a Clansman as you are — only my Clan is a little different from yours, and took a few detours to survive."

"Your logic is, as ever, perverse yet flawless," Souja chuckled. "All right, I yield. I don't have a lot of time to spend chatting, as Father is uneasy about me coming here already. I'm to retrieve Tenichi and return as quickly as I can — unnoticed, if at all possible. He's worried I'll bring harm on you by being here."

"It's quite possible that Tenichi's being in this area is a trap," Joumei agreed evenly, calmly placing his hands against the first of several smooth rock divides that had been cut at jagged intervals into the rock path. When moved out of their proper alignment, they opened up further tunnels, several of which led to dead ends, and only those who lived among them knew with absolute certainty which paths were and which were not true. Even Souja did not know more than a few of the hidden trails, and so he kept close behind, moving only where Joumei did and keeping the silver-haired man's slim form keenly in his line of sight.

"You think so, too?" He asked now, ducking his head so as not to brain himself on a low hanging piece of stone, and Joumei nodded.

"I think it's probable, actually," he agreed pensively. "It's another reason I came out into the open bareheaded this evening. I hoped that, if anyone was around, I could lead them off my scent... but there was no sign of anyone at all."

"Not now, but there has been..?"

"Mm... perhaps," Joumei sighed, pushing against the final door and leading the way into a long, narrow chamber. "When Tenichi was found, Izumi thought someone was here, watching everything from behind a shield of Kidou. Tenichi has cuffs on — they're not Seireitei quality, but they're definitely operational, which suggests some kind of technical knowhow in the field of Sekkiseki among other metals."

"Father suggested that Tenichi was released because keeping him captive hadn't elicited the response the kidnapper hoped for," Souja's eyes narrowed. "Do you think so, too?"

"Yes," Joumei admitted. "I think that Tenichi's entire abduction may well have been to do with us, and for that I'm sorry. We've caused the Gotei unnecessary trouble — so in reparation, we'll do our best to find out who and why."

“No... Father doesn’t want you putting yourself in harm’s way,” Souja shook his head, and Joumei shot him a wry smile.

“We are Kitsune. We live underground. People already want us dead,” he said matter-of-factly. “Nagesu-sama doesn’t hunt us, but he hasn’t repealed the death sentence Rikaya-sama placed over the heads of our ancestors and any born of their blood, making us fair game to any Urahara who happens to stumble across us. On top of that, there are other, more sinister enemies from which we must keep concealed. Hirata-sama knows as well as I do that every day we live unmolested is no guarantee the next will be the same. There is always danger here. The difference is how much, and whether anything can be done about it. I plan on evacuating the bulk of the people here to a safer place in the not so distant future, but Izumi and I are more distinctive than most. We will stay here to cover their tracks, and, I hope, discover the artisan of this particular mischief at the same time.”

He ran his finger against the stone wall.

“You can feel it, can’t you? The Sekkiseki,” he added. “We’re going to go down deeper, so you might find it hard going. If you feel dizzy, tell me, and we’ll slow down — but I’ve had Tenichi held as deep below the surface as I’ve been able to, because I don’t want him and the Kitsune crossing paths if possible. They don’t know he’s here — only Izumi, Hiko and a couple of others I trust to be discreet. He’s only seen Izumi and I, and he has no idea where he’s being kept. I’d like to keep it that way.”

“I’ll manage. It won’t be for long, and I’ve been up against Sekkiseki before,” Souja assured his companion. “Tenichi isn’t affected by it?”

“The cuffs have suppressed his reiryoku, so he doesn’t feel the full effects at present,” Joumei explained. “Izumi’s been keeping him asleep a lot of the time, too. It’s easier that way — you have less questions to field and you create less meaningful memories. She’s with him now, waiting for us.”

“We’d better move more quickly, then,” Souja said pragmatically. ‘I’ll be all right,’ as Joumei eyed him doubtfully. “Really, if I can’t deal with a little rock rejection, I’m not much of a Vice Captain, am I?”

“Well, if you say so,” Joumei sighed, but nodded, taking a key from around his throat and pushing it into a small square gap in the wall. There was a shudder, and then the stone split, revealing what were clearly winding steps going down deeper into the bedrock. “Though to be honest, your being a Vice Captain might go against you, rather than in favour. Izumi and I are used to lurking down here. We've been here since we were little kids — but you're not quite the same as us."

"I might not be your lord yet, but I still have authority over retrieving one of my men," Souja said acerbically. "I'm coming, Joumei. Let's go."

Joumei shrugged, but made no further remark, instead stepping into the darkness and onto the first step. There was the sound of tinder scraping the wall, then a dim glow flared up around them, feeble but enough for them to see where they were putting their feet. Belatedly Souja remembered that Kidou lamps did not work down here, and so the Kitsune had evolved their own methods of keeping the place light.

Not that this part of their home was particularly light.

He followed Souja onto the winding stairwell, resting his hand against the wall to get his footing on the narrow steps. The feel of the stone burned against his fingers, prickling and pushing at him to remove his touch and he grimaced, forcing himself to bear the discomfort a little longer. Joumei was already some ten steps ahead of him, and as Souja cautiously followed, putting his feet on the widest section of the step he could, he felt the first dull hum of a headache begin to wash over him, the thrumming of lethargy making his limbs seem heavier and unwieldy. His brain buzzed and twisted slightly, causing him to pause to bring the path back into focus, and ahead of him the glow of Joumei's makeshift torch swung and darted all over the place like a giddy firefly, the only beacon in what was an oppressive, claustrophobic shaft down. His entire body was screaming at him to withdraw, sweat beading his brow as the effort to keep going began to take its toll on his air intake and his ability to regulate his own body temperature, and by the time he joined his companion at the foot of the stairwell he was breathing heavily, skin grey and pale and stomach twisting with nausea.

Joumei eyed him impassively for a moment, then he grimaced.

"I warned you," was all he said, however. "You can sit down inside, if you like — the cell isn't quite as bad as the tunnel, though there's no natural light or air, so it's a bit musty. It's where we usually lay our dead before we bury them — but since there are no corpses at the moment, it seemed the best place to keep Tenichi. Only Izumi and I have access to this chamber, so it was the safest place all around."

"Those... steps... are cut directly into... the Sekkiseki seam... aren't they?" Souja managed, swallowing hard against the bile that rose in his throat, and Joumei nodded.

“The mine was abandoned during the civil strife within your Clan a few generations back, then forgotten about,” he agreed. “It was never completely exhausted. Well, our safety relies on that fact, if I’m honest. Down here is as bad as it gets, though. We leave the dead here because they decay more slowly surrounded by Sekkiseki and it gives us time to prepare them properly for an Urahara burial.”

“I don’t... know... how you can... stand it... so easily,” Souja muttered, and Joumei grinned.

“We don’t, not really,” he responded. “We evolve to overcome it, but it kills us in the end. Like a cancer, the radiation eats away at us, and that’s not compatible with long-term life. We’re all tainted by it — probably far more than even we realise we are, if I’m honest.”

“There needs... to be a way... to change that.”

“Well, there does, but it isn’t obvious right now,” Joumei reached to open the door, then paused, resting a hand on Souja’s trembling arm.

“Souja-dono, I don’t want to alarm you, but we’re taking very seriously Tenichi-dono’s appearance here,” he said quietly. “A foe we thought had lost our trail may well have picked it up again, and used him as a means by which to do it.”

“A foe?” Souja forced himself to pay attention, gritting his teeth against the swirling, dizzy sensation. “Someone who’s... hunting the Kitsune?”

“Among other things, yes,” Joumei’s eyes became unreadable silver pools of light, then he nodded. “I don’t want you to report this to Hirata-sama yet, though. I think... it would be... insensitive if I were to be proven wrong, and paranoia is a trait I’m apparently blessed with. Living like this, I need to be.”

“All right,” Souja resisted the urge to sink back against the wall, inclining his head in a nod. “So you don’t want me to report that much to Father — is that the gist?”

“Mm,” Joumei rested his hand against the stone door of the funeral chamber. “You know the name Aizen, don’t you?”

“Aizen Keitarou?” Souja’s eyes were slits, the discomfort momentarily forgotten as he absorbed his friend’s words. “Of course I do. He abducted my aunt and he brought dishonour on the whole Endou-ke with his exploits, not to mention the fact he slew my Great Grandfather and threatened the lives of many, many more people during his time in District Seven. The stories about him are endless — and none of them good. He disappeared, though, and many seem to think him dead... you don't think so?"

"I think he's the one who took Tenichi, and who brought him here," Joumei admitted, and Souja's jaw dropped open with dismay. Joumei nodded.

"Izumi thinks so too. The Kidou she sensed left faint fragments of reiatsu in the atmosphere and she's been analysing them, trying to pinpoint their source," he continued grimly. "They're not identifiable to one individual, but they are compatible with Urahara reiatsu — something which we're intimately familiar with. More, for him to bring Tenichi to this area suggests some knowledge of the region and what goes on here. Aizen Keitarou had his base not far from here in the time he was working with Seimaru-dono and, maybe, beyond. And, finally, the quality of spirit cuffs that Tenichi is wearing made both Izumi and I suspicious. They're crudely made, true enough, but it's not the skill of the creator that's lacking. It's the quality of the materials. I realise I might be well off course — but the only person I can imagine who is still interested in hunting the Kitsune and who would go to those lengths to find us... is Aizen Keitarou."

"If you're that sure, I should tell Father," Souja protested, but Joumei shook his head, reaching up to put a finger on Souja's lips.

"No. Not yet. You mustn't," he murmured. "I've heard Hirata-sama talk about Aizen Keitarou with my father, and it's easy to tell it's not a subject on which the Wind Hawk can be rational. I'm sure that he wouldn't be able to hold back if he thought Aizen was at large, and right now we haven't proven my theory either way. Izumi took samples from Tenichi's clothing and she's testing them to see if she can figure out where he was held. In the meantime, I wanted you to know so you can keep your eyes and ears peeled for any more clues that might be decisive. When we have the results of Izumi's tests, I'll make sure you're the first to know — but for now, you must say nothing."

"You mean lie to my father?" Souja looked stricken.

"Perhaps it is lying," Joumei admitted, "but for the sake of the peace of District Seven, for now it needs to be. I don't think for one moment that Aizen Keitarou — if it is him we're dealing with — is hiding out here. However, if this is the only clue Hirata-sama has..."

"No, I know. You're right, I know," Souja rubbed his temples, the ache returning to his head as he digested all of this. “All right, for now, I’ll say nothing. When you have Izumi’s results, perhaps then the situation will change — and I’ll do what I can to see if I can find out anything more. What about Tenichi? What has he said?”

“He says he doesn’t remember anything about anything,” Joumei said sardonically. “It’s very convenient for him, but neither Izumi and I have found a loophole in his story.”

“The other abductees didn’t remember anything, either,” Souja sighed, “and Tenichi is an honest man. I don’t believe he’d lie, not about something like this.”

“Perhaps he wouldn’t. I don’t know him well enough to be sure,” Joumei conceded. “I do know one thing, though, and that’s that Kotetsu Tenichi is also an Urahara by blood. Like Izumi and I, he’s the descendant of one displaced by Keitsune-dono’s experiments — but unlike Izumi and I, his father was Keitarou’s ally. I don’t know yet whether that means something or whether it doesn’t — but when we found Tenichi, he was at his father’s grave. The father that, according to popular fame, Keitarou buried.”

“You think Tenichi would turn against Soul Society?” Souja paled, and Joumei pressed his teeth together in a tight smile.

“I don’t know anything, and thinking can be dangerous when you don’t know,” he said at length. “It may be that he really does know nothing at all. He might never have met Keitarou, and Keitarou might not be involved. Tenichi said that he knew where Daisuke-sama’s grave was because a classmate of his told him where to find it, and as far as I’m aware, his story rings true. I have no evidence by which I can suspect him of anything except being a victim of circumstance. Just, if Keitarou is involved in this, it’s always worthwhile being on full alert. It won’t hurt to keep tabs on Tenichi — even if he’s innocent, it’s better to keep him safe. He might be targeted again, and the outcome might be worse.”

“I suppose that’s true,” Souja acknowledged. “I haven’t worked with him as much as my sister, so I don’t know him as well as others do, but he came to us with the recommendation of Ukitake Juushirou-dono, and that to me is a seal of the man’s honour as a shinigami and a member of the Gotei. Still, it’s possible he’s been used as a puppet without his active knowledge, and may know things he doesn’t realise he knows.”

“Exactly,” Joumei looked relieved. “I’m glad you understand.”

He smiled ruefully.

“I haven’t told him who we are, not even our names, so it’s quite impossible for me to explain to him why he should be our ally, not our foe,” he reflected pensively. “I wonder if he knows anything at all about his father, and all the things he did whilst he was still alive.”

He paused, then,

“One other question, by the way, before we go in.”

“Go ahead,” Souja nodded, his brow creasing in confusion. “What’s up?”

“Tenichi mentioned someone called ‘Kirio’. Do you know who that might be?”

“Kirio?” Souja blinked, then grinned. “Maybe you’re letting your paranoia get the better of you too often, Joumei-kun. Kirio is Hikifune Kirio-san, an old school friend of Tenichi’s and an officer in Ukitake-taichou’s Thirteenth Division. There’s nothing sinister in that connection. I think she and Tenichi may have known each other from when they were small — but I only know the things I’ve heard from other people.”

“That wasn’t why I asked,” Joumei’s expression became thoughtful. “Tell me, about how old is she, this Kirio? The same age as Tenichi..?”

“More or less,” now Souja was bemused. “I don’t understand, though. What has Kirio-san to do with anything?”

“It doesn’t matter. Just curiosity — tying off leads,” Joumei offered a smile, but it was a faintly guarded one, leaving Souja unconvinced that the question had been quite such an innocent one. “We’re wasting time, anyway. You want to take your officer back, and it would be better done before dawn.”

He turned to the lock of the door, unfastening it carefully before hauling it back and ushering Souja into the chamber beyond. The Vice Captain took tentative steps, the world around him hazing and shuddering slightly, but, as he stepped under the domed ceiling he felt the most oppressive level of Sekkiseki aura ease a little and he let out his breath in a rush, relief touching his expression.

From the corner, a small, cloaked figure got to her feet, bowing her head respectfully towards him, and Souja managed a smile, reaching out to take Izumi’s gloved hands gently in his dusty ones.

“Izumi-chan. You look well — I trust you are?”

Izumi’s expression became ironic, and she nodded, fluttering her hands together in brief, brisk syllables. Though Souja did not speak the sign-language his friend's younger sister used to communicate with any fluency, he knew enough signals to make sense of her words, and he laughed, inclining his head ruefully.

"Yes, I suppose right now I look worse for wear than you do. I'm not as hardy to Sekkiseki as I'd like to be."

Izumi patted him reassuringly on the arm, then slid her fingers through his, leading him the short distance across the chamber to the white marble funerary bier. A figure lay sprawled across it, his body covered with a worn blanket, but as soon as Souja reached the man's side he recognised the grimy features as that of his subordinate officer, and he let out a heavy sigh of relief.

"I told you we had him," Joumei's voice at his right shoulder made him jump, and he turned, nodding his head.

"I know, and I trust you, but it's my duty to retrieve him, and I'm glad to see him for myself, safe and well."

"His sword is upstairs," Joumei explained, as Izumi removed the blanket, revealing the dust-covered shihakushou and the threadbare, torn obi at the shinigami's waist. "We thought it best it didn't come down here with him — partly because he might have tried to use it on us, but mostly because bringing an active zanpakutou down here would probably do it serious harm. It's Tenichi himself who is sealed, not the sword — so we played it safe."

"He's sleeping very soundly," Souja's fingers ran along the grey cuffs that encircled Tenichi's wrists. "These are the cuffs you mentioned?"

"They are," Joumei nodded. "We've examined them all we could, so you can take them with him and see what you discover from them. I don't recommend removing them until you leave here, though. If he had a rush of spirit power back through him at this depth, the heavy aura would probably make him quite ill."

"Can we wake him up?" Souja wondered, glancing at Izumi, who nodded her head. She moved to the end of the bier where Tenichi's head lolled against the white stone, resting her hand gently across his brow. For a moment nothing happened, then the sleeping shinigami let out a murmur, his lashes twitching as he emerged slowly from his heavy slumber.

"He'll probably be a bit drunk and disorderly for a while," Joumei warned. "I'll help you get him to the surface, since you're in no fit state to do it on your own, but once you're there, it'll be up to you to manage getting him back to Seireitei. It won't do him any permanent harm, but he'll be a bit groggy for a couple of hours as it wears off."

"He's alive, so that's forgiven," Souja assured him. "Well, Kotetsu-hasseki? Are you ready to go report back to your Captain about your recent activity?"

"Fu..ku... taichou?" Tenichi's words were blurry and indistinct, and he rubbed his eyes as if unsure what he was seeing. Souja laughed, as Joumei hauled the dozy shinigami into a sitting position.

"I've been sent to take you back," he said simply. "Can you stand? We'll go at once... this isn't a good place for you or I to linger."

"Where... are we?" Tenichi glanced around him, and Souja patted him lightly on the shoulder.

"Somewhere you need never come again," he promised. "Get up. We'll find your sword and then we're due back at Seventh. Kikyue is worried about you and Father will want to speak to you at some length, I expect. Getting yourself abducted is not a smart thing for someone of your rank — so you better ready yourself for whatever he has in store for you — understand?"

"I... don't care," Tenichi wetted his lips, reaching out to grab Souja's arm tightly as he pulled his unsteady body to his feet. "I... want to go... back home."

"Good, because so do I," Souja said categorically. He cast Joumei a glance.

"Could you have someone retrieve Tenichi's sword?" he asked quietly. "I can get him up stairs on my own, but we can't leave without that."

"Whatever you say," Joumei bowed his head mock-respectfully, then exchanged looks with his sister, who let out a heavy sigh but obediently left the room. "I'm going to help you up, though, if only because I don't want to answer to Hirata-sama if you have broken bones at the end of this trip."

"You... the man who spoke to me... before?" Tenichi blinked at Joumei, who sent him a wry glance.

"You'd do better to forget you ever saw me, friend," he said frankly. "It's considered bad luck... those who meet us often find their lives cursed."

"Cursed?" Tenichi blanched, and Souja sighed, shooting Joumei a dark look.

“They’re Father’s allies, and that’s all you need to know,” he said firmly. “No more questions, Tenichi. We have a steep climb and then a long trip back to where we belong — better you focus on that than on things that don’t matter.”

“Hrm,” Tenichi did not make any further attempt to speak, his attention occupied with the effort of moving forwards. As Joumei had said, he was unsteady on his feet, wobbling and stumbling from side to side before he managed to reach the doorway of the chamber. Joumei was ready for him, though, and grasped him by the arm, pulling him unceremoniously through the gap and then waiting for Souja to follow suit. The Vice Captain did so, taking a deep breath to ready himself for the onslaught of Sekkiseki radiation, but going back up he found was not so difficult as coming down had been. Knowing that fresh air and moonlight awaited them gave him added strength to complete his task and, by the time Izumi rejoined them, sword in hand, they were at the cavern’s main entrance. Izumi handed the weapon over without a word, bowing her head solemnly towards both Souja and Tenichi, then disappearing once more into the blackness. Joumei hesitated for a moment, touching Souja on the arm, as if to remind him of the conversation they had had in the bowels of the Sekkiseki mine, and Souja nodded his head, unspoken confirmation of the promise he had made. Then he too was gone, leaving Souja and his dazed officer alone in the black woodland.

It was Tenichi who broke the silence, rubbing his temples furiously as though trying to process his thoughts more clearly. “Who were those people? Why... how..?”

“Father’s allies. Our allies,” Souja said briskly, gesturing for his companion to sheathe his weapon. “If you ask any more questions, you’ll get us both into trouble with the Captain, so I suggest you just count your blessings that they found you and were able to alert us to that fact. What matters more right now is getting back to Seireitei, and then, probably tomorrow, you’ll be called to report before him to explain what you can of what you remember. You’ve been missing several days — and a lot of people have been worried about you.”

“Ketsui!” this sparked life in the pale gaze, and Souja nodded, glad to see this sign of his companion’s clarity already returning. The night was fresh and clear, helping to eradicate the lingering effects of the Sekkiseki from his own system, and for a moment he just relished the gentle breeze that teased past them on its journey through the trees.

“Him especially,” he agreed, “but not just him. As I said, getting abducted isn't a wise act for an officer of your rank."

"I know," Tenichi's eyes became clouded, and he lowered his head in a meek nod. "I'm sorry, Fukutaichou. I guess I've caused people a lot of trouble, haven't I?"

"Yes," Souja said frankly, "but we'll repair some of that by making good time back to Seireitei. I don't want to try removing those cuffs — I think it should be done by an expert — and I'm a little tired myself, so that rules out shunpo. We'll have to take the back roads and hope we're at base before dawn. I told the Captain I'd return as quickly as possible, and I don't want to let Kikyue run my drills as well, not if I can help it."

"Is... Kikyue-dono... very angry?" Tenichi asked hesitantly, as the two men fell into step, picking their way through the dense undergrowth towards a clearer track that led in the direction of one of the local villages. At the apprehension in the Eighth seat's voice, Souja grinned, clapping his companion on the back as though it were he, not Tenichi who were the elder and more experienced officer.

"She's not happy," he agreed, "but she'll get over it. The most important thing is that you're alive and in one piece."

He sent the other man a sidelong glance, then,

"It would please everyone most of all, of course, if you can give us any clues as to what happened. You must've been grabbed within Inner Seireitei — which causes concern for everyone, security wise. If there's anything you can tell us — or tell me, now, whilst we're travelling, and I'll broach it with Father when he's calmer — I advise you do it. It may prove important — other lives might be at risk. Yours isn't the first abduction, but we want it to be the last."

"I agree," Tenichi's lips thinned, and for a moment Souja could not tell what the young man was thinking. Then, after a few moments, the Eighth seat sighed.

"I remember very little," he admitted, a note of defeat in his tones. "What I do remember is blurred and doesn't make a lot of sense. Someone grabbed me... I was on my way back from Thirteenth to report in with Kikyue-dono, and someone took me off guard in the dark. I didn't see their face, and they had cuffs on me before I could draw my sword or fire any kind of Kidou. Then..."

He shrugged helplessly.

"Can you remember where exactly that happened? If you walked it again with Kikyue or I, would you be able to pinpoint the place?"

Souja quelled his disappointment, focusing his attention on what his subordinate had said. Tenichi pursed his lips, then nodded.

“I think so,” he agreed. “I think I was just around Twelfth. I hadn’t gone far. I certainly hadn’t reached the central compound and I was nowhere near Seventh when it happened.”

“And you don’t remember how you were taken? You were knocked out at that point?”

“It sounds crazy,” Tenichi let out a deep sigh. “I thought that it was a Senkaimon, but that’s not possible, is it? District rebels — if that’s what they were — can’t operate Senkaimon, and certainly not without Seireitei knowing about it. If that had happened, you’d have been able to trace me more quickly, so I’m sure I’m wrong.”

I’m not so sure.

Souja bit his lip, a thoughtful expression touching his clever gaze. He said no more, however, nodding his head to indicate he accepted Tenichi’s statement. All the time, though, he watched his companion’s reactions like a hawk. Was that the faintest sign of relief in the man’s eyes? Had the tension left Tenichi’s body a little then, as though he had unburdened himself of something important?

“Kotetsu Tenichi is also an Urahara by blood. Like Izumi and I, he’s the descendant of one displaced by Keitsune-dono’s experiments — but unlike Izumi and I, his father was Keitarou’s ally.”

Joumei’s words echoed through his thoughts once more, and he frowned, narrowing his eyes.

I don’t think Tenichi is the kind of officer to be swayed by sweet words, and especially not the kind to turn traitor. He’s always had those roots, and it’s never been an issue before. I don’t think he’s a traitor... but as Joumei says, it won’t hurt to keep my eye on him a little more — as much as I’m able without generating anyone else’s suspicions.

Out loud he said,

“You don’t remember where you were held?”

“I woke up alone in District Seven,” Tenichi said simply. “I was in that forest... near where Father is buried. I was at his grave when... whoever those people were... they came and... did something to me. I’m still not sure what exactly that was, but...” he rubbed his brow again, “I feel as though I’ve slept for a week and all my thoughts are in backwards order. If you say I’ve been missing some days, that might explain it.”

“That’s probably the effect of wearing those cuffs long-term,” Souja lied, inwardly resolving not to give Tenichi any more information about the Kitsune or their Sekkiseki home. “We’ll get someone from Fourth to look at you and make sure it’s all right to remove them both at once.”

“Fukutaichou, that man... the silver haired man, he said that people in Fourth had been killed,” now Tenichi’s dismay was clearly genuine, and Souja felt his doubts and hesitations settle at the obvious anxiety in the other’s eyes. “Is that true? Were people really...?”

“Eight officers in the Spiritless Zone,” The Vice Captain nodded his head grimly. “Three more survived, though two suffered some injury and the third exhausted herself keeping her comrades alive. What exactly happened isn’t entirely clear — I’m sure the Captains know more than I do, but it’s a delicate subject and probably not one I should be discussing with someone of lower rank in too much detail.”

“No, I suppose not,” Tenichi conceded. “I’m sorry. I just... I maybe hoped it wasn’t true. I thought perhaps he’d made it up to scare me, but...”

“Men like that don’t need to use lies to frighten folk,” Souja said dryly. “Think no more on it, Tenichi. You had no responsibility or involvement in what happened in the Spiritless Zone, and even if you had been on duty, there’s nothing you or any of us could have done to prevent it.”

“I know, but the slaughter of shinigami is...”

“Distressing. I know,” Souja nodded. “That’s why I’m relieved to be bringing you back in one piece. You might not have been a member of Seventh since you recruited, and you might not be Endou, but you’ve made your mark among your colleagues and the division has been incomplete without you. The best thing you can do, if its possible, is put this behind you and look forward to what you can do to help. A lot of the younger ones are jumpy because of what’s happened, and if they see you’re fine and back to yourself, they’ll calm down.”

“It’s what I want to do too, sir,” Tenichi assured him fervently, nodding his head. “I want to forget this past week ever happened. I wish I could tell you more about what did — but at the very least, I want to get back into the swing of the division and catch up with what duties I’ve missed.”

“Good man,” Souja grinned, warmth lighting up his gaze. “If that’s the case, Kikyue will probably not rip you to ribbons. As for the Captain, tell him whatever you can remember. I don’t suppose he’ll be surprised if there are gaps in your knowledge, but even the little you told me just then about where you were abducted might prove useful in some small way. When you've debriefed, though, I'm serious about putting it behind you. It's over, and you can consider it the responsibility of those of us ranking higher to handle any investigation."

"Yes, sir," Tenichi bowed his head, and for a while they walked in silence, the occasional hoot of a distant hunting owl acting as the only accompaniment to the sound of their feet rustling through the long grass.

"You know, you've never mentioned your father's burial place before," they were approaching the borders of Inner Seireitei and the sun was beginning to set up a hazy red glow across the horizon as Souja ventured a new topic of conversation, casting Tenichi a curious glance. "I didn't know he'd died in Seventh."

"Mm," Tenichi's expression became momentarily hunted, then he sighed, shaking his head. "Ketsui and I were born there. We left when... well, we left, and moved to Eighth, but Father... never did. He died in Seventh when I was about eight or nine."

"I see," Souja pursed his lips. "Is that why you agreed to come to Seventh Division? Because you're from Seventh District originally?"

"Maybe," Tenichi grimaced. "Is that a bad reason? I wanted to find Father's burial place, and I thought, if I was with Seventh, I'd end up in the right kind of areas to find it."

"It sounds as though you managed to do so, by coincidence," Souja remarked lightly, and Tenichi flinched, then nodded.

"It was only because I knew where Father was buried on the maps that I realised I was in Seventh District at all," he said slowly, but Souja could see the consternation in his companion's eyes, and once more his own doubts began to raise their heads, buoyed by Joumei's words. "I recognised the stretch of forest. An old friend of mine was there, when he was put in the earth, and so she... and I was able to... to work it out. I... I'm sorry, I never said anything about it before."

He lowered his gaze, like a penitent child expecting rebuke, then,

"I like Seventh," he added softly. "Everything has been exactly as I've wanted it to be, leaving Thirteenth. I didn't know if that would happen, but it has. I might have come to Seventh looking for Father's burial place, but... but I'm glad I transferred and I... I am loyal... to the Captain... all the same."

“You were very young when you lost him,” Souja decided to play dumb, focusing instead on his companion’s earlier words. “I can’t imagine what it must be like to lose your father so young — and never have him know all the things you’ve achieved in your life.”

“Yes,” Tenichi seemed relieved by the turn of the conversation, nodding his head again. “I’m old enough that I remember him clearly, but you’re right, sir. He never saw me become a shinigami, and when I graduated the Academy, he wasn’t there. Not even knowing where he was buried left a gap inside of me, and I wanted to fill it. You don’t think that’s a bad thing?”

“All sons owe loyalty to their fathers,” Souja said with a wry grin. “Even if those fathers are no longer of this world. I’m sorry you’ve been through all you have, Tenichi — but I’m glad that, if it had one benefit, it allowed you to locate your father’s final resting place.”

“Yes. Yes, me too,” Tenichi agreed fervently.

“That said, I’m going to have to ask you not to return there any time soon,” Souja added, and Tenichi stared at him in surprise.

“Fukutaichou?”

“That area of Seventh is high risk, and I would rather not lose you again,” Souja pressed his lips together, ignoring the dismay that had flared in his subordinate’s eyes. “I’m sorry, since it’s obviously a place of pilgrimage for you, but as your Vice Captain, I have no choice. You must not go back there — and you certainly must not try to tell your brother or take him there. It would be seriously frowned on if you were to disobey that instruction — and if I’m more lenient in my judgements, the Captain would not be. Do you follow?”

“Yes sir,” Tenichi’s eyes darkened with something that might have been frustration, but he bowed his head in acceptance, and Souja sighed.

“I’m sorry that it means taking your father from you again when you’ve just found him,” he said softly, “but I must give priority to the living, and not the dead.”

And I want to keep you away from the Kitsune, no matter what.

As they reached the Inner Seireitei border, Souja saluted the guards on duty, who returned the salute, allowing both men to pass into the inner conclave and onto the narrow, white-stone pathway that led to the central concourse of Shinigami administration.

If you were to go trying to find out about them, it would cause everyone problems. More, if you were to be seen frequenting the grave of someone executed by the Endou for treason, it might create ripples that would be hard to suppress. Whatever did or didn't happen to you over the last week, Tenichi, I hope you'll follow my advice. If Keitarou was the one who took you, and if he was the one who led you to Daisuke's grave, have the sense to let it go now. For your sake, and for Father's, I hope it was not — but if that man is involved, Joumei's words about being cursed might just come to fruition. As Vice Captain of the Seventh, my duty is to keep my squad safe and to protect my men as much as I can. That means keeping you away from dangerous people and threats you might not have perceived... no matter what the cost.

19. Secrets

Chapter Eighteen: Secrets

“You know, if you keep pulling all-nighters, you’re going to end up with another fever.”

Shunsui settled himself more comfortably beside Ugendou’s open window, leaning back against the wood and closing his eyes slightly as a gentle, warm breeze fluttered between the slats, filling the chamber with the pleasant scent of evening blossoms. “Come to think of it, I might wind up with a fever too, considering I’m here humouring you like this. What exactly is so critical that it has to wait till your division have trotted off to bed to discuss, Juu-kun? I’m used to your random whims, but this one is stranger than most.”

Juushirou padded across the tatami mat floor, removing his haori from his shoulders with a sigh and hanging it up on the hook beside the door. “I’m grateful for you coming to follow up this whim, by the way. It involves you too, as it happens — I assume Shizuka-chan did report to you on her findings in the archive?”

“She said that they’d not had a lot of luck, but that she’d written up a few notes and Ketsui had brought them here to you,” Shunsui watched his friend languidly from beneath hooded lids. “Stop pacing and come sit down at the very least. Whatever’s on your mind, let’s discuss it then put work aside for the evening, huh? I still owe you a shougi rematch from the last time, and sake always tastes better at midnight.”

“I don’t have any alcohol in here, so you’ll be disappointed if that’s your plan,” Juushirou grinned, obediently taking his familiar seat behind the desk and settling his shihakushou so that the folds of cloth did not dig into his skin. “I know it’s never wise to keep that kind of thing in here — especially not when you’re coming to visit me. You get easily distracted if there’s sake on offer, and I want to talk seriously about something that needs your full attention.”

“I knew you’d say that,” Shunsui sighed heavily, then slid the fingers of his left hand into the right sleeve of his haori, pulling out a small ceramic bottle and setting it down on the floor between them. “I also planned ahead, and brought emergency rations with me. I'll share it with you, Juu-kun, so don't look at me like that — but if you want, we can talk shop first, and drink later."

"So much for a day of sobriety and abstinence," Juushirou remarked pointedly, and Shunsui shrugged.

"Midnight marks the beginning of a new day," he said unrepentantly. "Besides, everyone's under pressure. They deserve it — and there's not enough here to go mad with. Just a nice, friendly tipple to round the evening off — that's all."

"I should've known," Juushirou rolled his eyes, but there was amusement in his gaze and he nodded, pulling a folded sheet of parchment from his obi. "All right, I suppose that's fair. If it's Kyouraku sake, then I imagine it'll be good quality, and a few sips before bed won't hurt."

"That's the spirit," Shunsui said approvingly, nodding his head. "Well? Why did you call me here now? Why not wait till the morning? I know time is of the essence, but even so..."

"Because it's not something I want to talk to the whole division about," Juushirou admitted, smoothing the sheet of parchment and holding it out to his companion. "I've already told Ketsui not to discuss his findings with anyone, not even Enishi. It might be nothing, but as soon as I saw what kind of details Shizuka had taken down, I figured you ought to be aware of this too. Read her notes and see what you think."

"Let me see," Shunsui reached out a lazy hand for the parchment, taking it and squinting at the columns of characters that dotted the page. "Hrm. I see. So Ketsui and Shizu-chan stumbled on something relating to the Onmitsukidou, did they? That was a bit daring of them... though I didn't think that the Onmitsukidou recorded their private dealings in the Shihouin court."

"Ditto, which is why it struck me as something worth looking at," Juushirou admitted. "I don't know as it connects to what Mitsuki told me, though — there are just too many loose ends flapping around and I don't like it. I want to find some answers, but everywhere I look I see more questions."

"You're thinking of this Onmitsukidou person still being alive, then, I presume?" Shunsui arched an eyebrow, and Juushirou nodded.

"It occurred to me that someone like that would have a grudge against the Onmitsukidou, if he crossed them and they caught him," he agreed. “That led me to wondering whether or not he’s the missing link in the chain between Tenichi’s disappearance and the infiltration of Inner Seireitei in the first place. I don’t know anything about this case — but I do remember that, when Midori-sama’s daughter was born, Kai was called back to the Shihouin manor to take care of things there. That would’ve been around ten years ago, which is when Ketsui said this record was from. If something happened then, and Kai called it to the Shihouin court, it must’ve been a big deal. Otherwise he’d have let his subordinates handle it. That implies someone with some power and responsibility crossed lines they shouldn’t have — and that kind of person would be well equipped to slip into Inner Seireitei undetected and abduct a shinigami without leaving any evidence behind.”

“Not to mention opening a defunct Senkaimon,” Shunsui murmured, and Juushirou nodded.

“I’m working on that premise,” he agreed. “It seems convenient that this report comes from ten years ago, and the gate was sealed around that time, too. Besides, I can’t see any other means by which it was done. My only stumbling block was how someone would have unlocked the gate without alerting the Urahara — but if it was a member of the Onmitsukidou, albeit a disgraced one, he might have his ways.”

“It’s true that the Onmitsukidou have special clearance to use the gates without their spirit power being actively logged by the Urahara,” Shunsui nodded, setting the sheet of parchment down on the floor. “Kai told me that Midori-sama negotiated it with them back when she set the organisation up. It means that admission to the Onmitsukidou is strictly regulated, though. Only the most elite and loyal candidates are allowed to enrol, and they have tough training regimes in order to suppress their reiatsu and use it to move undetected around Seireitei. If any of them rebel or break even the most insignificant rule, the penalty could easily be death. It’s a harsh, strict set of regulations — but its necessary, given the freedom of movement they have.”

“This one broke some rule or other, and paid for it,” Juushirou said grimly. “If he was killed, they wouldn’t have bothered removing him from records, since there’d be no point. If he wasn’t dead, he would still be able to move freely — the trouble is, proving that he is — if he is the one we’re looking for at all.”

“Did you mention this to Hirata, yet?” Shunsui wondered. ‘He’s still convinced there’s an inside source, and although this is in some ways still “inside”, it might put his paranoid little hunter’s mind a bit more at rest.”

“I’m waiting for him to appear,” Juushirou admitted. “I sent a message to him earlier on, and had one back to say he was coming, but so far, he hasn’t. I don’t know if something has occurred at Seventh, but...”

“More likely he’s making sure all his regulation shinigami are where they should be before he leaves for here,” Shunsui said wisely. “He’ll probably need more sake than the both of us, given his stress levels of late.”

“I heard that, Shunsui-kun,”

The voice of their comrade, calm yet pointed out of the darkness made both men jump, Shunsui swinging around hurriedly to face the window. Outside, framed by the black night and glittering in the moonlight stood the missing member of their group, amusement glittering in his pale blue eyes as he surveyed their surprise.

“I’m quite good at suppressing reiatsu, still,” he said, unnecessarily, pushing the window back further and climbing into the chamber. “My kyokkou is still quite effective, too. It’s comforting, if it can fool two Captains of your levels, though — or maybe you were just not paying attention?”

“What are you doing, trying to kill me?” Shunsui exclaimed, putting a hand to his chest. “Whatever happened to coming in through the door, Hirata-kun?”

“I decided not to take the front entrance, in case I was followed,” Hirata said calmly, settling himself on the tatami-mat floor and turning to face Juushirou, who was staring at his fellow Captain in undisguised astonishment. “Don’t look like that, Juushirou-kun. I might be a Captain, but I learned how to climb in and out of windows from the best, remember?”

He shot a sidelong glance in Shunsui’s direction, and the Eighth Division Captain let out a chuckle of acknowledgement.

“I suppose that’s true,” he agreed. “You’re letting your paranoia get worse, though, Hirata-chan, if you think coming here to Thirteenth is now potentially dangerous.”

“If what you were saying just then is true, it probably is,” Hirata was unmoved. “Close the window, Shunsui. If I could eavesdrop on you both, so could someone else — and Onmitsukidou can suppress their reiatsu just as well as I can.”

“He has a point,” Juushirou sighed, indicating for Shunsui to do as he was bidden, and the Eighth Division Captain obliged. “We had no idea you were there, and just because the bulk of the division are asleep, it doesn’t mean more nefarious folk aren’t abroad listening for tidbits of information.”

“It might be a longshot, anyway,” Shunsui added. “This was something Ketsui and Shizuka picked up in the archives — but it’s unconfirmed. Juu thinks it’s how Tenichi was abducted, but we’ve no proof.”

“We might find out, soon,” Hirata pursed his lips, lowering his voice. “Souja had a message earlier today from the head of the Kitsune in Seventh District. They’ve picked up someone matching Tenichi’s description — so my son has gone out there tonight, in the hopes of bringing the missing boy back home.”

“He’s hardly a boy, now,” Juushirou objected.

“He’s alive, and that’s the most important thing,” Shunsui held up his hands before his friends could dispute the point. “It seems a little easy, though, don’t you think? First whoever it is makes all these demands about the Kitsune, then suddenly Tenichi is found by that same group of people?”

“I think probably it’s a trap, designed to lure the Kitsune out,” Hirata admitted uneasily. “Souja sees that too, at least, he did when I explained it — but I let him go on the understanding he’d be very careful and keep hidden as much as possible. I have faith in Joumei to be cautious, too — but it does seem too easy.”

“Could they have just given up?” Juushirou suggested. “Perhaps they were bluffing. They didn’t hurt the other shinigami they took — maybe killing him was never in their plans.”

“If we’re talking about the same kidnappers,” Hirata interjected.

“You don’t think that’d be too coincidental?” Juushirou frowned. “Just because the ransom demands were different, they still met particular needs.”

“Let’s assume we’re dealing with the same group for now, else it’s going to make my head ache,” Shunsui implored his friend. “We have too many players to deal with as it is — I’d rather keep it simple for the time being.”

“None of this is simple,” Hirata grimaced, “but if we have Tenichi returned safe and sound, maybe he’ll be able to give us some information himself.”

“The others had no memory of what happened when they were taken,” Juushirou pointed out.

“Tenichi is a more powerful officer, though. Subduing him completely would take more skill,” Shunsui reflected. “Perhaps that’s why they let him go — because keeping him was too much trouble and there was a risk of them being found out. They could’ve cut their losses and moved on, since they must’ve realised from your silence that you had no intention of giving them the Kitsune.”

“You really think that’s likely?” Hirata demanded, and Shunsui shook his head.

“Not really, but it’s a nice, positive angle to explore,” he responded. “If Tenichi-kun can add anything to the equation, it’ll help — but if Juu’s theory is right...”

“I’d rather be dealing with a disgruntled ex-Onmitsukidou than a member of the current Gotei,” Juushirou said grimly. Hirata nodded.

“Agreed,” he said with a sigh. “I don’t like the idea of having someone on the inside leaking information out — but the Onmitsukidou agents have free movement and they allegedly put to death anyone who betrays their code of honour. Understandably, few do — but if this one did... why did they let him get away?”

“From Shizuka’s notes, it looks like the person was pursued and attacked, dealt mortal injuries but a corpse wasn’t found,” Shunsui scanned the sheet of paper once more before pushing it across towards the younger man.

“They let that go?” Hirata was startled.

“Kai wasn’t in charge at the time. He was with Midori-sama in central District Two, and his adjutant had control,” Juushirou explained. “I don’t think we’re going to get any further with this without talking to Kai directly, though. He might be reluctant — but the more we discuss Shizuka’s notes, the less I realise we know.”

“I vote you do it, then,” Shunsui suggested. “Hirata will have Tenichi to interrogate, and... if it’s all the same to you... I’d like to keep Shizu-chan out of this if I possibly can. Ketsui’s already involved because of Tenichi’s abduction, and you are because of your link to both of them. There’s no sense in involving more people than necessary.”

“Fair enough. I’ll go tomorrow, if I can,” Juushirou agreed. “In the meantime, though, I’m still not sure what to make of Mitsuki’s claims about this man in Rukongai. Ketsui was certain there was no record of any escaped felon meeting what she told me.”

“Maybe he escaped before he was caught,” Shunsui suggested, and Juushirou groaned.

“Maybe, but I don’t know. It doesn’t make sense. If it wasn’t Mitsuki, I’d wonder if she’d imagined it — but it is Mitsuki, so I have to trust in her word.”

“You could be biased, though,” Hirata murmured. “We all trust Edogawa-san’s judgement, but she was pushed to extremes. It’s not impossible she got confused.”

“I don’t think that’s it,” Juushirou shook his head. “Perhaps I am biased — probably I can’t claim otherwise — but someone got her and Aomori across Rukongai to the base camp in Hokutan. Mitsuki could never have made that journey without help, not considering the severity of Aomori’s wounds. Someone helped her — and it wasn’t one of the Fourth Division. What does that leave us with?”

“Someone from Rukongai?” Shunsui looked doubtful.

“Mitsuki seemed to think he was from Seireitei, because of things he said,” Juushirou shook his head. “He seemed too well informed for a Plus soul, and too, well, spiritually gifted.”

“They are there, you know. Spiritually gifted folk in the Rukon,” Shunsui objected, and Juushirou nodded.

“So I’ve heard, but not like this.”

“We’re speculating again,” Hirata pointed out. “We can do that all night, but it won’t get us any further.”

“That sounds like a cue to move on to the shougi and the sake,” Shunsui looked hopeful. “I should’ve brought some rice crackers with me, and we could’ve made a proper midnight feast of it.”

“You’re never going to grow up entirely, are you?” Juushirou shot him an amused look, and Shunsui shook his head cheerfully.

“The day I do is the day I’ll be nailed in my box and confined to the Kyouraku crypt,” he agreed. “Well? Is class dismissed, sensei? If you tackle Kai about this in the morning, and Hirata takes on Tenichi, everything’s settled for now, right?”

“What are you going to do?” Hirata asked quizzically, and Shunsui lifted the sake with a grin.

“Pour, if Juu can find some sakazuki for me,” he replied casually.

“I meant in the investigation,” Hirata pulled a face, and Shunsui laughed.

“I’ll watch over you both, of course,” he said simply. “I’m a sounding board, and that’s my forte. Don’t worry. I’ve always got your back.”

“I can’t really argue with that,” Juushirou got to his feet mock-reluctantly, moving to pull some clean sakazuki from a box in the corner. “Here, you win.”

“You shouldn’t humour him so much,” Hirata rolled his eyes, and Juushirou shrugged.

“It’s too late in the day, and you said it yourself. We’ve exhausted all our avenues for now, and we need more information before we can keep going. For now, Hirata, it’s all right to take a break. You probably need it too — you’ve been under as much strain as anyone.”

“I’m worried about the note,” Hirata admitted, nonetheless accepting the sakazuki he was offered and allowing Shunsui to pour the fine clear liquid into it with a sigh. “I’m worried about why Tenichi was released and what the real implications are, since I can’t imagine it’s ended like this. It bothers me — that’s all.”

“It bothers all of us,” Shunsui said seriously, pausing in his pouring for a moment. “Right now, though, there’s no more we can do. We’ll keep on it, Hirata. I promise, even if I’m unreliable, I’ll help as much as I can and Juu will speak to Kai — if anyone can persuade him to divulge Onmitsukidou secrets, Juu can. He can also talk to Mitsuki again, and when you’ve interrogated Tenichi, we’ll talk again. We’re not going to let any more shinigami be hurt or abducted if we can help it. The Gotei are focused mostly on the Spiritless Zone case, and the Council has to look at that first and foremost — yourself included, perhaps. Juu and I have a little more freedom, though, so we’ll keep at it.”

“I’ll drink to that,” Juushirou nodded, raising his sakazuki in a symbolic toast before draining it of its contents. “Tomorrow, we’ll chase down as many clues as we can put together.”

“Right now, though, I have a shougi grudge to settle with the fishy fellow here,” Shunsui concluded, leaning across to pull Juushirou’s aged and fading shougi board from its cubby hole, “so lets forget politics for a while and play!”

“I see.”

Keitarou sat back against the wall of his makeshift study, displeasure glittering in his normally placid muddy eyes.

It was the next morning in Rukongai and, in the hazy dawn of another cloudy, overcast day, Masaya had made his return, immediately hurrying to the scientist's favoured chamber to impart his discoveries of the previous day. He was huddled now in the most stable corner of the ramshackle study, his back to the door yet his gaze flitting to the entrance every couple of minutes as if ready to take his leave the moment the situation became dangerous. Wrapped in a tattered black cloak he had stolen from an unsuspecting Seireitei villain on his way back, his nondescript, grey appearance seemed all the more sinister, his yellow eyes glittering faintly in the dim light of the room. If not for those eyes, Keitarou reflected, he might be a weasel skulking in the shadows, but the gaze, tarnished though it was with a mixed blood heritage could only be viewed as predatory, their flickering gaze cold as a reptile, yet quick and eager as a cat.

The more time passed, the less human he seemed.

Keitarou's lips tightened into a thin, straight line as he turned his mind away from his companion's unappealing appearance to focus on the more troublesome element of his visit — the news he had brought from the Shinigami court. An oppressive silence hung heavy over the whole room, and the dust and sandy earth that the wind usually scattered across the floor lay still, for there was no breeze. The stagnating air felt cloying and oppressive, and he could still pick up the faintest traces of his last experiment, the pungent odour of the roughly brewed chemicals sharp and acrid on every indrawn breath. Rukongai was not a pleasant place to be, but there were worse lives and worse places. Here they had freedom, but he was not so foolish to think it a commodity which could not be taken away. One false move could land them all in tremendous danger, and he knew only too well how high the stakes truly were.

"You are sure about this, Masaya?" the question came at length, spoken softly, but it was impossible to disguise the genuine anger in the scientist's tones. Across the room, the scrawny, black-clad shape of his chief spy prostrated himself hastily once more, then raised his head, nodding it eagerly.

"Yes, sir. I heard them myself, sir. There is no doubt — the Edogawa girl is still alive, and the Gotei are investigating her testimony regarding what happened in their Spiritless Zone. Keitarou-sama, I also saw the brother of Tenichi-sama, and clearly identified him as such. If Keitarou-sama wishes it, I believe bringing him here would be...”

“Do not divert the subject, please,” Keitarou’s words were pleasant, but the look in his eyes made Masaya stop in his tracks, swallowing the rest of his statement unspoken. “If I wish to meet with Ketsui, I will ask for it — for now, that is the least of my concerns. By your testimony, a shinigami I thought dead is still alive — and more than that, this shinigami witnessed something of the events in the Spiritless Zone?”

“Yes, sir,” Masaya grovelled in the dust once more, and Keitarou could tell that his chameleonic servant was not sure whether he was about to receive the full force of his master’s anger. “I heard them talking about it clearly, sir — Ketsui-dono and another girl, in the Seireitei Archive.”

“Very well,” Keitarou’s lips thinned to the point they were barely visible, and he jerked his head forward in a slight nod. “Masaya, tell me, did you happen to discover where in Seireitei the Edogawa girl currently is? There was no mention of survivors in either Katsura or Sakaki’s reports, so I only have your word for it that the girl escaped.”

“I didn’t see her myself, sir,” Masaya seemed crestfallen at this admission, “so I’m unsure as to where she currently is. Nonetheless, the shinigami were quite clear. They were researching legal records and criminal cases for information on an escaped felon meeting a description given them by a shinigami called Edogawa Mitsuki. I heard the name clearly, and the description of the felon she saw. It was a young man, sir, with dark hair, and blue eyes.”

“Really.” Now there was no concealing Keitarou’s anger, and Masaya shuffled back hastily against the fabric door-flap of the chamber, as though poised to flee should his companion’s temper explode into physical rage. “I must speak to my son, and find out exactly what he knows about this. He is with Eiraki this morning, I believe — go there and tell him that I wish to see him. Immediately.”

“Yes, sir,” relief flooded Masaya’s features and he scrabbled for the door, making an unelegant departure in his haste to get away from Keitarou’s line of fire. Such behaviour made it difficult to believe that, in a former life, this mismatched experiment had once been an expert in stealth and subtlety, but, Keitarou knew, in Rukongai, you took what you had and worked with it as best you could.

Still, his report was disturbing.
Katsura has never lied to me before.

His eyes narrowed to near slits as he processed this.

Every other mission he's ever done, he's reported to me faithfully and accurately. He's told me what kind of damage the Hollow has rendered, and in what parts of Seireitei. He's been obedient and quick to act, and I've utilised that fact to my advantage. I didn't even think that, in sending him with Sakaki to the Spiritless Zone, there'd be any doubt about the result.

He frowned, replaying Masaya's words afresh.

Masaya doesn't like the attention I give other people, and he could lie to get them into trouble... but this time I don't think he is. I don't suppose he'd risk angering me by slandering my children, and the eagerness with which he came here to give his report makes me think that he thought he'd found out something valuable. No, I'll hear what Katsura has to say, but I'm inclined to believe Masaya's words, this time. It's a disappointment, but I suppose it's wrong for any parent to expect perfection from his son every time.

"Otousama?"

The cloth door twitched back at that moment, revealing an apprehensive looking Katsura, his hair tied back in a loose tail behind his head and his attire splashed with mud, indicating that he had been helping Eiraki with some of the more mundane chores. As he met his son's gaze, Keitarou was startled and perturbed to see the consternation in the dark blue eyes, and the speed with which Katsura chose to look away. He covered it well, making as though to straighten the door behind him, but Keitarou was not fooled. Katsura's demeanour indicated something was amiss, and a dark sense of unease began to swirl up through the scientist's gut.

If you want something doing properly, sometimes you can only rely on yourself to do it right.

Out loud he said,

"Come join me, Katsura. Sit down."

"Yes, sir," Katsura did as he was bidden, dropping awkwardly down on the threadbare rug that covered the innermost part of the chamber and eying his companion expectantly. "Kurotsuchi said you were looking for me and that it was urgent — is something amiss?"

"I don't know," Keitarou spoke evenly, meeting his son's gaze with a grave one of his own. "That depends on the direction of this conversation, and what you have to tell me."

"Sir?" Katsura's body tensed, dismay flitting briefly across his face, and Keitarou knew for certain that his oldest child was concealing something important from him. His unease grew.

"I want to talk to you," he said softly, "about the Spiritless Zone and your movements there.”

“The... Spiritless Zone... sir?” Katsura swallowed hard, his face draining a little of colour, and Keitarou nodded.

“Yes, if you please.”

“I thought... Sakaki and I... we already... didn’t we already report...?”

“You did,” Keitarou cut across him, “but I want to give you a second chance to give me that report. It’s possible that, after a little time thinking it over, new information may have come to light and I would like to have an accurate overall picture of what happened over the divide.”

Now there was no concealing Katsura’s distress, and Keitarou sighed.

“I see,” he murmured, disappointment clear in his tones. “There’s something you don’t want to tell me... and I thought we had a mutually trusting father-son bond, Katsura-kun.”

“I... I...”

“Edogawa Mitsuki,” in a flash Keitarou’s demeanour changed from the slighted parent to the angry extremist, and two hands shot out to grab Katsura by the shoulders, his fingers digging deep into the flesh. “Last chance, Katsura. I want to know what happened to Edogawa Mitsuki.”

Katsura’s eyes widened, genuine fear flickering into the dark blue eyes, and Keitarou tightened his grasp.

“Tell me,” he ordered. “Tell me, or God help me, I’ll make sure you never tell anyone another story ever again.”

“Father, please, you’re hurting me!” Katsura exclaimed, struggling in vain against the scientist’s vice-like hold. “Please, let go of me! We can talk... but... please... don’t hurt me!”

“But you’ve hurt me,” Keitarou was unmoved. “I put my trust in you, and you’ve betrayed that trust. You were sent on a mission and you reported back to me that you had completed it. That was a lie, wasn’t it, Katsura-kun? You didn’t complete it. You failed, and you lied to me.”

“Father!” Now tears of pain glittered on Katsura’s lashes, his skin a greyish hue as he stared at the other man with a mixture of helplessness and terror. “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean... it wasn’t... I wasn’t betraying you, sir, I promise! Hollows are hard to... maybe she..."

"Be very careful," Keitarou said blackly. "If you tell me another lie now, I might lose my temper. I might accidentally rip through your skin to the bone and burn your limbs from your body with my kidou, if I really get angry. I forgive many sins, Katsura, but betrayal is not one of them. You have one final chance. I suggest you tell me the truth — or I shall be presenting your ashes to Eiraki to scatter as she sees fit."

Katsura's drew an unsteady breath into his body, sweat beading across his brow as he tried to gauge whether or not his companion's threat was a serious one. His body was trembling, Keitarou realised with detachment, and at length his lips parted, quivering for a moment before forming words.

"One of mine got away," he murmured, his words barely making a sound in the empty chamber. "The Hollow... didn't... kill... all of them."

"Why did you not tell me that the moment you returned here?" Keitarou demanded. "No, more to the point, why did you not finish it yourself? You were sent to do a job — surely you don't need me to tell you that if one method fails, you improvise and find another? Hollows are unpredictable beasts — but you are surely capable of overpowering one young woman and seeing to her death?"

Tears of fear rolled silently down Katsura's cheeks, but, though his lips brushed together briefly, no more words came out.

"I can't hear you," Keitarou did not relent for a moment. "Tell me. Why did Edogawa Mitsuki live? Why her, of all people?"

"It... was... an... accident," Katsura whispered. "Shinigami... have... swords... sir. I... didn't... and Sakaki... Sakaki was..."

"Doing her job properly, which is something you, as eldest, should be ashamed of," Keitarou snapped. "When your kid sister can do something more cleanly and efficiently than you, it's a sign you need to return to basic training and re-evaluate what exactly we're fighting for. I have never had to use this tone with you, Katsura. I have never had to scold you or chastise you for deceit or incompetence, despite your frequent flirtations with women in the Districts. Did you think that a shinigami would be the next challenge for your social skills, is that it? Did you save her life because you thought she was pretty, despite how much relied on you ending it?"

"No sir!" Katsura's denial this time was immediate, his gaze beseeking the scientist to believe him. "I never... it wasn't like that. I wouldn't fall in love with a shinigami! I hate shinigami! They're the enemy, and I don't... I don't care for them at all! It was an accident, sir, that's all. I didn't mean for her to get away, but... but she did, and... and she alerted her people back home, so I had to flee. I couldn't have been caught there."

"So she did see you," Keitarou released his hold, displeasure prickling from his slender form. "Masaya's report was an accurate one. Do you realise how much trouble you've caused now, my boy? A shinigami survivor is now wandering around Seireitei telling all and sundry about a young dark haired, blue eyed man that she saw in Rukongai."

Katsura gulped, beyond words, and Keitarou rubbed his hands together, flickers of Kidou energy rippling against his skin.

"Otousama, please, no!" Katsura's sharp senses picked up on the shift in his father's spirit power immediately, and he shuffled back, almost tumbling over his own feet in his haste to put space between him and his companion. "I didn't mean to... please... I didn't betray you! I wouldn't... I never would! Please, believe me! I made a mistake and I'm sorry, but please..."

Keitarou's eyes narrowed, his gaze flitting to the cloth doorway as a second familiar reiatsu brushed across his senses, and he grimaced, lowering his hands to his lap. The next moment the divide was flung back, and Koku stepped into the chamber, pausing to bow his head in Keitarou's direction.

"I'm sorry to disturb you, sir," he said levelly, his voice calm and even, "but I felt the flare of spirit power from this location and I thought someone might be under attack."

"Koku..." Keitarou met the intruder's eyes for a moment, and Koku held the muddy gaze impassively.

"I was apparently mistaken," he continued, "but if you please, sir, Eiraki-san is eager for Katsura to return to help with the chores. She asked me to come and find him, so, if it's not too forward of me, might I ask for him to be released to attend her?"

Keitarou let out his breath in a rush, feeling the anger and frustration cooling into resignation and regret. Slowly he nodded.

"I believe that we have all but finished this conversation," he agreed, shifting his gaze to the trembling Katsura, who nodded his head fervently.

“Yes, sir. I’m sorry. I didn’t mean... I won’t do it again. Not ever. I promise,” he babbled, scrambling to his feet and bowing towards the other man.

“I’m sure you won’t,” Keitarou said acerbically. “You may not consider this matter closed, Katsura. You made a mistake, and I will expect you to rectify that mistake.”

“Rectify it... sir?” Katsura looked blank, and Keitarou nodded.

“If it was simply a case of you letting someone live, I might overlook it. Mistakes are made, and though I wanted Edogawa Mitsuki dead, I did not convey that exact instruction to you before you left,” he said quietly. “More, you probably didn’t know the girl by name before this errand... and could not imagine how significant a pawn she would have become if she had been sacrificed there and then. However, your own carelessness has created a second problem. If she truly did see you, there’s only a matter of time before she and companions come looking for you. As a shinigami, she will recognise your reiatsu. She might even realise that it’s your work manipulating the Hollows... and that could lead danger here. Too many lives are at stake in this place for me to hope for the best and let it go.”

“But... with respect, sir, what can I do about it?” Katsura was taken aback. “If this shinigami is now back in Seireitei...”

“You will have to go there, find her, and finish the job you began,” Keitarou said frankly, enjoying the look of absolute horror that flooded his son’s easy-going features. “Oh yes, you are old enough not to have other people repair your wrongs. You allowed your face to be seen, therefore you must ensure that something is done to prevent your being traced back here. She can identify you, so therefore she must be silenced one way or another. If you can’t do this, Katsura, then you will no longer be welcome in Rukongai. The safety of everyone here relies on our anonymity. To protect that, you have a choice. You can kill Edogawa Mitsuki and escape from Inner Seireitei unseen — or you can leave this place forever, and wait for the Gotei to track you down and kill you for your crimes against the shinigami in the Spiritless Zone.”

“Keitarou-sama,” Koku’s expression mirrored Katsura’s aghast one at this, but Keitarou held up his hands to indicate he was not finished talking.

“You may go help Eiraki, and think over all I’ve said,” he continued, addressing his bewildered son directly. “As you do so, remember that to lose you would make Eiraki cry. Think very carefully about your actions from hereon in, Katsu-kun — you are my son and I care for you, but I cannot put your stupidity over the success of everything we have worked for. I hope to welcome you back here successful — but if you do not complete this task, you must be considered an enemy of Rukongai and I will be forced to remove you from the equation to protect everyone else.”

He smiled, a cold smile that did not reach his pale brown eyes.

“You may go.”

Katsura swallowed hard, exchanging looks of dismay with Koku, but his encounter with his father had clearly left him devoid of any spirit of his own, for he merely bowed once more, withdrawing silently from the chamber and disappearing into the greyish light beyond.

“Did you have to do that?” Koku had followed Katsura’s retreat from the study, but now he turned back to face Keitarou, a quizzical look on his young features. “Katsura is going to take that to heart, you know. You’ve upset him — no, I think it’s safer to say you’ve terrified him.”

“You came here to stop me from hurting him, didn’t you?” Keitarou reflected quietly, and Koku shrugged his shoulders.

“I like Katsura,” he said simply. “I don’t want anything bad to happen to him.”

“He was careless, Koku. Horrendously careless,” Keitarou sighed, and Koku grimaced, leaning up against the study wall.

“Sending him back to Seireitei is just as careless,” he said, censure clear in his tones. “He won’t be thinking straight, he might get caught... and most of all, he’ll really believe you when you say you wouldn’t take him back.”

“You think that was a lie?” Keitarou arched an eyebrow, and Koku’s lips stretched into a thin, humourless smile.

“I already know it was,” he said softly. “I know, and you know, but he does not.”

“Ah... you think you can judge me on my hatred of betrayal, so much so that you think I wouldn’t discard a child of mine for bringing us into danger?” Keitarou mused. “Perhaps you’re more softhearted than I thought, Koku-kun. I’m afraid that you might be proven wrong, though. True, this time, I don’t intend on discarding Katsura. I want Edogawa Mitsuki killed, both to silence her as a witness in Rukongai, and to send Ukitake Juushirou into a tailspin, and telling Katsura I won't take him back is the quickest way to motivate him to do as he's bidden. He has no other choice, since he has nowhere else to go, and with the right incentive, I'm sure he can be persuaded to kill. I don't anticipate a long term problem... but its also true that I don't forgive mistakes that are repeated."

"Mm," Koku pressed his lips together thoughtfully.

"Has he spoken to you at all about what happened in Rukongai?"

"Why would he?" Koku looked surprised. "It was a mission you sent him on. It has nothing to do with me."

"Yes, you are a far better liar than he is," Keitarou sighed heavily. "Far better at concealing your true thoughts and feelings from me... it's a frightening state of affairs. Katsura wears his heart on his sleeve. I can read and manipulate him with ease. Sakaki is fine so long as I give her people to kill, and Masaya owes me his entire existence, therefore would never vex me — but you..."

"I vex you by existing?" Koku asked archly, and Keitarou laughed, shrugging his shoulders.

"No, you please me because you exist," he corrected, "as all good things in this world must be vexing at some point or another. If they were not, they would not be interesting — and that would be a shame."

"Are you really going to send Katsura to Inner Seireitei?"

"You heard my instructions to him."

"Even though it might damage him?"

"Yes, even so," Keitarou smiled. "There are a few key pieces in this puzzle, and I am slowly using what resources I have to pull those things together. You should know that better than me — there's very little you don't pick up on. Maybe I should have sent you to the Spiritless Zone instead."

"If you had, I would have defied you," Koku said calmly. "I don't kill people. That's not my job. Katsura might feel honour bound to obey you, but I'm not the same as them."

"No... true," Keitarou acknowledged. "In which case, I shall have to put my hopes in Katsura rectifying his little faux pas."

"Edogawa Mitsuki's death is that important to you?"

"You aren't going to pretend you don't know why?" Keitarou raised an eyebrow, reaching for a file stuffed full with scraps of ratty parchment. He rummaged through it for a moment, finally locating a sorry fragment of paper and setting it down on the floor before him.

“Mourning robes from storm clouds hang heavy over the coastal tides, lamenting the fading light of the beautiful moon.”

He read the words slowly and reverently as though reciting a sermon, and Koku flinched, his expression becoming pained.

“I wish you’d stop reading your own motives and omens into those pieces of nonsense,” he muttered, and Keitarou chuckled in amusement.

“Nonsense? No, Koku. You know very well that they are not.”

“Words have many meanings,” Koku said bluntly. “Perhaps your way of reading them isn’t always the right one — and maybe Edogawa Mitsuki’s death has nothing to do with what you just read. The night Katsura went to Rukongai, there was no moon. It doesn’t mean that the beautiful moon is the Edogawa woman, and it doesn’t mean that the rest of what it says relates to Ukitake Juushirou. You want to believe that, so you pursue it — but most of the bits of paper in that file of yours are vague and nonspecific potential events. You’ve not been able to prove many of them to be correct, and if you rely on them to guide you, you’re the one who’ll become careless.”

“Was that an official warning?” Keitarou demanded, and Koku shrugged.

“Take it any way you like,” he said briskly. “I’m going back to my shelter to read. I think sending Katsura to Seireitei is a mistake, but I can see I won’t change your mind.”

“Wise boy,” Keitarou agreed. “Go, read your books and bury your head back in the sand. Whether you choose to agree with me or not, a war is coming — and I intend on using all the weapons at my disposal to come out the other side victorious.”

The Second Division barracks were almost as far away from the Thirteenth as it was possible to get and, as Juushirou made his way towards the entrance of the Shihouin’s proud Gotei domain, he reflected ruefully that the same could probably be said for the squad’s operations. Ostensibly an equal partner of the Gotei Thirteen, the existence of the Onmitsukidou and their usefulness to Seireitei had made the Second Division a power in shinigami matters. It had been almost thirty years now since the Shihouin Clan had faced the threat of obliteration and they had reacted to the fact admirably, piecing back together the pride and honour of their family from out of the ashes and forging a formidable force of stealth fighters and shunpo experts. It was partly thanks to the strong guiding hand of the current Clan leader, Shihouin Midori, but, as he gazed up at the crescent moon crest that had been expertly scorched into the soft wood of the gateway, Juushirou knew that his old school friend Kai had been as much a part of the regeneration as the infamous Shadow Cat. Though Midori was Clan leader and Division Captain, Kai's position in the Onmitsukidou gave him almost equal status among the shinigami squad chiefs and, though his official rank in Second Division remained Vice Captain, he was more often referred to by his Onmitsukidou honours.

Juushirou was sure that many of Kai's current subordinate officers had no idea how adverse to the idea of killing and death their leader really was, for in the time since he had inherited the mantle of secret ops leader, Kai had perfected the art of public impassiveness. He was known for treating all those who worked for him with objective efficiency, and though there were none of the warm bonds of family Juushirou liked to foster within his own division, the operation was efficiently run and rigidly held together. Juushirou did not know how many shinigami were currently included among the Onmitsukidou's ranks, but he did know that, far from being all pure-blooded Shihouin, Kai had accepted recruits with shunpo and combat potential from the District levels, training them remorselessly until they could meet even the strictest inspections without a flicker of concern. It was a different type of unity to Thirteenth Division's, but it worked, and the Shihouin Clan had continued to move from strength to strength as a result.

He did not come here often — nobody did, for the secretive Second did not encourage always quick to offer help and support to other divisions in dangerous and difficult situations, Midori preferred to run a tight ship, and Juushirou knew that this was as much to protect the Onmitsukidou agents as it was any other reason. Juushirou had heard rumours that some of the members of the Onmitsukidou had once been tried as felons in District Seireitei, pardoned and retrained according to their particular skills. Such things were technically against Council law, but, since Second Division had accepted responsibility for policing the Gotei prison, Juushirou privately thought it was a rumour grounded in some fact. That thought brought back to mind the reason for his coming, and he frowned, pressing his lips together.

Was the person who had abducted Tenichi a former Onmitsukidou, and if so, had he been one of these escaped felons whose reformation had proven half-hearted?

“Ukitake-taichou!”

The voice of a young woman drew him from his reverie and he turned, bowing his head politely towards the speaker, who echoed his formality with a grave expression of her own. Dressed in the all black of the secret operatives, and with her dark hair in a tight braid, it was hard to recognise her as a former playmate of Shunsui’s in the depths of District Eight, but Juushirou knew that this was Etsuo Saku. As Third Seat of the Second Division, she was both Midori’s personal aide and Kai’s current second in command. She was an unassuming yet diligent and, when the need arose, ruthless member of the secret forces. Looking at her now, Juushirou was in no doubt that, if anything she held dear was threatened, the sword that hung idle at her waist would be at the enemy’s throat in less than a heartbeat, ready and willing to slash through the jugular and redden the pale cobbles with blood.

The Second Division was that kind of place, the assassin traditions of the shadow Clan reborn into something legitimate yet terrifying within the Gotei’s accepted structure. The Council endorsed the actions of the Onmitsukidou, and Juushirou knew they had many positive uses, but he had learned not to ask too many questions, certain he did not really want to know all the answers. If was for this reason that any meetings with his old friend Kai generally took place in neutral territory or at Thirteenth’s own barracks, places where, in general, Juushirou felt more able to relax.

Still, today was an exception, and there was no time to make formal arrangements.

“You know that this is a closed barracks, Ukitake-taichou,” Saku continued now, faint reproach in her blue eyes. “I don’t remember Midori-sama telling me of your coming this morning, and if she isn’t expecting you...”

“I’ve come to see Kai, actually,” Juushirou looked apologetic, and, as her hands came out expectantly, he removed his weapon from his obi, placing it in her waiting grasp. “I have come unannounced, and I’m sorry for it, but it’s a matter of both importance and urgency and I don’t think it can wait. If he’s here, could I trouble you to go find him for me? I won’t stray around your barracks without guidance — you should know me well enough to know I respect a division’s right to run to its own rules — but I really can’t postpone my errand.”

“Kai-dono is very busy at the moment,” Saku sighed, sliding Sougyo no Kotowari through her dark sash, alongside her own weapon. “I know he often makes special exceptions when its you, and I understand that you're his friend, but with everything in the Spiritless Zone..."

"Yes, I know," Juushirou agreed sympathetically. "It's been a horrible time for everyone — but that is partly why I'm here. You see, an investigation of my own has turned up disturbing information that might connect to the Onmitsukidou — and naturally I want to discuss it with the people here before I look into it any further. It might be a matter of high secrecy, and so..."

"I see," Saku's eyes narrowed, and she nodded her head. 'In that case, I understand your coming. I can't take you to his office, of course, but if you follow me, I will take you to somewhere you can sit and wait whilst I call him. He may not be able to come,' as Juushirou's eyes reflected relief, "but I will ask him. Given what you've said, it would be remiss of me not to do that at least."

"Thank you," Juushirou was grateful. "I promise to go where you lead, Etsuo-san. I'm not here to pry into your people's business — the Onmitsukidou helped to save the life of someone very dear to me in Rukongai, and its a debt I can't rightly repay."

"That's why you're bringing this lead to us and not the Council?" Saku asked thoughtfully, and Juushirou shrugged.

"Maybe," he acknowledged, "but mostly I just want Kai's take on it. If it's something I can't touch, well, that will be that, I suppose — but I'd like his guidance first."

"I'll go see him," Saku promised. "Here... it's not very much, I know, but this alcove is at least shady and it has a seat. I'm sorry that I can't take you within — Midori-sama is currently at her Clan holdings, and her instructions are that nobody steps into the building itself without her or Kai in accompaniment."

"I'm not offended, and here will be fine," Juushirou said agreeably, sinking down onto the wooden seat and folding his hands in his lap. "Will you keep Sougyo until I leave, or...?"

"Another order," Saku looked regretful, tapping the hilt of the Captain's zanpakutou. "If Kai-dono allows it, I will return it to you when he comes, but I can't overstep my orders and presume what they want me to do."

"Naturally," Juushirou smiled. "It's quite all right, Etsuo-san. As I said before — your division, and your rules. I am the interloper, so I'll play it your way."

"Thank you," Saku bowed her head very properly in Juushirou's direction once more, then disappeared into shunpo, and Juushirou sighed, allowing himself to relax back against the wood. This was the outskirts of what was a thriving, busy compound, he knew, for though all he could see was what looked like the most innocent of training fields, he could feel the flickering auras of several squad members doing different kinds of work well out of his sight. Some would be inside the forbidden barracks, but others he felt sure were working beneath the ground in basement arenas and chambers the Shihouin had had specially crafted for the purpose. Rather like an iceberg, he reflected ruefully, only a proportion of the Shihouin's Gotei base was visible to the casual observer. Juushirou had never been fooled by Second's illusion of peace and tranquility, but something about the gentle atmosphere comforted him nonetheless. In the light of day, the previous night's discussion seemed to fall into its proper place.

And at the very least I can thank Kai for his help with Mitsuki. I must do that, because I know he went himself for her sake, and I'm grateful that someone she knew was there when she needed them.

He twisted his hands together absently in his lap, considering. If the person behind this is an aggrieved Onmitsukidou exile, then that takes things even further away from Aizen Keitarou. I don't know if I'd be relieved or cross if that proved to be the case. I want to catch Keitarou and have him safe within the Council's hands, just to make sure he doesn't cause any further trouble but... I don't really think I'm in a hurry to fight against him again. The last time it took Ojīsama's sword to render him helpless. If he survived Raiurei's wrath, he's probably holding a few grudges and I'm sure I'm top of that list. I'm not eager to renew that acquaintance at all — no, perhaps it is better if this is entirely unconnected with his mischief.

He frowned.

Actually, come to think of it, didn't Shizuka's notes say that the second in command was some officer called Kounou? Etsuo-san has been Kai's second for the last few years, but before that... was that Kounou? Would I have met that man? The Onmitsukidou are so wroop in secrecy that if I hadn't known Etsuo-san before we became shinigami, I might not be aware of her rank or position in this. Still, I'm sure that was the name Shizuka wrote down. Is he still with the Onmitsukidou, or did he get killed in action? I wonder if Kai would tell me that... providing he tells me anything at all. There's no reason for him to, and calling on old ties of friendship is a bit weak when it relates to security issues.

"Ukitake?"

The sound of his friend's voice drew Juushirou from his reverie, and he raised his head, meeting the quizzical golden gaze of the Onmitsukidou Captain himself. Saku was nowhere to be seen, but in Kai's gloved hands was the sheathed form of Sougyo no Kotowari, and as the dark-skinned officer crossed the yard towards him, he held the weapon out, indicating for the Captain to take it.

"Saku gave me this, but she shouldn't have taken it from you," he explained, as Juushirou did so, offering his friend a grateful smile. "Whilst it's Aneue's protocol to disarm anyone visiting here without proper clearance, I think she would agree with me that you're a visitor above suspicion. Besides, you're a ranked Captain in full uniform. I hope you won't take it amiss."

"Etsuo-san was doing her job," Juushirou assured him, sliding the weapon back into its customary place at his side. "I understand that, and you needn't worry, I'm not put out. You have to give trust to get trust, and I knew she would do my sword no harm. Besides, it was a small price to pay to get to see you so quickly. I know you're busy, Kai, but I'd like to play on our friendship a little bit and ask if you can spare me a bit of time to talk about something that's bothering me."

"Hrm," Kai pursed his lips, dropping down on the bench at his companion's side. 'Well, I am busy, but Saku implied that whatever it was had some bearing on the Onmitsukidou. Perhaps a direct one? In that case,' as Juushirou nodded, "it's my job to hear you out. Friendship or otherwise, I'd be remiss in my rank if I didn't."

"I hoped you'd feel that way," Juushirou grinned. "Is there somewhere private we could go and talk? I'm sure that this place is secured better than the Council Chambers themselves, but since I don't know if what I've brought with me is sensitive information or not, I don't want to take any risks."

"My office is currently occupied with some of my lower officers going over reports relating to Rukongai," Kai said with a frown, "and Aneue's study is locked and barred — nobody's allowed in there while she's away, not even me. Sacred space, she calls it, so that's out. Otherwise, there's only one place we really could go — but you might not like it."

"Oh?" Juushirou arched an eyebrow, and Kai nodded.

"There's an empty detention cell on the level beneath my study," he said ironically. "If anyone sees us, it might start tongues wagging, but they are soundproof because we conduct interrogations in them and those kinds of things are hardly for outside ears. If you don't mind the indignity of talking in a prison cell — that would seem to be the most available place.”

“Well, it’s an experience I wasn’t banking on, but I trust you’re not going to lock me up,” Juushirou chuckled. “Very well. I’ll put my Captain’s pride on one side for a while and follow you into the dungeons.”

“Oh, it’s hardly that,” Kai assured him with a grin. “It’s just a detention cell, not an actual confinement one. They’re not in the same area — this is where we keep people temporarily whilst trying to figure out if there’s a charge to pin on them. There’s no torture or anything like that in this room — no bloodstains, just some dust and perhaps occasionally the odd dead mouse turns up in the corners or underneath the mats. You might get dust on your haori, but I promise, that’ll be the extent of it.”

He turned towards the barracks, then paused, eying Juushirou speculatively.

“Knowing you, I imagine you’re going to interrogate me, not the other way about,” he reflected. “You have that look about you, and I’m rather worried about what you want to know.”

“It may be nothing,” Juushirou put his hand to his obi, feeling the soft crackle of paper beneath the fabric. “It might be irrelevant, or it might not. I can’t be sure, yet, but there’s a bigger picture going on here somewhere and we’re trying desperately to work out what it is.”

“Mm,” Kai’s eyes narrowed, but he said nothing, instead leading the way inside the outer perimeter of the Second Division barracks. Instead of taking the long corridor that led to the inner complex and the Captain and Vice Captain’s offices, Kai turned sharp right, pulling back a wooden divide and gesturing to Juushirou to follow him down a short flight of stone steps until they came to a second wooden door. This led into an underground passageway, doors leading off it to the left and right and, half way along this walkway Kai stopped, pulling keys from his belt and sliding one of them into the lock of a right hand door. It clicked open and he slid it back, running his fingers against the wall to activate the Kidou lamps and indicating for Juushirou to follow him inside.

Juushirou did so, not knowing quite what to expect but, as he stepped into the small, square cell, he realised that Kai had been right in his appraisal. The room was simply appointed, with a low slung wooden bench in one corner and a rolled up curl of moth-eaten, mouse-chewed bedding tossed into one corner. The floor had a thin layer of dust across it, but in all other respects it was clean and, though there were no windows to let in natural light, the Kidou lamps illuminated the room fairly evenly, making it easy enough to see. Kai ran his hand over the bench, patting the wood to check it was stable, then offering Juushirou a rueful smile.

“All right,” Juushirou did as he was bidden, ruefully reflecting on the scolding he would almost certainly receive from Naoko on his return for getting dust and grime all over his pristine white haori. Nevertheless he made himself comfortable on the bench, rummaging in his obi and pulling out Shizuka’s scribbled note. He handed it to his companion, who took it curiously, leaning up against the wall of the cell as he read the contents. As he did so, Juushirou watched his expression, noting the faintest flicker of consternation surface in the golden eyes. He made no comment, however, merely refolding the paper and handing it back.

“Well?” Juushirou arched an eyebrow, eyeing his friend quizzically. “Does it mean anything to you? Your face says that it does, but...”

“Onmitsukidou business is Onmitsukidou business,” Kai sounded pained. “You know that as well as anyone else, Ukitake... I’m surprised you’d bring something like this here. It’s not the business of the wider Gotei, and given that it’s our jurisdiction...”

“Kotetsu Tenichi was abducted from Inner Seireitei almost a week ago,” Juushirou cut across him bluntly. “He was safely located, from what I understand, returned early this morning thanks to the work of some of Hirata’s people, but his life may well have been in extreme danger. His is the third known abduction of shinigami on duty in a short space of time. On top of that, we have eight shinigami murdered in the Spiritless Zone, with another two taking serious injury and Mitsuki in grave danger of her life, too. Their survival is thanks to her and her alone, but the tragedy is still a considerable one. These are elements that bother me, Kai, and I want to get to the bottom of them. Surely you do too?”

“Why do you think I have my officers working twenty four seven, going over the reports and the evidence from the scenes in Rukongai?” Kai demanded, frustration in his tones. “I know about the Kotetsu boy’s abduction, too — everyone does — but you’re implying the two are connected! No, more than that — you think that a former Onmitsukidou is involved, and that piece of... whatever it was from wherever you found it proves...”

“It proves nothing at all,” Juushirou said simply. “It’s information that raised questions between us, that’s all. Your reaction suggests it means more to you than it does to me, though. It implies to me that the subject of this report may well be alive — and capable of orchestrating some of the things Seireitei has been dealing with recently.”

“Ukitake..” Kai groaned, sliding down onto the floor of the cell and burying his head in his hands. “I knew it. I knew you were going to come here and interrogate me. Do you know how much trouble it could cause, though, if Onmitsukidou secrets started leaking out all over Seireitei? We’re a secret force for a reason. Yes, there are ways in which we cut corners and bend normal rules, but that’s with the Council’s blessing and we never go beyond the limits laid out for us. If I started disclosing to you every single disciplinary event that went on behind closed doors, it would threaten the organisation at its roots. There’s an element of trust in what we do — a bond, in some cases, of protected anonymity. I can’t break that bond — if I do, it would mean betraying my people and I can’t do that.”

“No, I understand that,” Juushirou agreed. “This paper, though, didn’t come from Onmitsukidou anything. Two lower ranking officers found a record in the Shihouin court papers relating to this hearing. You brought it into the court of the Clan, rather than the Onmitsukidou court. Nobody has been digging in your private files, Kai — I would never sanction that, nor presume it of our friendship that you’d delve into them for me. This one was in the Shihouin records, though, which made me think...”

“I might talk about it?” Kai looked troubled, casting his friend a pensive glance. “The reason it went through the Shihouin Court is ugly and unpleasant to remember, and I’m sure there were few, if any details put in written record. There was no other way to deal with it, so Midori-nee sanctioned my doing so, but... I regretted it even as it happened. It was against our usual order — it hasn’t happened before or since.”

He let out his breath in a long, slow sigh.

“What evidence have you that this business connects to that one?” he continued. “The abduction of the shinigami and the murders in Seireitei being connected is also a stab in the dark for which we have no tangible proof whatsoever. The timing is conveniently troubling, but there’s not a shred of anything to connect that to this. We’ve some good evidence relating to the murderer of the shinigami in Rukongai. Madeki-dono’s witness statement, along with the autopsy reports have given us plenty to work with, though all searches of the area have so far come up empty. We have a female suspect in that case, though. The report you're referring to relates to a male of more senior years — perhaps the same age as you or I, perhaps even older. There's no way one could be mistaken for the other, not even given that..."

"Not even given that?" Juushirou pressed, and Kai groaned.

"There is no way that any Onmitsukidou, living or dead, committed the murders in the Rukon," he said frankly. "The murderer left no spiritual presence. The Onmitsukidou are trained to conceal theirs, but also trained to trace it. There is absolutely no evidence whatsoever of a foreign reiatsu. They were killed by a Plus soul. What her reasons were we'll know when we catch her and interrogate her — but we are looking for a girl and we are, I think, looking for one killer."

"And the abductions?"

"I know nothing detailed about them, since the Onmitsukidou are not investigating those," Kai responded with a shrug. "As I understood it, Ukitake, you were."

"Which explains my being here. Shunsui and I, and Hirata too — we have a theory that this Onmitsukidou of yours who committed some unknown crime and then was killed as he attempted to escape justice may not have been killed, and, because of some grudge he holds against Seireitei, is involved in kidnapping members of the Gotei for ransom and profit."

Juushirou met his friend's golden gaze even on.

"In any part, even if it's just a vague nod or a word of confirmation... in any respect, do you think that could happen?"

Kai was silent for a moment, then he pulled a graphic face

"I can see I won't get out of here without telling you at least the bare bones of what I know," he said with a sigh. "It's against Onmitsukidou policy, but this case was exceptional, so I'll bend my way around the rules and give you what I can. I can't give you everything you want, Ukitake. There are rules and I created them, so I need to stick to them most of all. The Onmitsukidou is my province, and I will die to protect it just as you would your people in the Thirteenth. Not everyone I have under my command has come from a settled, stable background. Some of the people I recruit would never be Gotei officers if not for the strict discipline involved in the Onmitsukidou training program. You have to understand that — becoming an Onmitsukidou means a life of doing things other people can't bear to do. I'm not a killer by nature, and I dislike the need to kill — but I accept that there are tasks and times that fighting without hesitation and killing without question are needed. The Onmitsukidou I lead are capable of completing those tasks... and that requires a certain kind of focus... a certain kind of soldier."

"So the stories about recruiting felons is a true one?" Juushirou mused thoughtfully. "I rather thought it might be."

"We don't consider them felons, not as such," Kai shook his head. "Those who are guilty of minor crimes, petty offences... they're sometimes given the choice to train and make something of their lives, or be subjected to punishment as meted out by Council law. We don't recruit people who are not capable of being trained or of cowing to necessary discipline. This is a special organisation with special rules... but it exists within the Council's regulations at all times. I make sure of that. There are no anomalies."

"I'm sorry," Juushirou was apologetic. "I didn't mean to imply otherwise. I don't personally have a problem with the idea of rehabilitating petty criminals, either. If it gives them a purpose in life, then so much to the good. There are many forced onto bad paths by hardship in the Districts — this is a way for them to move beyond that — all in all I find it commendable."

"You would," despite himself, Kai smiled wryly. "All right. So long as you understand that, I'll try and explain about Suzuki."

"Suzuki?" Juushirou's ears picked up, and Kai nodded, reaching across to tap the piece of folded paper.

"The officer that relates to was called Suzuki Naoto, and he was a ranked officer of mine until ten years or so ago," he agreed. "He wasn't a Clansman, but he did have dilute Shihouin blood, and all the natural traits and tricks for stealth work, so we took him onto our training program and he took to it like a duck to water. By the time the incident occurred, well, he was the head of one of my sub-squads and respected by a good many of the other men. He was a good officer as a rule — if a little obscure at times. Fanatical, perhaps, about his work, but nothing unusual for an Onmitsukidou. He had a wife — a fact he kept secret right up until his arrest, when she turned up to beg for his freedom. I never met her myself, so you can't ask me for her details," as Juushirou opened his mouth to speak. "I was away during the worst of it, and I still curse myself that I was, because I didn't see any of it coming."

"Suzuki betrayed your trust?" Juushirou asked, and Kai shrugged his shoulders.

“I still don’t know, quite, what happened,” he admitted helplessly. “What I do know is that there were several serious accusations of theft and handling of stolen goods in a particular area of Seireitei near where Suzuki was stationed. He was arrested. The evidence incriminated him, but he claimed he’d been framed, and a couple of the other Onmitsukidou seemed prepared to back him up. The matter went to my deputy in my absence. The two shinigami who had spoken in Suzuki’s defence disappeared before attending the hearing, and their bodies were later found mutilated in a ditch not far from the Onmitsukidou barracks. Suzuki’s escape attempt came two days later. He slipped the fence but was pursued and, as the report goes, was cut down and killed. My deputy sent men to retrieve the body... but it wasn’t found.”

He rubbed his temples.

“I liked Suzuki, for the most part, despite his oddities,” he added. “When he was arrested, he wrote me a letter and asked me to come intercede on his behalf — just hear his side, and see whether I believed him guilty or not. I had written to my deputy to stay any sentencing until I could return, but the letter apparently never arrived and, with Suzuki’s escape, well...”

“So it had to go to the Shihouin court?”

“Yes,” Kai agreed. “On two counts. One, there was a risk of internal corruption — the murder of the two shinigami and Suzuki’s claims he had been framed were serious issues that needed addressing in an objective space. Two, I had sent an official message from the Shihouin manor via a Shihouin messenger who also disappeared en route and was later found murdered. That being outside of Onmitsukidou jurisdiction... it had to become a Clan matter, and so it did.”

He grimaced.

“The upshot was that my deputy was behind the whole business. He was stripped of his rank and imprisoned to await trial. The trial never happened, though — Suzuki’s guilt or otherwise was unprovable without his testimony, and though I knew my deputy was involved in the smuggling, I couldn’t prove he deliberately framed Suzuki nor planned to kill him despite my orders to the contrary. The matter got dropped, and I promoted Saku instead. I knew I could trust her, and since then, all has been well.”

“Your deputy...” Juushirou glanced at the piece of paper, then, “Kounou?”

“Yes,” Kai looked uneasy. “I’d rather not dig too much into his case, though. I know he isn’t behind the kidnapping of the shinigami, because he’s in prison and has been for the past ten years, locked away with maximum security and no way to get free. I’m not at liberty to discuss his involvement in this any more with you, not without Aneue’s agreement. Kounou is... was... well, by blood, he is a Shihouin, therefore a Clansman. You came to ask about Suzuki, but not Kounou, and I’d rather keep it that way.”

“A living skeleton in the closet, huh,” Juushirou’s expression became grave. “I see. Very well. If Kounou is imprisoned for his smuggling crimes then he’s probably irrelevant in all of this. Suzuki, on the other hand... could he have escaped?”

“An eye witness saw him shot down with poisoned arrows,” Kai responded. “They were quite certain and clear that he had taken at least two arrows to the back and one to the neck — giving him three times the necessary dose to kill him. His survival would have been unlikely.”

“But not impossible?”

“I always believe that without a body, there is no proof of death,” Kai said grimly. “I can’t tell you how, it’s not my area of expertise, but I do know that people with grudges hold onto life a lot more resolutely sometimes than those who are at peace. Suzuki had grudges all right — his pleas to me unanswered, his pleas before the court unheard. He may have been guilty — many, including my sister, believe he was Kounou’s accomplice and Kounou turned on him only when he got careless and incriminated himself in the crime. Me, I’m not sure. I’m not wholly convinced of Suzuki’s guilt in anything except being in the wrong place at the wrong time.”

He bit his lip.

“I shouldn’t tell you this, but Suzuki was a petty thief before he joined our organisation,” he added. ‘He was also very gifted in the art of... concealment. Disguise. That kind of thing. His spirit power related to being able to camouflage himself in the most unlikely of places. He couldn’t completely alter his form,’ as Juushirou stared at him, “but he could blend in with surroundings better than any agent I’ve ever known. I’ve wondered for a long time if that was how he escaped that day.”

“So you do think he did escape?”

“I would, except for one thing,” Kai shook his head. “I have it on good authority from those who knew him that in the last ten years he has not returned for his wife. She lives alone, a widow, in one of the villages in District Two. I don't know which and I don't intend on digging into it — her life has been made hard enough without my interference. If he had lived, though — by all accounts, they were a close couple and he kept her a secret so he wouldn't have to give her up when he became an Onmitsukidou. He loved her very much... so why not return for her when the coast was clear? Ten years have passed... it doesn't make sense."

"Maybe he felt it was a risk," Juushirou suggested, and Kai snorted.

"You should know that lovesick idiots don't factor in risk when it comes to the object of their affections," he said bluntly, and despite himself, Juushirou reddened. "Yes, exactly. Would you leave Edogawa behind if it were you? Of course you wouldn't. The wife never believed in his guilt, so she didn't forsake him. He didn't go back for her... which probably means that, even if he escaped the arrows, he died ten years ago."

"I take your point," Juushirou sighed, nodding his head. "All right. But, just for argument's sake, if Suzuki had lived... do you think him capable of abducting someone in plain sight in the middle of Seireitei? Onmitsukidou have particular ways of circumventing the normal tracing devices on Senkaimon and he'd have known how to do that — do you think this Suzuki would have been able to pull such a thing off?"

"In all honesty?" Kai looked Juushirou straight in the eye, pressing his lips together. "If he was alive and I knew he was, he'd be right to the top of my list. The events in Rukongai? Not his style. The abductions, though? Right up his street."

"So in the tiny percentage of doubt in your mind about his being dead... is there any way to counteract the poison in those arrows?"

"Mm, not unless you had some knowledge of poisons and antidotes, and certainly not unless you intervened within a short time of his being poisoned," Kai responded. "The chances of that are slim. Not impossible, but slim."

"Not impossible," Juushirou looked pensive. "Kai, do you think that someone with the ability to conceal themselves effectively could also mess with Hollows and make them behave oddly?"

"Hollows?" Kai blinked, and Juushirou shrugged.

"Just a thought. Never mind."

"Onmitsukidou can do a lot of things, Ukitake, but manipulate Hollows is not one of them,” Kai looked bemused. “Nobody can control them... and who would benefit by doing so?”

“Someone,” Juushirou said darkly. “I can’t pinpoint it, but something is up with them and has been for a while. It’s like something is messing with their normal signals and making them act strangely. I can’t explain it any more clearly than that, and I’ve no actual proof — but some of my officers also believe to be the case, based on their own experiences in the field. I wondered if you thought someone like Suzuki could be capable of that — but obviously you don’t.”

“I can’t see how he would,” Kai said honestly. “He had skills and he was good at what he did, especially at shunpo and at concealing himself. But Hollows are Hollows and that’s a whole other ball game. I’m sorry, Ukitake. That one’s a blank.”

Juushirou was silent for a long while, digesting all of this. Then he groaned.

“No matter how I try to divert it, it always keeps coming back to the same point,” he muttered, and Kai eyed him keenly, folding his legs beneath him as he waited for his companion to expand on his statement. There was another pause, then,

“Kai, I don’t like where my thoughts are heading, and they’ve been in that area for longer than just today,” he said slowly. “The more I try and find other explanations and the more I tell myself that it’s unlikely, the more circumstantial information suggests the opposite. I have no case to put before the Council of Elders, but Shunsui and Hirata and I have discussed it in passing — and I’ll mention it to you as well. This whole thing reminds me of events already lived... a time when someone who should have been incapable of acting against shinigami acted against them, and when, unseen, someone in the shadows twitched and pulled at puppet strings to make a whole performance spill into place.”

Kai’s eyes darkened, and his lips thinned in comprehension.

“Aizen Keitarou?” he asked softly, and Juushirou nodded wearily.

“I don’t want to consider it, yet I keep coming back to him,” he admitted. “Keitarou’s whereabouts are unknown, but I never thought he died of his wounds and I’m sure nobody who ever met him believes that he did. You said the abductions were the kind of thing your dead agent would have been capable of — and it makes me think of Onoe Tomoyuki and the corpse puppet Keitarou once used to slaughter innocent people. I can’t connect him to the manipulation of Hollows, not yet — though I sent Naoko out to hunt for Chudokuga's reiatsu, she couldn't make a match. Even so, though, I can't help believing that somehow that's him — hurting innocent people by destroying their livelihoods in order to bring us into bad repute. Then there's Rukongai. A plus soul attacked shinigami — but plus souls don't do that kind of thing. A Hollow attacked Mitsuki and the others at the same time — and by Mitsuki's own testimony the Hollow was more interested in killing Shinigami than it was feeding on their souls. There are too many things which, on the face of it, seem completely separate. That's Keitarou's power, though — and it makes me believe they are all connected. Somehow... and don't ask me how, not yet... this whole business leads back to him."

Kai muttered a curse.

"When you put it like that, I understand your reasons for coming here and why you wanted to know so much about Suzuki," he said gravely. "I shouldn't have forgotten Tomoyuki so easily, but now you say it, there's every possibility you could be right. No matter what state Suzuki was in when he was shot down, if by some fluke someone like Aizen found him, with his science and his zanpakutou, he could probably make use of what was left. All he'd need would be a lifebeat — and a genius like Aizen would probably be able to maintain that if nothing else. If, like Tomoyuki, Suzuki lost his wits from the poison, then he probably wouldn't remember having a wife, let alone be able to go back for her. It's a particularly nasty substance — does some serious damage to tissue both inside and out — but someone like Aizen would see that as a challenge to his skills rather than an obstacle."

"I wish you'd told me I was being stupid," Juushirou looked sad. "Your putting it into those words only makes my worries bigger."

"I think they're worries with possible foundations," Kai replied apologetically. "All I can tell you about Rukongai is that there's no evidence of anyone with spirit power attacking the shinigami. Madekidono seemed to think the girl was in her wits, but savage at the same time. If she was trained... brainwashed... by Aizen, then I suppose that behaviour might be explained. Healers aren't designed for combat — and that's a huge oversight on Unohana-taichou's part, if you want my honest opinion. Unless she makes moves to forcibly train more of her people in sword skills and self defence, events like this are just waiting to happen. This has proved that even a Plus with the right motivation and drive to carry out a kill can overcome trained officers if gifted with the element of surprise. There are hundreds and thousands of Plus souls across the whole of Rukongai. The concept is a terrifying one.”

“It is, but one for which we have absolutely no evidence,” Juushirou sighed. “There’s only so much I can do at Captain’s meetings, even now. I’m not Clan, and I already push my weight around far more than many of my colleagues would like. I don’t let them stop me, but when it comes to initiating active searches for Keitarou, well, my authority is lacking. Without that piece of proof...”

“Well, then we’ll just have to find that piece of proof,” Kai said firmly, getting to his feet and dusting his black uniform down briskly. “I’ll reopen investigations into Suzuki’s disappearance, and send some officers to interrogate Kounou again, see if there’s anything we might have overlooked the day the prisoner escaped. I’ll also put Saku and some of my more trusted people on active alert to search for him. Nobody’s tried to do that in ten years, but it doesn’t mean there aren’t ways we can search. There’s his wife, too. If I can, I’ll bring her in and interrogate her about the last time she communicated with her husband. Kounou told me that she came to see Suzuki once when he was imprisoned, so she might know something about his attempted escape. Suzuki is a common name, but there are people who know where she is and locating her should be possible. Whatever resources I can spare from Rukongai, Ukitake, I’ll put into trying to establish whether or not Suzuki Naoto is still flitting in and out of his old hunting ground. If he’s here, I’ll catch him — and if I catch him, I’ll get the truth out of him. You have my word on that.”

“I believe it, and thank you,” Juushirou’s hazel eyes reflected a faint glitter of relief. “In the meantime, Hirata’s going to talk to Tenichi about his abduction. I stopped at Seventh briefly on my walk over here this morning, and saw Souja — he didn’t tell me much, except that Tenichi was safe and being examined by a healer to make sure he was not damaged in any way. I got the impression Seventh were going to conduct their own, private investigation into what happened to their officer, so hopefully that will throw up some leads as well. As for the Hollows...”

“If you say they’re odd, then I believe you, but without proof that Aizen’s behind it...” Kai shrugged, and Juushirou nodded.

“Naoko said that she sensed some kind of reiatsu — very faint, almost indiscernable, but she was sure it was there,” he responded. “Whatever it was, though, it didn’t belong to a shinigami, and it didn’t belong to Keitarou’s sword. She couldn’t place it and nor could Dokusou Houshi, meaning it’s nobody she’s worked with in the years we’ve been in the Gotei. The best theory we have is a Seireitei renegade. They might or might not have links to Keitarou — it's hard to know for sure who the players are with so many missing pieces. If my gut didn't say so strongly that this is his modus operandi...

"No, I think that you should hang on to that hunch and follow it through," Kai advised. "Even if you can't take it to the Council, yet, it's better to be ready for whatever he has to throw at us next."

"I think so too," Juushirou agreed. "I need to be getting back to Thirteenth, but there is one other thing, Kai, before I go."

"Mm?" Kai cocked his head, eying his friend inquisitively. "You mean you don't think you've already given me enough to consider this morning?"

"More than, for which I apologise, but you've been in the Spiritless Zone and I know you were there when Mitsuki was found," Juushirou shook his head. "I'm grateful for that, by the way — that you went yourself and made sure she was safely returned to Seireitei."

"My job," Kai said dismissively, but his expression belied the clinical abruptness of his words. "What of it?"

"Mitsuki said that she was helped by a stranger who killed the Hollow who attacked them, then helped bring Aomori across terrain to the shinigami camp in Hokutan," Juushirou responded. "She didn't get his name, but he was young, dark haired, with blue eyes and an amiable demeanour. She didn't feel threatened by him, but he was able to use raw spirit power to destroy the Hollow. It wasn't Kidou, she was sure about that... but she thought he had absconded from Seireitei and was maybe wanted for some petty crime but had somehow slipped the border and escaped."

"Not possible," Kai said bluntly. "Nobody can slip from Seireitei into the Spiritless Zone without hundreds of levels of security clearance. That's true even for us Onmitsukidou and for the healers of the Fourth. There is no point in the boundary weak enough for a random felon from Seireitei to sneak through undetected. You can take it to Nagesu-sama and have him tell you officially, if you like, but I'm one hundred percent sure of it. There is no way through from Seireitei to the Spiritless Zone except through heavily controlled gates."

He pursed his lips.

"But you did just say something interesting," he added. "I don't know if you realised it, but a few minutes ago you talked about Shikibu and the Hollows, didn't you?"

“Yes..?” Juushirou looked startled. “What about...”

“You said she picked up reiatsu, not that of a shinigami, and only fleeting, but enough to be sure there was something there. Right?” Kai pointed out, and Juushirou nodded. “Well, the next minute you’re telling me about some nameless youth in Rukongai who can destroy Hollows with raw power — only he’s not a shinigami. Do you see where I’m going with this?”

“You think the person who saved Mitsuki is the one manipulating the Hollows?” Horror and anger flared up in Juushirou’s gaze, followed by a moment of doubt. “But... you just said getting from Seireitei to Rukongai is impossible without clearance. Mitsuki met this person in the Spiritless Zone, in which case...”

“I said it was impossible to get from Seireitei into the Spiritless Zone, yes,” Kai nodded. “That’s what you asked me, so that’s what I told you. I didn’t say it was impossible to enter the Spiritless Zone through other channels, though. If you took a roundabout trip from Seireitei to the outer Rukon and then tried to find a point of penetration along the Sekkiseki divide... yes, then you might find a way through. It’s not beyond the realms of possibility that there are leaks between the Real World and Rukongai, too, given that we know there have been cases of clear reiatsu contamination among Plus souls. There are a few weak spots that our time deployed over there has made me aware of. I think it unlikely an escaped felon would leave Seireitei only to break into a closely policed Shinigami-controlled space like the Spiritless Zone. It would increase his chances of being caught and returned here, so it defeats the object of escaping. If there was another, more particular reason for them to be there, though...”

“To manipulate the Hollow to kill shinigami,” Juushirou’s eyes darkened with rage, and he clenched his fists. “I knew it. I knew that this person who helped Mitsuki was somehow dangerous. I knew...”

“No, you said yourself that he saved Edogawa, and helped her bring Aomori to safety,” Kai cautioned. “My theorising might be wrong, or it’s possible his manipulation of the Hollows had another motivation. Perhaps he didn’t intend for shinigami to be killed — or maybe Edogawa and the others were intended to survive in order to bring us into the equation. It’s just as possible that he’s been hurt by Keitarou and he’s acting on his own whims, activating the Hollows to draw our attention to something deeper and darker. If that’s the case, it’s worked, because it’s got your attention. There are a lot of different explanation — who knows which is the right one?”

“If we find him, we’ll find out. I want to know who he is and why he was in the Spiritless Zone,” Juushirou said blackly. “In the meantime, I’ll be making very sure that nobody is able to get near Mitsuki on any premise — not while she’s still recovering from what happened over the border. Maybe you’re right, Kai, perhaps this youth is innocent of anything and truly did come to her rescue — but if I find that he put her in any danger, you can mark my words that I will hunt him down and take him before the Council for justice.”

“Where Edogawa’s concerned, you’re still as irrational as ever,” Kai’s expression was one of amusement. “All right, I suppose that makes sense. I’ll see if I can find any clues around the scene of the Hollow attack, too. We’ve not spent much time there since retrieving the two bodies, but if you think that might’ve been a crime scene too, I’ll investigate. My Onmitsukidou will be stretched very thin for a while — but if this does involve Aizen, it’s worth the overtime if we can stall him before any more blood is shed.”

This part of Rukongai was always cold.

Katsura sneezed, pulling his cloak more tightly around his body with a shiver as he turned to survey his bleak surroundings. Once, he supposed, it had been a forest, but now only the dead trunks of the trees stood like silent skeletons, their bony branches reaching lifelessly out to each other in a mesh of criss-crossing wood. Although the foliage was long since gone, there was very little light that penetrated through the thick fingers of the boughs and, though for once the wind was still and silent, there was not even the faintest flicker of warmth from Rukongai’s lacklustre sun.

It was a place he hated to come, and for that reason he had come here, struggling to put his thoughts in some kind of order before he was summoned back to the centre of his father’s domain.

He rested his hand on the trunk of a nearby tree, trying not to draw his touch back in disgust at the dampness or the specks of rotting bark that clung to his skin. As a child he had been frightened of this place, certain that he could hear the lost spirits of the dead trees wailing and moaning on the breeze. Now, though, he found the silence twice as oppressive. Ever since the Spiritless Zone had been established, the spirits themselves had abandoned this place for fresher pastures and, though he had walked the length of the old wood several times, now the only noise was the sound of his feet softly crunching the dry ground beneath his sandals.

He closed his eyes, remembering the look of raw anger in Keitarou’s eyes. For a moment, fear gripped him, then, just as quickly, it slid away into resignation and despair.

"If you don't face your fears, Katsura-kun, you'll never overcome them."

The scientist's voice, calm and logical, rippled through his thoughts as a memory overtook him, casting him back for the briefest instant to his youth. He could still see himself, a small boy with tufts of dark hair standing every which way on his head, cheeks red and eyes streaming with tears as he had begged and pleaded with his father to take him back to the village. Unconsciously he reached out his fingers, mimicking the desperate way in which he had once grasped at his father's ragged kimono, beseeching him not to go back alone.

"A night or two here will teach you that there's nothing in this wood that can harm you."

Keitarou had been gentle, but his words had been firm. He had knelt for a moment before his son, meeting his gaze at eye level, and Katsura had seen a flicker of affection in the muddy brown eyes. Then the scientist had gone, and Katsura had been abandoned in the skeleton wood.

That was before I knew about Koku. Everything changed after I met him. Father didn't bring me here any more... as though he thought my fear of the place had healed.

Katsura patted the tree absently, glancing at the brown smear that now coated his hands.

He didn't understand how the voices teased at me. They were here, I know it — calling and taunting at me, whispering through my thoughts and trying to turn me mad. He thought leaving me here cured me — but instead it drove me to fear the place more and more. If I hadn't met Koku, maybe he would still have brought me here, even into my teens.

"Of all the places for you to come, this wasn't the first on my list."

As though summoned by his thoughts, Koku's voice broke through his contemplations, and, startled, Katsura jerked back from the tree, swinging around hastily as he tried to verify whether the speaker was real or his imagination. At his reaction, Koku's lips twitched into a faint smile but, from the gravity in the younger man's eyes, Katsura knew his companion was troubled.

"Are you all right?" he asked softly, and Katsura groaned, sinking back against the tree with a defeated sigh.

"How can I be?" he murmured. "He's never been like that with me before. No matter what I've done, or what's happened, he's never..."

He trailed off, running his fingers through the cold dark earth that surrounded him.

“Even when he brought me here, time after time, it was never with anger,” he whispered. “He was always patient, always firm... as though he was doing it for my own good. To face my fears, he said. To make me stronger... to teach me to deal with the thoughts and feelings I picked up from other things and other people. It was part of my training, and... even though I was scared, deep down I knew that it was for my own benefit. He was trying to help me... I always felt it was that way. But today...”

“He was very angry,” Koku agreed pensively, crossing the barren ground and pausing a couple of feet from his companion’s hunched form. “He thought you’d lied to him... you should know that lying is something he doesn’t easily forgive.”

“I did lie to him,” Katsura raised his gaze helplessly to the other man’s. “What else could I do? You told me just as surely not to tell anyone. They wouldn’t have understood — I’m not sure I even do.”

He clenched his fists.

“Wait till I get my hands on Kurotsuchi! I’ll rip him limb from limb myself!”

“No... no, I wouldn’t do that,” Koku cautioned, shaking his head. “Right now, you have bigger troubles to deal with than one tale-telling spy. If Kurotsuchi wants to cause trouble, let him. If there’s anything to be done there, you can trust me to handle it. You need to stop and think about what you’re going to do... because Keitarou-san was serious. I tried to convince him otherwise, but he intends you to go to Seireitei and kill that Edogawa girl. If not...”

“It might lead people back here. I know. I know!” Katsura buried his head in his hands. “I spoke to her. Helped her. Gave her plenty enough time to remember what I looked like.”

“Did you think she wouldn’t tell her comrades about you?” Koku sank down onto the soil, pulling the folds of his hakama closer to his body to keep them as free from grime as he could. “That was naive, Katsura, even for you.”

“I didn’t think about it at all,” Katsura admitted. “I just didn’t want to kill her. That’s all.”

“That argument won’t wash this time.” Koku sighed. “He’s indulged you before, and Eiraki-san will plead your case, no doubt, but when it comes down to it...”

“I made the mess, and I need to fix it,” Katsura’s eyes narrowed. “I don’t know how to get into Inner Seireitei, if that’s even where she is, and Koku, that's the least of my problems. Even if I go, which I will... even then... I'm not sure I can complete this order. I daren't defy him a second time, but... I don't think... I can kill her."

"Why not?" The question was neither accusing or surprised, and Katsura met his companion's calm, questioning gaze with a hesitant one of his own, somehow reassured by Koku's characteristically unflappable demeanour.

"I don't even know myself," he admitted now. "Does that sound strange to you? I'd risk my life... I'd risk everything for someone I've met once... someone who's my enemy, clear as day, and who would probably look at me with the worst eyes if she knew... what I'd gone to the Spiritless Zone to do. If she knew I was wrapped up in the deaths of her comrades... she'd hunt me down and drag me before the Council without a moment of hesitation. Those things I know all too well, but despite that..."

"Are you in love with her?" Koku asked softly, and Katsura shook his head.

"I'm not. If I were, maybe I'd be able to override it," he said regretfully. "You've always called me fickle, taking my affections from one woman to another, and I suppose that, if this was that kind of feeling, it'd pass in just as quick a way. No, it's not that. I don't have those kind of feelings for her. She's a shinigami. She's older than me. It's just..."

"Just what?"

"I don't know. I really don't know." Katsura muttered. "It's driving me crazy, but I can't pinpoint it at all."

"Hrm." Koku was silent for a moment, drawing his hands across his knees as he contemplated. Then he let out his breath in a long, slow, sigh.

"It would be easier, I think, if you'd fallen for her," he observed at length. "As you said, those things can be overcome. I'm afraid for you, Katsura. I don't like the path you're walking down, and I'm not sure I know a way to bring you back."

"Koku?" Katsura shot his companion a dismayed glance, taking in the hooded shadow of the other man's eyes beneath the criss-cross cover of the dead tree branches.

"You're going to warn her, aren't you?" the younger man asked softly, and Katsura swallowed hard.

"You're reading my thoughts again," he accused, but Koku shook his head.

"I don't need to," he said, his voice pained. "I already know you won't kill her. I knew it before, and I know it now. You can't kill her, because you're not like Sakaki. You can't kill someone just because you're told to, or because it's sport. You have to believe that they're your enemy -someone evil, someone unredeemable. You have to feel there's justification to kill them, but you can't do that for this Edogawa girl, can you? You've seen her as a person — like you or I, she's real to you now. You read her thoughts, understood her real feelings, and you identify that with your own beliefs. She's not your enemy any longer, and that means you can't kill her. Even if Keitarou-san orders it, it's too late. As soon as a foe takes on human form in your mind's eye, you hesitate. He'd do better sending Sakaki to finish the job."

"He can't." Katsura said shortly, and Koku nodded.

"I know, but it complicates things," he said grimly. "Keitarou-san believes that, if he sends you with a threat of abandoning you, he'll force you to comply... but he really doesn't understand you very well, does he? You'll go, yes, but..."

"I'm not turning against Father, Koku!" Katsura said hurriedly. "That's not my intention — I'm not going to betray him! I just... want to find a way to let Mitsuki go, that's all. I thought, maybe, if I went and I spoke to her... if I asked her that, in return for saving her life, she might protect mine..."

"That's why you're naive," Koku rubbed his brow wearily. "By showing yourself to her, you give her even more ways to find you. I don't know if your Edogawa Mitsuki is someone you can trust, and nor do you. More, Keitarou-san believes her death will weaken Seireitei considerably. I don't think he'll take any chances, even if you did manage to negotiate a deal with her."

"Then what do you suggest I do?" Katsura demanded hopelessly. "I can't kill her, Koku. I can't. Maybe it's as you say, but it doesn't change the fact that I've decided to let her live. I can't go back on it — to me, she's someone who shouldn't die. She's someone who's valuable to the well-being of innocent people, and she cares about them. I won't kill that spirit. If I did, it would make me a murderer, and I'm not going to become that!"

Koku eyed him sadly for a moment, then, slowly, lowered his head in defeat.

“I don’t want you getting hurt, Katsura,”

This time the words trickled across a psychic connection, and Katsura flinched at the genuine sadness in his companion’s tones. “I don’t like this path, and I’m afraid you won’t be able to turn back.”

“You think I should kill her?”

“I think you should be very careful. That’s all.”

Koku pressed his lips together thinly.

“I don’t believe in killing as a means to an end, so you won’t ever hear me tell you to go kill anyone. I don’t agree with Keitarou-san in that regard, so he’ll never send me to Seireitei to do that kind of dirty work. My case and yours are different, though. I don’t know whether he’d sacrifice you... even as his own son, I can’t be sure...”

‘I don’t know what’s going to happen, either,’ Katsura admitted. “If I don’t come back here with the deed done...”

“How strong is your resolve to let her live, Katsura?” Koku’s question was sharp, like a bullet through Katsura’s thoughts, and he started, eying his companion in consternation.

“Pretty strong. Why? What do you have in mind?”

“Mm,” Koku’s eyes became near slits. ‘Enough resolve to defy Keitarou-san a second time? Even, lie to him again?’

“Tell me what you’re thinking.” Katsura demanded, and a cold, humourless smile touched Koku’s pale features.

“I can think of one way,” he murmured, his voice so soft Katsura could barely hear his words. “If you’re already decided to be reckless, then maybe... maybe there is a way to resolve this that means nobody has to die.”

20. Skies of Blood

Chapter Nineteen — Skies of Blood

The village of Motonoyama was bustling with the weekly market as Katsura ducked his head beneath the branches of a swaying willow tree, pausing in its shade to observe the local people running here and there in a hurry to get their errands completed before the setting of the sun. Although apart from the crowd, an occasional wary glance his way told him that his presence had not been overlooked, and he chewed absently on his lip, scanning the horizon for any sign of a familiar face.

Motonoyama was as close as Katsura had ever been to the hallowed walls of Inner Seireitei. Though he had manipulated Hollows in various different regions of the eight Districts, he had never come this close before to the white stone divide that, at four points marking the notches of a compass broke into huge wooden doors, the planks cut from the strongest oak and pinned together several layers thick with strong iron nails. Behind each one of these gates, Katsura knew, Clan retainers stood guard, interspersed with shinigami of lower rank belonging to the Second Division's sinister Onmitsukidou, and so in the past he had been careful to keep his distance. Motonoyama had acted as a natural barrier between safe ground and the land over which the Shinigami held the strongest sway, for, as the name suggested, the surrounding territory rose up into a broken mountain, once tall and grand but, savaged by time and the elements, now little more than a ridge that curved protectively around the flourishing settlement within. It was one of his favourite places in lower Seireitei, and he had flirted and dallied with the daughter of more than one trader there in the past, but now its sheltered location seemed oppressive and claustrophobic, reminding him that he could not easily turn back.

There was a further half a ri before the white walls of marble encased Sekkiseki would come properly into view, the spirit dulling effect of the harsh stone all but negated by the fancy ornamentation the noble Council of Elders had insisted on incorporating into the divide. Though the Districts held many towns as prosperous as Motonoyama, the wall was a reminder that no matter how hard a trader sold or a farmer laboured, he would never reach the grandeur of those born of higher blood. It was a distinction Katsura had always disdained, for to him, people were people and there was no reason for one group to be exalted whilst others, unseen, scrambled along in poverty. It was largely this misplaced naivety in human equality that had persuaded him to the right in Keitarou's politics, but now, watching the locals go about their daily life, he found himself assaulted once more by doubts.

Edogawa Mitsuki is a good person. Killing good people is unnecessary. Father said that, too — that I needn't kill the local people if I didn't want to, because they were people without crime. Mitsuki didn't commit any crime against anyone. Shinigami might be corrupt, greedy and selfish, but she wasn't that way at all. I don't understand why this is so important to him... I don't understand what makes killing her right. Aren't we meant to be defending the good people?

He bit tighter on his lip, tasting blood as he remembered Koku's words to him as he had prepared to leave the evening before.

"Do what you believe is right to do," the younger man had said, gravity flickering in his often impassive dark eyes. "Leave the rest to me. If you don't want to kill her, then do as we discussed. I'll make sure it will be all right — even if I have to spend a night and a day arguing with Keitarou-san about it."

"You'll get into trouble yourself," Katsura had warned his companion doubtfully, but Koku had just laughed, shaking his head.

"Do you really think so?" he had asked, his words full of a bitter irony that had, for a moment, made Katsura feel guilty for focusing on his own concerns. "No. I'll be fine, Katsura. I'm always fine. Whatever happens, do what you believe in doing."

"And if I can't kill her, what then?"

"Then don't. Don't kill her." Koku's response had been simple and unequivocal. "If you don't, though, then take care. Make sure you know who and what to trust before you trust in them, Katsura, because whichever path you choose, there'll be no going back from it either way. I won't judge you for it, but others may... even the Edogawa girl herself."

He had smiled faintly at that moment, his eyes taking on the distant look that always made Katsura feel as though he, not his companion were the younger man.

"I don't think Edogawa Mitsuki ought to die, either," he had admitted, his tones confidential and barely above a murmur. "I think her death would be a bad thing, and just the first mistake of many. If Keitarou-san is right, and this person you rescued has close ties to some of the important shinigami in Seireitei, killing her is more likely to bring people here hunting for revenge. Letting her live is better. Keitarou-san fell foul of the Kuchiki Clan once before, by arranging the death of their chosen heir. He escaped that time, but everything since is a consequence of that. Treading on a tiger's tail is a bad omen... if he can't see that, then it's up to you and I to make sure history does not repeat itself."

I wish I had your confidence in things like this, though, Koku-kun.

Katsura grimaced, spitting out the blood and wiping his mouth on the back of his grimy sleeve.

Still, I'm here, and there's nothing to be done about it but go forward. At least dealing with people like this is something I can do.

He pulled the hood of his cloak up over his head, stepping purposefully into the mingling crowd and making a beeline for a particular stall, selling trinkets and amulets in a shaded corner of the town square. At the sight of him, the man scowled, his pock-marked face crumpling up with displeasure, but Katsura greeted him with a grin, resting the palms of his hands on the table and leaning towards the stallholder in a gesture of amiability.

"Gato-san, it's been a while. How's your daughter? I'm sure she's as beautiful as ever — maybe even more so, since I haven't walked this way in some time."

"I'm sure I told you once already not to play games with Amame," Gato growled, his bushy brows burrowing deeper into his lined skin at Katsura's frivolous comment. "What do you want, anyway? You haven't shown your face here in a long time — I thought maybe you'd curled up and died of shame. Linger round these parts too much and more vicious men than me will take their sticks and come drive you out by force — there are a lot of respectable young women living in this village, and they don't need to be sullied by the likes of you."

"As it happens, I'm not looking to kill time with one of Motonoyama's famed beauties, not this time," Katsura twitched his features into a look of regret that was only half an act. "I came to buy a good luck charm — and, at the same time, find out the latest news."

"You intend to buy from me?" Gato looked suspicious. "Since when has a rogue like you had money he hasn't palmed or stolen from another unwary traveller, hrm? I won't take your coin, not since it's as dirty as your hands and your mud-stained robes. You should leave here, before people get cross with you. You're not welcome around these parts, not since the scandal with the weaver's daughter."

"Weaver's daughter?" Katsura looked blank for a moment, then a rueful smile touched his lips. "Ah, that. I meant no harm by it. All I did was ask her to walk with me among the trees — it was the birds flying out of the branches that caused her to trip and fall, and of course, I wouldn't have been much of a man if I hadn't have caught her. It was unfortunate that those hunting gentleman happened to see us... but it was all a gross misunderstanding. Really, I came to cause no trouble. And I have money — not stolen coin, but given me by my father for this particular pilgrimage of mine."

He slid his fingers into his obi, pulling out a tattered purse in which rattled a handful of copper coins. Keitarou had given them to him before he had left, in order that he could buy information along the way. There was no money in Rukongai, and how his father had come by the coins he neither knew nor wanted to ask, but at the very least he knew that he had not stolen them, and so he jangled the purse with clear conscience, offering the trader a benign smile.

"A pilgrimage, is it?" Gato snorted, swiping the purse away with the back of his hand. "I hope it's to some shrine of note, because with sins like yours, you'll need all the blessings you can get to settle them. I told you, I don't want your coin. Get away with you — you'll buy nothing from me."

"Fine," Katsura pouted, but obediently put the money away, taking a step or two back from the stall. "In that case, you can tell me something, and in return I'll leave the village directly. Is that more to your liking, good sir?"

He used formal language, his tone mocking and playful, and Gato bristled, glaring at him angrily.

"Impudent whelp," he muttered. "Fine, but you make sure you keep to it and leave right away. I've real customers to serve, and if I'm seen talking to you, my reputation will take a hit."

"There are shinigami patrolling this area, aren't there?"

"As ever," Gato frowned. "Why, what business is it of yours what they do? They're unlikely to show interest in someone like you."

"Well..." Katsura drew out his word slowly and carefully, then shrugged, offering a sheepish, half-guilty smile. "I might have stepped a little close to the line on a couple of occasions. You know, they let girls fight with men in those Seireitei squads? Some of them are real pretty, too. It's hard to ignore them, dressed up in that black uniform, when it shows their figures so nicely."

"You really are a rogue, aren't you?" Gato groaned, and Katsura grinned.

"You live once," he said unrepentantly. "I'd rather avoid their patrol ground, though, if I possibly can. Which way do they usually go? I'll take the other and then I'm less likely to get myself into trouble. Father told me himself that if I caused him any more embarrassment, he'd take me to task — and I'm not really eager for a beating when I get home."

His lips thinned slightly as he realised how close to the truth this lie had come, and Gato nodded his head in defeat.

"If it gets rid of you, that I can do," he replied wearily. "They usually take the northern path, skim the outer ridge and then come back through the village, cutting through the square towards dusk each day. They cause us no trouble, unlike some young harum-scarums — they go about their business and we about ours."

"That's all I needed to know," Katsura's grin widened, revealing a row of white teeth. "I'll save my coins for the next time we meet, Gato-san — perhaps then I'll bring Amame-chan something pretty as a gift in gratitude for her father's kindness."

"Why you..." Gato was already reaching for the sturdy stick that stood up against the stall as defence against thieves or cutpurses, but Katsura was too quick for him, already halfway across the village square and making his way towards the twisting path that fed out towards the opposite side of the village. Once out of view, however, he doubled back on himself, tracking slowly and cautiously around the outside of the ridge and settling himself in a patch of long grass to wait for the distinctive, humming presence of approaching shinigami.

Far from avoiding them, he knew that if he was going to get entry to Inner Seireitei, the only way to do so was to tackle the enemy head on.

Gato said that they come towards evening. That suits me well. I can rest here and wait for them and, in the meantime, see what dark spirits lurk in the valleys hereabouts.

He stretched out on his stomach, unfolding his sharp senses to sweep across the peaceful landscape in search of the tormented soul of a newly turned Hollow.

In the confusion, I should be able to pick one of them off, take his robe and conceal myself among them for the return to Inner Seireitei. With any luck, the setting sun and the clash with the Hollow will distract them from paying me too much attention... and then, once inside Inner Seireitei... then the drama really starts. I hope I can pull this off, Koku. You're far better at the strategising than I am, and if it goes wrong this time...

He put a hand absently to his throat, stifling a shiver.

I don't know if Father would really abandon me to Shinigami justice, or whether that was just a ruse to get me here, but I don't want to find out. I can't kill Mitsuki, so my only other hope is to make an ally of her. Her life was in my hands, and now, mine will be in hers.

"Well, well, this is a heartening sight."

As Kirio swept the last of the dust from the division courtyard, a merry voice assailed her and she swung around, her eyes widening in surprise as she registered who stood beneath the wooden gate that led into Thirteenth Division's compound.

"Tenichi-kun?" she exclaimed, the broom and her chores forgotten as she hurried to greet her old friend, flinging her arms around him and hugging him tightly. "Oh, I heard that you'd been found, but... I didn't expect..."

"That I'd come so soon back to the scene of the crime, as it were?" Tenichi offered her a rueful smile, detaching himself gently from her embrace and holding her at arm's length. "Have I worried you, Kirio-chan? I'm sorry. It wasn't on purpose — believe me, I didn't choose to go anywhere."

"You're an idiot for getting grabbed, though, and that's unforgivable," Kirio swiped him across the shoulder, casting him a pretend glare of severity. "Didn't Taichou teach you how to protect yourself better than that? Your skills have slipped since you moved divisions, Tenichi-kun!"

"Maybe that's true," Tenichi agreed ruefully, scratching his head. "I've already spoken to the Fukutaichou about maybe doing some extra stealth and hakuda training. The person who grabbed me cuffed me with spirit cuffs almost at once, and I realised I rely way too much on my spirit power to get me out of trouble. You can consider me much humbled by the experience — I've spent this morning prowling the thoroughfare outside the Twelfth Division with Kikyue-dono, trying to pinpoint the place I was assaulted and having my commander go over and over my failings is a bit denting to my pride."

“You deserve it, making us all so frantic,” Kirio stepped back from him, putting her hands on her hips. “Did you come to see Ketsui? He’s training with Tsukabishi in the Kidou arena, but if you want to see him...”

“Actually, this time, I came looking for you,” Tenichi shook his head, running his fingers through his thick reddish hair with a sheepish smile. “I saw my brother last night. I spent most of yesterday being poked and prodded by healers and superior officers, and then had a three hour session being grilled by my Captain on everything I remembered about the experience — which, incidentally, isn’t much — but then they relented and Fukutaichou agreed to have Ketsui brought to see me. It was only for a little while, but I saw the strain it had taken on the lad, and I thought I ought to drop by here in case others were similarly bothered by my absence.”

“I don’t need you knocking around, so you needn’t fret on my account,” Kirio said matter-of-factly. “I’m well able to carry on with my duties regardless of where you are or aren’t, but it was rough on Ketsui-kun. He seems to think you’re some paragon and that nothing can possibly hurt you, so this was a blow to his brotherly expectations.”

“Well, we only have each other when it comes to blood family, so I guess that’s natural,” Tenichi acknowledged. “Fukutaichou said I’d been missing five or six days... that’s a long time with no word of my situation, so I’m sorry for it. All joking aside, Kirio-chan — I really am.”

He frowned, his eyes momentarily clouding.

“Time moves strangely when you don’t know where you are or what’s going to happen next,” he murmured. “Fukutaichou wants me to pick up where I was before and put it behind me, but it’s not so easy to do as all that.”

“I thought you couldn’t remember what happened?” Kirio linked her arm in her friend’s, leading him into the courtyard and pausing to pick up her discarded broom. “Come on, the Taichou will be keen to see you, too.”

“I’m sure he won’t, since I heard that Kikyue-dono came here in a flurry demanding if you people had seen me the first day I was gone,” Tenichi grimaced. “I’d rather keep a low profile from your Captain for now, if it’s the same by you. I came to see you, Kirio-chan, not the whole of Thirteenth Division. The Fourth Division’s healer who saw me yesterday said I shouldn’t hurry back into active service till my body's readjusted to having the spirit cuffs removed, so, since I'm at a loose end, I thought I'd wander by here. It's better than being on my own and dwelling on things I can't very well change."

"I see," Kirio looked thoughtful, glancing at the broom before setting it down properly against the wall. "All right, then. I'm done here, and I've nothing else pressing for a little while, so why don't we take a walk away from here and you can tell me all your troubles? You look like there are a few hanging over you — even though you're pretending like all's fine and dandy, you've lost weight, and you look pale. I guess spirit cuffs don't agree with you, huh?"

"Not at all," Tenichi groaned. "When they came off, I swear, for a moment I thought I was going to die. My spirit power flooded back through me and it wasn't nice. I feel better this morning, granted, but still a little delicate. I've had my sword confiscated until my reiryoku is steadier, so I think Taichou believes I might explode and destroy the barracks if they don't treat me with extreme care."

"Endou-taichou let you loose, so I suppose he's not so very cross with you," Kirio observed, as they left the Thirteenth Division's barracks, crossing over the thoroughfare and slipping between two barrier stones along the well worn path that led away from the military heartland of Inner Seireitei. Near the border with the Districts was a patch of open green which, in the warm summer months, was often frequented by dozing shinigami taking a break away from the pressures of their division and so even without saying their destination out loud, Tenichi knew exactly where they were heading.

"So lush and green, it seems wrong somehow," he murmured, as they stepped beneath the exuberant bough of a blossoming sakura tree, pushing the foliage aside so that they could enter the green proper. "Don't you ever think that it's strange how alive and fresh this place is, in the middle of a military base?"

"Not really, though I am glad of the chance to stretch my legs and get away from drill for a while," Kirio looked surprised. "You're not usually given to that kind of contemplation, though... why all of a sudden?"

"The idea of losing it, maybe?" Tenichi grimaced, dropping down onto the grass and indicating for his companion to follow suit. "I'm sorry, I guess I'm still trying to put the pieces back together."

"What happened, Tenichi-kun?" Kirio softened her voice, obediently settling herself on the grass beside him. "You can tell me, even if you don't want to tell your Captain everything. I'm your friend, and it won't change anything."

"Kirio-chan..." Tenichi paused, eying her carefully for a moment, then he sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

"I think I was drugged with something," he said at length, his words soft and almost sad. "I don't remember much. Someone grabbed me on my walk back to Seventh, and pulled me into what felt like a Senkaimon. Then... bits and pieces, disjointed fragments... that's all. Faint smells I couldn't identify, voices I didn't know, and the blur of day and night without knowing which was which. Then..."

He hesitated, wetting his lips, and Kirio watched him keenly, waiting for him to compose himself.

"I woke up somewhere in Seventh," he continued cautiously. "It was a dense piece of forest, and... Fukutaichou came to get me. I'm not allowed to say any more than that — but I really don't understand how I came to be found or why I'm safely back here like this. I'm not hurt... but I don't know what kind of ransom Taichou had to pay in order to secure my release."

"I don't know that, either," Kirio admitted. "Taichou might not even know, though Endou-taichou and Kyouraku-taichou have both been here a few times lately, and yesterday morning, Taichou went to the Second on some kind of business. You've heard about what happened in the Spiritless Zone, I trust?"

"Yes." Tenichi's eyes darkened. "Fukutaichou gave me the bare outlines, and I've heard bits and pieces. Someone said one of the healers was with you, recuperating — is that right?"

"It is," Kirio agreed. "She's an old classmate of Naoko-san's and the Captain's, so I suppose Unohana-taichou thought it best she came here. She seems a nice person — smart, and very pretty. I haven't heard what happened in the Spiritless Zone in any detail — it seems to be classified — but I know Edogawa-san was attacked by a Hollow, because she said so herself. One of her comrades is currently in Intensive Care in the Fourth because of that same Hollow... though what it was doing in the Spiritless Zone in the first place is anyone's guess."

"I suppose there are broken souls everywhere. Maybe even here," Tenichi sighed, flopping back on the grass and gazing up at the sky. "It's a shock, though... that something could decimate a whole platoon of officers like that."

"Naoko-san said that healers aren't really trained in combat arts very well,” Kirio responded. “They’re looking into changing that, but Naoko-san says that they’re far too unaccustomed to the kind of conflict the rest of us face up to every day. They come and pick up the pieces of our battles — but they don’t really learn to fight their own.”

“I suppose the Fourth are at sixes and sevens then, at the moment?”

“Yes, very much so.” Kirio agreed gravely. “Otherwise there’s no way that Unohana-taichou would’ve wanted Edogawa-san to be taken care of here. They just don’t have enough people to cover all bases and deal with the investigation into the deaths. The Spiritless Zone is in jeopardy... who knows what will happen from hereon in?”

“I see,” Tenichi chewed on his lip, then he hauled himself up into a sitting position once more. “Kirio-chan, this is a strange question, and right out of the blue, I know, but... are you still in contact with Ukitake Shikiki?”

“Shiki-chan? Of course!” Kirio looked indignant. “I’m not that fickle, Tenichi-kun! Even if my friends go into different squads, that doesn’t mean I change my view of them! You should know that, being that you’re proof of it!”

“All right, all right,” Tenichi grinned, holding up his hands in mock surrender. “You don’t need to get so defensive, I wasn’t questioning your loyalty. I just wondered, that’s all, whether you still found time to talk to her.”

“Shikiki was my roommate and my best friend at the Academy,” Kirio retorted. “Did you really think I’d forget her that quickly?”

“I thought I was your best friend?” Tenichi adopted a hurt expression, and Kirio grimaced, punching him playfully on the arm.

“You were my other best friend, but you weren’t my roommate. Sensei would’ve had issues with that,” she told him teasingly. “Besides, in the final year, you were all formal and Anideshi-ish. Ordinary mortals like us couldn’t compare.”

“Now who’s being an idiot?” Tenichi arched an eyebrow. “I don’t remember forsaking anyone I was close to.”

“What about Shiki-chan, anyway?” Kirio rolled onto her stomach, resting her chin in her hands and casting her companion a questioning look. “If I remember right, you and she knew each other before you and I met — before she and I met, too. You never did spend much time with her at school, though — I dunno, I never really understood why, since you didn’t seem to hate each other. Now, all of a sudden you’re asking after her? She wasn’t in the Spiritless Zone — though I’d think you'd at least know that."

"No, it isn't about that," Tenichi plucked a blade of grass, rolling it absently between his fingers until his skin was stained with green. "It's something else. Kirio, you remember I talked to you about things, before I was kidnapped? Things that I asked you not to mention to Ketsui?"

"Things about Daisuke-san?" Kirio asked curiously, and Tenichi nodded. "Tenichi-kun, you were just abducted and you're meant to be recovering from it — is this the time to be pursuing that as well?"

"Because I was abducted, I need to pursue it," Tenichi admitted. "It occurred to me how easily life can be taken, and, well, how quickly everything can change. You think the world is one way, but in fact, maybe it's another. It made me think of Father... and all the questions I still have relating to what happened to him."

"You look serious all of a sudden," Kirio frowned. "Tenichi-kun, something did happen while you were abducted, didn't it? Something you remember, but you don't want to talk about."

"I'm not allowed to talk about it. Fukutaichou told me I mustn't," Tenichi said flatly. "He came to get me, so I won't betray his trust — but yes, I suppose it did. Something to remind me of Father, and put him foremost in my mind. Please don't ask me questions, Kirio — just hear me out instead."

"If it's that kind of thing, then of course I won't pry," Kirio agreed. "Well? What about Shikiki, then?"

"I'd forgotten, but when we were small, Shikiki was often there with Ketsui and I," Tenichi explained. "I didn't really question why, since Father and Mother treated her as though her being there was perfectly normal. Then we left, but Shikiki didn't come with us. She stayed behind with Father, and I wondered... if she knew about what happened to him. As a child I never thought about why Father didn't send her with us, but, as time's gone on, it's dawned on me that it wasn't because Father didn't want to protect her. It was something else entirely."

"Such as?"

"Shikiki didn't belong to Mother and Father, so he couldn't send her anywhere," Tenichi replied darkly. "She was the ward of someone else, and that's why she stayed behind."

"Someone else in the village?"

“She never talked to you about it?”

“She only ever really talks about the Ukitake-ke as her family,” Kirio said pensively. “I know that her parents died, and she spent some time with you and your brother, but no. She never spoke to me much about that time. She said it hurt her to remember, so I didn’t ask.”

“I see,” Tenichi sighed. “Then she might not like me asking her questions, either. I’d like to know what she remembers, but...”

“Would you like me to broach it with her for you?” Kirio suggested. “If I explain to her why, she might be willing. We’re friends, and you and she do go way back. I don’t mind, if you want me to — it might be better than you suddenly descending on her with all kinds of questions.”

“Would you?” Tenichi’s face flooded with relief, and Kirio grinned.

“You didn’t really come to see me so much as to get me to help you speak to Shikiki,” she accused lightly. “I’m nothing more to you than a means to an end, Tenichi-kun — how cold!”

“On the contrary, seeing you makes me feel a whole lot more myself,” Tenichi returned the grin with a faint one of his own. “I’m every which way about a lot of things at the moment, but one thing that’s stuck with me is that I could’ve died without ever knowing what happened to Father. I need to know for sure what did — and where he is, and whether the bits and pieces I know about it are true or not. Shikiki might be the person who can answer those questions — so if you don’t mind helping...”

“I’ll ask her, but I won’t make her relive things she doesn’t want to relive,” Kirio warned. “You’re my friend, but so is she, and she’s had a lot on her plate lately. It was Shikiki’s spirit power that helped save the people in the Spiritless Zone, and Unohana-taichou has been relying on her a lot recently. If she says no, Tenichi, then that’s how it is. I won’t force her.”

“Fair enough,” Tenichi agreed. “If she says no, I won’t go after her of my own accord. I’ll just have to find another way... but I hope she’s willing. Even though it’s a friendship that’s drifted apart, we did used to play together, and for the sake of those shared memories, perhaps she will.”

“When I see her, I’ll mention it,” Kirio promised, getting to her feet and reaching down to pull her companion up with her. “Meantime, I’m playing hooky and you’re going to be the subject of a search party if you don't go back to your barracks safe and sound. I'll walk back to Seventh with you and deliver you there myself, then I'll go pick up where I left off with my duties. You might be taking it easy, but not everyone has that luxury."

"You said you had some free time," Tenichi objected, and Kirio dimpled.

"That was because I was glad to see you, and you obviously wanted to talk about something," she said with a shrug. "It's not as free as all that, but now I know you're okay, I can get back to what I should be doing with an open mind."

"Well, don't blame me if you get scolded," there was a little of Tenichi's usual mischief in his voice and he clapped her lightly on the back. "I was led here under false pretences, so I won't be taking responsibility for the consequences."

"It's good to have you back, you know, Tenichi-kun," Kirio eyed him pensively. "I've missed you."

"That's some admission," Tenichi said playfully, and Kirio shrugged.

"I think you should follow Souja-dono's instructions, too, and try and put it behind you," she advised seriously. "Finding Daisuke-san is one thing, but whatever else it is that's bothering you, Tenichi-kun, try to let it go. Whatever you say, I'm sure there's something about the last few days that's on your mind, and if you're not careful, it'll eat a hole right through you. Whatever it is, you're safe now. You're back home where you belong — it's over, so let it be, huh?"

Tenichi was silent for a moment, and Kirio's brow creased in consternation.

"Tenichi-kun?"

"Maybe," Tenichi conceded at length, reaching to take her by the arm and lead her back towards the path that led to the barracks. "I'll keep it in mind, Kirio-chan, I promise."

The sky was leaden, a sheet of cobalt grey that hung heavily over the hills as though draped there by unseen hands. The air was thick and dark, the fragments of dust and moisture clinging so tightly together that it was almost impossible to see a way through. Shapes without form or identity loomed suddenly in and out of view, as though there was a world outside the haze, but these disappeared just as quickly as they appeared, no more than ghosts or illusions set against a murky horizon. The path beneath his sandalled feet made only the most muffled of sounds, as if it too were subdued by the heavy aura permeating every inch of visible land. Still he walked on, the road appearing endless, not knowing where he had begun, nor where his final destination might be.

It felt as though he had been walking forever, but, at length, through the cloying mist, he could hear the faint call of a bird of prey, the sound growing fainter and fainter as the creature dipped deeper and deeper into the fog. A shadow followed the raucous sound, making the creature real before stealing it away again behind the blanket of smoky grey. Disorientated, he blinked, straining to see more clearly through the haze. The bird told him there was land hereabouts, not human land but wild land, perhaps dotted with trees and wild grasses, where small creatures made their nests and where a creature could hunt on the wing unfettered by the barriers created by man. All these things his mind pieced together, yet though he continued to walk, none of them came into view. Only the bird seemed to be real, flying and looping over his head but no matter how close it came he could only catch the briefest glimpses, the tip of a grey feather, perhaps the glint of a golden beak.

He reached out futile hands, trying to grasp a creature he knew would never come to him, for though some folk kept birds like this for sport, he could tell from the creature's defiant call that this one was governed by nobody. It's sleek, dull features hid a shrewd killer's heart, and he wondered whether the bird's beady gaze was fixing on him, hunting him instead of the small fry that scurried in and out of the invisible hedgerow.

The next moment, a slash of silver like lightning cut through the sky, splitting it in half and causing it to fall in heavy, sooty rain around him, smothering the landscape in ash-like debris. Coughing and struggling to catch his breath, he realised that the sudden slash had cut away the mist and fog, rendering his surroundings fully visible for the first time. To his surprise, he had not walked any distance at all for, as the world came into clear focus, so did his recollection of his journey's start and end. He was still where he had been at the start of his walk, the dead tree's bleached branches casting twisted, ugly shadows over the ground, the spring bubbling with fresh water over dusty, dry earth, and then, at the end of a long, shadowed path, the wall of a hut, barely concealed by a twisted fence of brush and scrub.

A sudden screech of terror jerked his attention away from the scenery, causing him to raise his gaze once more to the sky. Now he could see the bird clearly, but, to his dismay, it was no longer freewheeling, its stalking hunt curtailed by the thin thread of silver wire wrapped around its throat and the top of its left wing. As it struggled, the wire drew tighter, making the bird's movements more uneven and jerky as it fought to break itself free. The silver feathers began to shimmer with specks of red as it fought in vain, the thread winding itself slowly like fishing twine around the branches of the dead tree. With each tug of an unseen hand, it brought the bird lower and lower until he could see it clearly, gasping for breath, its eyes wide and fearful and its struggles more and more frantic. As it fought, stray feathers fell to the ground and, as those feathers touched the earth they turned to pebbles, fragments of smoothly polished stone that rattled and rolled together like the chattering of teeth. Now the creature was within his reach, but even as he reached up a finger to touch the stained plumage, a second bolt of silver slashed down between them, causing him to stumble backwards as it scorched through the earth.

No, not scorched. As he gazed at the place the lightning-silver bolt had made impact, he saw that it was a sweeping, clean cut through the soil, as though weaved by the blade of a warrior's sword. The ground was wet with blood, and his heart lurched in his chest as he realised the significance of that fact. Slowly, reluctantly, he raised his gaze, registering as he did so that the bird's panicked cries had ceased completely.

The creature, trapped against the tree flapped motionlessly in the gentle breeze, its chest scarlet with red. The end of what appeared to be a tree branch protruded from its chest, but as the bird moved, he saw the implement glint like metal in the pale light. The heavens shuddered once more, expelling a third silver bolt, but now he knew it was not lightning but the blade of a katana, wielded by an unknown killer. It sliced through the thread trapping the bird to the tree, then cut through the bird's body, paring it neatly in two and causing it to fall like a dead weight to the ground below. As it hit, it shattered into more fragments of stone, and, as those fragments seeped into the earth, the whole world shook and twisted, juddering with all the force of a seismic spasm.

It was no longer raining ash, but drops of blood, fresh and crimson, running over the remains of the savaged tree and through the crevasses and dips that the tremors had created in the earth. The land shook again, more violently this time, and deeper cracks began to tear through the ground, splitting across and across again. From within the cracks a flurry of insects flew up into the air, swarming and blocking what little light there was, and, as the blood pooled around his feet, he felt as though he was sinking, pulled down by invisible hands, the whisper of disembodied voices echoing unnervingly in his ears.

Koku opened his eyes, breathing hard, his heart pounding fit to burst in his chest. Something damp soaked his brow and his clothing, and for one terrible moment he thought it was blood, but, as he touched his finger to his skin he realised it was perspiration — the images that had seemed so vivid seconds before were only in his head, and the dream was already beginning to fragment and slip away.

He dragged his shaking body into a sitting position, leaning up against the wall of his reading shelter with an unsteady sigh. The room around him was pitch black, though thin slivers of light seeping through the cracks in the wood told him that it was still daylight out. Scraps of worn, recycled parchment lay scattered around him, testament to what he had been working on before he had fallen asleep, but he could not force his mind back to the coherence of before, the colours and sensations of his dream still too vivid in his mind's eye. His head span and ached, his stomach turning from the violent nature of the images, and for a moment he closed his eyes, immersing himself in the reassuring darkness. There were no pictures lurking there now, just empty black, and he focused his attention on this, drawing deep breaths into his lungs and exhaling slowly as he attempted to calm his body down.

Katsura's in Seireitei.

He opened his eyes slowly, pushing himself to his feet and using the wood to hold himself upright, transferring his weight to the makeshift bookshelf to support his trembling form.

Katsura's in Seireitei.

He repeated it again, almost as a calming mantra, trying desperately to bring his consciousness back onto an even keel. He glanced helplessly at the scraps of paper, knowing that the words they contained were important, but unable to read even the simplest character as anything more than a black smear against the beige. The more he looked at them, the more the kanji seemed to squirm and wriggle across the page like insects, and with a jolt the dream returned to him in violent technicolour, the swarming insects filling the room before disappearing into the dappled patterns the faint streams of light made against the walls. Bile rose in his throat and he screwed up his eyes, fighting to resist the urge to vomit. The feeling would pass soon enough, he comforted himself. All he had to do was keep breathing, and, little by little, the panic would subside and his brain would reassert control over his body.

In the meantime, I need to help Katsura. I need to do something... to make sure he's all right.

He leaned back against the wall, running his hands against the rough seam of the wood in a rhythmic pattern, rubbing his skin against the uneven surface until the surface of his hands became red. By focusing his mind on that discomfort, he could rationalise what was running through his head, and, as he forced himself to draw forth the backbone of his dream, he remembered the whispers of those voices, murmuring two syllables, over and over again.

In his dream, he had been too frightened to register them, but now, as he ran the sensation over again through his mind, he realised he could make out the sounds, and his eyes narrowed as he understood what they meant.

He stumbled forward, pulling the curtain back and forcing himself to step out into the dull daylight. Though there was no sun, the brightness bored through his aching, dizzy head, and this time there was no holding back the nausea, his stomach clenching and spasming and driving him to his knees. For a few minutes he was helpless to the demands of his instincts, then, as his stomach emptied and his body calmed, he sank back onto the dusty ground.

Get a grip on yourself, Koku. You're pathetic, letting yourself be floored by such little things at your age.

He gritted his teeth, forcing his protesting body back to his feet. You don't understand it, yet. You don't need to understand it. You need to worry about Katsura — don't let yourself get distracted by other things.

He turned his gaze back to the hut, reaching with a trembling hand for the discarded papers and, pressing them against the outer wall of the shelter, he read the words slowly to himself with painful determination.

I need to help Katsura. I promised I would, and I will.

He folded the paper into four, sliding it into his obi and leaning up against the shelter for a moment to steady his balance. Closing his eyes, he tried briefly to forge a psychic link to his missing companion but, with Katsura's absence, the activity proved futile. Katsura was on the other side of the Sekkiseki wall, a barrier that cut through all spirit power like a knife, and, in any case, Koku knew that in his current state, forging the concentration needed to link to another's mind was beyond him. The skill was Katsura's, not his own — he had poached it and exploited it, but without Katsura's native ability, there was nothing he could do. If Katsura wasn't trying to reach him, then they would not be able to link thoughts over so wide a distance. He would just have to hope that all was well over the other side.

To which end, I need to ensure that happens.

Koku's brows knitted together, and he pushed his body away from the shelter, walking slowly but resolutely back along the path towards the village. The auras of the local people swirled against his own, causing panic and confusion to rise up inside him like a stray match setting dry tinder aflame, but he soldiered on, searching through each and every presence for the one that he sought the most. Of all the people in the ramshackle settlement that Koku called home, there was one reiatsu that was identifiable by its lack of presence rather than its obvious existence. More even than the suppressed slithers of Keitarou's transient aura was the spiritual presence of one alive yet not alive, the emptiness and lack of substance making him the hardest of all the Rukon's residents to immediately track down. To most, it was an undetectable presence, but although Koku did not have Katsura's skill of reading minds, when it came to detecting auras, his senses were exceptionally sharp. It did not take him long to get a fix on the subject of his thoughts and, as he approached the river, he made out the hunched form of Keitarou's chief spy, wrapped in his customary black cloak and cupping his hands to the dismal flow in order to drink. He was relaxed, Koku noticed with detachment. His duty completed, he was easy and unhurried in his movements, apparently basking in the pleasure of a job well done. This rankled the young man even more, and he fought to keep a grip on his flaring temper, knowing that in his current unsteady state it would be far too easy for him to fly off the handle and take matters into his own hands.

If he was to succeed, he needed his composure and his cool, shrewd mind at his beck and call. He was still pale, his body trembling from the violence of his dream and the aftermath, but with a will of iron he suppressed it, focusing his attention on his companion alone and putting all other thoughts firmly out of his head. He could not show weakness, not in front of this one. The moment he did, he put himself in danger of being attacked, and Koku had no mind to begin a game of the hunter and the hunted around the wasteland village.

At the young man's arrival, Masaya glanced up, casting the young man a look of quizzical surprise.

"About Katsura," Koku did not bother with niceties, getting straight to the point and fixing his companion with a dark, uncompromising stare. "You know that he's been sent back to Seireitei, don't you?"

"It's not for me to judge the instructions Keitarou-sama gives his children," Masaya spoke waspishly, tilting his head on one side and fixing Koku with that cold, reptilian gaze of his. "He made an error, and it's only natural he should fix it. Such things are basic training for someone who works in the shadows. Katsura-sama is young, yet, and has a lot of things to learn. This will be a good lesson for him that he cannot always be so carefree with his appearance."

There was an edge of smugness in his tones, and Koku fought again the rising wave of anger, knowing that, despite the apparent disinterest of his words, Masaya was taking particular personal pleasure in Katsura's apparent disgrace.

"If it's not for you to judge the situation, I wonder why you are," he said bluntly now, folding his arms against his chest and leaning up against the trunk of the tall tree that overhung the water, resting his weight against it in an assumption of nonchalance that concealed how unsteady on his feet he still was. "In any case, I didn't come to discuss right or wrong with you. I came to give you an order."

"I don't take orders from any but Keitarou-sama," Masaya turned his head back towards the river. "If the order comes from him, then he will doubtless summon me himself."

"It has nothing to do with him," Koku said evenly, sliding his hand into his obi and pulling out the parchment. He glanced at it for a moment, then held it out.

Masaya did not move to take it, nor even shift his gaze to acknowledge it, and Koku narrowed his gaze.

"Kurotsuchi."

"I told you, I don't follow the orders of any but..."

"Are you sure about that?"

Koku's voice had changed, dropping to a low, ominous tone that, though barely above a whisper, held a certain chill that made the spy flinch, turning to eye the young man with sudden uncertainty. "I told you, this is an order. Take it."

Masaya hesitated, and Koku sighed, thrusting the paper into the spy's hand.

"Instructions," he said curtly. "You're going to Seireitei, and you'll follow my word to the letter, understand?"

"But I..."

"Katsura may have been careless, but you got him sent back there out of personal spite, not any other reason," Koku's words became even more icy. "You know it and so do I. I'm not fooled by your pretences. You'd like to see Katsura removed from the equation, because he takes so much of Keitarou-san's attention. You're connected to Keitarou-san by science, but Katsura is tied to him by something deeper and more permanent, something you can't compete with, no matter how much you abase yourself and grovel at your master's feet. You can't equal Katsura's connection to Keitarou-san and Eiraki-san, so you'd be happy to see him caught, killed, incarcerated by the shinigami as an example of reckless abandon. You imagine him abandoned by his father to rot in a Seireitei jail, but you've miscalculated. Because of that blood connection, Keitarou-san won't abandon Katsura as easily as you think."

"Keitarou-sama's orders are his own concern. I did not have any part in his decision to send his son there, as you likely well know," Masaya said frankly.

"Seireitei has no evidence to link Katsura with Rukongai or with anything here," Koku snapped back. "His going back to kill one shinigami specifically puts him in a position that could threaten all of us if he were caught. More importantly, it could lead to him losing his life and I'm not about to let that happen. You're going to be my insurance to make sure it doesn't."

"Why should I listen to you?" Masaya demanded, a dark glint in his golden eyes. "It's not my job to clear up other people's messes."

"Well, then let's put it in language you do understand," Koku moved to sit beside the spy on the riverbank, smoothing down the fabric of his kimono carefully before meeting the other's gaze head on. "If Katsura gets caught and imprisoned, probably they'll kill him. If that happens, nobody will be very happy, least of all Keitarou-san. He's banking on Katsura succeeding and coming back here safely, and you're going to make sure he does. See, if he doesn't come back here, Keitarou-san might accept it as the sacrifices of war. He might look on it that way... but I won't. He might not blame you for his son's death, but Kurotsuchi, I will. If Katsura doesn't come back here safely, then I will kill you myself."

"You can't," Masaya said smugly. "I'm not like you. I'm not so easy to kill. This body has as good as died already. You can't slay it as easily as any common man. Not even Sakaki-sama, with her demon sword skills could sever my life — an untrained whelp like you wouldn't stand a chance against my Onmitsukidou training and the unique life force granted to me by Keitarou-sama."

"You are comparing me with Sakaki?" Koku reflected on this for a moment, then snorted, shaking his head. "I'm disappointed in you. I thought a spy never underestimated anyone, but you've clearly underestimated me."

"Meaning?" Masaya's golden eyes became suspicious slits, and Koku let out a humourless chuckle.

"You really don't know me at all, do you?"

“I have no interest in knowing people. I do what Keitarou-sama commands me, and that is all.”

“Perhaps that’s true, but just because you view the world that way, it doesn’t mean everyone else does.” Koku’s eyes glittered suddenly, an ominous aura flickering briefly around his body, and Masaya’s eyes widened with dismay at the sudden chill in the air. “Did you never hear the words, ‘knowledge is power’ before? I know how Keitarou-san saved your life, Kurotsuchi. I know everything about you — everything, even the things he doesn’t. I know how to kill you just as sure as I know how to keep you alive... so keep that in mind before you decide to disobey me. You think it wise to stay on the right side of Keitarou-san, and you’d be right to do so — but you should remember that there’s a reason why Keitarou-san indulges me like he does. I’ll say it again. If Katsura comes to any harm in Seireitei, then I will kill you. It won’t be pleasant, I assure you — but I will do it, and as slowly and as tortuously as possible. Keitarou-san can protect you against a lot of things and people — your past, the shinigami you used to work with, Sakaki, even Katsura... but remember this. He cannot protect you against me.”

“Ko...”

Masaya’s lips mouthed the remaining syllables, horrified recognition suddenly flooding his gaze, and at his companion’s clear terror, Koku smiled, a chilling, terrifying smile that did not reach his ice cold eyes.

“Yes. We understand each other,” he murmured. “Good. Then read. Follow those instructions then destroy that paper. Nobody, not Katsura and especially Keitarou-san need know anything about it. If need be, you make sure Katsura stays safe, whatever path he chooses to take, even if that means you have to lie. You do exactly as I’ve instructed you, and if there’s any danger, any chance at all of Katsura getting caught, you make sure he does not. Even if that means putting yourself in harm’s way. If you come back without him, I will kill you — no matter what excuses you put forward.”

He reached out to rest a hand on his companion’s arm, and Masaya let out an exclamation, flinching back as though stung by a jolt of electric energy.

“I don’t like violence,” Koku said simply, “but I also don’t like betrayal or duplicity. Katsura has to fix his mess. You fix yours, or else there will be consequences.”

He got to his feet, offering the spy a last smile before turning on his heel and padding up the bank towards the dead forest. He moved purposefully but, once out of sight of the river and its shady occupant, he faltered, putting his hand against the wall of a nearby building as everything swam and danced in front of his eyes. At the edges of his consciousness, the image of the struggling, straining bird had dyed itself in blood into his thoughts and the more he tried to suppress it, the more he was sure he could hear its terrified, hopeless cries.

He cursed, screwing up his gaze and clenching his fists, battering them against the wall of the derelict building again and again as he tried to pound the images out of his thoughts.

“Stop it.”

A calm voice interrupted his frenzy, gentle and reassuring hands taking him around the wrists and carefully yet firmly pulling him away from the wall. “Calm down, Koku. Whatever it is, you’ll not settle it by blooding your fists. Look, you’ve made a complete mess of your knuckles. Come back with me to my hut and let me put something on them, before they become infected.”

“Keitarou-san?” Koku opened his eyes, staring blankly at his rescuer, who offered him a smile, a curious, compassionate look in the muddy brown eyes.

“We can talk too, if you wish,” he suggested, already beginning to lead the young man towards his own domain as though consent had been implicitly understood between them in that one, brief glance. “I don’t want you acting like that in public, though. You’ll scare the villagers, who aren’t used to seeing you so ruffled and upset.”

“Katsura...” Koku wetted his lips, allowing himself to be guided through the village, aware of the flickering spirits of the residents watching them behind screens and curtains with interest and apprehension. “I’m worried about him. I can’t reach him from here.”

“Katsura will be quite fine, I’m sure,” Keitarou spoke with certainty. “I have faith in his coming back successful, and so must you. You can’t expect him to make contact with you from so far away, not when he’s undertaking an important mission of his own. This petulant behaviour does you no good. I don’t want to see it again — do you understand? Losing your temper in a public place, whatever the cause, brings nobody any pleasure.”

“Mm,” like a small boy being reprimanded by a kindly schoolmaster, Koku bobbed his head forward in a half-nod, only vaguely focusing on his companion’s words. At his unresponsiveness, Keitarou laughed, reaching out a hand to knock back the heavy curtain door and pushing Koku gently inside the darkened shelter.

“Sit down, rest and calm yourself. I’ll fetch water, and then we’ll talk,” he suggested lightly. “While I clean and bandage those poor hands, we’ll talk about the things that worry you, all right? Don’t worry. I’m sure we’ll put it all to rights, and you’ll feel much better.”

“Yes, sir,” The words passed Koku’s lips almost automatically, his gaze fixed on the wall of the shelter rather than the face of his companion as the images of his dream flashed in and out of view once again. Keitarou sighed, shaking his head slightly, but he made no further comment, instead slipping back out of the office in search of water.

Koku shivered, leaning up against the wall of the shelter and pulling his thin clothing more tightly around his trembling body.

I can’t tell him, not this time. Whatever it was, even the idea of putting it into words fills me with terror. This one I have to tackle on my own... somehow. I have to work it out, piece by piece. I’ll leave Katsura to Kurotsuchi — that coward won’t dare go against my instructions, not now he realises what’s at stake if he does, but in the meantime, I have to pull this into some kind of order. If I don’t... if I don’t...

He closed his eyes, barely noticing the tears that glittered on his lashes.

If I don’t, maybe the skies really will rain blood.

21. Father's Honour

Chapter Twenty — Father's Honour

“If nobody minds, I’d like to chair the meeting this morning.”

In the midst of the hubbub of voices in the Vice Captain’s usual meeting chamber, Souja raised his hand, getting slowly to his feet and gazing around at his companions expectantly. There was a sudden hush, all eyes turning to rest on the Seventh’s usually retiring Vice Captain with a mixture of surprise and confusion, and at their expressions, a rueful grin touched his clever features.

“That must be the first time since you took the badge, Souja-dono,” Enishi sat back in his seat until the wood creaked, folding broad arms across a broader chest and surveying his comrade warmly. “What do you think, everyone? I say let him have it, if he’s so keen to lead for once. He hasn’t had a chance to, yet, so it’s only fair.”

“No objections here,” Sora’s eyes were dancing with curiosity, and she nodded her dark head. “Is this to do with the Kotetsu boy, Souja-dono? I heard he’d been returned — is that true?”

“We’ll come to that when the meeting begins properly, I’m sure,” Urahara Shiketsu put in smartly, before Souja could address Sora’s question. “For the time being, Houjou, if you’re sponsoring the nomination of Souja-dono to lead this meeting, allow me to second it. It’s not often we get the chance to hear things from Seventh’s point of view — I think it would be most enlightening.”

“Thank you, Shiketsu-dono.” Souja bowed his head properly towards the heir of the Urahara Clan, moving to the head of the table amid nods and murmurs of assent from the other Vice Captains present. They were not at full capacity today, he realised, sinking down rather self-consciously into the Chairperson’s seat and shifting around to make himself comfortable in what was, for him, something of an unwelcome position. Despite his intelligence and his loyalty to his own men, when it came to his peers and seniors among the officers of his own rank, he generally found it safer to take a back seat, so to have so many eyes turned his way was disconcerting to say the least. He reddened slightly, focusing his gaze on the empty seats of the Fourth, Second and Eleventh Division Vice Captains as he regained his composure.

Unohana Eriko was, he knew, still deeply mired in the aftermath of the Rukongai attacks whilst Kai had sent apologies via Hell Butterfly to say that his current workload was too great for him to spare the time to attend. As for Ikata, he had been commandeered by his Captain and Souja greatly suspected this was to ensure that the loudmouthed adjutant didn't say anything else that might cause Eleventh Division harm, work or embarrassment in the very near future. Souja had heard from Sora's gossip grapevine that, as a result of the abduction business, Minachi had been called to answer questions before the head of his Clan, and, as a consequence, had been going around Inner Seireitei like a bear with a sore head.

With those three accounted for, Souja scanned the room for any other absences, but found none. Even Yamamoto Akira, who rarely deigned to fill his seat at such occasions, preferring instead to get any important information by way of his cousin Enishi had bothered to turn up this morning, sitting at the back with his usual impatient, peremptory expression on his face. Glancing at him now, Souja wondered why he had bothered to attend today, then he realised that it was probably as much to follow up on Ikata and Minachi's actions as it was to take part in meaningful discussion. Souja shifted his gaze across from Akira to the still grinning Enishi, absently marvelling how two men of similar age born of the same bloodline could be such diametric opposites in personality.

Souja himself was among the youngest Vice Captains, which was another reason why he had generally shied away from the spotlight. Whilst it was customary for Clan Leaders to appoint their heirs Vice Captains, there was also an expectation that that heir prove himself worthy of the role and Souja, with all his shrewd attention to detail had quickly realised he would not gain the respect of his comrades by throwing his weight around or pushing in. Today, though, he would break that habit and stand before them to speak.

"I think everyone's here who's going to be here, Souja-dono," Shirogane's cultured tones put in softly from the left hand side of the chamber. "I believe we can start the meeting — it's time."

"So it is," Souja cast a cursitory glance out of the window, nodding his thanks towards the Sixth Division's Vice Captain. "Very well, then. I would like to begin, if I may, with the subject of security in Inner Seireitei."

"This is to do with Tenichi's abduction," Enishi's thick brows knitted together in consternation. "Did the lad say something about it, then?"

“He has been found?” Kanshi arched an eyebrow, and Souja nodded.

“Some of the people in District Seven discovered him unconscious in woodland near their home and took him in,” he said vaguely, being careful to skirt around the truth of who had found the missing shinigami. “They alerted the local authorities who in turn sent me a notice that a person meeting his description had been found. I went myself to retrieve him, and found him spirit cuffed and disorientated but generally unharmed. He’s safely back at barracks now and shows no physical signs of lasting damage from the ordeal.”

“No physical signs,” Shirogane thinned his lips. “No physical ones, but mental ones, is that what you’re trying to imply?”

“That I can’t answer, since Tenichi cannot remember what happened to him during the days of his abduction,” Souja looked regretful. “A member of the Fourth kindly came and examined him on our return, and though the removal of the spirit cuffs caused him some discomfort at first, she couldn’t find anything wrong. She did warn me, though, that suppressed memories and periods of great stress can have a deeper impact on someone — so we’re keeping him to light duties for a little while, just until we’re sure that he’s settled back into normal routine.”

“Are we going to discuss this idiot’s medical history all meeting, or is there a bigger point in all of this other than you sharing your happy ending with the class?” Akira put in abruptly at that moment, and more than a few of the other Vice Captains winced at the bluntness in the other man’s tones. “Not to be funny or anything, Endou, but if all you have to say to us is that your missing man is returned, it’s hardly a reason to take control of the meeting.”

“On the contrary, it has everything to do with it,” Souja kept his cool, fixing Akira with an even gaze. “I’m sorry to have wandered a little off my original point, and I’ll return to it right now. The truth is that, the day after his return, Kikyue took Tenichi out to the area where we believed him to have been abducted, and after some time examining the scene, they both concluded that the most likely method was via a Senkaimon, even if there should not be such a gate in that location.”

“There is a gate,” Enishi interjected frankly, settling himself more comfortably in his seat, and Shiketsu shot him a startled glance. “Taichou had me going through dusty scrolls in our archive to check, and he found it, written in on an old map. It’s deactivated, true enough, but there’s still a gate there.”

“Is that true?” Shirogane glanced at Shiketsu, who nodded slowly.

“Yes, but as Houjou said, it’s no longer active,” he said uneasily.

“So it’s not part of your current gate map?” Kanshi arched an eyebrow.

“No, but that’s because it’s no longer active. It can’t be opened — that’s the whole point of sealing it,” Shiketsu said earnestly. ‘It’s been closed off for more than ten years now. It shouldn’t even be under consideration.’

“Nonetheless, it’s our most likely explanation,” Souja said grimly. “Tenichi does remember being grabbed and pulled into what felt to him like an open gate. The existence of a Senkaimon, even a disused one, seems far too coincidental to be ignored. I remember, Shiketsu-dono, how you assured us that clearance to the Senkaimon is strictly overseen — but in light of Tenichi’s testimony and the scene itself, is it not possible that someone has found a way to hack into something that’s no longer being actively monitored?”

“Is such a thing possible for someone outside of Inner Seireitei?” Ryousei cast Shiketsu a glance, and the Urahara frowned.

“It should not be,” he replied uneasily. “As I said, the gate is sealed. After our last meeting, I went and doublechecked the records, but there’s no sign of any illicit activity anywhere around that region. I did check the area around Twelfth, just on the off chance, but there was no sign of foreign reiatsu at that scene, either. All sealed gates are also kept on record, just in case the Council ever chooses to reopen one or commandeer it for emergencies. If you’re seriously suggesting that someone from the Districts has managed to find out how to open a gate, such tampering ought to have been detected by us... but it hasn’t been.”

“All swords are registered with the Council of Elders, aren’t they?” Sora pressed her lips together. “What if it was an unregistered sword, though, Shiketsu-dono? What if someone somehow managed to summon a zanpakutou without proper training and guidance? Would it still show up?”

“It would,” Shiketsu confirmed. “It wouldn’t identify the user — by which I mean there’d be no spiritual fingerprint to tell us which sword was used to unlock it, not if that sword’s reiatsu wasn’t part of our database, but there would still be trace evidence of it having been tampered with. All the Senkaimon are set up to respond to and recall contact with individual swords — but in the case of an invading presence — what we call ‘ryoka’ — the gate should lock itself until someone of Captain or Vice Captain rank comes to release it with their blade. That way, nobody should be able to get in or out of Seireitei without the proper clearance. I don't understand how that system could be overridden with a gate in active use, much less one that is locked. Father has worked on it tirelessly since obtaining the research notes and this is the first time in almost thirty years that there's been an incident like this."

"There are no exceptions?" Shirogane enquired. "No loopholes by where reiatsu would not be detected? I had heard that Bankai level shinigami are often able to open gates without leaving a trace behind."

"That is true," Shiketsu admitted, "but the number of people who are capable of Bankai are few, even among the Captains. And I hope that we can assume them all to be beyond suspicion in a case like this."

"What about the Onmitsukidou?" Akira asked. "Wasn't there some kind of agreement relating to their movement..?"

"Mm..." Shiketsu frowned. "I am not familiar with the particulars of that arrangement. There is some special condition that applies to them — but it is strictly monitored and regulated by the Shihouin Clan. Kai-dono isn't here to clearly answer yes or no to your question, but I can't imagine how any of the Secret Ops agents would benefit from kidnapping random division officers."

"Rather than casting aspersions for which we have no evidence nor any real logic to pursue, perhaps we ought to focus on the circumstances in which Kotetsu Tenichi remembers being taken." Shirogane interjected acerbically. "Most particularly, whether anyone else abroad that night might have picked up anything out of the ordinary."

"What about your people?" Kanshi turned towards Michihashi Aoi, the Vice Captain of the Twelfth Division, who shrugged helplessly.

"If you're going to ask if we saw or heard anything, the answer is no," he said regretfully. "Unfortunately Sekime-taichou had a few... er... experiment-related problems that day, and we were all a little preoccupied in putting the outer wall of the Kidou arena back together."

"I wonder if it's safe, having barracks so close to yours, Michihashi," Enishi joked, and Aoi smiled ruefully.

"We all go to bed at night wondering if there'll be a roof over our heads in the morning,” he said wryly, “but in terms of the Senkaimon, we can’t be of use to anyone. We’re all deeply involved in Sekime-taichou’s Kidou research theories, whether we want to be or not — and that leaves very little time for anything else.”

“What about the Thirteenth?” Ryuusei wondered, and Enishi frowned.

“Looking at the old plans, the gate’s out of our sight, really. Closer to Twelfth — too far from our barracks for us to really pay attention to,” he said seriously. “If we’d known in advance something was up, well, I’m sure the Taichou would’ve had us on the alert — but it’s hard to predict something you don’t know is going to happen before it does.”

“That’s more or less what I wanted to talk about today,” Souja agreed. “Nobody can see the future, but we can still improve on the current setup. We all have areas that are our clear territory, but there are patches and blind spots that sometimes are left unguarded. This gate wasn’t seen as a problem before, to the point some of us didn’t know it even existed, but now we know there could be a leak in the system, it makes sense for us to step up our patrols in these areas, too. Perhaps there are other like Senkaimon which we think are sealed but are actually not. I want to suggest that, as Vice Captains we look again at the plan of Inner Seireitei and divide up the grey areas a little more concretely. If someone has found a way to penetrate one gate, it means they might have the ability to penetrate more. That means we all need to be more vigilant.”

“In short, stake out every available and unavailable Senkaimon in and out of Inner Seireitei and wait for them to make a wrong move?” Sora asked, and Souja inclined his head.

“These people, whoever they are, are getting more and more bold with each assault,” he said gravely. “First they only took people on patrol in the outer Districts, further from Shinigami territory, but Tenichi was definitely taken from under our noses. They obviously think they have us outsmarted. Sooner or later they have to fall into the trap of complacency — I’d rather it was sooner than later. They already made the mistake of leaving Tenichi unattended long enough for him to be found. If they continue making similar errors, we have a good chance of catching them before they cause any more disruption.”

He glanced around at his peers.

“Given the other, more pressing things that the Council and our Captains have to deal with, I thought this was something we as adjutants could take care of on our own initiative, and, maybe, put the matter to rest once and for all.”

“I agree with Souja-dono,” Ryuusei nodded thoughtfully. “It’s as you say — these kidnappers are getting more brazen. If we don’t act against them now, there’s a good chance that we might fall victim to another of their petty attacks. We have no intelligence as to where or when they might strike next. At least by taking the initiative we might be better prepared.”

“It also means instructing our officers to be extra vigilant and, if possible, to patrol in pairs or threes rather than alone,” Kanshi suggested. “Some will object about being forcibly buddied up, but it’s harder to kidnap multiple people at once here in the heart of shinigami administration. That fact alone might put them off the idea of trying a second time.”

“We should put this to a formal vote, then,” Aoi interjected. “As for me, I like the idea in theory. In practice, I think more danger lurks inside the Twelfth than outside it at present, so I don’t know how many extra men I can spare — but I see the logic of the suggestion and I’ll talk to my Third and Fourth Seats too about rearranging our patrols to better coordinate with other squads.”

“Let’s vote,” Souja raised his hand, again rather self-conscious at taking the lead among so many older officers. “All in favour?”

There were general murmurs and signals of assent, and Souja’s lips twitched into a relieved smile as he realised that his companions had voted unanimously in support.

“I suppose that settles it, then,” Enishi said matter-of-factly. “When I get back to base, I’ll pass the word on to Shikibu and Atsudane, and brainstorm about what Thirteenth can do to help. We don’t have as many members as the other divisions, but then we don’t have so many gates near our prescribed territory, so it should work out quite nicely.”

“I think we’ll all be doing similar things when we get back,” Shirogane reflected. “Someone will need to transmit this information to Unohana, Shihouin and Ikata, so they know what we’ve agreed to do. I don’t foresee any problems in that regard, though. I can’t imagine they’ll have objections.”

“I’ll tackle Ikata,” Enishi volunteered. “It’s on my route home, so I’ll do it, no problems.”

“I’ll pass word on to the Fourth,” Shiketsu offered. “I promised Unohana-taichou some data relating to another matter, so I’ll raise this while I'm there."

"And Kai-dono?" Souja asked. There was an exchange of glances, and Kanji smiled ruefully.

"It's not that anyone has issues with Shihouin himself, per se," he said slowly, "but I guess nobody's in any hurry to step over the threshold and into Second. It's not the kind of place people go by choice, if you know what I mean."

"Taichou was just there the other day," Enishi blinked, looking nonplussed. "What's wrong with it, Souryou? It's a barracks, just like the rest of them, isn't it?"

"Have you ever been there yourself, though?" Kanshi arched an eyebrow. "Ukitake... Ukitake-taichou is one thing, he's a law unto himself, but for the rest of us..."

"Sure," Enishi frowned, folding his arms casually across his chest. "Not recently, of course, not with them being so busy, but I've dropped by to see Shihouin and we've chatted over sake. I don't see the problem. Sure, they're quite strict there, but it's not like the Second is a dangerous place."

"Sometimes, Houjou, you amaze me — in a variety of different ways," Kanshi's tones were amused.

"I'll take the message to second," Akira interjected at this juncture. "It's like Enishi said, there's nothing to be particularly bothered about. Just a bunch of Shihouin prancing about in black. There's not usually people around, anyway. I'll handle it, Endou. That covers everyone, I think?"

"It does. Thank you, Akira-dono," Souja bowed his head gratefully in Akira's direction. "It's hard to explain, but I feel a lot better knowing that everyone else is on board with making this a reality."

"Soul Society's on edge about a lot of things right now. It's only natural," Shirogane's handsome features twitched into a look of consternation. "It's a little off topic, but I was hoping Eriko-dono would be here today. I wanted to know the state of health of the third survivor from Rukongai. Madeki-dono is apparently now fully recovered from the ordeal, but I haven't heard very much about the other officer."

"Aomori Seri," Ryuusei pursed his lips. "As I understand it, she's still fairly frail. I have occasional conversations with Eriko-dono through the divide between our division training grounds, when she and I happen to pass ways, just to see how things are there, and she seemed to think that the girl was going to live. Whether she'll be a shinigami on duty again, though, who knows. And there's the matter of Edogawa as well — though she's still with the Thirteenth, isn't she?" this last to Enishi, who jerked his head in a nod.

"She is, but she's all right, I think," he said frankly. "Shikibu's more in charge of her than I am, being that they're old friends, and I'm not so good at the whole sickroom etiquette side of things. I think she's mending, though. She seems to have given a lot of information to the Taichou about what happened, too."

"Ryuu and I were hoping we might have an opportunity to visit her," Shirogane admitted, and Souja saw a flicker of genuine emotion briefly cross the Vice Captain's face. "Ryuu is especially anxious, but I've been keeping him busy since Guren-sama is so tied up with Clan and Council matters of late. I think he'd quite have preferred us to take custody of her when she first came back to Seireitei — but I don't think Unohana-taichou felt mobilising the Kuchiki would do anything to help calm the situation down."

"She's fine with us, but I'll talk to the Taichou about it," Enishi promised. "I'm sure he won't object to either of you coming to see her, in an unofficial capacity. Nobody wants to get the Kuchiki hot under the collar, and it's not like this was an attack on your Clan, but an attack on shinigami in general. That's why Unohana-taichou chose us, I think, because of the neutrality — but I can't see why you'd not be welcome."

"Some neutrality," Shirogane muttered, mostly under his breath, but Souja caught the words and cast his colleague a searching glance, absorbing the tension that was lurking beneath the older man's normally cool countenance.

"I didn't realise Edogawa-san was a Kuchiki," he said now. "As a member of Fourth, I guess I assumed..."

"Mitsuki is a third degree Kuchiki, and a cousin of both myself and my third seated officer, Kuchiki Ryuu," Shirogane shook his head. "Her father, Teitou, serves Guren-sama's Clan court in a high capacity, and so you might say that, by blood, she's quite an important person. If the attack against her was considered to be one against the Clan, it would create a political incident — Guren-sama and I both remember all too clearly the last time someone threatened members of our family, so even though Mitsuki has chosen to follow her vocation in Fourth, we've been watching this matter from afar with caution and curiosity."

“No wonder they gave her to Ukitake-dono to look after, then,” Ryuusei reflected. “Another political incident involving the Kuchiki would be better avoided — no disrespect to our neighbours, of course.”

“None taken. We’d all like to avoid such a thing,” Shirogane assured him. “Houjou, I’d be grateful if you would speak to Ukitake on our behalf. It would put everyone in District Six’s minds at rest — Teitou-dono’s among the others — to know that she was recuperating well.”

“Consider it done,” Enishi agreed cheerfully. “I guess she’s quite bored, not having anything particular to do, so she’d probably welcome visit from kin.”

“Is there any other business anyone would like to raise, whilst we still have a few moments?” Souja glanced towards the window, taking in the position of the sun in the sky. “We’ve spent most of this morning discussing Seireitei security, for which I apologise.”

“It was an important matter, and it needed to be done,” Shiketsu assured him. “I’ll ask Father about the Senkaimon again, too, though I can’t imagine it’ll be any use.”

“I think we’ve all got enough to think on for one meeting,” Aoi reflected. “Reorganising patrols to cover grey areas and blind spots is going to take a lot of administrative shuffling on all our parts — I vote we leave it there for today and come to any other issues afresh next time. Anything vital we can take to our Captains — they’re meeting quite regularly too, lately, so some kind of cohesion should be possible.”

“Meeting, but whether they’re resolving anything, I don’t know,” Sora grimaced expressively. “Sh... Kyouraku-taichou won’t tell me much about what goes on at their meetings, but I got the impression the last one was a bit of a heated affair.”

“Father was a little ruffled when he got back to Seventh,” Souja agreed pensively. “He doesn’t usually let that happen, not outwardly, but I got the impression there’d been some kind of disagreement about... something.”

“We shouldn’t be discussing hearsay about the Captains in our meeting,” Ryuusei said reprovingly, and Sora snorted, sending her brother a weary glance.

“Oniisama, this isn’t gossip or hearsay but something that’s going to affect us at some point or another down the line,” she said bluntly.

“Besides, for Shunsui not to tell me about it, it means that it was a big deal and he’s bothered by it. Whatever came up in that meeting, it’s probably something not good. We ought to be prepared for it, whatever it turns out to be.”

“Sora, referring to your Captain in such an informal way in the privacy of your division barracks might be permissible, but in a Vice Captain’s meeting, it is utterly unacceptable,” Ryuusei glowered back at her, and Sora stuck out her tongue, forcing Souja to stifle a smile at the brother-sister squabbling.

“My Captain doesn’t mind my calling him that when I’m on or off duty, and my Captain has more authority to tell me what to do than you do, so shut up,” she returned neatly. “I’m here representing Eighth Division, remember? In these meetings I’m not a member of the Shiba Clan or your subordinate, so don’t treat me as if I am.”

She got to her feet, casting Enishi a glance.

“I’m heading back,” she said unnecessarily. “I’ll walk with you to Eleventh, though, since I want to ask Ikata some more stuff about his abducted people for Shunsui,” she put emphasis on the name, and Souja saw Ryuusei bristle in annoyance.

“All right,” Enishi agreed, heaving his considerable bulk from his seat. “Two of us might be better than one, if you don’t mind the trek back afterwards.”

“I’ll just have to tidy the mess Shunsui’ll have made in the office, so I’m in no hurry,” Sora rolled her eyes. “Come on, let’s go. I’d rather take Ikata than another pile of mismatched supply documents. I swear he does it on purpose, just because he likes to hear me rant, rave and stomp about the office putting the place back together.”

Their voices trailed away as they left the room, heading down the corridor towards the main exit, and Souja too got to his feet, smoothing down his hakamashita with his hands. The palms were clammy, he realised with a jolt, giving away the nerves he had felt on taking the lead, yet despite the pressure, he was glad that he had spoken up.

“It’s unlike you to put yourself forward in this manner, Souja-dono,” Shirogane’s voice at his right elbow made him jump, swinging around in surprise, and the Sixth Division Vice Captain offered him a droll smile.

“I startled you, I’m sorry,” he apologised, and Souja shook his head hurriedly, embarrassment crossing his face.

“No, I was miles away for a moment,” he admitted, rubbing his brow awkwardly. “I’m sorry, Shirogane-dono — what were you saying?”

“I was just commenting on your usual reticence to step forward like this,” Shirogane gestured to the room, which little by little was emptying of shinigami. “This business with the lad’s abduction — what was his name, Kotetsu? — has really bothered you, hasn’t it?”

“Mm...” Souja’s lips thinned, and he nodded. “I suppose so. Father, too. There are a lot of things and I’m trying to make sense of them. It bothers me that everything’s happening like this at once. Common sense tells me that they can’t be connected, but at the same time, I feel they must be. Does that seem overly paranoid to you? The Endou are known for their persecution complexes, so perhaps I’m just listening a little too hard to my blood.”

“No... Ryuu and I have had similar conversations,” Shirogane admitted. “Nobody higher up seems to want to link them, but though they can’t be linked, at the same time, they must be. It’s very hard to put one’s finger on — but there’s something there all the same.”

He tilted his head slightly in consideration.

“Your man, Kotetsu — he doesn’t remember anything at all?”

“No, he says he can’t recall his time abducted. He thinks he was drugged,” Souja shook his head.

“He says he can’t, or he can’t?”

“He’s never shown himself as the kind to lie before, so if he says he can’t, I take him at his word,” Souja said carefully. “He was trained by Ukitake-taichou and the Thirteenth, and he doesn’t seem the kind to deceive. If he was an Endou by birth, perhaps it might be different, but he isn’t. He’s District.”

“Unfortunate,” Shirogane sighed. “Oh well. Perhaps with time he’ll recover some memory. There are incidences of suppressed recollections due to trauma — I know from my own past experiences that sometimes patchy memories are hard to piece together into something that makes sense.”

He ran his fingers through his dark hair, loosening the tie, and Souja saw once again the flicker of emotion deep within the other man’s grey eyes.

“If possible, I’d like to get through all of these investigations without any Clans being forced to mobilise in their own defence,” he said at length. “When bad things stir in the Districts, Clans instinctively shift towards arming themselves against trouble. I don’t want that to happen this time. There are some good people in the Districts who have worked loyally for me and for my family for a long time and I’d rather we didn’t repay them with raids and routs into Outer Seireitei territory because we’re hunting down a few vigilante rebels too smart for their own good.”

“I agree,” Souja nodded. “My family have an especially bad reputation in that regard. Father and Grandfather have worked very hard to rebuild the trust the people of Seventh have in us — I’m sure it wouldn’t take much to destroy those fragile foundations and plunge Seventh back into war.”

“Whenever a world is at peace, it simply means war hasn’t started yet,” Shirogane said soberly, “and when at war, it means nobody’s found a path to peace. The two exist in uneasy balance with one another, that is all. Well, as an Endou, I imagine your understanding in this is greater than mine. My impressions of your family have improved greatly since your Father took hold of Seventh Squad and I have no ill will toward you, either. You are both reasoned, intelligent men who understand the need for delicacy and diplomacy and I believe Seireitei as a whole is moving in that direction. We need to — the balance of this world is stabilising, but if we are unstable, it will fall back once more to a precarious state. Hollow numbers have been increasing across parts of the Sixth, and it concerns me.”

“Hollows. Kidnappings. Murders.” Souja shivered, shaking his head as though to clear it of the sudden cloud that lingered there. “If Seireitei is under seige, Shirogane-dono, I intend to find out what from and how to stop it. You have my word on it — I won’t let us go backwards. As long as I’m heir to this Clan, I’ll keep the Endou moving forwards. If every Clan heir does the same, nobody and nothing can drag us back into war and rebellion. That’s what I believe — that’s why I want us to take the initiative and fight back before we’re really under threat. It’s important to me... there are enough people depending on me in this world and I don’t want to see them treated in the way Tenichi was — or in the way those poor healers were in the Spiritless Zone.”

“I see,” Shirogane’s expression became one of wry comprehension. “You stand back and absorb everything that goes on around you, and you rarely speak up or come to the fore — but it’s there, I see it now. The predator bird of the Endou — its spirit is in you just as sure as it was in your ancestors, isn’t it?”

“We are all birds of prey, Shirogane-dono,” Souja said philosophically. “The only question is who we are hunting, and whether or not we make a successful kill.”

He smiled, shrugging his shoulders.

“I’d rather not do any killing, if it can be avoided,” he added, “but I am an Endou, just as Father is.”

“So I see,” Shirogane agreed. “I have to admit, though, a cautious, patient hunter who sheathes his claws until they are truly necessary is a much preferable neighbour. You and I will both one day inherit our Clans — I am relieved to realise that when that time comes, I am unlikely to have to contend with border animosity of the level felt by other Kuchiki lords.”

“I’m sure we’re not suicidal enough to challenge the Kuchiki,” Souja said wryly, “but if it puts your heart at rest, Shirogane-dono, I hope for a peaceful incumbency too.”

Shirogane laughed, opening his mouth to respond, but instead he faltered, his brows twitching slightly as though trying to pinpoint something faint and indistinct in the Seireitei air. At his companion’s change of demeanour, Souja too glanced around him, realising with a jolt that what his sensitive colleague had detected was the distinctive spiritual pulse of a Hell butterfly, it’s drone like consciousness distorting the even air in the chamber concourse. As it materialised, Souja’s heart clenched slightly as he recognised the silverish wing tips and realised where the butterfly had come. Slowly he held out his hand and the insect fluttered slightly, before landing in a drunken, ungainly heap against his skin.

Shirogane arched an eyebrow.

“That must be an experimental model,” he observed acidly, “as I haven’t seen one with quite that shade of wing decoration before. If this is a new advance in Hell Butterfly technology you’re trialing though, Souja-dono, I advise you to encourage the researchers to work a little harder on its landing accuracy.”

He bowed his head to indicate their conversation was over, and, as he withdrew to attend to his own errands, Souja sighed, sinking back against the wall of the meeting hall and absently stretching out his index finger to stroke the butterfly’s fragile, velveteen body. The insect twitched slightly at his touch, almost as though it were a living creature aware of him and everything around him, as opposed to just a drone carrying a message in spiritual fragments from one place to another. Joumei had never been as skilled with Hell Butterflies as Souja himself was, and the creature's raggedy wing tips told the Vice Captain that the insect's lifespan was probably almost at its limit.

It was probably trying to find me, since I wasn't in my office, and it wouldn't have been able to get into the meeting hall. It's not an official Hell Butterfly from anyone in the registered chain of command, and so it might've been waiting a while. Joumei's message must be important — but it's probably also something nobody else should overhear. I'm glad Shirogane-dono didn't linger. It might've been hard to explain my behaviour, if I suddenly became furtive and had to dash off.

He closed his eyes, opening himself to the dark insect's fluctuating consciousness as he tried to pick up the strands of Joumei's message.

The butterfly gave one last flap of its wings before disintegrating into the ether, and Souja opened his eyes, chewing hard on his bottom lip as he tried to piece together the fragments into something coherent.

Izumi's found something, that much is obvious. Something to do with Tenichi and where he was held? Not in Seireitei... does Joumei mean Tenichi was taken outside of Seireitei, or is he trying to tell me something else?

He clenched and unclenched his fists in frustration.

Damn him for making me promise not to divulge this business to Father until things were more concrete. If I assume that Joumei's message relates to Aizen and that Izumi has found evidence of him being somewhere outside of Seireitei... a specific, identifiable location, then that is extremely significant information and keeping it to myself could be construed as neglecting my duty to the Gotei. If what Joumei's telling me is that Tenichi was held outside of Seireitei, then, again, it might lead to arrests and a halt in abductions once and for all. But... if what Joumei's saying is that Izumi's found evidence of both of those things — that Tenichi's abduction and Aizen are connected and he has proof... then not to act on it could prove a devastating mistake. I need to go to the Kitsune — as soon as humanly possible — and hear everything for myself. That means persuading Father to let me go there again... and he was reluctant enough about it the last time.

He began to walk slowly in the direction of the Seventh Division, sliding his fingers absently into his obi and gazing around him as he walked at the shinigami running this way and that bent on their own specific errand. Several of them saluted him, or bowed their heads, but although the mood in the air was a positive one, Souja knew that it hid a deep undercurrent of uncertainty.

Just like in a storm, when everyone waits to see where the lightning will next hit.

He pressed his lips together grimly as he made up his mind.

If I ask Father about going to the Kitsune again, he'll demand to know why. Unless I tell him everything, he won't give me leave — but I promised Joumei and I must keep that promise for the sake of District Seven. I don't have anything like conclusive evidence, and I can't start jumping to conclusions, not about something like this. No, that won't do. It will get Tenichi into trouble too — and there might be no occasion for that, since I find it hard to believe him to be the kind of officer who plots betrayal. No, I need more than I have and that means going to the Kitsune. And that means...

He paused outside Seventh Division's main gate, gazing up at the hunting bird insignia that glared down at him with austere, reproving eyes. For a moment he imagined the bird was his father's hawk, its talons gleaming and its expression without mercy, and he swallowed hard, trying to quell the deep sense of unease that lurked in the pit of his stomach.

And that means disobeying Father, and hoping that, when all is put to rest, he'll forgive me.

“So what exactly is this about, Kirio-chan?”

Shikiki ran her finger along the long row of hooks that flanked the main entrance of the Fourth Division barracks, selecting her cloak and pulling it down with a sigh. Wrapping it carefully around her substantial frame, she knotted the sash at the waist, casting her companion a questioning look.

“Things at Fourth are pretty busy at the moment, you know — Taichou only spared me because you said it was something important. Is Juu-nii being stupid with his fevers again? He was pretty bad the day that Mitsuki-dono and the others came back from Rukongai, but in most cases locking him in Ugendou and making him rest does the trick better than most of the remedies and spells I know. He pushes himself too hard as a rule — and the only cure for that is a spell of taking it easy. Taichou would say the same.”

“No, it's not to do with the Captain,” Kirio hid a smile, shaking her head. “I'm sorry, Shiki-chan. Am I dragging you away from a patient? I don't want to do that. I didn't like to explain all the details to Unohana-taichou, because I wasn't sure she'd understand. I don't know if I do, not completely — but I still think it's important you come."

"That was even more cryptic than what you said before," Shikiki sighed, rolling her expressive eyes skywards. "As it happens, Aomori-san is sleeping right now, and there are healers better than me for tending to her now that she's beginning to mend. I'm limited in my natural healing skills, so Taichou's relieved me of my duties there and shifted me over to some lighter ones instead. Otherwise I wouldn't be able to take a break like this."

"I suppose not," Kirio agreed, falling into step with her friend as they crossed the courtyard of the Fourth Division towards the main gate that led to the central thoroughfare. Members from the Third and Fifth Divisions were milling around outside as the afternoon patrol shifted to the evening ones, and both Shikiki and Kirio acknowledged the officers with a nod as they passed through into the main street. "I hope Unohana-Taichou never finds out that I had a reason other than healing for calling you out, though."

"Let's both hope that's the case," Shikiki said with feeling. "Well? We're outside now, so you can tell me. Where are we going, and why?"

"Don't be mad with me," Kirio looked apprehensive, glancing down at the cobbles and kicking her sandalled feet absently against the smooth stones. "It's Tenichi's fault, really, not mine — I just agreed to help."

"Tenichi?" Shikiki's eyes widened in surprise. "Kotetsu Tenichi, you mean?"

"Yes," Kirio agreed, turning pensive eyes on her companion. "The truth is, Shiki-chan, he wanted to speak to you and I think it was quite urgent that he did. It seemed... very important to him, and though he wouldn't explain exactly why, I got the feeling that the sooner it happened, the better."

"Tenichi, huh," Shikiki pursed her lips. "We haven't talked a lot for a long time. Why all of a sudden now? He's quite all right, isn't he, after his abduction? I know a bit about it, because healers from the Fourth went to see him when he returned, but I thought he was unhurt?"

"He's fine, so like I said, it's not a healing errand," Kirio responded carefully. "Just, when I spoke to him, he really seemed as though something was on his mind. He'd mentioned it before, but now... I don't know what happened when he was taken prisoner, Shiki-chan, but it's as though it's heightened all his concerns and made him all the more determined to put the facts together. He says he doesn't remember being abducted, and maybe he doesn't, but... something is on his mind, and he thinks you can settle it."

"I see," Shikiki's eyes shadowed, and Kirio shot her a guilty look.

"You look like you've guessed what it relates to already."

"Maybe," Shikiki sighed, running her fingers through her wavy rose-petal hair. "Tenichi and I haven't really talked for a long time. If he wants to ask me anything, it must relate to when we were children... which is a time I'd rather not remember too clearly, if I'm honest with you."

"It's about Daisuke-san," Kirio admitted. "He thinks you can tell him things about what happened after he and Ketsui left Seventh District... but if it's too much for you to do, I told him that he wasn't to upset you. If it's really bad, Shiki-chan... just, he looked so haunted, and..."

"Daisuke-nii, huh," Shikiki's eyes closed briefly, then she nodded, meeting Kirio's gaze. "That's why he sent you? He thought that, if he asked, I might not agree, but if it was you..."

"I was the mindless go-between, yes," Kirio agreed, chewing on her lip. "You're both my friends, but I never really understood why you didn't spend more time together when we were students. You never seemed hostile to one another, it was just as though there was a big gap between the two of you and... I didn't know what was needed to breach it."

"A big gap... yes, I suppose so," Shikiki grimaced. "Things left unspoken and unasked... probably things neither of us knew how to tackle, or if we even should. Things about Seventh... and everything that happened when we were children."

She shrugged her shoulders.

"We're going to his division, then?" she asked, and Kirio shook her head.

"Tenichi doesn't want to discuss anything about this stuff so near to his Captain, being that Seventh is Endou land," she responded. "He's going to meet us outside the archive. He's not allowed to wander far by himself at the moment, but since the library's such open space, he thinks he should be allowed to go there. Kikyue-dono has him on light duties until he's cleared for full action again, so he volunteered to go do some mundane paperwork for her there this evening, and that's where we'll meet him. Security is tighter everywhere since his abduction, so it'll probably be all right."

"Mm," Shikiki chewed on her lip, but made no demur, and Kirio shot her another quizzical look.

"Is it really all right?"

"No, not entirely," Shikiki admitted, "but I suppose that I knew he'd have questions about things one day. I didn't know when, and I hoped that they'd never come, but I don't think I can refuse to answer them, Kirio-chan. Dai-nii was someone who connected Tenichi and Ketsui and I when we were young. We all loved him, but I'm the only one who knows... everything that happened. If anyone is going to tell him, it has to be me. Even if I don't like it, Dai-nii was Tenichi's father. I can't not talk to someone about their father, not when there's nobody else."

"I suppose that's true," Kirio's eyes softened. "You and I are different from Tenichi in that we've never had biological family to worry about us. Daisuke-san did worry about his family, though, to the point he sent them into exile to save their lives. I understand why Tenichi wants to find things out, I just don't want you to be upset by dragging up ancient past."

"My family are Juu-nii's, now, just like yours are the people who took you in," Shikiki said matter-of-factly. "You're right, though. It is different for Tenichi and Ketsui."

"Kirio!"

As they reached the library, Tenichi was already waiting for them, and he hurried across the stone slabs towards them, pausing a short distance away and bowing his head towards Shikiki in a mixed gesture of apology and gratitude.

"Shikiki... I wasn't sure you'd come and humour my selfish demands, but I'm happy that you did."

"Kirio says you want to ask me things about the past," Shikiki said gravely. "I don't like it, Tenichi-kun, and I don't know that you will, either. Nothing I can tell you about your family is good or happy, and once it's said, it can't be unsaid. If you really want to know, I'll tell you — but I don't really want to, and I'm not sure you want to hear it."

"I need to hear it. All of it. Everything that you know, about Father after Mother took Ketsui and I to Eighth," Tenichi replied grimly. "I've always wondered, but now... I need to know. I need to know what I never knew for sure. You were with him, weren't you, when he died? He cared for you, so..."

"I wasn't with him when he died," Shikiki shook her head abruptly.

"But I thought..."

"I was with him when the village was burned down, and he was taken by the shinigami," Shikiki's voice shook slightly, and she let out a little sigh, tears glistening in her aqua eyes. "He told me to wait for him, and that he'd come back for me. He didn't. He couldn't. The next time I saw him, he was dead."

"Shiki-chan..." Kirio rested her hand on her friend's arm, then cast Tenichi a glance.

"Does this need to happen now?" she asked softly. "Shiki-chan's been through a lot of stress lately, with everything at Fourth. I know you want to know about Daisuke-san, and I promised to help, but if it's going to upset Shikiki to talk about it..."

"I'm sorry, Shikiki," Tenichi looked apologetic. "I need to know, though. It has to be now."

He glanced at his hands.

"When I was in Seventh... after I was let go by whoever had me hostage, I found... some sign of Father," he murmured. "I can't explain it, but it was as though I knew he'd been there, somehow. It made me remember... all kinds of things, and I wanted to know exactly what happened. For a brief instant I thought I'd found him... but maybe I was misleading myself. Shikiki knows... I'm sure she does, all the things I don't know. Even if they're not good things, Shikiki, I want to know. If you can tell me, I want to know everything about the time you were my Father's ward."

"I wasn't Dai-nii's ward," Shikiki's voice was edged with a bitterness that Kirio had never heard before. "If I had been, I would've been sent with you and Irie-san to Eighth. I was kept behind because I didn't belong to Dai-nii. I belonged to... someone else. Someone who came back for me... when there was nobody else to come."

"Someone else?" Kirio's brows knitted together, and Shikiki frowned, glancing around her then taking both Tenichi and Kirio by the arm, leading them around the side of the library and down a narrow, twisting pathway towards a stretch of empty land that had once been part of the old Council compound but which had been abandoned and left to ruin when the new quarters had been built. She sank down onto a broken piece of wall, gesturing for her companions to follow suit, and, exchanging glances, they did so, Kirio settling herself on a patch of worn grass and Tenichi perching on the stump of an old tree.

“I don’t talk about it, not here, and not ever, not now,” Shikiki spoke softly, and Kirio was aware of the sadness in her friend’s eyes. “He abandoned me, and I abandoned him — it was a long time ago, and I became part of Juu-nii’s family. I didn’t need to go back to what came before.”

“The someone else... was that... Keitarou-dono?” Tenichi asked apprehensively, and something in his eyes made Kirio’s heart clench in her chest.

“Aizen... Keitarou?” she whispered, and Shikiki nodded, putting a finger to her lips.

“Shh,” she cautioned. “Like I said, some connnections are better forgotten. I belong to Juu-nii’s family — I’m an Ukitake, and I have been since I was eight. Anything else doesn’t matter — most people here don’t even know.”

“I remember, vaguely,” Tenichi admitted, gazing at his hands. “Sometimes, when Keitarou-dono visited Father, and you’d be there... but I’d forgotten that you were his and not Father’s responsibility. You spent so much time with us, but he would come and go, like a ghost, back and forth to his work with the Endou.”

“Mm,” Shikiki twisted her fingers together. “I loved Dai-nii a lot, Tenichi. I really did. I loved Kei-nii... Keitarou-san, too. He saved me from being killed by the shinigami and the Hollows, and protected me in a place where children with spirit power were being slaughtered. I didn’t know, then, all the ins and outs or what he would go on to do. When he hurt Juu-nii, I realised I couldn’t forgive him for that. I don’t suppose he forgave me, either, because I chose to go with Juu-nii and sever our relationship. But before that, I was with him. Between when the village burned and when Juu-nii’s family adopted me, I was always with Kei-nii.”

“And Daisuke-san?” Kirio asked quietly. Shikiki shook her head.

“The shinigami took him,” she said simply. “They took him, and the next I saw him, he was dead. Kei-nii... Keitarou went to rescue him, but he couldn’t. Dai-nii’s body was frozen, as though he’d been attacked by ice. Kei-nii wanted me to help bring him back, but I couldn’t. He was already dead — his spirit was gone, and I couldn’t do anything about it. All I could do was mend the damage on his body, and Kei-nii buried him.”

“In District Seven?” Tenichi’s voice became choked with emotion, and Shikiki nodded.

“In forestland, where there was enough shelter to hide us while he dug a proper grave,” she agreed sadly. “I’m sorry, Tenichi. I couldn’t save your father, even though I wanted to. Keitarou couldn’t, either. He believed he could, and went to do it, but what he went to face was worse than he predicted. I don’t know what they did to him... to Dai-nii... but his body... was covered in wounds.”

“And frozen by the blade of an ice powered sword,” Tenichi muttered. Shikiki started, staring at him for a moment. Then she nodded.

“Yes,” she agreed. “How did you...”

“Shouichi-dono’s sword was an ice sword. I’ve heard Taichou talk about it,” Tenichi’s voice shook slightly, and Kirio could see the emotions swirling deep in her friend’s eyes. “You said he was taken by shinigami, didn’t you? I know the Endou hunted down the exiled Urahara, and killed them. I’d heard that Shouichi-dono was involved in ordering Father’s death, and I guess that was true. Only he really did do it himself, with his own blade, didn’t he?”

“Mm, I think so,” Shikiki’s tears began to fall now, trickling silently down her plump cheeks as she nodded her head. “It was so horrible... that I think... maybe when death came, Dai-nii... I think he accepted it. Kei-nii said that Dai-nii acted to protect him, but I don’t know what really happened. All I know was that Dai-nii was broken, and that Kei-nii shed tears for him. I never saw Keitarou cry about anything else, not ever — but when Dai-nii was buried, he cried a lot. Later, he told me he’d killed Shouichi-sama in revenge for Dai-nii. I didn’t really understand everything he said to me, but as I’ve got older, I’ve understood. He avenged Dai-nii, but it wasn’t enough to really assuage his hatred. He hated a lot of people, and hating them made him turn against Clans and blame them for the bad things in the world.”

“Aizen Keitarou is a wanted criminal who murdered lots of people, not just one Clansman who took the life of a family member,” Kirio said quietly. “Taichou’s always said that he’s not someone to be taken lightly — he’s dangerous, and whatever prompted him to act how he did, it doesn’t excuse the loss of life.”

“Wars bring losses of life, Kirio-chan,” Tenichi murmured, and Kirio shot him a sharp glance.

“Tenichi-kun?”

“I’m not justifying it,” Tenichi shook his head. “I’m just saying that Keitarou-dono isn’t the only one who’s killed people. People among the Gotei have taken lives, too. I know Taichou killed his cousin in a struggle for Clan power when he was younger, and I’ve heard stories about other people, too.”

“The only solution is to prevent war altogether,” Shikiki said firmly. “If there isn’t war, people don’t take sides and then they don’t have to die. Kirio, I know what you think about Keitarou is right, but like Tenichi, I also remember another side to him — a kind person who I adored and who protected me. That person was destroyed because of the evil that war brings to the world. The Endou waged war on skilled District folk and on underground Urahara, and so lots of people died. Kei-nii became someone beyond saving because of those events — he was broken and twisted up because of them.”

“Maybe so,” Kirio acknowledged, “but even so...”

“He buried my father with honour, though,” Tenichi whispered, bowing his head towards Shikiki, “and so did you. Thank you, Shikiki. I don’t blame you for not being able to save him... but I’m grateful for you doing what you could for him when nobody else was there to do it.”

“I loved him,” Shikiki wiped her eyes, offering Tenichi a wan smile. “An eight year old doesn’t understand politics, or who is truly good or bad. She only understands who’s loved her and shown her kindness. Of course I would do that for him — I would’ve done anything for him.”

She smoothed down the fabric of her hakama, then,

“I remember where he is, if you wanted me to show you,” she added softly. “I know the path, and I wouldn’t forget somewhere like that. Kei-nii marked the spot with a stone and he wrote something on it. I couldn’t read, then, so I don’t know what it was, but he said it was something that marked out how important a person Dai-nii was to him.”

“Tomo,” Tenichi’s words were too soft for Shikiki to hear, but Kirio picked them up, casting her friend a concerned look.

“If you wanted me to take you there, I could,” Shikiki continued simply. “If you did...”

“I’m not allowed to go back into District Seven,” Tenichi shook his head, cutting across her with a shrug. “Fukutaichou’s orders, because I was dumped there. I appreciate it, Shikiki, but I think you've told me what I wanted to know. What happened and where he sleeps... those things are important. Right now I can't go there, and I won't disobey Fukutaichou's instructions because I've already caused them too much strife in being taken hostage in the first instance. But knowing... that makes a difference too."

"I see," Shikiki's features cleared, and she smiled. "That's why you wanted to interrogate me — because you can't go investigate for yourself."

"Yes," Tenichi agreed, though there was something clouded in his gaze that did nothing to dispel Kirio's sense of general unease. "I'm sorry to rake it all up for you, though. I don't suppose I realised how horrible it was for you, but it must've been..."

"The worst time was when the village was razed, and I was all alone," Shikiki shivered. "It seemed like forever before Kei-nii came for me. My whole life changed from that point... I don't suppose I'll ever forget those last months I spent in Seventh District. I've never really wanted to go back there, not in all the years since I've been grown up. It was my home a long time ago, but the good memories of it are tainted by those weeks in hiding, hunted by the Endou and threatened by Seimaru-sama and his people."

She rested a hand on Tenichi's shoulder.

"Dai-nii died so you didn't have to go through those things," she added softly. "If you want to honour him and his memory in the best way you can, Tenichi-kun, then keep moving forward. He'd be really proud, I think, to see how you and Ketsui have grown up and taken charge of your own lives."

"We became shinigami," Tenichi said sadly. "A shinigami killed him... I wonder if he'd understand."

"There are good shinigami and bad shinigami," Shikiki shrugged her shoulders. "I learned that when I met Juu-nii. You and Ketsui are good shinigami, and you help people by protecting them. Dai-nii would understand that, since he used to protect the people in the village as much as he could until it was too much for him to manage. He died protecting people he cared for — that's the legacy he'd want to pass to you. Whatever bad things Kei-nii did, I'm sure Dai-nii would just be happy knowing you survived and were able to grow up free and safe from persecution."

"I agree," Kirio nodded her head, casting her friend a smile. "I never met Daisuke-san, but I knew Irie-san and I'm sure Shikiki's

“We could have talked about this a long time ago,” Shikiki admitted, looking troubled. “At the Academy, or since then, but the time never seemed to be right. We used to play together as children so much, Tenichi-kun, and yet, when we began studying, although I knew who you were... it was as though there was a wall separating us. I didn’t want to be reminded of the past... and I guess I thought you didn’t either. I didn’t realise it was eating away at you so much — I’m sorry.”

“We both created that gap,” Tenichi said honestly. “I suppose neither of us wanted to be associated with the underground Urahara or with Keitarou-dono and his actions. We were still growing up when the Kuchiki boy was murdered, and yet when we began at the Academy, the Council were still actively hunting for Keitarou-dono and Eiraki-hime. If the people around us had known we had connections to him, we’d have been shunned. Not talking about it made the most sense... but since that was the past we shared, it made it harder to talk about anything at all.”

“True,” Shikiki let out her breath in a heavy sigh. “I’ve always regretted it a bit, though. Whether Kei-nii is still alive or not, or what he does... it hasn’t anything to do with us. We’re both squad shinigami with a job to do, and the past doesn’t have any bearing on that. As District shinigami, what’s more important is that we’re here, and able to do our bit. That’s changed since we were children, and we’ve been part of the change.”

“A lot of District children have conflicting roots,” Kirio pointed out. “I still don’t know what happened to my sister and brother, or whether they abandoned me on purpose. I don’t know if I’d rather they had died, because it would mean they hadn’t left me... or whether I want them to be alive, even though they chose to be alive without me.”

“Seireitei is still changing,” Tenichi got to his feet, turning his gaze towards the setting sun, and for a moment, Kirio could not make out his features. “It has to keep changing. Shikiki’s right. We’re part of that change and we have to keep faith with our roots as well as with our current place in this world. Being District shinigami is important... sticking up for the people who can’t fight their own fights is important. I think, at the very least, Father would understand that, even if he didn’t understand everything else.”

“You really don’t remember what happened during your abduction?” Kirio asked softly, and Tenichi turned to face her, a faint,

“Fukutaichou told me not to bother about it, but to get back to my duties, and I will,” he said softly. “There are things I can’t quite resolve within myself, not yet, but I will. Don’t look worried about me, Kirio-chan. I’m all right.”

“Not knowing can be more damaging than remembering everything,” Shikiki agreed. “Tenichi-kun, I know that one of my squad-mates came to see you, and she said you seemed well — but it doesn’t mean the shock of what happened won’t hit you later on. If you feel that happening, don’t be afraid to come talk to someone at Fourth. Nobody will think the less of you for it. None of us know what you did or didn’t go through in the five or six days you weren’t accounted for, and it might take a while for your body and your mind to rationalise what right now it’s blocking from your recollections.”

“No, I think not remembering would be a safer option,” Tenichi said cryptically, shaking his head. “I’ll keep it in mind, Shikiki, but I don’t suppose I’ll need any further help. Really, I just wanted to know about Father. Now I do... maybe I can put that into its proper place in my mind and understand... a little more what he sacrificed for our sakes.”

The sun was setting gently over the rough ridged mountain that shielded Motonoyama, its deepening colours spreading and pooling across the fields and valleys like the steady, resolute flow of molten lava. There were no volcanoes as such within Seireitei, nor within Rukongai, so the imagery was lost on Katsura but, as he stepped carefully over the broken branches and red-spattered, bent blades of grass, he reflected on how much it resembled a lake of blood, dripping over the asymmetrical peaks onto the hapless settlements below.

Such a morbid line of thought was not his usual style, yet for some reason, now the sun was setting and the sounds of Motonoyama’s distant market had quieted for the night, he could not help but focus on the inescapable reality of death as it lay spreadeagled and crumpled on the ground before him.

The Hollow had been a violent one.

Katsura licked his lips, brushing the sweat from his brow and gazing down at the red-smeared features of one of the hapless shinigami, meeting the terrified, sightless gaze with a pensive one of his own. Until the encounter with Mitsuki, he had never really thought of the shinigami as victims with feelings and, perhaps, families and friends of their own, but something about this broken, doll-like form made him imagine for the briefest instant that this lifeless creature was one of those that surrounded him — people without whom he could not imagine living his life.

Nobody had come yet to retrieve the body, which had surprised him. It had been a small patrol that day — just two agents, one of which had lost his head at the sight of the Hollow and had been knocked down straight away. The other had fought valiently for several minutes before finally managing to take the monster down. This second shinigami had taken a bloody, nasty injury, and had limped off the scene some time before, but, because no help had yet arrived, Katsura wondered whether he too had succumbed to his wounds before he could reach Inner Seireitei and healing support. Still, Katsura was not so naive as to believe that nobody in authority kept a check on which shinigami went where and their lack of return would surely soon be noticed now that night was falling. He did not have very long to achieve his goal — there was no time for sentimental ponderings about the people he had stalked and hunted down.

He knelt down beside the body of the first man. He had died on falling, taking a fatal blow which had sent him flying across the clearing, clattering head first into a tree and shattering his neck on impact. His uniform had caught on a few of the branches, leaving it a little torn and bloodied, but it was not saturated in red like that of the one who had limped away, and for this, Katsura was glad. Steeling himself for what he was about to do, he glanced around him for any sign of witnesses, then grasped the dead man around the wrists, concentrating his haphazard shunpo on lifting the corpse away from the more open field and into a dense thicket he had scouted out some hours before. Here he had hidden, spiritually downwind from the fighting shinigami who had been preoccupied with the threat the Hollow posed to Motonoyama and therefore not concerned with a random commoner lurking in the shadows. It had given him time to prepare the area for the quickest change over possible, and, among the dry leaf litter he had already scraped out a shallow grave, ready to roll the remains into when he had taken what he needed.

It took very little time at all to relieve the corpse of its shihakushou and even less time for Katsura to shed his own clothing. He donned the damaged black and white uniform, and then, quickly re-robing the now naked body in his ragged attire, he knelt at the shinigami's side, pressing his hands together in a brief prayer before putting his weight behind the man's body and giving him a hefty shove into the uneven ditch. The body fell into the opening with an ungainly thud, arms sprawled out at odd angles, and Katsura swallowed his revulsion at the sight of the pale skin, shoving the leaves back over his victim in an attempt to cover the scene as well as possible. In his fervour to conceal the crime scene, however, energy sparked unbidden from his fingertips and he let out a faint exclamation of dismay, jerking back as a lick of strange blue flame seared across the leaves, immediately setting them alight. With a mixture of horror and disgust, Katsura stared as the unbidden energy spread from the leaf matter to the body itself, the limbs jerking and twitching slightly from the heat before curling and blackening against the earth.

Although Katsura had used spiritual energy before, never had he managed to school the power he knew he possessed into a recognisable spell. He had not bothered reading his father's texts nor had he paid particular attention to learning shinigami skills, disdaining them as tools of the enemy and determined to do things his own way as befitted a Rukongai rebel. Keitarou had laughed, but had not pushed him, and so, when he had destroyed the Hollow in the Spiritless Zone, he had massed reiryoku and attacked but not fired any specific spell. Here, though, in spiritually pure land and so close to Inner Seireitei, even the faintest hint of stray power had twisted itself into a strange, eerie kind of flame, lighting up the thicket as though it had been possessed by an angry ghost looking to take its revenge.

Katsura did not wait to see whether the fire burned the body completely away, nor did he stay to ensure the corpse's layer of covering leaves was replaced. His heart pounding suddenly in his chest, he got to his feet, fleeing the scene as fast as his legs would carry him. Though he knew that an outpouring of foreign spirit power would alert the shinigami to the presence of something suspicious, it was terror rather than self-preservation that drove him across the fields and the rocky stream that trickled at the foot of the old mountain path. Beyond this he could see the white walls of Inner Seireitei and, his hands clammy and his breath coming in short, uneven gasps, he stood and stared at it, knowing that he had come too far now not to enter, but certain he would be identified as a fraud the moment he tried to step through the gate. He fumbled for the gloves he always carried with him, pulling them hastily over the soot-charred fingers as if by doing so he could conceal the truth of his crime from himself as well as the eyes of the person he was going to see. Though he knew he shouldn't care, he did not want Mitsuki to know the gravity of what he had done.

Go and do what you need to do. Follow your conviction and see it through.

Koku's voice echoed suddenly in his head.

If you can't kill her, don't. You don't have to go there for that. Do what you think is right.
What I think is right.

Katsura clenched his fists, chewing down on his lip hard enough to taste blood.

Mitsuki.

He let out a heavy sigh, then gathered his resolution, hurrying up towards the guard on duty at the gate and schooling his features into a look of purpose.

"There's been an incident in the forest!" he exclaimed, grasping the startled guard by the shoulders and fixing him with an urgent look. "A hollow — we need a healer. We need the Fourth division!"

"A Hollow? Has it been killed?" The guard was immediately alert, and Katsura nodded.

"Yes, yes it has, but one man is down, and another injured badly. He sent me back, and I ran all the way, but I... I took a whack and I'm not all that steady myself. I hurried — one of my squad isn't doing so good. I don't know if he'll live, he was bleeding a whole lot and I don't know much about medical care, so he told me to run back here. Please, I need some help. It's not far from Motonoyama — what if another Hollow comes?"

"You're a mite bloody, and your shihakushou's right torn up over the shoulder," the man on duty looked concerned, patting Katsura gingerly on the arm. "The Hollows have been real strange of late — slashing up people at the least excuse, and that's no joke. Two of my patrol took broken bones just last week, and now you say there's been another one, this close to Inner Seireitei? It's making a mockery of the whole organisation, I swear!"

He clapped a hand to his head, and Katsura realised that the man had completely fallen for his act, believing that the stranger who stood in front of him was simply a comrade from another patrol. Kurotsuchi had said that shinigami from different squads did not always mix, but even so, relief coursed through his veins as he registered the safety his anonymity had afforded him. The bloodstained shihakushou was genuine, therefore there was no reason to doubt his right to be there. Was it only shinigami arrogance that prevented an increased guard from being stationed here, or was it rather that those who tried to infiltrate Inner Seireitei didn't usually try to do so through the main gateway? He had also once heard Kurotsuchi grumbling about security methods implemented on the underground drainage system, and absently he wondered whether the shinigami had forgone mainstream measures in order to cover the less obvious methods of infiltration.

"I'll raise an alert," the man promised. "You, go on to the Fourth and find a healer. From your uniform, you belong to the Tenth, right?"

"Uh, yes. Yes, I do," Katsura nodded quickly, hoping that was the right answer and not a trick, but the guard simply nodded, reaching for and brandishing his writing brush.

"You got your squad number on you?"

"My...?" Katsura faltered, blinking at the guard blankly. There was an uncomfortable pause, then the guard's hand shot out again, grasping the front of the shihakushou and pulling it towards him. Katsura tensed, half ready to flare another ghostly burst of spiritual energy in his own defence, but the guard laughed, offering him a reassuring grin.

"You're real shook up, huh?" he asked sympathetically, turning the fold of the fabric towards him and glancing at something stitched into the seam before making a note on his pad. "There, I got it. Shouda Mikisue... that you?"

"Sure is," Katsura managed a wan smile, his heart flip-flopping in his chest at the closeness of the call. "I'm sorry. I just keep seeing all the blood, and for a moment, my mind went blank. I never saw someone cut down like that before... someone I know... I guess it rattled me more than I thought."

"Ah, I can't blame you. It's never nice seeing a comrade struck out," the guard said sympathetically. "Honestly, you do look a little dazed and you're pale as a ghost. I've got your number down so your cleared to enter. I'll put a general alert out to the Fourth for your comrade — you can leave it to me to handle that. I'd go there yourself, though, when you've reported back to Hakubei-taichou."

"Thank you!" Katsura bowed his head, schooling his easygoing features into a grateful grin, then he stumbled into the central courtyard, blinking for a moment as he took in for the first time the heart of the shinigami homeland.

Tenth Division.

His brow wrinkled as he gazed around himself, moving slowly as he tried to absorb his surroundings more clearly. Kurotsuchi had not provided Keitarou with any kind of map or plan of this area, and Keitarou himself had never been here, but with the entrance guard still within close sight, it would not do to appear as though he was visiting the place for the first time. The shinigami who had died had belonged to the Tenth division, whilst the healer he sought belonged to the Fourth. He knew the location of neither, but shrewdly assumed that the central entrance to Inner Seireitei would be located somewhere in the middle of the gathered barracks. That being the case, he presumed, running his gaze down what seemed to be identical openings to repeated rows of barracks and living quarters, where he was now was likely somewhere around the Sixth or Seventh Division. The sight of a Clan flag fluttering in the light breeze told him that his assumption had been right, for, beneath the ornate crest of what he realised must be the Kuchiki family were the distinct slashes of the number six. Casting a furtive glance back towards the main gate, he decided to choose the right hand path, ducking beneath the white flag with a deep-seated sense of unease.

Mitsuki said she was a Kuchiki. Her family are inside there. I wonder if she's told them about me... and if the rumours about the Kuchiki and Father are really true. Mother said that it was a Kuchiki who gave him the injury that even now causes him to limp. If they knew who I was... or why I was here... if they knew I'd put one of their kin in such danger...

He shivered, quickening his pace until he came to the carved entrance to the next division. He paused for a moment before this one, his eyes widening in dismay as he absorbed the beady, accusing eye of the wooden hawk glaring down at him from atop its proud perch. The number seven rested beneath its talons, like prey dragged in from hunting in the fields, and Katsura swallowed hard, knowing that if the Kuchiki land was dangerous, this area was even worse.

Mother's family. The Endou Clan... the family who kill first and ask questions later.

“Hey, you!”

A voice made him jump almost clean out of his skin, spinning around guiltily to meet the sharp gaze of a young woman of about Koku's age, and for a moment he stared at her in disbelief, stunned to silence by the familiar curve of her features and the shock of dark hair that had been regimentedly schooled back from her face into a tight braid. Eiraki was older now, and her vivid blue eyes were possessed by none of the current generation of young Endou, yet Katsura saw the resemblance nonetheless.

“Why are you lurking outside Seventh?” The woman glared at him suspiciously, her fingers brushing against the hilt of an intricately gilted sword as she spoke. “Nobody has time to be loitering, and I’m sure your Captain didn’t send you to roam the streets of Inner Seireitei, especially not in such a dishevelled state.”

“No... no ma’am,” Katsura choked out hurriedly, taking a half-step back. “I was just... I had to...”

“Name and division?”

“Er... Shouda. Shouda Miki..sue. Tenth Division,” Katsura babbled out, lowering his head in a bow towards her. “I’m sorry, I was just...”

“Tenth, huh?” the woman clicked her tongue against her teeth, then, “well, Shouda, get on with you to your own barracks. If I catch you lingering around doing nothing again, I’ll be taking a report to your Captain myself and asking him to make sure you have adequate duties, since if you have the time to loiter, I’m sure he can put you to better use.”

“Yes, ma’am,” it was all Katsura could do not to salute under the piercing gaze, taking to his heels and hurrying off in the direction she indicated before she could call him back. Whilst it troubled him not at all if Shouda Mikisue was reported to Tenth Division for dereliction of duty, there was something in the woman’s eyes that reminded him all too strongly of Sakaki when she was determined about something, and he had no desire to find out whether this Endou kinswoman had the same penchant for gratuitous violence as his younger sister. I’m off limits to Sakaki, but somehow I don’t suppose the ties of blood would work in that case.

He turned the corner, slowing his pace slightly and letting his breath out in a rush as he saw the banner for the Tenth Division looming up ahead.

I swear, I wish I’d never come here. I wish Father hadn’t ever sent me — I’m in much greater danger of being discovered here than I was in Rukongai. Even if Mitsuki did talk about me, right here there are too many enemies and not enough means of escape. If I run into someone who knows the real Shouda Mikisue, I’m in trouble. But, having come this far... I’m still no closer to finding Mitsuki. She’s from the Fourth division. That’s the opposite direction. I was going to cut past Seventh and double back, but with that woman on duty, I daren’t show my face there again. Knowing my luck she’d frogmarch me to the Tenth and deliver me there personally, and that’s one place I can’t be seen. They’d know I wasn’t who I claimed to be, and the game would be up. How am I going to get to where I need to be, though? I have no idea how to navigate this place. Damn Kurotsuchi for being possessive about information! If he’d only left Father with a map...

He sighed, leaning up against the wall of one of the Tenth Division's barrack buildings.

I don't even know if I can find her in this place, with so many shinigami and so many different spiritual signals, but I don't see anything else for it. If I can't track the normal way, I'll have to do it the spiritual way. I might not be able to lock onto her thoughts directly, but if I can at least track down her general aura, it'll be a start. I only met her the once, but fortunately, once someone's spiritual fingerprint is locked into my senses, I don't usually forget it. Oh well. It's worth a try, anyway.

He closed his eyes, steadying his scattered thoughts and taking a deep breath. Carefully and cautiously he spread his senses out into the surrounding ether, flinching slightly as his sensitive awareness was bombarded by a flurry of competing signals from the nearby shinigami barracks. At first he could make no sense of anything, but then, creasing his brow in concentration, he forced the extraneous signals to the back of his mind, honing in on the faint yet familiar strain of the healer's gentle reiatsu. She was closer than he had expected, he realised with a jolt, his eyes snapping open.

She's not with the Fourth Division. She's not back behind me at all. She's ahead of me. Somewhere along this pathway... somewhere near here.

He frowned, confused.

Why? She's a healer. Surely she should be with the other healers?

He let out his breath in a rush, shrugging his shoulders in defeat. Shinigami are strange, but at least it saves me a wasted ramble around the back passages of the shinigami's domain. If she's ahead of me, then I'll just keep walking, as far as I'm able to go. Until I know whether she's under particular armed guard or not, I can't plan my next move — but I hope she's not going to prove difficult to get to. I had anticipated more of the healer types, but if she's not with them, she might be with people who have proper fighting swords, and I'm not the best one to deal with that. Swords are Sakaki's department — and I don't know how reliable my spirit power might be if faced with several armed fighters.

He turned his gaze to the path ahead, squinting slightly in the darkness to make out the shape of the further military buildings that still lay beyond.

I must find her, though, tonight if I possibly can. I can't waste any time, not with things the way they are. Koku might be right or he might be wrong — following my instinct might be good or it might be bad. But whichever way it is, I need to act now, while I still have my resolve.

22. A Life Too Precious

Chapter Twenty One — A Life Too Precious

The air was still that evening, the feeble night breeze brushing half-heartedly against the wisps of cloud that made the slither of a moon appear as a hazy silver slash in the darkening sky. The twinkle of the stars glittered reflectively on the surface of the water, as Mitsuki knelt beside the Thirteenth Division's koi pond, idly tracing her fingers through the cool liquid. Beneath, deep below the reeds where she could not see them, the pond's inhabitants had settled for the night, safe and secure in their stable, unchanging world, yet although Thirteenth itself was peaceful, Mitsuki was restless.

That morning she had been visited by Eriko, the Fourth Division's harried Vice Captain and, at the sight of her superior officer's haggard features and tired eyes, she had almost begged to be allowed to come back to her home squad, to do something to lessen the burden of work that weighed so heavily on her surviving comrades. It was not just the reduction in personnel that was a problem, she reasoned pensively now, eying her blurred reflection in the pond's surface. The people who had died had all been stationed away from Seireitei, so in theory the same number of healers were available as had been before the crisis in Rukongai. In reality, though, everything had changed. The rounds of autopsies, investigations and compiling of reports had taken its toll on the morale of what had always been a serene, peaceful section of the Gotei. Of the three survivors, she was the most fit and well, but with Yuuyugo still less than half reformed into its sealed blade, she knew there was little of purpose she could do to help out. Eriko had given her permission to rise if she felt well enough, but they had parted with the firm instruction that, until further notice, she was not to attempt any spiritual magic nor think to try releasing her sword under any circumstances whatsoever. Only when Mitsuki had made a solemn vow not to attempt to use her healing skills until Retsu had approved it had Eriko been content to leave her once more in the hands of the Thirteenth and so, although her boundaries had been somewhat lifted, she felt just as much a burden on Soul Society as she had before.

Not exactly what I came here to achieve, when I first chose to join the Fourth and be sent to Rukongai.

She sighed, getting to her feet and walking slowly along the bank of the pond away from the long bamboo-plank walkway that led to the Captain's chambers. She had promised Juushirou not to leave Thirteenth's compound without first letting him or one of his senior officers know, on account of the reported abductions of other shinigami, but that did not mean she had to linger in the Captain's shadow, getting under his feet and distracting him from his duties. She was still getting used to the idea of Juushirou being a Captain, she reasoned ruefully, as she picked her way carefully through the dampish blades of grass towards the patch of trees that marked the boundary of the Thirteenth Division's designated land.

As the final division, and the afterthought in many ways, Juushirou and Enishi had managed to commandeer a fair spread of green land among their territory and so here, away from the bustling main street and the fluttering Clan banners, Mitsuki found a peace and calm that she thought she had left behind in the Spiritless Zone. It was not quite the coastal province where Juushirou had spent his childhood years, but it was a restful place and, as Mitsuki surveyed it, she realised it was one that reflected her old friend's love of tranquility and natural beauty. During the day, she was sure, the division members populated this place for practice exercises, but at this time only those who had been awarded night duty were still patrolling, and therefore she had the inner conclave to herself.

A sudden flicker of light across the pond followed by an unexpected shift in the air current made her pause, turning to glance around her for any sign of Naoko or one of the division's other shinigami coming to check on her. They took their responsibility for her safety seriously, from Juushirou down to the youngest recruit, and so she half expected to see a furtive junior lurking behind a tree, watching to ensure that no harm befell her. She could make out nothing, however, and she frowned, turning her gaze back towards the glimmering surface of the koi pond. Maybe it had been a fish, she mused idly to herself, taking a step towards the water and gazing down at the gleaming ripples that curved silently outwards towards the bank. Though this was shinigami land, it was shared by living creatures both above and beneath the surface, and she marvelled at how easily she had forgotten all of the natural sounds that, in the Spiritless Zone, had been largely absent.

In Seireitei, birds hunt, animals forage, fish swim. Insects buzz and swarm, and shinigami train with swords. There are so few living things in the Spiritless Zone other than the Pluses that I'm aware of every wingbeat or splash as though it were something foreign and strange.

Something moved out of the corner of her eye, but even as she turned, she knew that whatever it was was gone. Turning back to the water, she caught sight briefly of a face reflected in the water, and she let out a little gasp, stepping backwards instinctively as though whatever she had seen was about to emerge from the koi pond itself. The hard wood of a tree's trunk prevented her from moving very far, however, and before she could process what she had seen, rough hands shot out of the branches, one grasping her firmly around the throat whilst the other clamped itself around her mouth, forcing it shut and preventing her from making any noise. Fear coursed through Mitsuki's jolted senses, and she was only vaguely aware of the soft thud of feet landing in the grass behind her. A brief swirl of spiritual energy prickled against her throat, followed by a muttered curse, then she was yanked back away from the water and deeper into the trees. As she struggled to free herself from her attacker, the wavering spirit power trickled across her worn senses, and a mixture of dismay and consternation flooded her heart as she realised where she had felt it before.

The man in Rukongai.

The hold at her throat tightened slightly, causing her to choke, and her kidnapper faltered, loosening his grasp ever so slightly as if to allow her room to breathe. She tried to bite him, but he had her well gagged, the rough fabric of his gloves pressing against her teeth, and there was the sudden sense of warm breath against her ear as he lowered his head to hers.

"I don't want to hurt you, but if you scream or call for help, there'll be a scene," he murmured, the voice barely above a whisper. "I'm sorry, Mitsuki-san. I didn't intend for this to happen, but I need your help. I think... I need more of it than you can probably give, and definitely more than I have the right to ask for."

Mitsuki's eyes darted upwards, trying to make out the outline of his form from her captive position, and she felt his body shift as though letting out a heavy sigh.

"I'll let you go if you promise not to make a fuss that summons your comrades," he whispered. "I know you believe shinigami have honour, so on that honour, Mitsuki-san, promise not to give me away. I don't have much time to talk with you — but it's vital that I do."

Mitsuki hesitated for a moment, then, slowly, she jerked her head in a nod, and at her gesture, she felt the other's body relax. The hand was pulled away from her mouth, allowing her to breath properly once more. Drawing clear air into her lungs, she shuffled around to face her assailant, anger and indignation in her grey eyes but, as she met his troubled gaze, her annoyance flew away, replaced by consternation and dismay.

Though his features were just as she remembered them, instead of peasant robes he was robed in battered shihakushou, torn and dirtied around the edges and with no weapon at his waist. The sight of him in shinigami uniform put the young healer a little on her guard, knowing it was wrong and yet, at the same time, realising how much more normal he appeared in this attire than when she had seen him dressed as the stray. The carefree way in which he had spoken to her in Rukongai was gone, however, and the eyes were almost black with apprehension, regret and guilt flickering in their depths. At her glance, he dropped down onto grass, lowering his head before her in a bow of apology.

“I shouldn’t have done that, I know,” he said softly. “You’re a Kuchiki and this is Inner Seireitei. For laying my hands on you, the penalty is probably death. I had to see you, though. I had to come here... and I didn’t know how else to get your attention. I didn’t know if you might sound an alarm... and I needed to talk to you.”

“What’s happened?” Mitsuki hurriedly gathered her wits, gazing down at him in confusion. “Why did you come here? You told me yourself you don’t like shinigami. If you’re so afraid of them, why venture into the depths of their territory like this... no, even more, why are you dressed like one? I don’t know how you got in here, but the chances of you getting out again unseen are...”

“I’ll take my chances,” the young man said bitterly. “They’re the best odds I have, so I’ll cling to them and make them work somehow.”

He glanced at his hands, covered as they were with dusty black gloves, and Mitsuki felt a sudden, overwhelming rush of compassion for the young man now huddled at her feet. Just as in the Spiritless Zone, she could sense the power emanating from him, yet it was fragmented and indecisive, and there was no attacking intent in his aura. On the contrary, she reflected, it was as though between that meeting and this, something had broken the youth’s spirit, making him appear as lost as one of the disorientated young Plus souls that had poured into the Spiritless Zone in quieter days.

The Spiritless Zone.

Her eyes narrowed, and she gazed at him anew.

“How did you even get here?” she asked suspiciously. “The last time I saw you, you were in Rukongai. You shouldn’t be able to get from there to here like that. It’s not easy even for registered shinigami — how could you follow me from there to here, with all the security measures Seireitei has in place? How do you have a shihakushou? Who gave you that, and why?”

“I stole it,” Katsura admitted. “When you go where shinigami are, the only way to do that is to look like a shinigami looks. I wanted to come see you, Mitsuki — the means don’t matter, do they?”

“I think they do.”

“There are always loopholes,” the young man said vaguely, shrugging his shoulders, but there was a sudden defensiveness in his posture, and Mitsuki saw him fold his arms across his chest as if trying to hide the rents in the fabric. For a brief second she thought she caught sight of blood, but in the darkness it was hard to make out, and before she could mention it, the moment had gone. “That’s not important now. What is is...”

“No, you said it wasn’t important before, but it is. It is important,” Mitsuki cut across him, shaking her head. “You were there, now you’re here, and both times it’s me you’ve come to. What do you want from me, and why are you so interested in what I do?”

He did not answer, uncertainty and indecision glittering in his gaze, and Mitsuki sighed, the tension rushing out of her body at his obvious disconcertion. Despite herself, she reached out an arm, resting her fingers gently beneath his chin as she urged him to raise his gaze to hers.

“Tell me?” she asked softly. “I don’t know why you chose me to flee to, when you wouldn’t even tell me your name before, but...”

“Katsura,” Katsura raised his head, a troubled, half-frightened look on his young features. “My name is Katsura.”

He buried his face in his hands.

“I wasn’t going to tell you that,” he murmured. “I was going to lie... I was going to pretend... but I can’t. When you look at me like that, Mitsuki-san, I only want to tell the truth.”

“Why would you need to lie?” Mitsuki settled herself on the grass opposite him, laying her hand on his shoulder. “You saved my life. More, you came here to speak to me. Why would you come all this way specifically to tell me a lie? I don’t understand... and every word you say confuses me even more.”

“I shouldn’t tell you anything about me,” Katsura admitted miserably. “I shouldn’t, but I want you to trust me. There’s no reason why you should, but I thought, if I told you my name...”

He swallowed hard.

"I knew your name," he whispered. "You told it to me, not your comrades. I never saw them, not once, not until I came to save you from the Hollow. I lied to you then. It was you who told me your name, Mitsuki-san, that night we met by the river. I heard it, then, loud and clear. Ever since then, I've been thinking about it... about you... and what happened there."

"Thinking... about me?" Mitsuki jerked her hand back, staring at him in consternation. "Katsura-kun, I..."

"No," Katsura shook his head before she could put words into a sentence, holding up his hands. "It isn't like that. Everyone thinks it is, but it isn't. I just... when I saw you, with that girl, I didn't want anything bad to happen to you. When you fought the Hollow, you were thinking about them, weren't you? The villagers... you wanted to protect them. You were thinking about them and so you kept fighting, even though you couldn't do anything to stop the Hollow yourself. Before I knew it, I came to save you — I couldn't leave you to die with those thoughts left unanswered."

"My... thoughts?" Mitsuki's eyes became big with disbelief. "Are you telling me you read my mind? That's how you knew where to find me — you can read my thoughts?"

"I can't. Not now," Katsura shook his head, distress in his expression. "I don't know whether you believe me or whether you're thinking about calling the shinigami with swords to arrest me and interrogate me because I infiltrated shinigami space and I shouldn't be here. But then, then I did. I sensed how you felt about those people, Mitsuki-san. It's how I feel about them, too. It made me think... we were allies. We should be allies. And I knew... I didn't want anything bad to happen to you."

He clenched his fists together, twisting the black-cloaked fingers together in obvious agitation, and Mitsuki did not speak, allowing him time and space to put his thoughts together.

"I came here to warn you," he said at length, an earnest expression in his dark eyes. "You were supposed to die in the Spiritless Zone, and you didn't. Because of me, you didn't... but that was wrong."

"I was... supposed to die?" Mitsuki's eyes narrowed. "What do you mean, Katsura-kun? What do you know?"

"Someone was sent to kill you, and they failed," Katsura murmured, genuine pain in his eyes. "They were sent before, and they've been sent to try again. They'll come here, most likely, and try to end your life. They have no choice. If they fail, their own life is probably forfeit.”

“I see,” Mitsuki’s mind was whirling, but somehow she kept calm, her gaze absorbing every inch of Katsura’s tense demeanour as she tried to process his words. “And how is it you know about this? In the Spiritless Zone, too, you seemed to know something was afoot. You came to my aid, but you didn’t want me to go to Hokutan, did you? You knew my comrades were in danger, and that I’d be in danger too, if I went there. I didn’t think of it at first, but, little by little, I’ve realised how odd that was. You knew they were going to be attacked, didn’t you? That’s why you warned me against going back.”

Katsura didn’t respond, and Mitsuki frowned, folding her hands in her lap.

“And this time, you’re warning me again,” she continued. “Why would you do that? We’re strangers — why go to so much risk to protect me? In the Spiritless Zone was one thing, but here... like this...”

“I don’t want you to be killed,” Katsura blurted out, his cheeks reddening at the bluntness of his admission, and Mitsuki stared at him, momentarily taken aback by his words. “That’s all, all right? I don’t want you to be killed. You shouldn’t be allowed to die. You care about the people over the border... someone like that... someone like that should never be attacked. It isn’t right!”

“None of my comrades deserved to be attacked either, you know,” Mitsuki said frankly, and Katsura winced, a troubled look crossing his face once more. He lowered his gaze, and Mitsuki had the sudden impression that her young companion’s presence in Rukongai had been far from coincidence.

“I didn’t meet them,” he said honestly, “so I don’t know. They’re nothing to do with me, so I wasn’t thinking of them. But I met you. I saw you help the little girl, and I know how much you wanted to help the people in that village. I... I admired that. Approved of it. So few people care about the lives of others... and shinigami in particular, they care even less.”

“Not the shinigami I know,” Mitsuki said matter-of-factly. “But you’re sidelining the point. If I’m to believe you came here to warn me, I need to understand why and how you know I’m still in danger.”

Katsura averted his gaze, and for a moment Mitsuki thought he would not reply. Then, at length, he reached out a hesitant hand to take her pale fingers in his.

“If anyone finds out I spoke to you like this, or at all, I am dead and so are you,” he said quietly. “I can’t answer your question, because if I do, it will put both of us in even more danger.”

“From what you’ve said, I’m already a target, and if it puts you in that much danger, you shouldn’t be here telling me these things,” Mitsuki pointed out matter-of-factly. “If you’ve come to me, Katsura-kun, it means you want me to know... to understand something, and you still haven’t told me what that something is. You know, don’t you, what really happened to the shinigami in Hokutan? You know that, and, knowing that my comrades and I were there too, you came to warn me, thinking that we might still be targets, even though we came back alive.”

“I didn’t kill anyone in Hokutan,” Katsura said softly, and Mitsuki snorted, grasping the young man by the shoulders and giving him a gentle shake.

“Of course you didn’t. You were with me, helping me against the Hollow, so how could you have been?” she scolded him, and Katsura’s eyes widened, staring at her as though seeing her for the first time. “If that’s why you’re so afraid, you needn’t be. I owe you my life, whatever and however you came to be in Rukongai when you did. If your warning tonight is true, maybe I owe you it again — but that’s no reason to hide. If you’re so afraid, why not come with me and talk to my allies? They would protect you, once they knew you’d helped me, and...”

“No!” Katsura pulled back, alarm glittering in his dark blue eyes. “No, you don’t understand. You don’t... I don’t belong here. If it got known... that I’d crossed over... that I’d told you anything...”

“Katsura-kun, how involved in this are you?” Mitsuki asked sharply, and Katsura sighed, looking suddenly weary.

“I would never hurt you,” he said soberly. “I give you my word, I never would. I didn’t save your life in order to end it, and I wouldn’t ever want to.”

“You’d risk your own life — more than once — for someone you barely know?” Mitsuki pressed, and Katsura reddened.

“It sounds crazy to me, too,” he admitted awkwardly. ‘I don’t really know how to explain it, except that when I’m around you, everything goes completely contrary to my expectations. I’m not in love with you!’ as Mitsuki arched an eyebrow, “it’s really not like that. If it was, maybe I’d understand it, but it... it isn’t. It’s more like...”

He sighed, turning to glance at the pond for a moment, then meeting her gaze with an earnest one of his own.

“It felt like saving your life was a good thing. An important thing for me to do,” he said at length. “I can’t put it into better words than that, I don’t think. I see a lot of people, and I travel a lot, Mitsuki-san. I see rich people and poor people. Happy people, sad people. Old people, young people — good and bad. But you... there’s something different in your aura. Something I touched against that night I saw you with the young girl. It felt as though you would know... how hard things are for ordinary people. I was surprised when I heard you were from one of the Clans. You really don’t seem like that to me at all.”

“I’m not sure I completely understand,” Mitsuki owned. “Something in my aura? Something you didn’t expect?”

“Yes,” Katsura agreed pensively. “I don’t really understand either, but nonetheless it was like that.”

He shrugged.

“I don’t know how shinigami use magic and things like that. I haven’t ever learned any of your tricks or spells, though sometimes I can do things with reiryoku and I know that I have it,” he added. “Sometimes it lets me see people through more than just their appearances. Some people I can connect to, and I can see what those people are really like deep down. I can’t read your thoughts now, Mitsuki-san, but I have read people’s minds before. I don’t know if it’s normal or if it isn’t — I don’t know enough people with spirit power to ask. Some folk are easy to see right through, but others, you can only catch a glimpse when their guard is down. When that happens, you see right to the core of who they are, and you... you understand things about them that maybe nobody else does. We’ve only just met, I know, and it may seem odd to you, but... when you were fighting the Hollow, I made that connection to you.”

“Almost like a healer would,” Mitsuki murmured, more than half to herself, and Katsura stared at her uncertainly.

“I’m not a healer. I can’t heal anything,” he said hurriedly, and Mitsuki smiled, shaking her head.

“No, I don’t suppose you can,” she agreed lightly, “but that empathy, that sense of reading someone’s character and connecting to them in a way you can’t explain, that’s how healers often are. It’s how we reach out to our patients... maybe that’s what you sensed when you and I met. Maybe it was, I don’t know, a hint of a kindred spirit — someone with a different kind of empathy, but a common understanding nonetheless.”

“Healers... can do that?” Katsura had suddenly gone very white, his eyes huge in his face. “Healers... like the people who died... they can feel like that... think like that?”

“Yes,” Mitsuki agreed soberly. “We’re trained to help others, even if — as it sometimes does — it costs us our lives. We can’t be afraid to go into dangerous places, Katsura-kun. We’re shinigami, and we’re meant to face risks if there are people who need our help. You don’t need to look like that. They were friends of mine and I miss them horribly, but I also know that when they were fighting that Hollow, they believed in giving their all. Saving the villagers was important to all of us — with your help, we kept them safe from harm.”

“Mm,” Katsura chewed on his lip, then, “I need to go. I’ve been here too long as it is, and all these things you’re saying... I’m not sure I ought to hear them.”

“Why not?” Mitsuki was startled. “I thought you wanted to talk about your spirit power... even come to understand it?”

“Perhaps some things are better left alone,” Katsura sighed. “I didn’t come here because of that, anyway. I truly don’t want you to get hurt, and so I took this risk. In return, please, trust me. There are people who can hide in unseen places and witness things they’re not meant to see. If you don’t listen to me, someone really will come to kill you — and they might hurt others at the same time. People dear to you... I don’t know where it might end.”

“People who can hide in unseen places?” Mitsuki echoed, and Katsura nodded.

“Maybe even now,” he admitted uneasily, glancing around him as though expecting someone to emerge from the shadows to strike him dead there and then. “People who wouldn’t hesitate to kill both of us, if they knew we’d ever talked.”

Mitsuki was silent for a moment, then she fixed Katsura with a quizzical glance.

“Was it you who was sent to kill me, Katsura-kun?” she asked directly, and Katsura flinched, a stricken look crossing his dark eyes. Mitsuki sighed, slowly nodding her head at this obvious confirmation of her suspicions.

“It was,” she murmured, more to herself than to him. “In Rukongai, I was meant to die, but you interfered and someone got cross. Someone threatened you... someone backed you into a corner and forced you to come here, didn't they? Someone told you to kill me, else... else what? What will happen to you if I don't die, Katsura-kun?"

Katsura did not answer, and Mitsuki reached out to take her hand in his.

"I'm not afraid of you," she said softly. "You didn't come here to hurt me — if you had that intent, I would be able to read it from your aura the same way you read mine, but I don't. You aren't a bad person. I don't know how you got messed up in this, or who you're so afraid of, but if you let me help you..."

"You can't help me, not like that," Katsura shook his head firmly, getting to his feet and pulling away from her grasp, eying her sadly.

"I told you my name so you'd think me your ally," he added, "but I'm not an ally of your friends. I can't trust them, and so I only came to speak to you. I told you, I didn't come to hurt you. I came to warn you. Please, stop the shinigami from looking for me. If they come after me, I'll be killed — whether by them or by others. The best thing you can do for me is let me alone. Let me slip back into the shadows and vanish, as though I never existed at all. If you do that, then you'll have repaid me for your life by protecting mine. That's all I ask from you — please, stop your friends from looking for me."

"But..."

"If you really want to help me, and want to keep yourself and your comrades safe, tell them to look for the one who should be dead but isn't," Katsura seemed to make up his mind, a flare of resolution briefly illuminating his troubled gaze before fading and disappearing like flames to ash. "Tell them to look for the shinigami who cheated death — tell them to find him, and leave me alone. I'm just the messenger — he's the one you should beware. I won't ever hurt you, Mitsuki-san — but dead people have no souls, and there's no telling what they might do."

"I beg your pardon?" Mitsuki blinked. "One who's dead? Dead how? I don't... explain, what do you mean?"

"I've already said too much," Katsura glanced around him uneasily again. "This is shinigami ground. It's too dangerous."

"Katsura-kun..."

"Goodbye, Mitsuki-san," Katsura cut across her words, bowing his head solemnly before her. Then, as soon as he had arrived, he was gone, leaving only the faintest hum of reiatsu in the surrounding ether to tell that his visit had not been a dream or an illusion.

“Katsura... kun,” Mitsuki ran her fingers over the bent blades of grass where moments earlier he had been, biting her lip in consternation.

Juushirou wasn't able to find any record of you in the criminal courts in Seireitei, but what else could you be but an escaped felon if someone is able to blackmail you and back you into a corner like this? I don't know who these shadows are — these others who are always watching, and I don't know whether my life is really in any danger. You believed it was, though, and even though we barely know each other, you came all the way here to warn me. I'm proof that not all empathes are born within the Unohana Clan. Maybe it's even more widespread — further proof about how little we know regarding what District-born children can do. If you had been Clan born, you would've been guided and trained — but you aren't, and so your power is left to fend for itself, and so, it seems, are you. Because of that, you've got mixed up in something dangerous... yet even if you were the one sent to harm me, I can't see you as a killer.

Slowly she got to her feet, pulling her cloak more tightly around her shoulders as she made her way towards the barracks' building.

Again, I was completely vulnerable in your company. You could've killed me in Rukongai, and again tonight, but you didn't even try. I don't know if the name you gave me is your true one, but I do believe you when you say you don't want to hurt me. I'm not the one who really needs helping, Katsura-kun. You came to me today because you need my help. For my life, I owe you that much. Whatever happened in Rukongai, you were with me when my comrades were killed. Even if you did know about it — and maybe you did — you saved Seri and I, you didn't kill us. I don't want you to lose your life because you protected ours.

She frowned, her brows knitting together thoughtfully.

I might not have sensed killing intent from you tonight, but I did sense genuine fear. You've trusted me with information, and I have to work out the best way to use that information. Firstly, though, I need to make sure that Seireitei stop their search for you. If you really do know what happened to the healers in Hokutan, then I need to convince you that the shinigami aren't your enemy. To do that, I have to prove they won't hurt you.

She rested her hand against the barracks door, glancing up briefly at the thin sliver of silver moon. It reminded her of a curved sword blade, she reflected absently, an apt symbol to hang high over shinigami headquarters.

You're not the only one uneasy in the heart of this place, either. I belong with the people of Rukongai, and maybe, so do you. Maybe that's what you meant when you said we should be allies.

She sighed, pushing open the door.

In that case, the first thing I can do is try and get to the bottom of your last, cryptic message. I don't know what you meant when you talked about a shinigami who cheated death, but obviously you felt it was important. I haven't been here, but maybe others who have been will know more what that means. I'll have to ask Juushirou... if I can work out a way to do so without alerting more suspicions. In any case, if it's a way I can make myself useful while my sword is still recovering, then so be it. Whatever it is, I'm sure it's important, or you wouldn't have come here to risk telling me, Katsura-kun. You wanted me to trust you... so I'll trust you. I'll look into it, and see if I can't find justice for my squad mates at the same time.

He could no longer sense her presence.

From his hiding place, curled up tight among the thick, covering branches of his namesake tree, Katsura let his breath out in a long, shaky sigh, glancing ruefully at his still-trembling fingers as he acknowledged to himself how frightened he had been so close to the shinigami barracks. It would have been very easy, he reflected, for her to have alerted her comrades and summoned them to capture him, but she had not done so. She had listened, and once more, spoken to him with gentle kindness and understanding.

What she had said had troubled him, and he sank back against the trunk, pulling the gloves from his hands and gazing down at his pale fingers, chewing on his lip as he imagined them covered in blood. I said I wasn't going to become a murderer by killing those who didn't deserve it, but maybe I already did. I didn't know Mitsuki's friends, but if they're as she said, maybe... it was wrong.

He closed his eyes, clenching his fists together and fighting to control the swirl of confusion that rose inside him at the thought.

I can't focus on this now. I've taken enough risks for one night. Questioning Father is not a sensible course of action for anyone to take, least of all me. Bad enough I disobeyed his orders a second time. Koku said to leave it to him, but I never saw Father so angry. Persuasive as Koku is where he's concerned, I'm not sure even he can soften Father's judgement this time.

He glanced down, his sharp gaze taking in the shadowy figures of this shinigami and that rushing across the cobbles to take this message or carry out that duty. They seemed ill at ease, he mused, often glancing over their shoulders as if sensing his gaze on them, and for a terrible moment Katsura thought that his suppressed reiryoku had been detected and that they were looking for him. The longer he perched there, however, without a single soul looking his way, the more his fear subsided, and he began to consider his next course of action, aware that the dawn could only be a few hours away. He didn't know whether his crime in the forest had been discovered yet, or whether the body he had inadvertently burned would be identifiable as the real Shouda Mikisue, but he knew that lingering too long in enemy territory was a bad idea.

If they see me, they'll catch me. If they do that, then there'll be no help from the other side of the barrier. Father really will discard me, then. Maybe he will anyway, but at least, if I get back to Rukongai unscathed and unseen, maybe, if I bow before him enough, he'll let me off the slitting of Mitsuki's throat.

His gaze flitted back towards the boundary that separated Thirteenth Division from the general concourse, and he sighed.

In other circumstances, I think we'd be friends. I think... I'd like us to be friends. More than that, maybe. I don't know what this feeling is, but when I'm near her, I feel as though I've met someone who'd understand how I see things. Perhaps she'd even be able to explain to me why this energy prickles from my fingers sometimes without me really intending it to. I'm sure she would know why that body caught fire, when all I intended to do was cover it — but that's a question I could never ask her. Bad enough I told her my name. Koku told me to do what I believed was right, but... I didn't intend to go that far.

He shivered as a chill wind blew through the compound, teasing the wisps of dark hair away from his face.

If she chooses to betray me, then it's over. If she chooses to tell those allies of hers that I was here — or that I still am — then I might not even survive the night. I've put my life completely in her hands, this time. Also, if Father knew I'd told her something about Kurotsuchi, he'd be angry. Even if I told him it was Koku's idea, I'm sure he wouldn't go easy on me. It sounded so much more simple when Koku outlined it — but I'm not as good as he is when it comes to thinking out all the angles. Maybe Mitsuki will take my bait, transfer her interest to Kurotsuchi and away from me... but I can't help but think I've somehow made things more complicated by telling her what I did and how.

He reached for the branch above his head, pulling himself to his feet and gazing down at the ground below, wind whipping through his hair and the thin fabric of his clothing.

Enough worrying about that now, though. I need to leave here, preferably before the sun rises. I'll go home and I'll follow Koku's plan through to the end. He said he'd take care of things there — and deal with getting Kurotsuchi out of my way — so all I have to do is go back and report that I didn't attack Mitsuki because it was too dangerous to get close with all the guards protecting her. I'll tell Father that they were investigating Kurotsuchi, just like Koku suggested. Even if it's not true at the moment, it will be, now I've sown the seeds. If I tell Father that I infiltrated Inner Seireitei without a single person taking a bit of notice of me, but that they were looking into reports of a former Onmitsukidou turning traitor, then surely it will distract him away from what happened in Rukongai. And if Seireitei catch Kurotsuchi..?

He smiled, a faint, humourless smile that twitched briefly at the corners of his mouth.

If they catch and kill a dead man, well, then it just returns normal order to the world. If a dead man dies because of this, so be it. We can move on, and Father will discard his puppet if he starts creating ripples. No, Koku's right. I can't undo what Seireitei already know about me, so distracting them with something more juicy is the only angle. I just hope... that Mitsuki doesn't tell anyone I was here tonight. I want to trust her... I need to trust her... but she's still a shinigami, and I guess we'll find out exactly how far I can have faith in one of

The woodlands of District Seven were quiet as Souja made his way cautiously towards the usual Kitsune meeting place, pausing every few moments to scan the air for any sign of unfamiliar followers, or to listen for the sound of muffled footsteps that would tell him someone was on his path. All was silent, however, and, with the exception of the hunting owls flying high above his head, he was alone.

"I was starting to wonder whether you were planning to come at all."

The disembodied voice came suddenly from the darkness of the forest and, despite himself, Souja started, a rueful hand going to his chest to calm his pounding heart. He turned, seeing the shadows move slightly as a hooded, cowed figure made its presence known, Joumei's outline visible enough in the blackness for Souja to know where to head, but not so much that a person watching from distance might be able to track their path. He cast a careful glance around him, then crossed towards the trees, deliberately skirting away from Joumei's position before doubling back on himself and following the faint, uneven hum of his friend's mutated reiatsu until he was standing beneath the branches of a large, gnarled pine tree.

"You Endou really need work in discretion, too," Joumei ducked out from behind the broad trunk, and Souja could see resignation in the silverish eyes. "Never mind. As it happens, there are no alien spirits abroad tonight. We've kept the area under very careful surveillance... but since you took that shinigami back with you, there has been no sign of foreign activity hereabouts."

"Perhaps we were jumping to paranoid conclusions, then," Souja reflected, following his companion deeper into the woodland towards the entrance to the Kitsune lair. "The Endou are good at that, even if they're not good at other things."

"No..." Joumei hesitated slightly, then sighed, pushing back the branches and vines that covered the entrance and sliding his body through the narrow gap, moving a few steps forward to allow Souja to do the same. "I wish we were, Souja-dono, but I'm afraid we're not. I sent you the message because it's important someone in a position of authority knows about it, and as soon as is humanly possible."

"Someone in authority, but not Father?" Souja questioned, as they headed below ground, this time avoiding the deep stairway that led to the funerary chamber and instead following a more even pathway towards the chambers which Joumei used as his own. Joumei reached up to knock back the hood of his cloak, shaking his head grimly.

"I'd rather report it to you first, if you don't mind," he said slowly. "I'm worried what might happen if Hirata-sama were to get involved. I think... it might be a bad thing for all concerned."

"Your message was broken up when I received it," Souja admitted. "I heard you say that Izumi had discovered something from beyond Seireitei — but more than that, I couldn't make out. Still, I decided it was important I come as soon as I finished my day's duties. Whatever you have to say, Joumei, I think it safer told face to face than through Hell Butterflies, especially if you don't want Father listening in."

"You didn't tell him you were coming, did you?" Joumei paused at the entrance to his private chamber, turning to fix his companion with thoughtful pale eyes, and Souja sighed, shaking his head.

"No," he admitted. "He'll be cross, if he finds out — or no, I'd better say when, because he will. Probably I'll go to him and tell him the truth myself, if I'm honest about it — once I know what truth he needs to be told. Am I right in thinking that Izumi's findings relate to Tenichi specifically — rather, to do with the samples she took when he was here with you?"

"They do indeed," Joumei said grimly, pushing the door open with a shove, and ushering his companion within. A dim light cast the small, windowless space in a hazy glow, and Souja could make out the slight form of Joumei's sister leaning against the wall, waiting patiently for their arrival. As they entered, she raised her head, and from the consternation in her vivid silver eyes Souja felt a sense of deep unease wash over his heart.

"Well?" he asked softly. "What are we dealing with? Tell me what you know, both of you — whether it be good or bad, I need to hear all I can."

"That was the idea," Joumei pulled out the chamber's only makeshift stool, indicating for Souja to take it before squatting down on the cold floor, crossing his legs and leaning back against the wall. "Now we're here and quite alone, Souja-dono, I want to be frank with you. That shinigami of yours... watch him."

"Tenichi?" Souja's eyes became slits. "Explain?"

Izumi's gloved fingers twitched together in a series of fluttering movements, and Souja frowned, shaking his head in frustration.

"More slowly, please, Izumi-chan. I can't follow your signals as fluently as Joumei, and I want to understand clearly everything you've found."

Izumi frowned, but obediently repeated her gestures, this time more slowly and deliberately, and Souja made out the word 'Rukongai'. He chewed on his lip.

"Rukongai? Tenichi was taken there?"

"We think so," Joumei said gravely. "More than that, though. We — well, Izumi — thinks that he wasn't taken to the Spiritless Zone. The minerals she found on his clothing are not compatible with that area of land, nor with anything in Seireitei. There are two, maybe three deposits that only exist in the Rukon, but they are found in spiritually potent areas, as they show some level of exposure to reiryoku."

Izumi's fingers twitched again, and Joumei's lips pressed together.

"Continuous reiryoku exposure," he amended. "In other words, a place where people with spirit power have resided and probably for some duration."

"Outside of Seireitei?" Souja demanded, and Izumi lowered her head solemnly.

“You’re completely sure?”

“As sure as we can be.” Joumei confirmed.

“But... have you been to Rukongai? Taken samples there? I don’t understand how you can be so precise.”

Izumi unfastened the tie of her cloak, pulling it back and retrieving a scroll from the inner folds, crossing the room towards Souja and holding it out to him with a formal bow. Hesitantly Souja took it, and, after glancing at his young companion, he gingerly unrolled the aging paper, smoothing it against his knees as he scanned the contents for any sign of clarity.

There was none. A list of figures and lines of complicated characters greeted his eyes, and he raised his gaze to Joumei’s helplessly.

“This is..?”

“Survey documentation from an Urahara expedition into Rukongai, approximately a hundred and fifty years ago,” Joumei said matter-of-factly. “We have no recent records from the Urahara archives, but certain documents from before the Reidoku incident got brought and stored here to allow us to continue a measure of research in secret. This particular document relates to mineral deposits found in specific zones of Rukongai. The minerals Izumi identified are only all present in one area that we can see. Bearing in mind that this data is old, there may be some inaccuracy, but... we believe it to be a region apart from the current Spiritless Zone and, from the reishi residue on the particles, a place where people with spirit power currently reside.”

“So Tenichi was taken to a part of Rukongai the Gotei thinks is empty,” Souja frowned, setting the scroll aside. “That’s a pretty big security oversight. I know land was evacuated when the Spiritless Zone was begun, but... my working memory doesn’t go back far enough to remember all the political wranglings over the Rukon before that. Could there be people living in those places still?”

“I think it’s almost certain they are,” Joumei said grimly. “Look, Souja-dono, I’ll cut to the point. Your shinigami, Tenichi, he’s an Urahara as sure as we are. You know it and so do I. He went missing and conveniently turned up here, near where we are. Izumi is sure there was another Urahara here, and the only one who’d still be interested in us is Urahara Keitarou. Tenichi is Daisuke-sama’s son, and Daisuke-sama was Keitarou’s right hand man. The story goes that he martyred himself to save Keitarou's life. There are too many coincidences and the scientist in me dislikes their frequency. It's far more likely that there is no coincidence. We've no evidence to clearly prove it, but there were threads of foreign reiatsu on Tenichi's clothing, too. We don't have anyone to match them to, but there were Urahara fragments present in those samples. Izumi thinks it was the same person who was with Tenichi in the forest — in the location of Daisuke-sama's grave. The only people cognisant of that burial place, aside from us, are Urahara Keitarou and a District girl Tenichi went to school with. She's not an Urahara, which rules her out... and rules back in prime suspect number one."

"You think Tenichi wasn't abducted, don't you?" Souja's heart ran cold as his worst fears began to come into focus. "You think he's cooperating with Keitarou in some way because of this shared genetic past."

"I don't know," Joumei admitted. "The boy's answers to our questions... well, there wasn't a loophole in them, and it is possible all of this happened without his active knowledge. Nonetheless I think he was taken by Keitarou and for a purpose. Maybe it's a greater purpose than finding us... I don't know. I do remember, though, that Keitarou's zanpakutou has certain specific qualities of control..."

"You think he might have made a puppet out of Tenichi?" Souja asked sharply.

"If he had, you would probably have noticed certain symptoms by this point." Joumei glanced at Izumi for confirmation, who nodded her head decisively. "Tenichi has spirit power. Keitarou's sword would cause a reaction with Tenichi's natural spiritual defence system. Wearing spirit cuffs might have delayed it, but by this point you'd probably notice... has he been pale, lethargic, even coughing since he came back to Seireitei?"

"On the contrary, he's been fine," Souja let out a sigh of relief. "Then he probably hasn't been infected?"

"Probably not, but that might not be a good thing," Joumei warned. "I said his story had no loopholes, but it doesn't mean I entirely believed what he said. Izumi's test results only add weight to those suspicions. So, my advice is watch him. He may or may not know Keitarou is interested in him, but I suspect that he does, and more, that he's hiding more than he's told you. It may be that he's just frightened to admit the person who kidnapped him was someone he knew, in which case, time will probably bring the truth to the fore but... just in case it's not so simple... be careful, Souja. It might not just be about finding and killing us. It might be about something far more, and we're simply one distraction in a much larger web."

"I understand, and I'll keep it in mind," Souja promised, getting to his feet. "I also want you to take care though, both of you. Whether you're the main target or a side fancy, your lives are precious and nobody wants you killed. I can see why you don't want me to tell Father, since he might act against Tenichi without any real grounds to do so — but..."

Izumi's fingers danced together briskly, and Souja paused, furrowing his brows.

"Wait... Izumi-chan, say that again. Did you... I must've misunderstood, but..."

Izumi repeated the gesture, and Souja's brow creased even more.

"Children?" he whispered, and Izumi nodded.

"It's highly likely that Keitarou has a child," Joumei said softly. "The reports go that when Eiraki-hime disappeared, she was already pregnant. That child would be about your age now, I think, maybe a little older. If it were a son, Souja-dono..."

He trailed off, and Souja swallowed hard.

"A son might be considered legitimate, mightn't they, in a claim for the Clan," he realised. "If they challenged me and won in witnessed combat, then they would be accepted without question in my place. Worse, they could challenge Father. I see, and I understand. I'll be on my guard, Joumei. Don't worry. And I won't bring Father into things, not till we know more. If you find out further information, though, you must bring it to me at once via whatever method you are able. If Keitarou is lurking in Rukongai, he almost certainly had a hand in the murders in the Spiritless Zone. I'd like to see him brought to justice... he's been free to cause suffering for far too long."

"In that we are completely agreed," Joumei said acidly. "I think it unwise that you come here again, whatever the provocation — instead, I will try and find a way to send a message to you that's less unstable than a Hell Butterfly. If you don't hear for a while, don't worry about us. We will find out all we can, and we will be in touch."

"Then I'll return and try and cover my absence as best I can," Souja decided. "I'll also keep close tabs on Tenichi, as much as I'm able being that he's in Kikyue's patrol. If he knows nothing about anything, then all should be well, but on the off chance he is hiding something, it's better that it comes to the fore before anyone gets hurt and before it ruins both his career and his life.”

“I suppose we’ll see whether that’s possible,” Joumei reflected. “Travel back safely, Souja-dono. The night is quiet tonight, but those nights are always the ones that bring the biggest dangers.”

“I thought Taichou told you you weren’t to stray too far from the barracks, Mitsuki-chan,”

As Mitsuki pushed back the sliding door of the Thirteenth, Naoko was waiting for her, arms folded across her chest and a decidedly put out expression on her proud features. “I’ve been looking high and low for you, and no wonder I couldn’t find you! You might feel up to going for a walk, but...”

“I didn’t leave the grounds, Naoko-chan, I promise,” Mitsuki carefully fastened the latch behind her, turning to face her friend with a faint smile. “I’m sorry you were worried about me. Fukutaichou came to see me earlier, and she gave me leave to spread my wings a little — but I promised not to go outside of Thirteenth’s territory and I didn’t. Just, the koi ponds are so pretty and tranquil and, well, this isn’t my division. It’s a foreign place full of people I don’t really know, and I needed some space from that for a while.”

“Not everyone here is a stranger.” Naoko looked hurt, and Mitsuki sighed, linking her arm in her friend’s with a nod.

“I know, I didn’t mean you,” she said apologetically. “You and Juushirou and Houjou-kun have been kind to me and it isn’t as though there aren’t other familiar faces. I suppose what I meant was the atmosphere was foreign. You all belong here, but I don’t. It’s not my division, and I’m not really sure, yet, what being in a division in Seireitei means. I’m not used to it — that’s all. Juushirou told me how pretty the grounds here were, and it’s true.”

She cast the older girl a quizzical look.

“You said you were looking for me? Any reason why?”

“You have a visitor, from Sixth,” Naoko nodded, pursing her lips and eying her companion thoughtfully. “Mi-chan, were you really all alone out there? I came to the door because I thought I felt something on the breeze... and it wasn’t your reiatsu.”

“Who would have been there?” Mitsuki opened her eyes slightly in a show of surprise, inwardly feeling guilty at deceiving her friend. “I only know a handful of people here, and this is Thirteenth’s barracks. Nobody else would be coming here without your knowledge, surely?”

“No, that’s true...” Naoko agreed cautiously. “I’m not sure, maybe it’s nothing, but...”

She trailed off mid-sentence, loosing her arm from the other girl’s and moving to the door. Slowly she unfastened it, sliding it back and staring out for a moment into the darkness, then she sighed, shutting it again with a click.

“Maybe it’s my imagination,” she admitted at length. “We’re all so on edge lately, and I want to make sure you’re safe as well, you know. Perhaps I’m overthinking it, but I could’ve sworn...”

“There’s nobody there, Naoko-chan,” Mitsuki said softly, reaching out to take Naoko gently by the hands. “I came in by myself, and there was nobody else by the ponds when I left them. I would have seen them, wouldn’t I? Or I would’ve sensed them. My spirit power is recovering — I’m sure I’d have known if someone else was there.”

“That’s probably true,” Naoko acknowledged with a rueful smile. “I’m probably reading too much into nothing, then. Just, a short while ago when Taichou sent me out to look into something, Dokusou Houshi picked up a reiatsu I couldn’t quite place and nor could he. It was so faint I could barely pick it up, but it was definitely there. Tonight, I thought I sensed it again — but I don’t sense it now. You didn’t pick up on anything?”

“No,” Mitsuki looked thoughtful, feeling guilty for deceiving her friend but shaking her head all the same. “Meanwhile, you said I had a guest?”

“Oh! Oh, yes, you do,” Naoko nodded, thick braid of auburn hair falling over her shoulder. “It’s Kuchiki-kun... I mean, Ryuu-dono. He’s come on behalf of the Sixth Division and Sixth District’s Clan, I think, but... I imagine he asked to be the one to come with the message, since I think he’s been worried about you too.”

“It’s been a long time since I saw Ryuu,” Mitsuki’s eyes softened, and a smile twitched at her lips. “I’d like to see him very much. I know the Kuchiki didn’t want to make a political incident of my being involved in this, so they’ve kept away, but... I’m all right now, and they are family. People like Ryuu and Shirogane-senpai... no, I shouldn’t call him that, should I? Shirogane-dono, they’re dear to me beyond the ties of Clan. Will you take me to him, Naoko-chan? If he has news for me, I ought to hear it.”

“Of course. He’s in the Taichou’s office, and Taichou sent me to get you,” Naoko agreed. “Follow me. I’ll show you the way.”

Author's Note: IMPORTANT please read.

Hi all — it's been a little while. I've had exams, gomen nasai.

However, recently I've also had a bit of a crisis of conviction where Bleach as a whole is concerned. This story still has a few chapters to upload before we get into the unwritten abyss, but this week's manga chapter rather shook me from a fannish perspective, most specifically because of the MANNER in which a certain event was handled (not its happening, but the WAY it happened — if in fact, it happened as I think it must). It's made me wonder what else there is to come, and whether I really want to see it happen.

Consequently, I am in two minds about this story and whether to continue and try and finish it before worse things happen in canon, or whether to ditch it completely. What I really want to know is how many people are still reading/want me to continue?

If you are still reading, please review this chapter and tell me your thoughts. It is seriously in your hands. If there is enough interest, I shall do my best to continue regardless of what Kubo does — but I want to know that it's worth my doing so.

Thanks for reading and sorry for the sober tone.

23. Mitsuki's Guest

Chapter Twenty Two: Mitsuki's Guest

It was not a long walk from the main barracks to Juushirou's 'Ugendou', and, as Naoko raised her hand to knock on the door, she could hear the sound of low voices coming from within. Ryu was not a frequent visitor to Thirteenth, for his own conscientious attitude towards his squad and the frequent duties placed upon him made it difficult to pay house calls, but his friendship with the Thirteenth Division's upper members had not diminished any in the process and, as Naoko cast Mitsuki a sidelong glance, she knew that another glad reunion was about to take place on the other side of the door.

The young healer was still pale, but there was more colour in her cheeks now and secretly Naoko was glad that her friend had found the physical strength to rise from her bed and rejoin the general population. It was for this reason that she had not pressed the issue of the reiatsu too hard, not wanting Mitsuki to question her still recovering senses, but as they had walked across the long wooden bridge that led to their destination, Naoko had once more been sure that her friend had not been in the garden alone.

If someone was stalking her, though, and she knew nothing of it, better I don't frighten her. She's been through enough already... there's no need for her to go through more, not while she's recovering like this. Maybe later, maybe when she's less unsettled... but right now she looks better than she has done, and I don't want to change that.

She rapped on the wood sharply, waiting for Juushirou's familiar summons to call her in, then slid back the door, bowing her head towards her superior then ushering Mitsuki into the small chamber. Within, the Captain was seated at his usual desk, Enishi propping up the wall in the far corner with his broad arms folded across his chest. On the other side, perched stiffly on a cushion which Naoko knew with a wry smile had been hurriedly pulled out of storage for their guest was the Sixth Division's Third Seated officer, Kuchiki Ryu.

He had changed little in the time since they had all graduated from the Academy. His dark hair had grown longer, but he still wore it tied in the same tail, and his black and white shihakushou were smart and clean, stitched from the finest fabrics Sixth Division could provide. About his throat hung the pendant of the Kuchiki Clan, and, in any other circumstances, his appearance might be seen as foreboding or austere. Naoko knew Ryuu, though, and, like all those present, she knew that his proud Kuchiki veneer concealed a loyal, if sometimes awkward sincerity which had never wavered. Now, despite the gravity of his demeanour, she could see relief and pleasure glitter in the slate grey eyes as Mitsuki entered the chamber.

“Mitsuki,” he murmured, and Mitsuki hurried forwards, grasping his white gloved hands in hers and squeezing them tightly. An only child, Mitsuki had always seen Ryuu more as a brother and a cousin and Ryuu had reciprocated the affection, preferring Mitsuki’s company to that of his own sisters.

“I’m sorry to have worried you,” she said now, kneeling on the tatami mat before him and casting him a warm smile. “It’s been a long time, Ryuu-kun, but you look well and happy — I’m glad.”

“I wish we weren’t reuniting in such circumstances as these,” Ryuu admitted, returning the smile with one of his own. “Nonetheless, I am content to see you alive and more, risen. I was under the impression you had been incapacitated with exhaustion — but clearly you are making some headway now.”

“I’m all right,” Mitsuki agreed vaguely. “It wasn’t nice, and I’d rather not talk about it too much, but I’m recovering. Once Yuuyugo has recharged her spirit power, I’ll go and see what I can do to help Retsu-sama, too. Please tell the rest of the Clan that, if they ask about me, Ryuu-kun. I’m all right — they don’t need to get involved.”

“On the contrary, Shirogane-fukutaichou has done everything in his power to prevent Clan involvement in this matter,” Ryuu said softly. “We are all too aware of the dangers of allowing the Clan to mobilise to avenge its pride and Guren-sama also agrees that such a venture would be unwise. He has taken the line with the family that you have chosen to live and act away from the Clan, therefore this is clearly not a case of a Kuchiki being targeted — and so far, things are calm. I have come here tonight to see how you are for myself — but there will be no action from the Clan without the sanction of the Gotei, you have my word on that.”

“I think that’s a relief for all of us,” Juushirou put in, gesturing for Naoko to sit down too and reaching to pour her a mug of tea. “Here, Naoko, you should join this meeting too. Ryuu brought some news with him from Sixth Division and I’d be interested for you and Enishi both to hear it.”

“News?” Naoko obediently did as she was bidden, taking the mug of tea gratefully and casting her opposite number a quizzical look.

“What kind of news, Kuchiki-kun?”

“Yes, the other reason for my coming was to convey information from my Vice Captain,” Ryuu nodded sagely. “Given the Kuchiki’s position in this, he felt it better that the message was passed to a more neutral authority. When I heard that he intended to pass it to Thirteenth, I volunteered my services as messenger. Truly, Mitsuki, I believe he would much like to see you too — but Guren-sama’s occupation with Clan affairs often means that Shirogane-fukutaichou is left holding full responsibility for the squad. I think he would rather not have spared me — but he understood why I wanted to go, and so allowed it.”

“When I’m more able, I’ll come to Sixth and see him,” Mitsuki promised. “I’d like to hear news of Father, too — I know he’s still alive, but I’d like to get a message to him, if possible.”

“Teitou-dono is in good health and would doubtless like to hear from you, too,” Ryuu promised her. “I will ensure such arrangements are made. You have my word.”

“So, this news, then?” Enishi drained his own mug of tea, dumping the ceramic vessel back down on the floor with a thud. “I’m pretty intrigued to know what Shirogane-dono’s got lined up for us. Tisn’t often the Kuchiki throw a bone our way, so to speak — it must be something pretty important.”

“Possibly, depending on how you read it,” Ryuu said cautiously. “As you may or may not know, Houjou, my Vice Captain has certain contacts among District individuals — nomadic traders he met some years previously and with whom he has established agreeable arrangements. They provide him with information — one woman, Funaho, is particularly sharp in this regard, and the data she provides almost always proves accurate. That being the case, when she came to beg an audience with him last evening, he admitted her to his study at once.”

“Shirogane-dono has contacts among the District classes?” Naoko blinked, and Ryuu nodded.

“I believe it was an acquaintance formed during his brief exile, when my Clan was in less happy straits,” he reflected. ‘I do not know the particulars, but she is an intelligent individual and not given to exaggeration. Shirogane-fukutaichou puts a lot of trust in her, furnishing her with tokens by which she can enter parts of Inner Seireitei on his errands and she has never betrayed that faith. Last evening she brought news of a village... or no, perhaps a small town on the border between Second and Third. There were some rumours of dissident activity there. I believe the name of the settlement was Haruna. Houjou,' he turned to Enishi, "would I be correct in suggesting that some Gotei officials were abducted in that vicinity?"

"Haruna?" Enishi rubbed his chin. "Now you mention it, I think Ikata did talk about that area when he was holding forth about his own men. Yes, Kuchiki, I think you're right. I think they did disappear not far from the border with Second and Third."

"That's too convenient to be coincidental, surely?" Naoko said sharply, and Ryuu inclined his head.

"I believe so too, and so did Fukutaichou when he heard it," he agreed gravely. "He gave the impression there had been discussion over this at a Vice Captain's meeting — it seems that was correct."

"Yeah. Yeah, it was," Enishi agreed. "Haruna-chou, huh. Rum place, if I remember right. Not quite Second, not quite Third. Lots of trading goes on there — as you'd expect, being that the border runs right through the middle."

"You've been there?" Mitsuki shot him a questioning look, and Enishi nodded.

"Ran some patrols there a few years back," he agreed. "The area we cover changes from time to time, Edogawa, so it's been a while since last I went. I think it's now part of Kuchiki patrolling land... isn't that right?"

"It is, but Shirogane-fukutaichou would rather not become directly involved," Ryuu said matter-of-factly. "There has been some stickiness already in Sixth District over the abduction of the Ninth Division recruit, and he would rather not make that worse. Ukitake-taichou,"

He turned towards Juushirou,

"My Vice Captain requests that, as part of your ongoing investigation into these events, your Thirteenth Division be deployed to investigate this lead in our stead."

"That's a little cheeky of him," Naoko remarked. "Doesn't he think we have our own work to do?"

"But Thirteenth are actively involved in investigating this, Shikibu. Since Tenichi was nabbed, that's been the case," Enishi pointed out. "What do you think, Taichou? I'm game to go if you like, check it out and see if anything strange is afoot."

"Wait a minute," Juushirou raised his hand, casting Ryuu a quizzical look. “Did Shirogane-dono’s informant give any other details about the kind of dissident activity we might be looking into? I’d rather go into the scene prepared — are we talking rebel District individuals with sticks and barbs, or something more?”

“I am not entirely sure,” Ryuu looked apologetic. “Being an outsider to the town, I believe Funaho could only glean bits and pieces and it was on her own initiative she decided it was information Shirogane-fukutaichou should hear. All I know is that some rebel element may be using this town. That, and one other thing which probably has no connection whatsoever.”

“Things with no connection often are connected,” Juushirou said dryly. “Shunsui’s always saying that, and it’s true.”

“Well, then I will divulge it, too,” Ryuu shrugged. “I believe it to be a fancy of the common folk populating the area, but if it is of interest, I have no reason to keep it secret. There have been stories — rumours — of restless spirits being sighted in this region, too.”

“Ghosts don’t exist in Seireitei,” Naoko said frankly, and Ryuu nodded.

“I would concur,” he said simply. “However, the rumour still persists. What manner of spirits, I don’t know. Funaho was also unclear, only that she had heard a few of the young folk talking at the town well, and it had struck her as strange. She later heard a similar discourse between two elderly women as they were selling their wares, and it put her on her guard. She saw no sign of these so called ghosts, I hasten to add. Only both the old and the young folk seemed sure that the ghost of a dead man had walked through their village a few times in recent weeks.”

“The ghost... of a dead man?” Mitsuki murmured the words softly, and Naoko sent her a sharp glance, noting the change of expression that crossed her friend’s features.

“Mitsuki-chan? Does that mean something to you?”

“I... don’t know,” Mitsuki admitted, looking troubled. “Perhaps... not. I’ve never been to this Haruna place, so far as I know... and...”

“Does it strike a chord with something that happened in the Spiritless Zone?” Juushirou asked gently, and Mitsuki shrugged helplessly.

“I’m not sure how to explain it,” she said at length. “Just, it’s not the first time I’ve heard someone talk about a dead man walking. I can’t be any clearer than that, but... I wonder... whether such a thing could really happen.”

Juushirou’s eyes narrowed to near slits, and for a moment he was silent, processing this. Then he sighed.

“Perhaps it carries some meaning for me too,” he admitted. “Not a dead man, exactly, but someone believed dead, perhaps?”

“This is a story I haven’t heard,” Enishi’s eyebrows shot up. “What are you talking about, Taichou?”

“When I sent Ketsui to the archive to investigate the man who helped Mitsuki escape in Rukongai, he brought back notes about an Onmitsukidou who was allegedly killed ten years ago absconding from the Shihouin’s prison,” Juushirou said slowly. “Kai will not be pleased, probably, that I’ve divulged that much — but when I went to see him, he confirmed that it was true. They never found his body... and now you say that people from a village have seen ghosts. Ghosts can’t exist in Seireitei — Naoko’s right about that. However, someone who ought to be dead but isn’t... someone might see them and think they’d seen a ghost.”

“A dead Onmitsukidou, watching from the shadows, hiding in places he can’t be seen,” Mitsuki blanched, and Naoko sent her friend a concerned look.

“Mitsuki-chan?”

“An Onmitsukidou could certainly do those things,” Ryuu said grimly. “You went to see Shihouin about this, did you say, Ukitake? And he confirmed such a person had existed?”

“Yes, as you say,” Juushirou agreed. “This occurred on the border of Second and Third, and Kai told me the man — his name was Suzuki, I think — was from Second District. He had dilute Shihouin blood — but was not a member of the Clan. I believe he was a petty thief before he became an agent of the Shihouin’s secret forces. This information remains confidential — I trust everyone in this room to treat it with discretion. I wouldn’t have mentioned it now, only Ryuu’s story strikes too many chords to ignore a possible connection.”

He sat back on his hands, deliberating, then,

“I’ll go to Haruna myself, I think,” he decided, causing startled looks from all of his companions.

“Taichou?” Naoko frowned. “But surely... in a situation like this...”

“It’s best that I take on Shirogane-dono’s request personally, and I think Kai would prefer me to do so, given the conversation we had,”

Juushirou said simply. "I'll take a couple of officers with me — Kirio and Tsunemori, most probably, since Kirio's quick and I might have use for Tsunemori's Kidou. Enishi, I'll leave you in charge here. Naoko, I don't even need to ask you to back him up, I suppose?"

"Of course not," Naoko shook her head. "But if you're going... what about..."

She glanced at Mitsuki, who frowned.

"I won't get in anyone's way," she said softly. "I might not be much use to anyone, but I won't be a hindrance, either."

"Perhaps it would be a good time to take Mitsuki back to Sixth with me?" Ryuu suggested. "Shirogane-fukutaichou wishes to see her anyway, and she could pursue enquiries about her family more easily there. I think that to be the best idea, Ukitake — with your permission, I should like to take my kinswoman home."

"Mitsuki, what do you think?" Juushirou asked, and Mitsuki hesitated for a moment before nodding her head.

"If Ryuu is with me, I'll be safe enough," she said decidedly. "If I'm at Sixth, too, I won't be getting in the way here. There are people there I want to see and speak to — and whilst Thirteenth has been kind to me, it's not my division. Truly, I'm a little lost here, without anything specific to do. Maybe, if I go home, I'll find something... and if not, I'll at least be able to see my kin and, perhaps, contact my Father."

"I see," Juushirou's eyes clouded briefly at her words, but he nodded his head. "Then I'll give my consent for you to go. Ryuu, please take her straight to Sixth Division, though. No diversions, nothing like that. We still don't know what dangers may lurk in the shadows at night, and I'd rather we were too careful than not careful enough."

"It's understood," Ryuu inclined his head. "Mitsuki will be quite safe with Sixth Division, I assure you."

"I'll go and get Yuuyugo, then," Mitsuki got to her feet, offering her cousin a faint smile. "Thank you, Ryuu. I appreciate it."

With that she was gone, and Juushirou let out a heavy sigh.

"Twenty five years is a long time, sometimes," he murmured, more to himself than anyone, and Naoko frowned.

"She's still shaken up over a lot of things," she agreed. "Taichou, while Mitsuki isn't here, there's something I want you to know. In light of what's been said this evening, I think it important I raise it, even if it proves to be wrong."

"Go on," Juushirou nodded, and Naoko bit her lip.

"When you sent me out scouring for evidence about the Hollow behaviour, I told you I picked up something like a reiatsu, but I wasn't sure how to place it," she said slowly. "It was real, but I couldn't identify it."

"I remember," Juushirou agreed. "What of it?"

"I thought I felt that reiatsu again tonight," Naoko admitted. "Here, within Thirteenth Division."

"Here?" Enishi reacted at once, sitting bolt upright and almost banging his head on Juushirou's shelves. "But... within the Division's barracks?"

"Yes," Naoko looked uneasy. "I think... whoever it was... was here. And I think... they were watching Mitsuki."

"Mitsuki?" Ryuu looked horrified. "With what intention?"

"I don't know, and I didn't want to frighten her by pushing the subject, so I didn't," Naoko confessed. "When I asked, she said she sensed nothing and saw nobody, but her senses are still ragged and might not be working to full strength. I don't want her to think someone or something is stalking her, but given Tenichi's abduction and what happened in the Spiritless Zone, it worried me."

"If that's the case, then it probably is best Mitsuki goes to Sixth Division for a while," Juushirou said heavily. "You were right to tell me, Naoko, even if you had no real basis for your fears. If there is a former Onmitsukidou in the shadows, and if they are involved in abductions like Tenichi's, it's far better to be safe than sorry. Kidnapping someone like Mitsuki would create a political incident. The Kuchiki have stayed quiet so far, but Guren-sama still acknowledges Mitsuki as one of his Clan. If she was to be specifically targeted, it could prove troublesome for a lot of people."

"We won't let anything happen to her in Sixth, you have my word," Ryuu said grimly. "We will protect her however we can."

"I was going to ask permission to try to go trace this reiatsu," Naoko added, "but I suppose if you're going out yourself, Taichou, I ought to stay here with Hou... Fukutaichou, shouldn't I?"

"I'd rather you did, for now," Juushirou agreed. "I'd feel happier knowing that you were both here and on your guard, just in case there is danger abroad tonight. If some entity did break into Thirteenth Division, I'm concerned that I didn't sense it sooner — but if you and Dokusou Houshi recognised it, you'd doubtless pick it up more quickly. Even if Mitsuki leaves Thirteenth tonight, there are vulnerable young ones here who could easily get hurt if we were inattentive. I'd prefer to have you stay behind for now, I'm afraid — tonight, leave the investigations to me."

"Yes, sir," Naoko bowed her head. "If it comes back — whatever it is — I'll be sure to nail it this time around."

"Then we'll leave it at that," Juushirou decided, getting to his feet. "It's late, but that can't be helped. Night is often the best time to go hunting ne'er-do-wells, so I'd better go ready Kirio and Tsunemori to leave!"

The moon was riding high over Seireitei as Souja crossed over the District boundary, stepping onto the winding chalkstone pathway that led from the outer reaches of his family's District to the white walls that divided Inner Seireitei from the surrounding land. The air was cool and gentle, deceptively so, Souja decided, his senses alert and aware as he navigated the uneven track. Joumei and Izumi's findings had troubled him, but, though he had spent the walk back pondering over them, he could not see how to take them forward.

Aizen Keitarou... huh.

Souja's eyes narrowed as he remembered the last time he had heard that name come up before his Father. It had been an Endou Clan council meeting, some ten years before, when he had been just a teenager and attending the gathering for the first time. Sat up high in the stalls with Misashi as his companion and guide, he had watched proceedings with big, eager eyes, feeling important to be included in such a formal group.

"Everything this family does, it begins here, Souja-kun," his grandfather had murmured to him as they had taken their seats among the rest. "Your father is a very powerful and important man to this family, and as you'll see, his decisions allow us to move forward and continue to grow. You must learn to be as he is, my boy — for the sake of the Endou, you must understand as soon as you can how control over the Clan means peace for the District and everyone living here."

"Everyone, including Joumei and Izumi?" he had asked with innocent eyes, and Misashi had nodded, putting a gentle finger to his lips.

“Those are names you must not speak anywhere, not even to me,” he warned. “That too is a burden only an Endou leader can carry — when you grow older, you will understand.”

The room had been full that day, Souja remembered, the rows of red and brown clad kinsman adorned with the individual crests of Endou strains gathered in their usual places around the room. Souja had marvelled on how many different family emblems he could see, yet every one of those present had their gazes turned towards the centre of the room where his father, calm and quiet, stood waiting for the time for the meeting to begin. Souja had always had a close bond with his father, and so had never seen the bird of prey hunter that he had heard people talk about in the manor grounds, yet that day, the subject had turned to the hunt for a missing fugitive, and, as his name had been mentioned, Souja had seen Hirata’s pale eyes change from the gentle, pensive gaze he was used to to the sharp, ruthless glitter of a predator whose prey had somehow slipped away.

He shivered now, recalling how the wind had suddenly whipped around the chamber and, most significantly of all, how many of the men at the front had drawn back, fear in their eyes as though they thought their leader might draw his deadly blade from its sheath and strike at them in his frustration and his anger. It had not come to that, for Hirata had caught Misashi’s gaze for the briefest of instants, taking a breath and forcing his spirit power to settle. Yet in that moment Souja had understood how his father had kept such a tight hand on the Endou Clan since he had taken the helm... and more, that whoever this fugitive was, he was someone Hirata hated above any other.

“It’s a difficult circumstance, Souja,” when he had asked his grandfather, later, Misashi had looked troubled, resting a gentle hand on his shoulder and letting out a sigh. “I suppose it’s right that you should know of it, being that one day the fight and the hunt may become yours.”

“What kind of fight, Grandfather?” Souja had asked curiously, and Misashi had paused for a moment, pressing his lips together as he had pondered how best to continue.

“Aizen Keitarou is an exile — a wanted man who has caused pain in many Districts and harm to many Clans,” he had said at length. “He hid here for a good many years, and in that time he brought about the death of my father, your great Grandfather, who once ruled this Clan. He killed a good many individuals in the Districts during his time here, but he escaped our justice. Worse... he stole something from us that was precious, and that could not be replaced.”

“Stole something?” Souja’s eyes had become big, imagining powerful weapons or valuable jewellery, but Misashi had not answered at first. Instead he had taken the young boy by the arm, leading him to the Gallery where portraits of the Clan’s forefathers hung in splendour, gazing down on their descendants and kinsfolk with a sense of lofty pride. As they walked between the mounted images, Souja had glanced along them, recognising each from his lessons, but, as they passed the portraits of Shouichi and his wife Yayoi, his grandfather stopped, gesturing to a covered canvas that hung on the wall between Misashi’s own portrait and that of Hirata.

“Grandfather?” Souja had frowned, furrowing his brow as he sought to understand.

Misashi’s eyes had reflected genuine pain that day, as he had lifted his staff, using the jewelled end to push back the flap of the covering to reveal a portrait of a young girl, no more than in her teens. She had been about the same age as Souja himself had been at that time, sitting in a composed, demure position with her dark hair tied back in customary Clan style and her blue eyes so vivid Souja had almost thought that they were looking right at him. She was dressed in the same reds and browns as he was, and, with a jolt, he had recognised the emblem at her throat as bearing the identical crest he himself wore beneath the folds of his Clan robes.

“Grandfather, who is that?” he had whispered, and Misashi had let out a sigh that had seemed heavy enough to blow the whole room away. He had allowed the cover to fall back over the image, and for a moment, he did not speak. Then, at length, his lips had twitched, forming words.

“That is your aunt, Souja,” he had said softly. “Your aunt Eiraki, who was your father’s sister, and who was as dear a treasure to us as anyone could ever wish. This treasure, Aizen stole from us. It is a wound that cannot be filled and a sin that cannot be forgiven — and your father and I will never forgive it.”

Souja had swallowed hard.

“Did he... kill her?” he had asked, half dreading the answer, but Misashi had shaken his head.

“No, he stole her,” he had said simply, touching Souja on the shoulder and gesturing back towards the way they had come. “He stole her and made her his, until the blood that stained his hands stained hers as well. He took and destroyed her, Souja — but I believe she still lives. I know Hirata believes it too. Somewhere out there, they still are. You're old enough now to understand the shadows of your family's past... but it might be best not to discuss it too much with your father unless he raises the subject. It is not a happy recollection... and sometimes those are best left to lie."

Eiraki-basama.

Souja's brows knitted together.

If Joumei and Izumi are right, and Keitarou is involved in this, then so is Eiraki-basama, without question. And, if Eiraki-basama did flee with him while pregnant, then it explains what Grandfather meant when he said that Keitarou 'made her his'. I dread to think what Father might do if he was to know they might be involved... and without any proof, I can't risk unleashing his Wind Hawk on innocent people. More, if it is Rukongai they're hiding, a release of Father's zanpakutou there would put paid to any chance of re-establishing the Spiritless Zone and would do untold damage to anyone else living in the vicinity. If there are individuals beyond the Spiritless Zone limits... it doesn't necessarily follow that all of them are evil. Is that why Tenichi's keeping quiet? Maybe he's not working with Keitarou, but perhaps... something else? But if he won't talk to me... I don't see any way of making him open up.

A rustle of tree leaves made him falter, pushing aside his musings for the time being and reaching for his sword as he tried to work out where the sound had come from. To begin with he thought someone must be following him but, as he drew more deeply into the shadow of a nearby elm, he saw a figure dart between gaps in the moonlight, the black and white of a shihakushou briefly visible before the image had gone once more into the black. Souja's eyes narrowed, processing this.

Nobody should be patrolling here at this time, and certainly not alone, not given recent events. I wonder...

Keeping his hand on his zanpakutou hilt, he moved carefully between the trees, scanning the landscape for any sign of the mysterious figure. At first he saw nothing, but then, as he crossed away from the path to Inner Seireitei and more deeply into the wood, he caught sight of the individual again, stood before the trunk of a dead tree. Souja pressed his body into the shadows, suppressing his spirit power down to its lowest level and cloaking himself instinctively in the Kyokkoku his father had taught him to cast when he had still been a small boy, then slipped out of his hiding place, moving slowly and cautiously towards where the shinigami stood.

As he drew closer, however, Souja had the definite feeling something was amiss. The man was young, maybe his own age, with messy dark hair and no sword at his waist. His shihakushou was torn in places, the white obi trailing carelessly behind him and, as he caught the moonlight, Souja was sure he could see specks of blood against the pale cloth. Apparently oblivious to the fact he was being tracked, the youngster spread out his hands, something small and glittering clutched against the dusty fabric of his gloves, and, as Souja watched, he released it into the air, where it hovered for a brief moment before disappearing into nothing. Souja was about to step forward and confront the individual when to his surprise and dismay, the air rippled and ripped across, parting the tree trunk into a yawning hole of black that, to the Vice Captain, could only be a type of Senkaimon.

But without a sword... to open such a thing... and here, so close to Inner Seireitei... a gate to where?

Souja's thoughts flew to Tenichi's abduction, and he frowned, gripping his weapon tightly as he watched the young man step into the black and disappear.

If someone has the power to open gates without zanpakutou, then the Council needs to know about it. I can't let this opportunity slip by. Whoever this person is and wherever he's going, I can't just let him go there.

To think was to act and, as the gaping stretch of darkness began to close up behind its controller, Souja leapt forward, ducking into the blackness before it could seal up completely behind him. Instinctively brushing his fingers together to form a Hell Butterfly, he watched the feeble creature flutter around in a circle for a moment before darting off in a particular direction.

That way, huh? All right. That's the way we'll go, too.

Souja released his hold on his weapon, setting off after the butterfly with resolution.

Father will just have to wait a little longer for my report. This is too important a chance to waste!

So, the fool had slipped up again.

Masaya drew his body more closely into the trunk of the tree, his eyes slits of contempt as he watched the Senkaimon close up behind the black clad figure of the Gotei Vice Captain.

It seems that he's determined to bring disgrace down on his family. Whether I had spoken up or not, that idiot boy would have created chaos all the same. That's why trusting people based on family bonds is pointless. Keitarou-sama, your son is an idiot and he will be the death of your whole scheme if you continue to allow him to get away with such carelessness. If I were you...

He ran his fingers beneath his cloak, brushing them against the hard hilt of the dagger that was concealed there. Slowly he brought the tip of his index finger down so that it touched against the sharp, cold blade of the weapon, and a humourless smile touched his pale lips.

Still, I was instructed to ensure that he returned to Rukongai. He has clearly done so, his mission unfinished and who knows what he accomplished within the grounds of the Thirteenth Division? I couldn't get close enough to hear their words, but it looked very much like the boy was colluding with the woman, rather than threatening to take her life. How Keitarou-sama could bring up such a naive, soft-hearted youth is beyond me — but the truth this time will speak for itself.

Derisive pleasure glittered briefly in the empty golden eyes as he pictured Koku's expression, the resolution burning in his dark eyes as he had given Masaya his commission.

You can try and protect him all you like, but you can't protect a fool from himself. You ordered me to make sure he returned to Rukongai in one piece, and since he's done so, I need attend your instructions no longer. Your threats may be real or they may be empty ones, but even you wouldn't try and kill me in front of Keitarou-sama's eyes, now would you?

He turned his back on the Senkaimon's location, sweeping his cloak around his shoulders more purposefully as he melted into the night.

Meantime, since I'm here, I think I'll create a little trouble of my own. That shinigami boy, he concerns me. I brought him to Rukongai because I thought that Keitarou-sama had a purpose for him, but then, for whatever reason, he let the captive go. The shinigami that followed Katsura-sama will pose no danger to Keitarou-sama, not at the level of his sword, so no doubt he will be quickly silenced — but it is almost certainly not a coincidence that he belongs to the Endou division. The Kotetsu boy must have told him something... and I can't have that. If he can tell one officer, he can tell others... and that could mean danger for Keitarou-sama and his work. I think it best I have a little word with him... just in case he's thinking of sharing his secrets with those who surround him.

He let out a soft, silent chuckle.

Keitarou-sama doesn't like betrayal. It would be far better for the Kotetsu boy to learn that early on — else the time may come when I have to silence him as well.

Author's Note: Arigatou

Hi all ;)

My apologies for the AN last chapter –I was still in shock following 494. Now I'm just confused about what actually happened and if it happened and... all kinds of other things.

I want to finish this story, and I want to be able to do it positively and productively. The main concern I had after last week's chapter was that, if I kept reading, I was going to see similar things happen to other characters such as the two who are most prominent here. I don't want to follow a series which discards characters without a second thought, but to finish Sukuse I need to know what else Juu and Shun's swords can do. That being the case, I felt caught in a quandary and really questioned my wanting to keep with Bleach for the first time.

Maybe it was a touch melodramatic... but really, the chapter shook me up. This arc has been so messy so far, and is moving so fast and in strange and worrying directions. This week's chapter is no exception — though seeing Rose took the edge off it a bit. I don't really know how I feel about Bleach right now — wary and cautious, perhaps — but the responses to my freakout AN made me realise that Sukuse is an obligation and I've begun it, so I want to try and finish it. You people have supported me through Meifu and to this point through all the changes in my RL too, and it would be rude and ungrateful to run away and leave you hanging. Your comments and reviews drive me to do better and work harder and come up with plotlines or scenes that I really look forward to sharing with you. I needed to refind that a bit this week, and I hope now I've begun to do so. You guys helped me put it in context and with my exams now done I will do my best to keep it going.

Some not so nice stuff will happen in the next couple of chapters, though. Please be prewarned and prepared. I feel the need to say that, though I think some of you know what's coming.

Thank you all for your support and I'm sorry if I scared you. Even if Kubo-sensei is doing his best to drive me crazy of late, I still think you guys are the best and I'll do my best not to let you down.

Additionally: Mitsuki & Juu (review reply)

An anon reviewer last chapter asked about Mitsuki and Juu and since I can't reply to anon reviewers via PM, I felt I should do so here. I've never formulated in my mind what happened in the long run with Juu and Mitsuki. The events referenced in the very last chapter of the very last Meifu Omake happened approximately 300 years before canon, which I earmarked in my mind as an important date because it predated both the Quincy crisis and the Pendulum. Since I wrote about the Quincy crisis sans-Mitsuki in Rain Dragon, and would like to kind of tie that in to the Meifu timeline if possible (with the whole idea of ancient Third doing science and so on), it makes sense that those things occurred before that. However, the reason I chose that date was something else, relating to a story I only ever wrote a few chapterlets for and which I might never finish. Mitsuki was to play a role in that story, as VC of the Fourth Division.

In terms of Rukia, I never thought that that history would be a happy one, and even that Juushirou might not have known anything about it. Since I imagine Mitsuki spent a lot of her early career in and out of Rukongai, the potential for keeping secrets were quite high. I dunno. Even if he did know, with Rukia and Hisana dumped in Rukongai, somewhere along the line something terrible must've occurred and I don't know that I want to spend too long figuring it out. Somehow I think it's a story best not written? All I will say about Mitsuki and Juu, therefore, is that, in my interpretation of Kubo's Bleachverse, they were soulmates up until those events 300 years Before Canon, and in Juushirou's heart, maybe still are. Whatever else might have occurred... is up to you?

24. Crimson Dawn

Chapter Twenty Three: Crimson Dawn

“Hey, Kotetsu, are you going to sleep till Shougatsu?”

Tenichi opened his eyes sleepily, blinking and staring up blearily at the blurry figure bending over him. There was a laugh, then someone slapped him on the shoulder, grabbing his thin blanket and pulling it back with a sharp tug.

“You’re back on normal duties from today, right? Kikyue-dono said as much last night, so no extra sleep for you that the rest of us can’t have!”

“Nakata-san?” Tenichi dragged himself into a sitting position, rubbing his eyes and blinking at the substantial frame of his broad Endou bunkmate. Seventh Division’s seventh seated officer, Nakata Yusuke was fifteen years Tenichi’s senior, and, since the District boy’s transfer into the Endou division had taken it upon himself to make sure that his new subordinate knew the ropes. He was a bluff, friendly individual, though Tenichi knew from training sessions that he showed his enemies no mercy in a battle of swords, and, despite the humour and patience with which he had inducted his companion, the District boy had seen the rough side of his division-mate’s temper during drill with the recruits on a couple of occasions. Nakata was an Endou through and through, the son of a fourth degree Lord who had served in a senior position on Hirata’s family council for many years and, both as a result of this and his own dedicated attitude towards his work, he was well respected both by his junior and senior officers. Tenichi was not foolish enough to believe that his arrival in Seventh Division would have been as easy or as smooth had it not been for Nakata’s taking a liking to him in the mess hall on his first night, and he had learned to cultivate the friendship, ingratiating himself with several other members of Kikyue’s patrol at the same time. Despite the clear benefits of Nakata’s society, however, Tenichi was genuinely fond of his bunkmate. When he had returned to the barracks following his abduction, Nakata had been the first behind Kikyue to greet him with a cuff to the ear and a gruff comment about careless idiocy, but there had been no harshness in the gesture, and thanks to Nakata’s force of character, Tenichi had found himself largely unmolested by the inquisitive juniors, all of whom had wanted to know what had happened to him in his several day absence.

Nakata himself had asked no questions, and Tenichi had been especially grateful for that. Unlike Kirio, whose concerned probing had put him on edge, Nakata had said nothing about it, simply going on with his daily routine as if nothing had happened. That morning too, he reflected, as he pulled his aching body up and out of the thin pallet that comprised his bed, it was business as usual, and the normality of it had helped more than anything to settle his unease at what had transpired in Rukongai.

"No time to be sitting around like that, else you'll miss inspection and you'll find yourself on cleaning duty," Nakata told him briskly, ruffling his fingers briefly through the younger man's tousled hair before returning to his own bunk to retrieve his long white obi. "Nobody's going to let you slack, not when you've got juniors watching and expecting you to lead by example. Get yourself together, Kotetsu — I'm heading down to the mess, but I'll see you there in a few minutes."

He tied his obi with a flourish, then,

"If you're not quick, you'll have to go on an empty stomach. Kikyue-dono said we were to assemble promptly, and you've given her enough headaches already."

With that he was gone, the door sliding shut behind him with a click, and Tenichi sighed, getting reluctantly to his feet and padding over to the small window to gaze down on the cobbled yard that belonged to the Seventh Division. There were already signs of activity despite the early hour, and with a grimace he realised that there was truth in Nakata's words. Whatever special favours he had received in the days since his return would no longer count — it was now back to normality with a vengeance.

It's probably better that way, though.

He slipped his robe off, dropping it on the end of his bed and reaching for his own clean, freshly pressed shihakushou.

All I've done is think about Keitarou-san and Father and the things I learned in Rukongai. How I can help... what I can do... if I can trust anyone with this secret, and most of all, that Shikiki confirmed everything Keitarou-san told me about Father's death. That was the place he was buried, and Keitarou-san did bury him. Shikiki has no reason to lie to me, and it upset her to remember, but I'm sure what she said was true. That means that Keitarou-san didn't lie to me either.

He pulled on the dark hakama, sliding the hakamashita over his upper body and wrapping the thin fabric carefully around his chest.

Fukutaichou didn't want me going back to that place, though. It makes me wonder, was that simply because of everything that happened to me, or was it because it was where Father was buried? Fukutaichou's great-grandfather was the one who killed Father, that's almost for sure. Hirata-sama and Fukutaichou, they're not like Shouichi-sama was — everyone's said that. Shouichi-sama and Seimaru-sama were the ones who caused our family to be uprooted and everything else, so I can't blame them for the things that others did. Still, Father was killed by an Endou... maybe there's enough shame in that knowledge for Fukutaichou to want to keep me away from his grave. Perhaps the Endou know more about it than I realised — probably there's something at the main house that relates to the purge of the Urahara, and maybe Father's name is included.

His eyes narrowed as he reached for his obi.

Misashi-sama would've been there at the time, too. He might not have known about it, of course, but he may have. Trouble is, with Fukutaichou warning me off, there's not a lot I can do to pursue it. The best I can do is follow Nakata-san's instructions, rejoin my patrol and wait and see what transpires. Nobody here seems to suspect anything extreme happened to me while I was away. They've accepted my amnesia story almost without question, so waiting is probably the best option. No sense in doing something rash and drawing attention to myself.

He tied the white fabric in a tight knot, testing it and then scooping up his sheathed zanpakutou from its place propped up against the wall, thrusting the scabbard through the sash and sliding his feet into his sandals, making for the door. His comrades would already be gathered around their favourite table in the mess hall, probably bemoaning the early start and envying the members of Souja's patrol who, by habit, carried out more night missions and were therefore less often dispatched at dawn. Kikyue would descend on them mid-meal, tapping her feet in impatience to be off, and causing the younger recruits to wolf down the remains of their food in fear of having it whipped out from under their noses unfinished, whilst the older and more experienced ones would already be piling their plates ready for collection, one or two of them watching the juniors with an eagle eye for any wasted rations they could steal. For Clansmen, Tenichi reflected ruefully, they could behave like starving children with the best of the Districts, and this thought brought a smile to his pale features. Everything had been turned topsy turvy in his world since Keitarou had summoned him, but today he had the chance to return to his normal routine, and, he realised, he was looking forward to it.

"You seem extraordinarily happy this morning, Kotetsu Tenichikun."

The voice came from nowhere, and Tenichi, whose hand had been halfway to the door froze, the smile fading from his features at its sound. There was a soft laugh, then the sound of someone — or something — slipping across the floor towards him, the gentle sweep of a cloak brushing against the boards towards him.

“Well? Don’t you have somewhere important you need to be? Isn’t there inspection this morning? I would hate you to be late for your squad duties.”

The voice was slick and mocking, no warmth in its smooth tones, and Tenichi’s brows knitted together as he realised where he had heard it before.

“Kurotsuchi?”

“You are cleverer than you look. We’ve only met the once, yet you recall my voice so well you don’t even need to see my face to know who I am? Impressive. Very impressive. Perhaps I can understand a little more why Keitarou-sama is so interested in you... although I don’t suppose you had much opportunity to see my face the last time we met, did you?”

“Get out of my room!” Tenichi wheeled around at the sound of Keitarou’s name, fingers covering the hilt of his weapon. The memory of the night of his abduction burned fresh in his thoughts, and he half expected to see some deformed monster standing before him, but instead he met the glittering gaze of a man about his own height and half his weight, wrapped in a heavy cloak and with the cowl pulled so far over his head that, other than the feline gold eyes, he could not make out any distinguishing features. “Get out, and don’t come back here! If you want to talk to me, talk to me away from here — but not here, not in my barracks, not...”

“Not on Seventh Division land?” The cowed figure chuckled, reaching up to push back the hood of his cloak, and for the first time Tenichi saw his abductor face to face. A thin, pinched appearance faced him, a nondescript face with a neutrality that bordered on the surreal. Crisscross marks across his cheeks indicated that he had been in fights in the past, but, looking at him, Tenichi could not imagine how this skinny wraith of a man had managed to so easily overpower him.

“Oh, I’m stronger than I look,” Masaya seemed to guess his companion’s thoughts, because he grinned, an unpleasant grimace that revealed a row of uneven teeth. He took another shuffling step forwards, reaching out a hand to rest it lightly on Tenichi’s shoulder, and the shinigami cursed, pushing the arm away and taking a hurried step back.

“No, no you don’t. I’m not going back, so don’t think you can pull the same trick twice. I’m not going anywhere with you.”

“You mistake me,” Masaya said flatly, lowering his hand slowly. “I have no desire to take you anywhere. On the contrary, your existence brings me no pleasure whatsoever. So long as Keitarou-sama sees value in you, I will not harm you, but you really interest me not at all.”

“Then why are you here?” Tenichi’s eyes narrowed suspiciously. “Are you trying to get me into trouble? Surely you know that that wouldn’t do that person any good, so stop saying his name so freely as though it was the most normal thing in the world.”

“Are you afraid?” Masaya mocked him, and Tenichi grimaced.

“I have things to lose, here,” he snapped, “and if I lose them, I won’t be able to do anything to help that person’s cause or the people he’s trying to protect. I gave my word that I’d help and I will, but that doesn’t mean you can slip in and out of my quarters and stalk me like an uninvited ghost.”

“I like to call it insurance, rather than stalking,” Masaya’s golden eyes narrowed to slits, and Tenichi saw the glitter of a sword tip penetrate briefly from beneath the heavy folds of cloth. It was gone as soon as it had appeared, but Tenichi knew he had not imagined that it was there. “You see, whilst my orders are not to hurt you, I don’t really trust people on this side of the divide. I have no reason to trust anyone in shinigami colours, and so I like to make sure that... the understanding between you and my master... is a solid and unambiguous one.”

“Meaning?” Tenichi demanded, and Masaya leaned forward until Tenichi could feel the warmth of the other man’s breath against his cheek.

“Talking about anything you saw in Rukongai would be a very bad idea,” he said, his voice becoming menacing. “It would be a very, very bad idea, and I wanted to remind you of that fact. Just because he let you go... just because he allowed you to return here, it doesn’t mean that you’re free to return to your life as it was before. You have a secret and you belong to him now, whatever you think. If anyone were ever to find out where you’d gone, Kotetsu Tenichi, and who you had treated with... do you think it would be overlooked and ignored?”

A cold smile touched his lips.

“If you betray Keitarou-sama, I will kill you with my bare hands,” he added frankly, extending his arm once more and Tenichi watched with horrified dismay as the digits began to extend towards him, stretching and bending out of their normal shape until they became like tendrils reaching for his throat. “As you see, I have some unusual abilities and I can be watching you, even when you don’t think that I am. If you decide to tell anyone what happened over the divide, I will come for you... and I will come for anyone you choose to tell.”

“Don’t be stupid, who would I tell?” Tenichi gathered his wits, slapping the tentacle-like fingers away, and Masaya took a hop-step back, amusement clear in his golden eyes. “I haven’t and I won’t. It wouldn’t do me any good to share with anyone, now would it?”

“Hrm,” Masaya tilted his head on one side, then, “I suppose, then, it’s coincidence that one of your hallowed squad headed towards Rukongai early this morning?”

“What?” Tenichi paled, and Masaya laughed.

“If you didn’t tell them anything, you should relax,” he said airily. “They’re unlikely to leave the place alive. They have no idea what kind of power they’re dealing with over the divide... if they’re fool enough to fall into danger by themselves, then so be it. However... if they should happen to have gone there because of you... or if they were likely to discover that you weren’t kept confined but walked free around Rukongai, the honoured guest of my master, how do you suppose that would be received back here?”

“You’re joking. You’re trying to bait me!” Tenichi grabbed Masaya by the collar of his cloak, giving him a little shake, but the elusive spy slipped his hold, stepping back against the wall of the room and shaking his head.

“I don’t joke,” he said sagely. “There’s no profit in it. But you’ll find out soon enough. One of your comrades is coming this way. Listen to him, if you don’t believe me — you’d better hope that they’re not coming to arraign you under suspicion of treason and collusion, hadn’t you?”

“If they see you here, what do you think will happen?” Tenichi exclaimed, and Masaya rolled his eyes.

“Don’t be so simple,” he said disparagingly. “I told you, I have ways and means. You deal with your own troubles, Kotetsu Tenichi — leave me to handle mine.”

Even as he spoke, the spy's body began to fade and merge into the wooden beam walls, and Tenichi watched in wary disbelief as the space where, a moment before his tormentor had stood clear as day now appeared empty. Although he appeared to be alone, somehow Tenichi knew the man was still there, watching and listening to every word, but before he could do anything, there was the sound of pounding steps and the door of the bedchamber was flung back to reveal an anxious looking Nakata, red-faced and out of breath from his run up the stairs.

"Look lively, Kotetsu!" he exclaimed, hurrying forward to grab his companion by the arm. "We're wanted at once. There's a fuss going on downstairs. Nobody can find the Fuku... it's like he's gone into thin air."

"Fuku... taichou?" Tenichi blanched, glancing fearfully at the stretch of wall where he knew Masaya had concealed himself. Was it his imagination, or had the seam of wood moved slightly, the shift of a golden eyeball boring its gaze into him as if to say 'I told you so'?

"Nobody's got a damn clue where he is," Nakata agreed briskly. "At least you're dressed. Kikyue-dono sent me to find you. Even the Captain hasn't an idea where he's gone, so it's serious business. Last time he was out late evening, it's when he brought you back, but this time..."

He shook his head briefly, a serious look in his eyes.

"The Fuku's not one to duck his duties, nor take off without the Captain's say, so everyone's worried," he added. "Given what's happened of late, they're saying... maybe someone abducted him."

"Abducted... him?" Tenichi swallowed hard. "Like... me?"

"We've no time to reason on it, either way," Nakata responded with a shrug. "Kikyue-dono's scrapped inspection and we're heading out at once in search of him. You too. She wanted you in particular, in case you remembered anything that he said or did the night you came back, anything that might help you find him. She's tearing hair and spitting feathers, boy, so if you remember anything at all..."

Tenichi's gaze flitted back to the wall, and he sighed, rubbing his temples.

"Go tell her I'll be right down," he said at length. "I'm right behind you, Nakata-san, I promise — tell Kikyue-dono I won't tarry."

"Will do," Nakata glanced at him, but nodded. "Don't be long, though, I'm serious. The last thing Seventh wants is another incident, and the Taichou looked like he might get involved if we lingered too long about base.”

“Message understood,” Tenichi said shortly, and Nakata clapped him on the back before disappearing back down the stairs to convey the message.

“You did this,” Tenichi’s words were a statement, not a question, and a soft, disembodied chuckle came from the darkness.

“I did nothing,” Masaya said simply. “On the contrary, I came to warn you.”

“You didn’t say that it was Souja-dono who had gone exploring,” Tenichi snapped. “You didn’t say that! He was the one who brought me back here, and the one who told me not to go back to Seventh, he, of all people...”

He froze, the memory of the silver-haired strangers suddenly blazing through his thoughts.

Isumi... that was her name, wasn't it? The girl from the people Souja-dono said were servants of the Endou.

Out loud he said,

“The people with silver hair... who are they?”

“Ah, so you have made the connection?” Masaya’s form became gradually more visible, a thoughtful look in his golden gaze. “Well, well, it seems you are intelligent, beyond my expectations. Yes, you’re right. Those people are the real culprits in this. They have long been hunting my master, and they are spies for the Endou in places and ways that even I don’t completely understand. They are traitor Urahara, boy. Underground spies, people whose lives have been bought and sold by the Endou Clan for some generations.”

“The man said they were cursed... that knowing about them was a curse,” Tenichi’s voice shook slightly. “He asked me a lot of questions about why I was there, at Father’s grave. What did they say to Souja-dono, to make him hare off to Rukongai? What if he finds out I was there, Kurotsuchi? What if he finds Keitarou-san? What if...”

“You had better pray he does not, but in case he does, you can be sure a welcome will be awaiting him,” Masaya said dismissively.

“You don’t mean...” Tenichi blanched again, and Masaya shrugged.

“You were an exception. Most shinigami who cross into that place don’t leave it so easily,” he reflected. “I said it before... if he was fool enough to step into danger on his own, then he'll find he's taken on more than he asked for."

"But..."

"You would do best hoping that he gets the reception such a nosy intrusion deserves," Masaya cut across his companion's words cruelly, extending a long, pale finger to brush briefly against Tenichi's cheek. "The best enemies are dead ones. Remember that — you'll go far with it."

"But Souja-dono is my superior officer, not my enemy!"

"He was your superior officer. Now he's your enemy," Masaya shook his head. "If he discovers Keitarou-sama's Rukongai, you and everyone who has ever connected to it are as good as executed. And don't you have a brother?"

He clicked his tongue against his teeth.

"What would he think, I wonder, if he saw you fall from grace? What kind of emotions would he feel, seeing his brother stripped of rank and paraded before the Council before being put to death for treason? Or more, what if they think him a part of it too — would you like to see your younger brother put in chains?"

"Stop it! Leave Ketsui out of it!" Tenichi exclaimed, pushing Masaya away and reaching for the door. "There's no guarantee that Souja-dono's gone anywhere near Keitarou-san, nor that there's any danger. I'm going to go and I'm going to do my duty — so don't try to twist my thoughts around! Keitarou-san hasn't asked me to turn against what I believe in doing and that's still being a shinigami for the Gotei! That means supporting my Vice Captain — and making sure he's all right!"

"Well, we'll see," Masaya said speculatively. "We'll talk again, Kotetsu Tenichi... maybe when you've realised for yourself that there's no going back. You've made your choices — everything that happens now is a result of those decisions, and you'll learn soon enough how firm the path is you've chosen to walk."

Tenichi did not respond, flinging the door back and hurrying down the steep curl of steps, taking them two at a time as he hastened to join the rest of his patrol. They were already massed in the courtyard, an impatient Kikyue at their head and Tenichi's heart flip-flopped in his chest as he registered the white-haired figure of the Captain among his comrades. Nakata had not been joking, he mused grimly, for Hirata's expression was as dark and stormy as he had ever seen it and he could not help but wonder if the bitter, chill wind that whipped around the barracks was nature or the Endou Clan Leader's spirit sword exhibiting its displeasure.

"Tenichi!" At the sight of him, Kikyue let out a yell, speeding towards him and grabbing him by the flaps of his hakamashita, glaring at him with intense, anxious eyes. "How long were you planning to take? We've got an important mission to attend — Nakata told you?"

"Yes, ma'am," Tenichi's body stiffened, and he bowed his head in apology. "I'm sorry, I overslept a little... I didn't mean to..."

"Kotetsu Tenichi," Hirata's voice cut across his excuses, and Tenichi gulped, turning to face his Captain as Hirata crossed the cobbles towards them. "Kikyue, stand back. Tenichi, I want to ask you something, and I want you to answer me as honestly and as clearly as you remember how to — do you understand?"

"Yes, sir," Tenichi spoke quickly, unease pulsing through his veins even as he jerked his head forward in a nod. "If I can, sir, please, ask anything."

"You reported to both Souja and I on your return to Seireitei, correct, before being discharged to Kikyue's authority?"

"Y... yes, sir."

"Tell me, was there anything you reported to Souja — anything at all, no matter how small it might have been, that you may have omitted to report to me when you stood before my desk?"

"Sir?" Tenichi swallowed hard, then, "Taichou, I'm sorry, but... I didn't... I don't think there was anything that I said to Fukutaichou that I wouldn't have reported to... you're my Captain, and so... and if I had forgotten, surely Fukutaichou would've... would've spoken to you as well?"

"One would think so, yes," Hirata looked suddenly weary, but he turned away from Tenichi, glancing at his daughter.

"Take them and go. Spread out over a wide area and ask questions," he said quietly. "I'll rouse Souja's usual second in command and send a second patrol after yours, so keep in contact. If you can't send a butterfly, send a runner back if you find anything. Keep looking until you do — if he returns in the meantime, I'll summon you back to base."

"Yes, sir," Kikyue saluted her father sharply, no hint of the close father-daughter relationship they possessed in her demeanour. ‘Well, you heard that, didn’t you?’ this last to the division members. “We’re going after Fukutaichou, and we’re going to find him, no matter where we have to search or how long we have to do it. Tenichi, I want you here with me in particular — just in case you remember something that proves to be important.”

“Yes... yes, ma’am,” Tenichi reddened, but hurried to the front of the group and, with another salute, they hastened out of the courtyard, following Kikyue’s own brisk pace before slipping into shunpo and crossing through the gate to the land beyond.

As they re-materialised in woodland near the Seventh District border, Kikyue grabbed Tenichi by the arm, pulling him towards her.

“Where did you go, that night he came out to find you?” she demanded, and Tenichi stared at her, taken aback by the suddenness of her demand.

“Kikyue-dono?”

“Father didn’t tell me, but I know that my brother came to find you. Father sent him on an errand and he came back with you, so he knew where you were,” Kikyue said blackly. “Maybe he’s gone there again, or maybe because he went there, someone took him like they took you. We have to check it out.”

Tenichi was silent for a moment, and Kikyue’s brows drew together.

“Answer me! That’s an order!” she demanded, giving him a short, sharp shake. “Have you forgotten already who your superior officer and patrol leader is? Obey my orders, Kotetsu, or...”

“Fukutaichou told me that I wasn’t to speak of it.” Tenichi said slowly. “He said I wasn’t to talk about it and I wasn’t to go back there. I... I don’t know if... even if Kikyue-dono is the one asking me...”

“Niisama said that?” Kikyue blinked, the wind suddenly taken out of her sails. “Why? Did he tell you why?”

Tenichi shook his head.

“He just said I should not,” he said honestly. “He said it was better forgotten, and that I should not talk of it to anyone.”

“Kikyue-dono, do you think that, wherever this place is, that’s where the Fuku’s gone?” Nakata ambled up behind them, a question in his eyes. “If so, if he’d found something that he thought might put Kotetsu in danger to pursue, maybe that’s where he is.”

“In which case, we need to know,” Kikyue said decisively, turning back to Tenichi with fresh resolution in her gaze. “Tenichi, Father asked you whether there was anything you disclosed to Fukutaichou that you didn’t disclose to him. That was a lie, wasn’t it? Whatever Oniisama told you not to discuss, you didn’t talk to Father about it, did you? If you had... if you did, he’d know where Oniisama had gone, and he doesn’t. If Oniisama did leave of his own accord... if he wasn’t abducted... he could still be in trouble. He’d have come back by now, I’m sure of it... so we can’t just let it lie.”

“I...” Tenichi faltered, and Nakata clapped a hand down on his companion’s shoulders.

“Tell the lady, Kotetsu,” he said softly. “You saw the Taichou, he’s as worried as anyone about this business. You can consider this an order from him too, I expect — either way, the Fuku needs to be found, else the whole Division will be in chaos if they think another of their people has been snagged by unknown enemies. Best tell Kikyue-dono where the Fuku found you... if it’s wrong, well, I’m sure in the circumstances it’ll be overlooked.”

“Nakata, I don’t need you to authorise my orders for me,” Kikyue snapped, colour rising in her cheeks at the older man’s casual appraisal. “Tenichi, I’m ordering you to tell me where it was Fukutaichou came to find you. If anything more comes of it, I’ll take responsibility, because I’m patrol leader, but I demand you tell me what you know. Tell me what you didn’t tell Father — else I’ll tell him myself that you lied when he questioned you so directly back at base.”

Tenichi chewed his lip, remembering the silver-haired ghosts that had shadowed him, and Kurotsuchi’s words echoed through his thoughts.

They have long been hunting my master, and they are spies for the Endou in places and ways that even I don’t completely understand. They are traitor Urahara, boy. Underground spies, people whose lives have been bought and sold by the Endou Clan for some generations.

If Souja-dono spoke to them, if they know something... but if I lie to Kikyue-dono now, it will become even more suspicious. If Kurotsuchi was telling the truth, Souja-dono isn’t in Seireitei. If that’s the case, then he might be in serious danger, but if I was to tell Kikyue-dono that, then I’d have to tell her about Keitarou-san, and that would mean trouble, not just for me, but probably for Ketsui too. Kurotsuchi was right about that, damn him — if I’m implicated in something, even though my intentions aren’t what they’d think, nobody would believe that Ketsui wasn’t involved. We’re too close... they'd never believe he was innocent, and then... but can I just abandon Souja-dono? He's not my enemy, he's my superior officer, and as a shinigami... my duty... but he made me promise not to talk about those silver-haired folk, and so surely that means he doesn't want me to...

"Kotetsu?" Kikyue's words held a demanding note, and Tenichi swallowed the bile that rose in his throat, letting out a heavy sigh and nodding his head.

"Seventh District," he said at length. "I was dumped by whoever had me hostage in Seventh District. In a forest... a thick forest... where Fukutaichou came for me. He knew the way, though — I didn't. My family came from Seventh originally, but it wasn't an area I was familiar with, and Fukutaichou guided me home. He told me not to talk about it and not to go back there, because it might be dangerous... and... and that was all."

"If we tried to follow the trail, do you think you could remember the direction?" Kikyue asked, and Tenichi nodded.

"In bits and pieces, I think, yes," he agreed reluctantly. "Kikyue-dono, Fukutaichou was adamant that it shouldn't be talked about, are you sure..."

"I'll deal with it," Kikyue cut across him, raising her hand to indicate to the rest of the group that they were heading off. "You just focus on remembering the pathway... let those of us in command handle the rest. Our orders are to find the Fukutaichou — everything else can wait."

The tunnel had been an unstable one.

As Souja carved through the opening with his sword, he stepped cautiously down onto the ground, pausing to assess his position briefly for any sign of danger. The first glimmers of morning light were beginning to crest over the horizon, rendering his surroundings more and more visible with every passing moment, but as he straightened his body, scanning the landscape for any sign of the young man he had pursued here, the barren emptiness of the environment struck him with a sudden chill.

Where was he?

The gateway had opened up in a part of Seireitei Souja did not remember there ever having been a Senkaimon, and although the person he had seen disappearing into it had worn shihakushou, something about his demeanour had been wrong. Now, as he regained his bearings, the young Endou realised with a jolt that his hunch had more than likely been correct. The scenery was completely unknown to him, empty, grey and lacklustre, and the dry wind that whipped dull flurries of dust across the ground gave no indication of meaningful life. Though he had seen some bad battle scars in the worst-hit heartland of District Seven, he had never seen a place like this, and deep in his gut he knew where the gateway had dropped him.

Rukongai.

That man was an interloper — a presence in a place he should not have been, opening divides between worlds that should — and that have — remained quite separate. If I could find him, maybe I could learn how, and more importantly, why.

He hesitated, checking the horizon for any sign of shinigami activity, but felt none. A hazy, indistinct cloud of something he could only describe as reiatsu pollution hung heavy in the air, telling him with a jolt that this was not the troubled Spiritless Zone he had stumbled into, but somewhere beyond the boundaries of the Council's precious project. Somehow he had crossed into forbidden land, and though he was not sure how he was going to get back, right now all thoughts of his absence from his squad or his family's concern for him were replaced by a deep rooted curiosity to find out more.

I can't waste the opportunity. This may be the place Izumi was referring to. At the very least I should find that much out — doing so might protect the Kitsune and resolve the Gotei's problems, so to turn back now without investigating would be unforgivable.

Souja stifled a shiver as the wind cut through his bones, half wishing he had brought a thicker cloak with him. Still, he reasoned, a Clan cloak would be harder to hide — if there were indeed people here, they were almost certainly poor and he had no way of knowing whether they might be so desperate they might try to rob him as he passed on through.

Better to sheath my sword, in case I'm taken for someone hostile and set upon.

He glanced at his zanpakutou, before returning it reluctantly to its scabbard.

*Rukongai people might or might not understand what zanpakutou are, but Iwanosuri is a valuable looking weapon and waving it around is more likely to make me a target.*

He began to walk, the rough signs of what might be called a village coming slowly into view and, as he approached it, the dust from the central concourse rubbed against his sandals, marking his white tabi a dirty grey-brown. The vibrant colours that he had come to take for granted when walking through the villages of his District were completely absent here — what grass remained was a seedy yellow brown and the trunks of trees looked haggard and thin, the flaking bark more like carved stone than the framework of a living creature. There were no flowers, though the odd browned petal lay carelessly scattered around the tree roots, surrounded by decaying leaves that had fallen out of season to create a haven of mud and mulch for the insects squirming beneath. The air was brisk and chilly, its emptiness only adding to the distinct frigidity of the environment as a whole.

He glanced up at the sky, taking in the heavy cloud that concealed the weak Rukon sun from view.

Is the air here so polluted, then, that it doesn't even allow for the sun to shine through?

A shadow darted past out of the corner of his eye and he swung around, hand reaching for the hilt of his sword as he anticipated an attack. None came, though, and there was just the fleeting sense of something or someone in the vicinity, gone as soon as it had come. The cloth divides that hung across the gaping openings of some of the broken down properties twitched and twisted slightly in the wind, and Souja frowned, the hairs on the back of his neck pricking up as he contemplated whether their movements had been caused by the elements or by ghostly, unseen hands.

This part of Rukongai was supposedly abandoned, but the mingling of unclear spiritual residue on the air made him wonder if that was truly the case.

Are Joumei and Izumi right? In which case, the person I followed back here... is he... one of them?

He shivered. Just because he could not see anyone, it did not mean nobody was there.

I wonder how much the Council — even Father — know about this side of the Rukongai wall. If there really are people living in this hellhole... if there are, then... something ought to be done about it and soon. If there are living souls suffering in this kind of environment, that can only breed dissention, and if Joumei and Izumi are right about the enemy we're looking for, there's no better place to hide than wasteland full of downtrodden forgotten souls. If there are even half as many Plus souls who have fallen on this side of the divide by mistake, then they could pose a very real threat. If someone like Aizen Keitarou mobilised them, made promises to them... sold his fanaticism to them as the hope of a better life... maybe then some of them might break through the Rukon divide and enter into the Spiritless Zone. Maybe the reason the girl who killed the members of the Fourth Division hasn't been found is that she belongs to this Rukongai... instead of that one.

He frowned, not liking the way his thoughts were heading. And then there's the other thing Jousei mentioned. Eiraki-basama's child. About my age, he said — or thereabouts. Is that child here in this place too? Did it live? Grow up and learn to hate Seireitei and the people in it? More... is it a girl, or... is it a son?

He reached the end of the path, pausing for a moment to eye the bent and skeletal tree that greeted his arrival. Though the rest of the area had been in a sorry state, in comparison to this stretch of land, it looked like an untouched paradise. The grass which struggled to grow everywhere else had withered and blackened here, the dead branches of bushes and trees bleached and leafless as they swayed sorrowfully in the wind. Crushed fragments of white — maybe chalk, maybe bone — littered the ground in place of the fallen leaves, and although dawn had broken, Souja had the distinct sensation that he had encroached on a place of eternal night. At the far end of what seemed to be a worn pathway there was a wooden hut and, with one careful glance around him to make sure he was not being followed, Souja slipped through the divide, trying to ignore the sensation of cracking bird skulls beneath his feet.

There was something here, and as he drew closer to the hut, he could feel it more keenly, resonating in waves that, although vivid in their presence, seemed unreal and twisted out of their normal shape. The closer he got to the hut, the more intense the sensation was, but this only doubled his determination and he pressed on, pulling his cloak more tightly around his body as if to protect him from what felt like an army of spirits teasing at him with long, spectral fingers. As he placed his hand against the roughly hewn door, he almost thought he could see them, eyes reflected in the knots of the uneven wooden planks that stared at him accusingly for trespassing into their territory.

He frowned, pulling himself together. There were no ghosts in Rukongai, and even if there were, it would not be them that posed the greatest danger. The atmosphere was oppressive and unpleasant, but he could rationalise it, and he put his hand over the biggest knot in the wood, covering the eye from view and giving the door a hefty push. It did not move, and for the first time he was aware of a small silverish notch to the lower right, rusted in places but still clearly a functioning keyhole that told of recent use.

Well, and that wasn't put here by spirits.

Souja's eyebrows drew together thoughtfully, and he crouched down, pressing his finger to the lock and focusing his spiritual energy on a short, sharp burst of kidou, just strong enough to melt and dislodge the fastening from its rest. The door juddered and then swung open, revealing a yawning hole of fetid blackness beyond.

The sun, had it been visible, would have already moved to behind the hut, casting it in shadow, but despite Souja's understanding of such phenomenon, the inky darkness did nothing to reassure him about what he was about to find. Despite the waves of energy, he had not detected a person's living presence within the shelter, and he steeled himself, half wondering if he was about to find a stash of murdered bodies or worse, dissected body parts. Souja had heard in graphic detail from retainers and family alike about the experiments Keitarou had allegedly carried out on residents of Seventh District during his Great Grandfather's time, and he was under no illusions about the levels of base cruelty to which their enemy had previously stooped.

Nonetheless, it was his duty to go inside. He had to view everything, good and bad, and report it back to his father and the Council at once. If this was where Tenichi had been held... if Joumei had been right and this was Keitarou's base of operations, then it was his responsibility to find the truth, no matter how traumatic it proved to be. He gritted his teeth, clapping his hands together to produce a burst of blue kidou light to illuminate his path ahead. He was an Endou, he reminded himself. Endou did not flinch from death, and he would not do so, either.

He dipped his head slightly, stepping over the threshold and into the hut proper, glancing warily around him for any sign of immediate danger. To his relief, he could not see anything resembling human remains, and, as he moved deeper into the room, he noticed small notches dug into the walls on each side — crude but unmistakeable evidence of basic kidou lamps.

Shinigami are using this place, then. That makes the whole business more and more suspicious. I have to give Izumi credit. It looks like her hypothesis has some basis in fact.

Dispersing his own spell, Souja touched his index finger lightly to the nearest lamp, watching it flicker uncertainly into life. It cast the hut's interior in an eerie glow, but it was enough light by which to see and investigate his find, and Souja turned back to survey his surroundings once more, glad to have his hands free.

The room was plainly furnished, with a rumpled blanket and a moth-eaten pillow suggesting that from time to time the hut was inhabited. In one corner stood a wooden box, the lid held down with a heavy metal catch and, as Souja crossed the room towards it, he caught sight of ropes and spirit cuffs lying discarded to one side of the blanket. His heart chilled as he read the scene anew — not a place of sleeping, but a place of confinement, then? Was this a prison — somewhere where Tenichi and others had been held, their wits befuddled with unknown soporifics?

He bent to touch the blanket, and, as his skin touched the rough fibres, a flood of broken images rushed through his skull, piecemeal and incoherent and leaving him breathless. He drew his hand back hurriedly, struggling to regain his composure, but the hut around him remained silent as a tomb, uncaring of his distress.

Beyond the blanket and the restraints there hung a curtain and Souja moved towards it cautiously, this time pulling his sword from its sheath and turning it hilt first to push back the heavy folds of cloth. Beyond the fabric were thick lengths of wood constructed in a criss cross formation as if to resemble a prison, and, peering into the gloom, Souja could make out a small, square cell, the floor clean and covered in rushes but with no further sign of furnishment. The cell was empty, and to Souja's eyes it did not look as though it had been used for some time, so he allowed the cloth to fall back, returning his gaze to the main chamber itself. This, he reflected, had seen activity far more recently, but although nothing looked out of the ordinary, the air was thick with something indecipherable that made him want to turn tail and flee back the way he'd come.

Nothing was there now, but something had been. Something dark, something broken, something so filled with death and despair that it had soaked through the very walls and floor of the hut itself and dyed its malevolent presence into the wood's grain.

A sputter of the kidou lamp caused the light to flicker slightly, and, as it did so, something in the far corner of the room glinted. Souja frowned, turning to examine the object which, in a chamber full of wooden objects seemed oddly out of place. As he reached it, he realised that it was a sword, unsheathed and mounted on a rough bracket on the wall, thick straps holding it to its mooring as though whoever had put it there had feared it might escape on its own. Something about the sword made Souja wary to touch it — but as he peered at it, he detected a familiar sensation, and he frowned, squinting at the hilt more carefully to confirm his suspicions.

Sekkiseki? Why would anyone use Sekkiseki to hilt their weapon?

Especially since this... isn't a dead blade. This is Rukongai, but this sword... has a life force. Is it a zanpakutou? How can it be, with a hilt coated in something so poisonous? But whatever it is... whatever spawned it... this thing is alive.

Something was engraved deeply into the soft metal of the Sekkiseki ore, though it was difficult to make out the characters in the flickering light of the flames. Still, Souja persevered, allowing a faint glow of his own Kidou to brighten his surrounds. As he did so, for the first time the words became clear, and the sight of two of them cast a chill down his spine.

Aizen. Aizen something. Ko... haku? Does that say... Ko... haku?
He moved his finger to touch it, then faltered, reminding himself of the unpleasant sensation the Kitsune's Sekkiseki had left against his skin.

The first two characters are definitely Aizen. The second two are river willow, and white. I think that would be read 'Kohaku'...so is it someone's name?

His heart stilled in his chest for a moment as he put the pieces together.

Maybe the name of... Eiraki-basama's child? Does this weapon belong to them, then? Kohaku could be a girl's name or it could be a boy's — even if that's so, I'm still no closer to discovering anything of use.

He shivered, glancing at the weapon once again. Though it hung still and silent from the splintering wall, he almost thought he could hear a beating pulse, and though it was only a sword, he could not shake the sensation that it was watching him as intently as he was watching it.

But that sword gives me chills. Coated in Sekkiseki and strapped to the wall, almost as if by confining it one might confine a person's very soul within it. And, given the alleged nature of Aizen Keitarou's zanpakutou, maybe that's exactly what he's done.

He took a sudden step back, unnerved by this thought, and as he did so, something crunched beneath his feet. He glanced down, moving his sandalled foot back to reveal a crumpled sheet of worn parchment paper lying discarded on the floor. He bent to pick it up, smoothing it out to examine it, and as he did so, he realised that someone had written on it in dark, slashing ink, a desperate, slanted hand whose characters showed more haste than calligraphic grace. The paper was covered with spots of ink as though the writer's hand had shaken as he or she had cast down their words, but despite Souja's best efforts, their meaning eluded him. The top part had been torn away, rendering the first word cut in two. The text was divided into two separate paragraphs, though, both written by the same hand;...rdian of the silver treasure sleeps on a carpet of red. Sacred branches hang heavy with crimson rain, the shadow cast by the hunter's passing form their shroud.

Bonds of life severed by a bitter blade, the wrong tree falls in a foreign forest, once uprooted, it is gone.

The first word is probably guardian, but even if that's true, it doesn't seem to mean anything.

Souja ran his finger absently alongside the first column.

A coded message for someone, perhaps?

He frowned, slipping the document into his obi.

I'll take it back anyway. At the very least someone can examine it as a match for Keitarou's writing and spiritual aura. Having never met him, that's not something I can do on my own.

He turned to leave, then froze, for standing in the doorway of the hut was a figure, watching him in impassive silence. He was a young man, and clean-shaven, though the dark hair scattered around his shoulders was tousled and untidy, as though it had not been properly brushed in some time. He was robed in rough, peasant clothing that had clearly seen better days, for in places the colours were faded and more than one seam had been patched with clumsy lengths of thread. His eyes were dark — brown, Souja thought, a muddy, clouded colour watching him from beneath hooded lids that seemed to conceal any kind of real emotion. At first glance, the newcomer appeared much the same as any of the common individuals Souja had encountered on progresses through District Seven. This wasn't a Seireitei individual, though, nor was it the youth he had pursued through the Senkaimon and as Souja processed those thoughts, the hairs pricked up once more on the back of his neck.

People are here, then, in wasteland Rukongai. Just as Joumei said.

There was a lengthy silence, then the man spoke.

"You shouldn't be here," he said softly, his voice neither accusatory nor confrontational, and Souja had the distinct impression that, despite his shinigami uniform and glittering weapon, this Rukon stray was not in the least bit afraid of him. "This isn't a place for people like you. You should leave here, while you still can."

"Who are you?" Souja's fingers inched towards the hilt of his sword, and at his movement, a faint, hollow smile touched the stranger's lips.

"That's rich," he observed off-handedly, though there was a slight edge to his tones. "You invade someone else's land, and then demand them to identify themselves. This isn't Shinigami territory, Souja-dono. I'll say it again. You shouldn't be here. Leave, now, and don't come back. Don't ever come back — you can't be here."

"You know my name!" Souja's eyes widened in dismay, his hand claspng more firmly around the sword hilt now, and the young man raised his hands as if to indicate he had no weapon.

"Will you attack an unarmed peasant?" he asked lightly, and Souja had the feeling he was being mocked. "I came to warn you, not to hurt you. This land isn't safe for shinigami, and you shouldn't come here. Go back to your Seireitei — leave us alone."

"This land is meant to be empty. Nobody should be living here." Souja said firmly, grasping at the threads of his composure under the young man's level stare. He was not far from his own age, the Vice Captain realised with a jolt, Joumei's words about his estranged aunt once more ringing through his mind. "I'm here because it's my duty to be here. You're wrong when you say this isn't Shinigami land. All of Rukongai is the province of the Gotei. You are the one who shouldn't be here."

"Then tell me where else we are to go?" The youth was unflustered. "There is no place in Rukongai for people like us. Your Gotei made sure of that. If you take this place from us too, where else are we to go? Leave us be and go home, Souja-dono. Please, I won't tell you again. If you stay here, you won't ever leave. I promise you... you never will."

"Was that a threat?"

"It was a warning," the youth said flatly. 'A warning that forces more powerful than you work in ways you can't understand. You came here,' he gestured to the hut, "so you ought to realise that not everything is as it seems. Only foolish people step over that threshold and expect to walk away unscathed. It's a poisoned, tainted place full of evil pictures and dark thoughts. Stay too long and you might lose your mind... that is, if you don't lose your life here first."

"You are threatening me!" Souja drew his sword, but the young man merely laughed.

"I told you, I came to warn you," he repeated. "This place is dangerous. People have died here. You could die here too. It's no joke.

You've felt it, haven't you? The vibes in this shelter. This is a place of death. Leave it and go home."

Souja's gaze flitted to the sword on the wall, noting once again the tight straps that bound it in its place. His eyes narrowed.

"This is something to do with Aizen Keitarou, isn't it?" he asked quietly, and despite himself, the young man's eyes flickered slightly, as if in consternation. "This place is his domain. You're sheltering him. Maybe he's made promises to you... I don't know what he's said, or what he's done, but he's a dangerous man, and..."

"If you know that, you'll stay away," his companion interrupted him, and Souja's brows knitted together.

"I'm not afraid of danger. I'm trained to uphold Council justice and Aizen is an enemy of that justice," he said matter-of-factly. "I won't attack an unarmed man, of course not, but if you're colluding with or protecting him, you put yourself at risk of sanctions. Your best course of action is to tell me where he is — then I can go back to Seireitei, get help, and return. If I do that..."

"...Everyone here will die," the youth cut across him again. "I don't like death, Souja-dono. I don't like it at all. I don't want to see people suffer any more than they already are. That's why I'm asking you to go."

He stepped aside, gesturing to the entrance of the hut.

"I'll lock this door, and you'll go, and nobody need ever know you were here," he added simply. "I won't report it, and you'll leave us be. It's the best way for both of us."

Souja took a few steps towards the opening, then, as he drew almost parallel with the young man, he paused, turning to eye him carefully. The stranger met his gaze once more, his brown eyes giving nothing away, and Souja chewed on his lip thoughtfully.

"If you know who I am, you'll understand the dishonour Keitarou did to my family when he took my aunt and made her his wife," he said softly. "I have heard a child was born to that union, not long after they fled from the Council's gaze. He or she would be the same age as I, or thereabouts. If you know Keitarou, you will know if that child lives."

"Perhaps I know, perhaps I don't."

"Perhaps you are that child."

"Ah," the young man's lips twitched into a rueful smile, and he shook his head. "Is that what you think? Then I've disappointed you. Maybe such a child was born, and perhaps it lives — but I am not it. I've heard tell that twenty five years have passed since your aunt went into exile and left her Clan behind. I am only twenty one summers — so you see, I'm far too young to be the one you seek."

"Then I don't suppose you can help me any further," Souja inclined his head slightly, half in apology to his companion. "Perhaps you did come to warn me, but even if you did, I have a duty that overrides the words of a Rukongai soul. I'm sorry, but I can't listen to your advice. If Keitarou is here, and my aunt, then finding them is paramount. The child, too, if it lives. For the sake of justice..."

"The child won't ever inherit the Endou Clan, Souja-dono," the words came like an ice cold blade out of the blue, cutting through the atmosphere and making Souja stop dead, staring at the young man as if seeing him for the first time. Though up till that moment he had not picked up on more than the slightest flicker of reiatsu from his companion, in that instant he felt something more, suppressed but unmistakably there.

"But you're..."

"Maybe you came from duty, but it's Clan pride that will destroy you," the young man's eyes bored into Souja's with a sudden intensity that made the Vice Captain take a step back. "The child, even if it lives, won't ever inherit your Father's title. It's not them who pose you a threat right now, but your own Clan foolishness in coming to find out the truth for yourself. Once you cross the divide, Souja-dono, you can't ever go back. Once you've seen what's on the other side, you can't go back to a time before you knew. Coming here... changed things for you. Even if you leave now... maybe it's too late, I don't know, but please..."

He reached out his hand suddenly, grasping Souja around the wrist and making the other man jump.

"Please, leave," now the words were soft, the eyes beseeching as though trying to convey something of greater importance than the stranger knew how to put into words. "If you do, perhaps it can be stopped. If you go now, maybe there's still a chance..."

He faltered, rubbing his temples with his other hand, and Souja gently prised himself free of the man's grip, shaking his head.

"You have me wrong," he said quietly. "I came here out of duty for the Seventh Division, not out of Endou pride. As a shinigami of the Gotei, I can't simply walk away when I know an enemy is here.

Whatever you say, whoever you are, however you know my name... I have higher orders. Keitarou is a wanted fugitive. If he is here, I must find proof of it."

With that he slipped into shunpo before his companion could stop him, darting through the streams of light until he found himself well away from the hut and its odd, eerie ambience. Setting down on the grass, he let out a sigh, bending to touch the yellowed blades with his fingers.

Here there is little life, there there was none. He was right about one thing — that hut, whatever it's significance, was a place of death, as though that sword's presence had choked the very life out of it. I felt it when I walked in — I can't pretend I'm not glad to be away from it.

He turned to glance around him, gauging where he was. The land was barren for miles around, slopes and curves masking dips and shallow streams, and from this position he could make out the clusters of ramshackle housing he had observed earlier on. The Senkaimon had brought him to this place originally, he realised, and, in trying to find a landmark he recognised as an anchor for his shunpo, he had returned here.

Whoever that young man was, I believed him when he said he wasn't that child. Perhaps he did have reiryoku, but even if he did, I doubt he could follow me through shunpo. There may be something in the stories about Plus souls being tainted by reiatsu and not completely Hollowfied by the experience — but I can tackle that when I get back. For now, I need more conclusive evidence of Keitarou's being here. Having seen that sword, I can't just walk away and pretend that I did not. If Father's going to be livid with me, I should at least have something to show for it. He's almost certainly noticed my absence by now — so I need to make my story good for when I return. If I have proof, then I can tell him Joumei's fears, too. So long as there's something tangible connecting Keitarou with this place...

The sudden shifting of the air around his body made him draw instinctively to his left and something whistled past his ear, embedding itself in a thud in the dead trunk of a nearby tree. Souja swallowed hard, taking in the short-bladed dagger that now adorned the wood with a deep-rooted sense of unease.

That young stray warned me of danger, and then this. Was I wrong about him following me? Is this his work, or something else?

"Tsch,"

The sound of a voice caused him to tense, hand grasping his sword and pulling it once more from its sheath as he searched for any sign of the speaker. He could see nobody, picking up not even the slightest trace of foreign reiatsu but there was no doubt somebody was there, someone who had been watching him and who, if he had not moved as quickly as he did, would have struck a direct hit through his throat with the finely polished blade.

“I guess I should expect shinigami to have better reactions than common folk, though that hasn’t always been my experience.”

This time the voice was closer, as though whoever was speaking was stalking him and out of the corner of his eye he caught sight of a shadow as something slipped nimbly down the side of an old, half-demolished building, using the curves and crumbling piles of stone and wood to conceal themselves from his gaze.

It had been a woman’s voice.

Not the same person then. Worse and worse — that means there are more of them — whoever they are. I need to be careful — if the other one chooses to follow me, I’ll be outnumbered. And, more to the point...

Souja’s grip on his sword tightened, remembering all too clearly the report from the Spiritless Zone of the unknown female assassin.

But here? Maybe my idea was right. Perhaps they didn’t find her in the Spiritless Zone because she was already hiding out beyond its walls.

“Show yourself!” he commanded, his voice echoing strangely in the dry, empty atmosphere. “Hiding is a coward’s game — only weak folk attack from behind!”

“Oh, and you’d know all about that, wouldn’t you?” The woman’s voice was cold and cutting, but a rustle came from the shadows behind the building and, slowly, a figure emerged, stepping forward just enough that she was clearly visible in the brightening atmosphere of the Rukongai dawn. At the sight of her, Souja drew breath sharply into his lungs, taking out her slim form and her obvious youth with surprise and consternation.

I heard a report that she was young, but... surely not as young as this? She’s still just a child... maybe I’m mistaken.

His eyes flitted briefly to the dagger embedded in the wood, taking in how deeply it had pierced through the dead tree, and his gaze darkened.

No. That throw was meant to kill. Maybe this girl is still just in her teens, but that doesn’t mean I should let down my guard. Several people in the Spiritless Zone were killed by a girl wielding a dead blade. I can see her, but I can’t sense her... it’s too much of a coincidence not to be the same person.

“Well?” at his lack of response, the girl put her hands on her hips, her eyes glittering with contempt. “I thought shinigami had an answer for everything, but I guess that’s not always the case, is it?”

“I don’t have to answer to you for anything,” Souja said calmly, though inwardly he felt his spirit power gather and settle, readying himself to release his weapon if needed. “This is Rukongai, and the Gotei hold sovereignty here. I am the Vice Captain of the Seventh Division, and therefore...”

“Seventh...?” The girl’s expression underwent a transformation, then she snorted, letting out a derisive chuckle. “Oh, it gets better. So when you ran out of prey in your own world, you decided to come here hunting us instead, did you?”

“What are you talking about?”

“You’re an Endou,” the girl’s humour was gone in an instant, replaced by a look of pure hatred, the intensity of which on such a young face took Souja aback. “If that’s the case, I won’t go easy on you at all. Shinigami aren’t welcome here, but Endou especially... you’re scum, and I’ll enjoy gutting you.”

“You seem to know an awful lot about Seireitei, for someone who lives in the Rukon,” Souja kept his hand on his temper, despite the insult to his family’s pride. “The other lad called me by name, and now you, putting together Seventh and the name Endou without even a heartbeat to think it over. Who are you and what is your connection to the Gotei? Don’t tell me you don’t have one — someone must be feeding you this information, because otherwise...”

“You think Rukon people aren’t smart enough to know things by themselves?” The girl’s words dropped from her lips like ice, and she took a step towards him. At her side, her fingers twitched slightly, and Souja was unnerved to see a long, sharp-edged katana appear in her grip. “You think we’re stupid, mindless creatures who potter around waiting for important folk like you to decide how we should live our lives? You must be completely stupid. We don’t need outside help — we don’t need people like you. Not everything important happens in Seireitei.”

“I see,” Souja’s eyes became slits, and he lifted his left hand, resting his palm against the curled fingers of his right. “Then I was right. This does have connections to Aizen Keitarou. He’s here, isn’t he? He’s here, and...”

“You leave him out of it!”

As if he had lit a fire beneath her, suddenly the girl's stalking demeanour changed, her expression twisting into a visage of hate as she launched herself at him, her weapon primed to pierce him straight through the chest. Souja cursed, all thought of releasing his weapon forgotten as he shifted his weight to deflect the force of her blow, but no sooner had he done so than she had twisted and turned herself against him again, the katana blade glittering coldly in the pale morning light as it searched for a chink in his armour. Despite the lack of spirit power resonating from either the weapon or its wielder, Souja found himself hard-pressed to keep up with her speed or the ruthless stabs and thrusts of her weapon, and as he struggled to put space between them, he found himself thinking of the Rukongai dead, understanding what kind of assault they must have faced in their last, terrifying moments.

None of them were trained like I was to hold a sword. None of them would have been able to defend themselves, and so they died. A dead blade, Kai-dono said — but there's nothing dead about the one wielding it. The true weapon is the girl, not the sword.

He slipped into shunpo, appearing across the other side of the stretch of land and drawing a deep breath into his lungs, steadying his stance. The girl cursed, wheeling on him again, but this time he was ready for her, and his superior physical strength told, pushing her back until he had her safely at arm's length.

"Concealing a wanted felon is a crime against Soul Society punishable by death," he told her, his voice hoarse but steady despite the unexpected exercise. "Attacking a Vice Captain without due cause is also a serious offence. Either one of them could have you taken to Seireitei and held before the Council of Elders. If you don't want to be indicted for either thing, tell me the truth. Keitarou is here, isn't he? You know where he is and you're protecting him. You and that other boy — you're both shielding him. Tell me where he is."

The girl's eyes narrowed, and she glared at him coldly, before spitting in his direction.

"I wouldn't tell you if you were the last person in the world," she said blackly, her voice shaking with genuine hatred. "I have nothing to say to shinigami, and especially not one belonging to your people."

"By which you mean the Endou?"

Souja's eyes narrowed, taking in the girl's appearance more carefully. Though her face was twisted into an ugly mask of aggression, at this range he could clearly make out the curve of her features and the eyes that sparked with indignant fire were a paler imitation of those he had seen staring down at him that day from the portrait of his aunt in the Gallery at the Endou family home. Despite himself, he took a step back, keeping a blade's length between them as he digested what he was seeing.

"But you're one too, aren't you? You're an Endou, too," he murmured, and at this, the girl's eyes widened with pure fury.

"Don't you ever call me such a thing again, you shinigami scum!" she shrieked, launching her blade at him afresh, and Souja's feet slid on the dry dirt as he repelled her, hurriedly drawing on and discarding spells as he worked out the best way to subdue her. "I'm no part of that family, not now and not ever!"

"But you fight like one," Souja pushed her back, taking a leap away from her and the two of them circled each other for a moment, each awaiting the next one's move. "You hunt to kill. You're a predator — I can see it in your eyes. You might be here, and you might revile the Endou Clan, but you're blood to it all the same. Keitarou is here, and you're protecting him — because you're kin to him, aren't you? You're an Endou too — you're Eiraki-hime's get, and that's why you're so keen to kill me. I can't explain why I can't sense your reiatsu — maybe you're suppressing it, maybe it's Rukongai's atmosphere, or maybe it's some other trick completely, but only an Endou can look at their prey with such a cold, calculating ruthlessness. You can't hide it from me — you're no Plus soul at all. The reports are wrong — the killer in the Spiritless Zone is an Endou, just as much as I."

"You don't know anything at all," The girl spat out, shaking her head.

"On the contrary, I think I do," Souja's eyes narrowed. "You were the one who went there and slaughtered them as though they were no more significant than invading mice. That was your handiwork — your blade. I thought it at the time, that whoever killed those people must've had the killer instinct of a predator, and I was right. It was Endou blood that killed them, and for that I should kill you. Fortunately for you, I've been raised to believe in the Council's justice — but I'll take you back to answer for it all the same, and if you value your life, you'll talk to the right people about Keitarou-san and what exactly is going on in this godforsaken stretch of Rukongai."

"You won't take me anywhere," the girl hissed, her eyes glittering with ice. "You won't tell anyone anything about me. I'm not like my brother. I don't let loose ends slip away from the sharp end of my sword."

“Your brother?” Souja’s eyes widened, his mind flitting back to the encounter in the hut. “You mean... the young lad? The one with brown hair, who tried to stop me back in the forest?”

“Brown hair?” The girl snorted, derision crossing her features, and she shook her head, spitting once more onto the ground as if something that Souja had said had offended her. “Don’t be stupid. That idiot’s no kin of mine — if he was, I’d slit his throat myself. Believe me, I’d like to, only I’m not allowed. Believe me, there are a lot of people I’d like to kill, if I was able — but you’re here, and you’re in front of me, and I’m allowed to kill you. Shinigami are my prey -and you know too much to be allowed to leave here, which gives me carte blanche.”

A dark glint entered her gaze.

“Even if you are kin to my mother, you’re no kin to me,” she added softly. “Your life is mine, shinigami... your bones can bleach here for all I care, because you’re never going home.”

“I’m sorry to disappoint you,” Souja shook his head, bring his sword firmly and cleanly across the flat of his opponent’s blade and striking it from her grip, sending it spinning into the air before it dropped like a stone to the ground. The girl froze, staring at her weapon in undisguised dismay, and, in the moment of her hesitation, Souja was on her, using his free arm to pin her to the ground whilst leveling Iwanosuri’s blade at her throat.

“I don’t like fighting blades with women, especially not kinsfolk, but I’ve been taught that anything connecting to my aunt is dangerous and needs to be stopped on sight,” he said quietly, regret in his pale eyes. “I’m not a killer by nature, and I take no pride in causing death, but if you fight against me again, I’ll have to hurt you. You’re just a child — do you even understand what you’re involved in?”

The girl’s eyes became stormy, and she glowered at him, but made no attempt to speak.

“You admitted that you were my aunt’s child, didn’t you?” Souja continued. “Not only that, but that you have a brother — an older brother, I suppose, about the same age as me?”

“Do you really think I’d tell you anything about my family, shinigami?” the girl spat at him, wriggling slightly beneath his grip. “You really do think I’m an idiot, don’t you? You’re the real fool, though. You call yourself an Endou? Endou are meant to kill people, not sit and talk to them like they want to win them over. They’re not people who stop and consider, they’re folk who hunt and kill. If you think I'm like one of them..."

She trailed off, wriggling once more, but before Souja could open his mouth to speak, he felt a vicious, stabbing pain burrow through his gut and up into his chest, causing him to gasp and fall back in dismay. His free hand went instinctively to his chest, coming away coated in red, and he stared at the girl in disbelief, making out for the first time the short-bladed dagger clutched in her left grip. He blinked, his gaze darting to the tree trunk where, a few moments earlier, the dagger had been safely out of harm's reach, but to his horror there was nothing now but a hole in the wood where the weapon had been. In the struggle, she had retrieved it, and, like the hunter she was, she had allowed him to take her off balance, putting his guard down enough to strike a dangerous blow through his body.

"You..." he gasped, and the girl scrambled to her feet, amusement dancing in her blue eyes.

"I told you, you're the foolish one," she said quietly, taking a step towards him and tossing the blooded dagger aside, twitching the katana so that it caught the light. "If you know I'm a hunter, you shouldn't assume that I have only the one way to hunt. I told you I was going to kill you — and unlike you, I don't have mercy towards anyone who trespasses on my family's business. You should've killed me when you had the chance, but I knew you wouldn't."

"How..." Souja's grasp on his injured body tightened, the blood soaking through his shihakushou and staining the obi a bright, dazzling scarlet. He scrambled back a few inches, but she merely drew closer again, the excitement and anticipation of the kill glittering in her young gaze.

"You told me you'd seen that useless fool Koku, but you didn't kill him," she said simply. "He's too weak and sissy to kill anyone, so he wouldn't have given you much of a fight if you'd wanted to finish him. You're covered in blood now, but when we met, you weren't. If you'd killed him, I'd have known you meant to do the same to me — but you let him go, and now you've let me take you off guard, too. The Endou have fallen, haven't they... when a hunter becomes the hunted? I wonder what your family will say when you don't come home — or how much shame there is for an Endou prince who dies on Rukongai land..?"

She reached his side, her feet less than an inch from his ribcage.

"You won't need to worry about it, though," she continued brightly, raising the sword up over his throat and Souja swallowed, knowing that she fully intended to strike him through. “That, or me, or anything else you think you learned here. That’s why I kill shinigami, Endou-dono... because that way, they’re no longer able to talk about things that might prove troublesome for people here.”

She lifted her right foot, placing it very purposefully against Souja’s wrist and, with a decidedly triumphant smile, she shifted her weight from her left, slowly pressing the Vice Captain’s limb into the earth. Souja let out a yell of pain, hearing the sound of his bones crunching beneath her weight, but the girl just laughed, bending to pick up his discarded weapon and tossing it away from his reach.

“I think it will be better without that getting in the way,” she said, and there was no concealing the predatorial edge in her words as she bent over him, apparently pleased by the tears of pain that had sprung into his pale eyes. “Well, Endou-dono, let’s see how much fun killing you is going to prove to be.”

25. Choking Darkness

Chapter Twenty Four: Choking Darkness

The sky was already beginning to lighten over Inner Seireitei as Masaya cloaked himself in darkness, scuttling between patches of shrinking shadow as he hastened away from the Seventh Division barracks and the unfortunate subject of his baiting. Tenichi's reaction had both amused and disgusted him, and again he found himself wondering why Keitarou had chosen to waste time and energy having the older Kotetsu brother brought to Rukongai in the first place.

I shouldn't question Keitarou-sama, but sometimes I wonder what this fascination is he has with those who share his blood.

The spy grimaced, pulling himself up into the branches of a sturdy elm tree and using the mottled shade of its branches to conceal himself, slipping into shunpo and speeding more quickly through the spiritual streams of energy towards the main gate. Even in his days as an Onmitsukidou, he reflected, they had scarcely ever noticed his entrances or exits, but these days, with his skills so honed and his focus so unwavering, he could slip in and out of the most secure region of Seireitei without even leaving a spiritual trace. Yes, Keitarou had certainly delivered on his promise to make him a new person, and, as he rippled past the unsuspecting guard on duty, he allowed himself a smirk of derisive triumph.

Had he ever been so stupid as to care about this place? Perhaps he had, but if so, he did not remember. His recollections of Seireitei were patchy and grey, covered beneath layers of mental dust at the back of his thoughts and he preferred it that way. To have ties and concerns like the Kotetsu boy was to have weaknesses, and without them he was unshackled and free to serve Keitarou's cause.

He spread his hands beneath his cloak, reaching out his senses for the nearest Gotei gate through which he could conceal his tracks and disappear from the heart of the shinigami's territory. He would go to Haruna, he decided absently. He had no intention of returning to Rukongai so long as Katsura and his unwanted follower had headed back there, for he had no wish to provoke Koku into carrying out his threat, but nor could he risk lingering too long in dangerous Gotei territory. No, Haruna was the best place for him to lurk, for Minami was still tied enough to him to protect him, even if he gave her nothing in return. She had been a useful pawn in Keitarou's schemes and, when he had discussed it with the scientist, Keitarou himself had agreed that keeping Minami on side would prove beneficial. Masaya did not really understand why his former wife was so tied to the past, locked onto his former name and the person he had long since discarded, but he had gleaned enough from her behaviour to realise that her love for him meant she would not betray him, even if it meant her life. That kind of loyalty was hard to find in a place as treacherous as Seireitei, and so, when it came to finding a place to lie low, Haruna was the first place that sprang into his thoughts.

The land he currently stood on belonged to the Fourth Division, but although his emotional recollections had been dulled and splintered by his near-death experience, Masaya's geography of Seireitei and the gates that linked the regions together was still as ruthlessly clear as it had ever been. Here, he knew, the Districts came together like spokes of a wheel feeding into the nucleus that was Inner Seireitei and, as a consequence, it was the one area where transference between land holdings was both quick and simplistic. Some two ri beyond the borders of Inner Seireitei were a series of linked Senkaimon set up fifteen years before by the Urahara to connect these frequently patrolled stretches of land and facilitate ease of shinigami movement between the Gotei's base and the peasant settlements that covered the hills beyond. Masaya remembered with complete clarity where each gate was and how each could be opened without leaving a trace and so, without a moment of hesitation he drew the nearest gate open, stepping into it and focusing his energy on emerging near the village which he had once called his home.

It was not quite fully sunrise, and the market and village was quiet, with only the odd individual moving about, going to the well to collect water, or preparing their wares for the day ahead. Masaya pulled his cloak more tightly around his thin frame to conceal his features from anyone who might pay him any attention, walking along the dusty main street towards the cluster of houses that were the most familiar. Haruna was a wealthy town in comparison to some other District settlements, with proper dwellings built of stone and trees from the nearby forest and Minami still lived in the house that had once belonged to Masaya and his mother, many years ago. Masaya did not really remember those days clearly, nor did he have more than a couple of fleeting recollections of his mother's face, but the shape of the home itself he remembered vividly, including each and every escape hole that he had ever had cause to use when operating as a petty thief. That had been before he had made the ultimate mistake in joining the Onmitsukidou, he ruminated absently — but those days were long gone and there was no changing them now, even if he had cared to do so.

“What are you doing here?” As he approached the house, someone yanked on his arm, pulling him into the cracks between buildings and hissing in his ear. Masaya’s body tensed, ready for combat, but as he wheeled to face his opponent, he realised it was Minami herself, dressed for market and with an indignant, anxious look on her handsome features. “I thought I told you that coming around here so often was dangerous, and now you’re walking openly down the main street when anyone might see you?”

“Nobody pays me any attention,” Masaya said dismissively, detaching his arm from her grip and facing her impassively. “I came to see you. I need somewhere to stay for a little while, and here seemed the most logical.”

“Oh, so now you use me as board and lodgings?” Minami was indignant. “Never mind what damage it might do to me or my reputation if people thought I had a strange man suddenly staying here? You’re the one who keeps telling me that my husband is dead and I have to manage without him — what do you suppose my neighbours would say if they thought I’d taken a lover?”

“You needn’t concern yourself with that,” Masaya’s lip curled derisively over sharp, white teeth. “I have no interest in creating village scandal.”

“No interest...” Minami’s brow creased briefly, as though his words had somehow hurt her, then she seemed to pull herself out of it, grasping him by the wrists. “Listen. It would be bad enough if folk saw you and thought I’d lost my moral values, but even worse if they saw you and recognised you. You say you look different, and yes, you do, but not so much that I don’t recognise you. True, I’m your wife, and that’s how it should be but... if people saw you too much in my company, they might put the pieces together and realise. If that happened...”

“You worry too much about ties to the past,” Masaya said levelly. “Those are all severed. Suzuki Naoto died. Why would anyone believe they saw him here?”

“You might have severed those ties, but not everyone is that cold or clinical,” Minami snapped, a bitter edge to her tones. “You had friends here who grieved for you when you disappeared. People who supported me — people who still do. People who believed you’d died — what would those people think? I’ve told you that I’ll do what your Keitarou-sama says, but if you keep coming back here...”

“Has someone been here?” Masaya asked sharply, and Minami shook her head impatiently.

“Of course not. What do you take me for?” she demanded. “The only folk that have been in these parts are traders, and they come and go every day. Nobody’s asked any strange questions, nor have there been any shinigami patrols. I’d like to keep it that way, if you don’t mind. If they knew that those stupid junior officers had been kept locked and bound in my cellar...”

“If nobody is asking questions, nobody will find answers, will they?” Masaya sank back against the wall with a grimace. “You worry about the wrong things. If you’re loyal to Keitarou-sama, then protecting me should come automatically... or is it too much to expect a woman to understand that level of loyalty?”

“Shut up!” Anger flared in Minami’s eyes, and she brought her hand sharply across his cheek, causing him to stumble in surprise. “You have no idea what loyalty is, Suzuki Naoto, damn you! What kind of foolish person clings on to the walking corpse of their husband, even when he no longer cares for her, just because seeing him occasionally makes her believe she has a reason to keep living? Do you know how much I still hope that, one day, I’ll find the person I married inside that shapeshifting cadaver? You abandoned me, and you say I don’t understand loyalty?”

She gazed at her hand, then sighed, rubbing her brow.

“If you said you loved me, I’d still take you back,” she whispered, tears glittering on her lashes. “That’s a woman’s loyalty, Naoto. Maybe once you would’ve understood that... but now... I don’t think you can.”

“My loyalty is to Keitarou-sama,” Masaya said quietly, touching his cheek briefly, then lowering his hand. “Yours should be too — any other kind of distraction is unnecessary and you should discard it. I have.”

“I know,” Minami’s voice shook. “I know you have, damn you, but we’re not all like you.”

She folded her arms across her chest.

“Well? Why do you need to hide out here, anyway? Why not go back to Rukongai? I assume something’s happened in Inner Seireitei, but you don’t usually come here to me like this... and I’m not so stupid to believe for one moment it had anything to do with wanting to see me.”

“A Vice Captain’s gone missing from Inner Seireitei,” Masaya said simply, and Minami’s eyes became wide.

“Did you...?”

“No, of course not. Keitarou-sama said no more abductions, and I obey his orders,” Masaya snorted, shaking his head. “No, it’s nothing to do with me. He’s a busybody who’s prying into things he should not. But he’ll be dealt with, and I’d sooner be away from the centre of chaos when that happens.”

“I don’t suppose I’ll get any more, even if I ask for it,” Minami rolled her eyes. “Fine, then I suppose, since my basement’s free, I could lock you in it for a while. Nobody goes down there, not since I told my neighbours that it was infested with rats and better left alone.”

She smiled bitterly.

“There are rats, as it happens, so if you get hungry, you’ll be able to feed yourself,” she added acidly. “I’m sure, given your current attitude towards the world, that you’d not have any qualms about slaying a few rats, and it would make you useful to me in one way, at the very least.”

“I’m not afraid of rats,” Masaya said disparagingly, and Minami nodded.

“Then you and they will be well matched,” she returned neatly. “Come with me. There’s an entrance hidden around the back of the house and less people will see you if you go in that way.”

“Fine,” Masaya nodded his head. “You could have begun with that, though, and wasted less time with your unnecessary emotional outbursts.”

“I should slap you again,” Minami said blackly, “but for now I’ll just have to hope you get a few rat bites. I don’t have time to fuss over you — I have to be at market soon enough, and if I’m not there, people will know something is up.”

She took him by the hand, giving him a rough tug towards the rear passage that led to the back door of her home and Masaya did not resist, instead glancing around him to gauge the progress of the sun. It would be fully daylight before too long, he mused, but it should be possible to conceal himself fully in Minami’s basement long before the streets became busy with visitors from the surrounding area. Yes, Haruna had been the best place to come to, given the number of strangers which flooded its streets on a daily basis. The flow of people was such that, when the time was right, he could melt away in the midst of a crowd of customers and nobody would ever be the wiser for his having been there.

As he stepped over the remains of the old boundary fence that had been knocked down in a recent storm, however, something faint flickered across Masaya's senses, causing him to pause. He frowned, turning in the direction of the sensation as he tried to work out what it was and where he had sensed it before.

"Naoto?" At his hesitation, Minami too paused, shooting him a quizzical look. "What is it — why are you hesitating? I thought I told you, I don't have time..."

"Shut up, you stupid woman," Masaya snapped, pushing her instinctively behind him as he extended his spiritual wits across the village space, unease growing with each and every passing moment. No, he had not imagined it. Though faint and clearly suppressed, he could make out the clear and distinct aura of a shinigami, and more, one of considerable rank. He muttered a curse, glancing at Minami, then taking a step away from her.

"Naoto?"

"Don't call me by that name," Masaya ordered, swiping her hands away as she reached once more for his wrist. "Get inside your house and stay there. Stay there, do you understand?"

"What do you... I have market to go to, and..."

"There are shinigami. You're too dull-witted to notice, but they're there and they're coming this way," Masaya cut across her, anger surging through his body, and at his words, Minami paled, her eyes widened as she followed the line of his gaze.

"Shinigami? Coming here? But why?"

"It may be a random patrol, but it may not," Masaya spoke in low tones. "Just do as I tell you, woman. If anyone comes asking you questions, you don't know anything about anything. Your husband died ten years ago and that's all — understand?"

"Are you just going to abandon me to deal with them?" Minami demanded, fear replaced by indignation in her eyes. "I knew you'd sunk, but not to that depth! You'll really sacrifice me and the people here in order to make a getaway? Your reaction tells me you don't think it's a random patrol, yet even so..."

“Shut up!” Masaya retorted. “I’m not staying here, not when it’s dangerous. I’m leaving Haruna, and you should do as I tell you. Shinigami won’t hurt innocent people — and you said there’s been nobody here asking questions.”

“No, nobody has,” Minami shook her head quickly. “Nobody has, but... what if that’s just because they didn’t need to? What if they know about you... what if they know about me? What if...”

She trailed off, and Masaya turned to glance at her, taking in the pallor in her cheeks and the wide, apprehensive eyes that stared at him with a mixture of hope and dismay. She was trembling, he realised with a sudden jolt, her strong, defiant facade suddenly shattered by the thought of a shinigami invasion, and, despite himself, something stirred deep inside of his heart.

She’s Keitarou-sama’s ally, too. I should protect her for that reason. This village is our land. I should protect it, else Keitarou-sama will be angry.

He clenched his fists, rationalising the feeling until it settled and calmed into resolve inside of him.

That’s right. Protecting allies of Keitarou-sama is my job, and Minami isn’t one who usurps his favour or takes advantage of his benevolence. She acts as he tells her and no more. Keitarou-sama finds her useful, so he’d want me to protect her. That’s my duty... so that’s what I’ll do.

“Go inside your house, and shut the door. Bar the windows, if need be,” he said softly, and Minami let out a little gasp as she met his gaze, as though seeing something there that she had not seen for a long time. “If anyone comes here, tell them what I said. Your husband is dead. Cry, if you like — you’re good at that, and it throws people off, when a woman cries over them. Do that, and don’t worry about anything else. They won’t linger here — they won’t need to, I promise.”

“What... are you going to do?” Minami asked shakily, and Masaya’s gaze darkened.

“I’m going to do what Keitarou-sama would expect and protect those who are loyal to him,” he said matter-of-factly. “It’s a nuisance, but it can’t be helped. This location is important to Keitarou-sama’s plans, and so I can’t let it fall into enemy hands.”

“You’re... going to protect me? Protect us?” Minami’s eyes almost fell out of her head, and Masaya snorted, pushing away the hand she had hesitantly begun to reach out towards him.

“Don’t mistake me, woman,” he said curtly. “Suzuki Naoto might have been that kind of fool, but I act out of duty to Keitarou-sama, not to you or anyone else. Be grateful that he considers you useful — otherwise I'd simply leave you to die."

Minami's eyes glittered with tears, but Masaya did not hesitate to hear her response. Instead he slipped back into shunpo, heading towards the direction he had felt the encroaching reiatsu and inwardly cursing at having his day so summarily disrupted.

They're definitely heading to Haruna. Minami might have been mistaken — maybe there were spies here, and they covered their tracks better than she thought. That's what comes of trusting an amateur — but I won't let them reach the village. If they're looking for trouble, I'll have to give it to them myself.

He dropped out of shunpo, landing deftly on the branch of a nearby tree and scanning the land below him for any sign of the shinigami. There were two of them, he realised, both dressed in the identical black and white of a Gotei officer, swords hanging at their waists. One was a young man, scrawny and skinny, whilst the other was a young woman, slightly built. Masaya let out a sigh of relief as he realised that neither one of them looked particularly physically strong.

A coincidental patrol? Maybe it was. Either way...

Fumbling beneath his cloak for his own sleeping sword, Masaya prepared to launch himself from the branches, suppressing his reiryoku down to infinitesimal levels and blending and blurring his appearance in with the woodland so as to better camouflage his attack. As the shinigami paused to examine something on the ground, he took his opportunity, shooting down from the tree like a bullet from a gun and aiming the sharp end of his weapon directly for the young woman's jugular. As he did so, however, there was a sudden rush of air and spiritual energy and, with a resounding clang, his weapon met against another, stopping him in his tracks and causing him to step back.

He raised his gaze, horror and dismay glittering in his golden eyes as he met the grave hazel eyes of the Gotei's Thirteenth Captain, white haori flapping about his shoulders and long white hair tied in a tail at the nape of his neck. In the other man's right hand was the distinctive form of a gleaming katana, its sharp edge pressing against Masaya's own blade with just enough force to hold it at bay. For a moment he was frozen, and Juushirou pressed his lips together, running his gaze pensively over his sudden opponent.

"Well, well," he murmured, a look of troubled comprehension glittering on his features as he took in the spy's amber gaze. "Suzuki Naoto, I presume?"

For a moment, Sakaki allowed her full weight to crush the bones in the shinigami's wrist then, as his eyes began to cloud with pain she drew her foot back, lowering her sword to touch it pensively against his cheek. Far from the quick, deadly thrust that Souja had expected, now her victim was down, she had no desire to end the fun quickly. A shinigami infiltrating Rukongai was a rare event and, unlike the last one, this one she had no reason to hold back on.

The wound to his gut was serious, but it would not prove fatal. It had been enough to stun him, but, as she brought her weapon away from his skin, he struggled to pull himself into a more defensive position, his snapped wrist hanging uselessly from its socket as he pushed his elbow against the ground as a lever instead. His left hand was already reaching out for the discarded hilt of his sword, and despite her contempt for those who wore the shihakushou, Sakaki was grudgingly impressed by the resolution in her opponent's gaze. Although he had not made to kill her, he had not begged her for mercy, either, and for a moment she let him gather himself, waiting until he was within inches of grasping his zanpakutou's hilt before jerking out her right foot to kick him bodily in the throat and send him flying two or three metres back along the ground. He fell with a crunch and a groan, and Sakaki half wondered if the fall had shattered his other arm but, once again, there was the sound of scrabbling fingers against the dying grass and, panting for breath and dripping with blood, the shinigami pulled his body around to face her, resting his entire weight on his uninjured left hand whilst using the damaged right to protect his injured torso. His eyes fixed on her face, unblinking and cold with anger, but the colour of his skin was already becoming pale and Sakaki knew from past experience that he would be getting weaker from both the loss of blood and the shock of her attacks.

"I take what I said back, though," she said coquettishly, skipping nimbly around him and bending to pick up his finely crafted sword. "You aren't as weak as I thought you were. Most souls would be begging for their lives right about now — but you won't do that, will you?"

"Endou... don't... beg," Souja managed to spit the words out hoarsely, and Sakaki let out an approving chuckle at the flash of blind hatred that flared up in his eyes. "You... don't... understand... what... you... unleash... when... you... declare... yourself... our... enemy."

"What, exactly, are you going to do to me?" Sakaki squatted a short distance away from him, lifting her arm and tossing his zanpakutou across the grass so that she was between him and retrieving it. “You have no sword and I know that with an injury like that you won’t be able to use your demon magic.”

She tapped her head with the index finger of her hand.

“I learned young that, if I can’t use spells, I have to be able to stop anyone I fight using them,” she said confidentially. “You can threaten me all you like, Endou-dono, but it won’t make any difference. You’re down to my level now. Humbled by a Rukongai resident who has no spirit power and no magic sword. Don’t you feel ashamed of yourself? I’m sure your Clan would be ashamed of you.”

Her eyes narrowed, and she squinted at him thoughtfully.

“I haven’t met anyone from the Endou Clan before,” she admitted. “It’s kind of fun, to actually fight with one. I’d heard they were powerful and ruthless — you weren’t really, but at least you don’t die easily. I like that at least.”

“Hadou... no... Yon... Byaku..rai!”

A sudden blast of white electricity zig-zagged across the clearing, narrowly missing Sakaki’s leg and causing her to yelp, jumping to her feet with a cry of indignation.

“Hey, you’re not supposed to be able to...!”

“Maybe... you didn’t... hear me,” Souja’s eyes were like slits now, the normally pale, gentle gaze sparking with cold fire as he reached his shaking left hand out for a nearby shard of broken tree wood, using it to pull himself painfully and slowly to his feet. “I’m... the Vice Captain... of the Seventh... Division.”

“I don’t care if you’re the King of Soul Society, you’re not going to ruin my fun by escaping,” Sakaki pouted, tightening her grasp around her katana and preparing to launch herself at him once again. “Just because you got to your feet, it doesn’t mean I’m going to let you get away. I’m not an idiot and I’m not going to let a loose end like you slip out and bring trouble down on the people here.”

“Stop me,” Souja’s gaze was already roving across the grass behind her for the glint of his zanpakutou, and Sakaki let out a growl of annoyance, driving forward with her blade angled directly at his injured stomach. Souja’s movements were slow and shaky, but he managed to flare a feeble bakudou shield to deflect the weapon away from his vital organs, causing it to glance through his useless right arm instead. Fresh blood spurted from the wound and he let out an involuntary yelp of pain, but he did not fall back, and Sakaki cursed, realising that he truly meant to keep fighting her until he literally dropped dead from loss of blood or exhaustion.

Mother always said that the Endou were hard to kill but professionals at killing. He didn't look like a killer before but now, covered in blood and with that look in his eye, maybe I see it. Perhaps it's there, even in this one — the predator looking for his prey. Probably that means my game is over — I ought to finish him off quickly, and save decorating his body till after he's dispatched.

As Souja made a desperate lunge past her, aiming to retrieve his sword with his one remaining good hand, Sakaki took her moment, barging her smaller body into his taller one and knocking him off balance. He stumbled, flailing his damaged arm helplessly to try and stabilise himself, but Sakaki was not about to let her opening pass and she drove him mercilessly to the ground, slashing her weapon towards his upper body without caring particularly where she cut. Her first swing ripped through the black hakamashita, but the second and third drew blood and Souja yelled out, bringing his left hand up instinctively to push her weapon away. His fingers slid against the sharp edge of the blade, smearing blood across it, but Sakaki was beyond reasoning with now, and she merely brought her weapon back only to attack again, driving the tip this time towards Souja's throat. The Vice Captain saw the attack coming, mustering the last of his strength to fire an even more feeble Bakudouto to deflect the sharp blade from slicing through his jugular, but Sakaki responded with a well-aimed kick to the ribcage, sending Souja once more sliding across grass which had been made slick by his spilled blood.

"Time to finish it off, Endou-dono," Sakaki's words had lost all humour, and she gripped the hilt of her weapon tightly in both hands, preparing to swing the blade one final time across his neck to sever his head from his body. Souja flinched, seeing the attack coming, but Sakaki knew he had exhausted his strength on trying to defend against her, and this time, he would not be making any kind of escape.

This time, he was hers for the taking.

This time...

"What have you done?"

The sound of Koku's voice, sharp and uncharacteristically cold cut through the morning air, and Sakaki swung around, blood still dripping from her katana as she faced her Rukongai rival. Defiance glittered in her blue eyes, and she moved to stand in front of the fallen body of her victim, as if claiming him as hers.

“This is nothing to do with you,” she hissed, her eyes narrowing to slits. “This is my business. My job. Go back to your books, Koku. You’re not wanted here. This is nothing to do with you.”

“I said, what have you done?” Koku’s brown eyes glimmered with something that Sakaki had never seen there before, and despite herself, she felt a chill run down her spine. Her fingers tightened on the hilt of the sword, and she thrust it out, spraying blood across the ground as she stretched the red-stained point between them, using it to keep her challenger at a safe distance.

“I’m killing a shinigami,” she snapped back. “That’s my job. I protect this place, and he came here when he shouldn’t.”

She cast the still Souja a cursive glance, as if to make sure he wasn’t using the interlude to wriggle away, but he had made no attempt to move, and she realised that he had either lost consciousness or expired.

“He asked about Father,” she added. “When he said that, do you think I was going to let him go?”

“You’re a damn idiot, just like always,” Koku retorted coldly. “Don’t you think that it will bring trouble raining down on our heads if you kill one of the Gotei’s senior officers? Do you know who that man is, Sakaki? Do you have any comprehension whatsoever of who you’ve just blooded with that godforsaken shard of metal?”

“Just because my sword doesn’t have a soul, it doesn’t mean it can’t slit your throat, so don’t insult it,” Sakaki exclaimed petulantly. “Besides, why should I care who he is? A dead enemy is a dead enemy. Dead enemies don’t talk. What does it matter what his name is? He won’t be using it any more — and if you let me finish my job, there’ll be nothing recognisable left of him anyway, even if someone should decide to come looking for him.”

“He’s Endou Souja, you moron,” Koku’s tones were impatient, but Sakaki felt certain she could hear a certain note of fear or urgency underpinning them, something she had never heard in Koku’s voice before. “Endou Souja, heir to the Endou Clan and son of Endou Hirata! Surely you can’t be dense enough not to know who he is, not when Eiraki-san is...”

“He did say something about an aunt,” Sakaki acknowledged, kicking absently at the black-fabric covered legs that sprawled at her feet, but there was no response, not even the faintest murmur of pain. “I told you, though, I don’t care what the shinigami think or what they do. I kill shinigami. If they come here, I’ll kill them, too. I’ll kill as many as they send, so you needn't look so frightened. Just because you were a coward and let him escape, you shouldn't expect the same from me."

She offered him a mocking smirk.

"I won't even tell Father that you met him before he came here, but you let him go," she taunted. "I fixed your mess for you, and I won't even tell on you. You would've let him go back to Seireitei with all kinds of dangerous information... he even thought you were my brother, and he recognised me just by looking at me, that I was mother's child, and he knew I'd been in the Spiritless Zone, too. He was far too dangerous to let go, whoever he might've been. Besides, it's pointless to worry about now."

She kicked the still leg once more, but there was no reaction, and she snorted.

"He's already beyond anyone's help. If you want to make yourself useful, you can bury the corpse — I've lost interest in it now you've come along and ruined my fun. You can have it, if you like — I don't want it any more."

Koku's gaze flitted to the still form on the ground, and Sakaki saw his eyes darken until they glittered an ominous black.

"I see," he murmured, his words trembling with something that wasn't quite anger, but something else, a pent up emotion so deep and intangible that it made Sakaki ill at ease. All of a sudden, the entire clearing seemed to be filled with a choking, whispering energy, and the younger girl stumbled, almost tripping over her fallen victim in her hurry to put further space between her and her companion. All around Koku's body, the air seemed to distort and become suddenly more vivid, as though the gathered clouds of polluted spiritual energy had been forced apart, driven back by whatever strange energy had wrapped itself around Koku's aura. She took two or three steps back but, although Koku made no attempt to follow her, he turned his gaze suddenly on her and for the briefest instant Sakaki felt as though something savage was clawing at her throat, trying to drown her in an invisible sea of spiritual pressure.

"What the hell are you doing?" she demanded, no longer defiant, as fear gripped hold of her heart. "What are you... why... how... stop it! Stop it, Koku! Stop it and leave me alone!"

"You did something you should not have done," Koku's voice sounded foreign to Sakaki's ears, mired in the whispers and flashes of colour that fought to dominate her senses. Though she knew he could not use shunpo, she did not see him move, yet in a moment he was beside her and, before she could react, he had grasped her by the rough collar of her hakamashita, pulling her towards him so that her face was less than an inch from his. His gaze bored into hers, seeming to see right through her to the soul beneath, and try as she might, she could not look away, although meeting the intensity of that stare made her dizzy and afraid.

“I should kill you now, but it’s not your time,” he whispered, and Sakaki gathered her courage, swinging her sword around towards him. There was the clash of metal on metal, the vibration running through Sakaki’s whole frame, and her eyes widened in consternation as she realised that from beneath the folds of his robe Koku had produced a weapon of his own.

In all the years she had known him, never once had she seen Koku wield a sword. In fact, as she stared in dull disbelief at the ugly greyish weapon clasped between his dusty, pale fingers, she could distinctly remember him telling Keitarou that he did not want to learn to fight with blades, because he didn’t want to cause anyone to get hurt. She had mocked him for so many years for what she had interpreted as weak-willed cowardice, yet then, as their swords had met, she had felt the intent behind her companion’s swing and it had unnerved her.

“Wh... where did you get that?” she demanded, as Koku pushed her blooded weapon away as though it were nothing more than a flower petal that had fluttered into his line of vision. “You don’t use a sword! You said...”

“It wasn’t time, then,” Koku said softly. “It’s not time now, but you do things that make me angry, and this time, it’s not something I can ignore.”

He gestured to the crumpled form of her victim on the ground with the sharp end of his weapon, which glinted strangely in the pale Rukongai light, giving it an eerie appearance that once more chilled Sakaki to the core of her being.

“You should not have killed him,” he said softly. “It was badly done, and you will pay for it.”

“Are you going to kill me, then?” From somewhere Sakaki found bravado, though inwardly she was trembling like a leaf at this sudden, unexpectedly aggressive onslaught. “Take your stupid, ugly weapon and kill me because you’ve suddenly developed an attachment to the Endou Clan and you’re scared that I spilled a little bit of their blood?”

My blood is Endou, too, and Endou kill each other. You're such a coward, Koku... especially when I did you a favour, silencing him on your behalf."

"You really are an idiot, sometimes," Koku said bleakly, and the frustration and despair in his tones pierced through Sakaki's body, taking root in her thoughts as though it were her own. "I should kill you here and now, and put an end to it. That would be the sensible thing — but if I do that, people would cry, and I'm not you."

His eyes narrowed, the dark orbs sparking a strange, uncharacteristic fire from beneath hooded lids, and he reached out his free hand, plucking the blooded weapon from her grip blade-first as though it were nothing more dangerous than a stick she had picked up from the ground. He tossed it aside, pushing his own sword towards her throat until it scratched lightly against her skin. Frozen by the look in his eyes, Sakaki was unable to do more than drag air into frightened lungs, and for a moment, she felt sure he was going to swing the weapon through her jugular, so strong was the killer instinct that pulsed from the normally quiet boy's body. There was a pause that seemed to last forever, then, with a sigh, Koku pulled the sword back.

"It's not your time yet," he repeated, and Sakaki was sure she could hear a mingling of regret and resignation in his tones. "I won't kill until there's no other option but to. Get out of here, and don't come back. Leave the shinigami with me — and pray it's not too late to resolve this, else it won't be me you need to fear."

"Koku..."

"I said go," Koku's words ripped through her like a sudden clap of thunder, the whole clearing seeming to spark suddenly with dangerous energy that even her dead spirit senses could not help but pick up and she swallowed hard, cowed despite her usual defiance. Pausing only to grab up her sword from the ground, she spat at him, then scuttled into the woods as fast as she could manage. Only when she was sure she was out of sight did she stop, scaling the trunk of the nearest tree that would bear her weight, and sinking down into the branches, struggling to catch her breath. She was physically trembling, she realised, dismay filling her heart. Her hands were shaking so hard that she could not even sheath her sword, and, at length she gave up, shoving it down on the branch beside her and burying her head in her arms as she struggled to comprehend what had just happened. Tears that were usually so foreign to her glittered on her lashes and she dashed them away, but more came, mortifying her even further as she realised they too were signs of fear and confusion.

Koku... with a sword. Koku who doesn't use weapons, and who doesn't fight people, coming at me as though he meant to kill me, and... and turning the whole world into... something strange.

Sakaki swallowed hard, processing this with difficulty.

I've never seen him like that before. Is that why Father took him in? Did he know Koku had spirit power? I can't sense reiatsu, so I wouldn't have realised till he came at me like that, but... but whatever he did, it wasn't normal. Those voices..the whispers, the colour... like he was forcing himself into me, making me see... making me feel... what?

She screwed up her eyes, trying to make the memories disappear, but they sank deeper into her consciousness, replaying over and over again. The blurry, half-words that had slipped teasingly into her ears began to form into proper sounds and syllables, and she covered her ears with her hands, as if by doing so she could force them back.

I have to tell Father. I have to tell him... tell him everything. I have to tell him... that Koku threatened to kill me. He took that sword, and he put it to my throat... when all I was doing was protecting my family and covering his back too! It was a shinigami, and I have carte blanche to kill those, if they come here. That one wasn't a Kotetsu, so he was fair game. So what if he was an Endou? Mother wouldn't care if I killed her kin, so why should someone like him? I didn't do anything wrong. It was Koku. Koku was the one who was out of line and if he's betraying us, I ought to go slit his throat. But... I don't... want to go back there. I don't want to fight him... because...

She swallowed hard, gazing down at her blood-spattered fingers.
I don't think that I can.

The admission pained her, but she knew it was true. In that instant, the bookish, unassuming Rukongai citizen that she had all but dismissed had flown at her with a steel resolve she had not known he possessed and, try as she might to tell herself she was not afraid, she knew that she was.

I need to tell Father, before he hurts someone. Now, before it's too late — before Koku can get there and sweet-talk his way around it. I have to warn them... I have to warn everyone what he's really like. I have to go... now.

She had gone.

Koku took a deep breath, trying to calm the rising waves of angry reiatsu that threatened to engulf his whole body in their tempest. For a moment, all he could see was white hot energy, sounds and images blurring together and making no impression on his senses, but then a low moan came from the figure on the ground, and something in the weak sound cut through his delirium, giving him an anchor back to the present.

He's still alive.

Tossing the sword aside as though it was no more than a trinket he had picked up by accident, Koku hurried down at the shinigami's side, sliding an awkward hand beneath the man's head and supporting it as a cough racked through the broken body. There was a fair amount of blood, he realised, bile rising in his throat at the sweet stench that covered the body, and the front of the stranger's black shihakushou had been all but shredded, indicating a frenzied attack that had not abated until he had come onto the scene.

"You..." the man wetted his lips, managing to croak a single word, and Koku shook his head.

"Don't speak. Don't say anything. You'll only hurt yourself more," he said, panic rising in his heart as he realised how badly the man was cut apart. "I told you this was a bad place to come. You shouldn't have come here. You should have gone back."

The man grimaced, coughing again, then flailing out a weak arm to support his body a little, pulling himself up just enough that he could see Koku's features clearly.

"I didn't listen," he murmured. "You... tried to warn..."

"I didn't suppose you would, but I had to try anyway," Koku said regretfully.

"She... didn't... expect you... to fight her... did she?"

"You were listening to that?" Koku bit his lip, and Souja offered him a feeble smile.

"Playing... dead... is sometimes... advantageous," he admitted, "if your physical position... is a weak one."

"Mm," Koku could not dispute the shinigami's words, and Souja cocked his head slightly to get a better look at his would-be rescuer.

"She... her name... was Sakaki... and you... Koku?"

"That's neither here nor there, not right now," Koku responded briskly. "There are far more pressing things than my name for you to bother about. She's messed you up pretty badly — even for her, this is extreme. I'm sorry. I got here as quickly as I could, but I can't use shunpo like you can."

"But... you... stopped her," Souja managed, and Koku snorted.

"Not in time. Not quickly enough, and nobody here will help to fix you," he muttered, glancing around him for any sign of inspiration, but there was none.

"Why... did you? Isn't... she... your... ally?"

"My ally?" Koku pulled a graphic face. "She's a damn nuisance, and that's all. I told you, I don't like death. She does, so we don't get along. Besides, I already told you, forget about me and forget about her for now."

"But..."

"You need your strength, since knowing all about me won't do you any good if you die right after I tell you," Koku said succinctly, pushing back the shinigami's shihakushou and examining the bloody mess with growing dismay. "I can't heal you. I don't know any spells that would, and there aren't any healers here. You know that, though, right? You knew when you came here that you were entering No-Man's land."

"You... are here," Souja objected, clearly ignoring the instruction not to talk. "You... and that girl... she... the one who... killed... in the Spiritless Zone... yes?"

"I've never left this part of Rukongai," Koku avoided the question, pulling the rough sash from his waist and using it to create a rough, clumsy tourniquet around the worst of Souja's bleeding wounds. "I can't answer questions about what happens in other places, so don't ask me to. I'm trying to help you — you could repay me by helping me, too."

"Helping... you?"

"You shinigami have a way to get back to Seireitei," Koku said categorically. "I know you do — you must have had one to come here. You did, right? A... a Senkaimon, or something like that?"

"Yes, but... I didn't... wasn't my..."

"Can you open it up again?" Koku eyed his companion urgently. "There, they can help you. Heal you. Fix your wounds. You might live. I can't do it here, but there..."

"I... I can't reach... my sword." Souja coughed again, blood dribbling down the side of his mouth. "Without it... I can't... it needs... my sword... and... reiryoku. Even then... its not... Gotei gate. Maybe... it won't... open... but I need... my sword... to try."

"Your sword?" Koku's gaze strayed to the discarded weapon that lay across the grass, then back to the crumpled form that lay huddled against him. "You need a sword to open something like that?"

"You really... haven't... ever left here, have you?" Souja's eyes became pensive for a moment, before pain creased his brow once more. "Funny. You... don't seem... like you come... from Rukongai. Your reiatsu... felt..."

"I guess people aren't always what they seem," Koku said brusquely, not letting his wounded companion complete his sentence. "Anyhow, your sword. If I get it, do you promise not to try and hurt me with it?"

"You're... helping me," Souja snorted. "If I... killed you... how... would I get back?"

He flapped the fingers of his right hand uselessly, and Koku realised the limb had been shattered at the wrist, the distinctive dust-marks of a footprint across the black shihakushou telling him exactly how it had come to be broken. He muttered a string of curses, fumbling on the ground for Souja's sealed zanpakutou, the glittering blade somehow dulled in the hazy light of the Rukon Valley. Gently, he slid the hilt into Souja's damaged right hand, curling the fingers around it and ignoring his companion's visible flinch of pain as he disturbed the fractured bones.

"Now, can you?" he asked anxiously, and Souja gasped, drawing a pained gulp of air into his lungs. He closed his eyes, apparently bracing himself, then he nodded.

"Help... me... up," he instructed, moving his shaking left hand to cover his right, tightening his grip on the weapon. "I... need... to stand... to... open... the gate... properly."

"Like this? You'll drop dead before you do," Koku objected, but nonetheless he did as he was bidden. Souja let out a low, pained chuckle, shooting his companion a resigned look.

"I... know... my injuries... are bad ones," he said matter-of-factly. "I... thought I was... dead... till you appeared. I don't... know who you really are... but..that girl... knew you. She'll... come back. With others. If... you want to... help me, I..will help you. You... take me back... where I belong. In... return... I promise you... shelter. They... will protect you... in return... for you... protecting... m... me.”

He coughed violently again, doubling up and it was all Koku could do to keep the man on his feet.

“You should worry about yourself first, and let me alone,” he said bluntly. “You need a healer, first and foremost, and anything else can...”

“No,” Souja shook his head decisively, the blade of his weapon glimmering unevenly with faint light as he focused his spiritual strength one last time. “Most... important is... reporting to my... Captain. Then... they can stop this. People... like her... for everyone... need to... stop. Endou... responsibility... more important than... patching my... wounds.”

“Souja-dono...”

“She... was my... cousin,” Souja said grimly, pain creasing his brow, and he drew a heavy, laboured breath into his lungs. “My aunt... my family must... redress... I must... warn them. Must... go back... more important than... my life... everyone... in... Seireitei.”

“I see,” Koku’s eyes became grave, and he let out a sigh. “Even if I take you back, you won’t let it rest, will you? Whatever happens to you, I won’t convince you to let this place alone, will I?”

“Old... wounds... need... reparation. If not... new... wounds... form,” Souja gasped out. “But... I promise... you will... be safe. I promise... I give... my word...”

“I told you already, worry more about yourself right now,” As the shinigami stumbled, Koku let out an exclamation, hurrying to steady his wobbling form. “If you’re going to open it, open it, before you fall down and can’t get up. I don’t know how these Gate things work, and even if I’m not all that keen on the idea of Seireitei, I don’t want to have you drop dead at my feet.”

Souja nodded grimly, and, through gasps of breath, he lifted the hilt of his weapon, thrusting it forward with resolve into the air beyond.

Immediately, the sky itself split apart, revealing a gaping tunnel of darkness beyond, and, as Souja parted his bloodstained fingers, Koku saw the iridescent, stunted form of a butterfly begin to take shape, fluttering feebly and drunkenly before them both before heading towards the tunnel.

“Follow... it... and... take me... back,” Souja murmured, his words faint now as every syllable became an effort. “I need... to tell... Father... everything. Take... me... home... and I promise... they... will... shield you.”

I can't protect you, even if I take you back. I can't save you, even if I step into that abyss with you. Worse, returning there with you may mean betraying everything here... and once I step into that chasm, there's no going back.

Fear clutched at Koku's heart as he regarded the yawning hole, knowing that, on the other side, lay the alien world of Seireitei and the shinigami that he knew so much and yet so little about.

I can't do anything for you, but if I leave you here, I let you die. If I abandon you, I killed you — that makes me like Sakaki. I know... that if there's even the faintest chance of saving your life, I have to take it. Whatever faces me on the other side... I have to go. If someone's life is there in front of me, I can't discard it... no matter what the cost.

Slowly and jerkily he nodded his head, tightening his hold on Souja's failing body and taking a step and then another one towards the Senkaimon.

Besides, whatever I do, it hardly matters anyway. It's already written... all I can do is obey.

Murmuring a prayer under his breath for help, he crossed the threshold into the tunnel, watching as the sky closed up behind him, engulfing him in black.

26. Kestrel's Strike

Chapter Twenty Five: Kestrel's Strike

A deadly silence fell over the clearing, as Captain and former Onmitsukidou faced one another, their gazes locked together in the silence that threatened to grow oppressive. Then, as if woken from a spell, the dark clad shadow sprang back with a hiss, light glittering from his left palm as he prepared to weave some kind of Kidou attack.

“Get out of my way, Taichou-san!” he warned, the gleam of a cornered animal in his strange, amber gaze. “If you don’t, I won’t be responsible for picking up the pieces of you or your underlings, so step back and let me pass.”

“Who are you calling underlings?” Kirio’s hand was on her own sword now, indignation surging into her gaze, but before she could draw it fully, Juushirou held up his hand, indicating for her to stop.

“Fall back, Kirio. You too, Tsunemori,” he said quietly. “We came out looking for something in particular and I think it’s safe to say we’ve found it. Until we know the exact nature of it, though, I want you both to stand back.”

“But Taichou!” Kirio’s voice bubbled over with frustration, but Juushirou shook his head, his gaze never leaving the shadowy figure who crouched before them, ready to spring forward again at a split-second’s notice.

“That’s an order, Hikifune,” he said quietly. “Stand back and wait for further instructions. This is a populated area... the more reiryoku that gets released here, the more likelihood there is of drawing trouble onto unsuspecting villagers. Our job is to capture this individual, not start an all out sword fight. I believe we should be able to accomplish our goal without the need for that.”

“You’re very cocky,” The dark-clad figure’s strange golden eyes narrowed to slits, “not to mention delusional. You call me by the name of a man who you must know is dead, yet you do so without fear that I’m a ghost here to curse you or poison your reiryoku with my decay. Do the Gotei teach shinigami how to fight battles with spectres now, then?”

He spread his fingers, sparks of silver electricity shooting out across the woodland, singing through the branches of trees and causing them to splinter and fall to the ground. "If so, I'd like to see you try."

"I don't believe in ghosts," Juushirou said evenly, glancing briefly at the charcoal stubs of wood before turning his attention back to his opponent. "I do believe, however, that you are the person I came looking for. Most individuals would not know the name 'Suzuki Naoto' — my companions have surely never heard of him. You, on the other hand, showed no surprise at all that I would use such a name — more, you claim to know that person's fate, even though his former commanding officer remains uncertain as to what became of him."

"Ah, well, we District people have our ways," the shadow leered mockingly out from beneath the hood of his cloak, his eyes blurred slightly by the heavy fall of the fabric. "Maybe I'm the one who killed him — you never know. District people will do anything for money, so I hear, when times are tough... oh, but you'd know that, wouldn't you?"

He let out an amused peal of laughter, but it was lacking in humour and ran like ice rain through Juushirou's senses.

"Yes, of course. How silly of me, lecturing you on the ways of the Districts. You must know those just as well as I do, Juusanbantai-Taichou-san. I know of you. We all do, you see — the Thirteenth Division Captain from the seaside hovel in Sixth, and his wild strays robed in the corpse dress of the Gotei."

"These wild strays are perfectly capable of separating you from your limbs if need be," Kirio snapped out, and Juushirou could feel the ripple of her reiryoku rising as if to meet the challenge. Tsunemori remained silent, but his spirit power rippled too as if in protest, and the Captain sighed, slowly shaking his head.

"Words are only that. Words," he said matter-of-factly, keeping his tones calm despite his own indignation, for he knew that it was the only way to keep his subordinates from reacting to the shadow's taunts. "You can say as many of them as you like, but it won't make me fly into a rage and release my zanpakutou in a mad frenzy. I don't know why you're here or what your intention is — to bait me, to distract me, to draw me into a confrontation that would bring Hollows to this place and make the Gotei look bad — but I'm not interested in the vulgarities of your vocabulary. What I am interested in is Suzuki Naoto — and unless you have a way of proving to me that you're not him... I'm going to persist in believing that you are."

A faint flicker of spiritual energy glittered down Sougyo no Kotowari's blade.

“Now, if you’re quite done with the trash-talking, I’d quite like you to come back to Soul Society with me,” he continued pleasantly. “I suppose it’s useless for me to invite you and expect you to come with me cordially and by your own choice, so I suppose that means using force.”

“I already told you not to talk down to me,” The shadow’s eyes slitted again, and he drove his body forward, more kidou glittering from his left hand whilst his right lurked beneath the cloth of his robe, the angle of it’s movement telling Juushirou from which direction the blade he held would next come his way. Sure enough, as his opponent came within striking distance, the silver metal of the sword glittered in the early morning light, and once again Juushirou met it with the flat of his own weapon, parrying it back before swinging Sougyo no Kotowari around to deflect the flare of Shakkahou that came blazing towards his upper body. The spell scorched across the metal of the blade, but although the zanpakutou’s spirits cried out to be allowed to join in the conflict, he ignored their call.

There are too many innocent people living nearby, In’you. Whether there is or isn’t underhand business going on in the Districts, without any proof I won’t put people at risk. I’m not a child any more, and I won’t respond to childish provocations. My sword is dangerous enough these days just by releasing it — who knows what a proper fight might attract given the strangeness of the Hollows in recent weeks.

“You’re not taking me seriously, are you?” the cloaked figure let out a hiss of mocking disappointment, twitching his blade into a more upright position and launching himself at Juushirou a third time, yet this time, as the Captain moved his weapon to counter, the arm that bore the enemy’s blade twisted and flexed out of its normal alignment, elongating and bending to avoid the swing of Sougyo no Kotowari’s blade. Letting out a muttered curse, Juushirou took a step back to avoid the swing, watching in disbelief as the shadow-figure’s limb bent back on itself as though hinged at the elbow in both directions before swinging like a length of vine towards him, casting the weapon’s sharp edge in the direction of Juushirou’s throat.

“Taichou!” Now it was Tsunemori who cried out, and Juushirou could tell his subordinate was on the verge of releasing a spell.

the weapon clean out of his opponent's grip. The stranger cursed, hopping back and glaring at Juushirou from under hooded lids.

"I suppose nobody told you that I fight with both hands," Juushirou said evenly, flexing his fingers and passing the sealed weapon between right and left grasp as he contemplated his opponent's likely next move. "Whatever it was you did with your arms, I'm not as open to attack as you seem to think. Even without releasing my sword, I've trained for a long time in kenjutsu and I'm not easy to disarm. If I were you, I'd cut my losses and surrender now... or do you think that if you laid your blade on me, my companions would stand back and let you escape?"

"It's a coward's game, to rely on the protection of underlings," the shadow snapped back coldly, and Juushirou's eyes narrowed, the hazel gaze becoming cold as flint as he tightened his hold on Sougyo no Kotowari's hilt, taking a step towards his opponent, then another, and another.

"You mistake me," he said coldly, the ice this time in his tones. "I'm not asking them to protect me. I'm warning you that your position is an unenviable one. Drop your sword, surrender and come quietly — otherwise I'll be forced to use this to draw blood, and that will make a nice mess all through the Gotei halls. I'd rather avoid that — but I'm trained to take down an enemy in whatever way is necessary, so don't think that my need to take you alive will stop me from incapacitating you physically with Sougyo's blade."

He raised his zanpakutou as if to emphasise his point, and the shadow leapt back, stretching his snake-like arms upwards to grab hold of a tree branch and swinging his body up towards the shelter of a heavy bough of thick wood and leaves. Juushirou had pre-empted him, however, for a glittering white bolt of Byakurai seared through the chill morning air, slicing through the branch in a similar way to the ones the shadow himself had cut down only moments earlier. As the stranger lost his grasp, a thin weave of gold energy darted out from the tips of Juushirou's sword hand, wrapping itself around the cloaked figure's torso and looping itself determinedly through his arms and legs, binding them together until he fell to the ground, unable to do more than wriggle helplessly against the tightness of the bonds.

"I did try to warn you," Juushirou sighed, sheathing his sword and moving to stand over his captive, gazing down at the golden eyes that sparked up at him with hate and anger. "It would've been easier if you'd surrendered, but somehow I didn't think you'd do that.

Onmitsukidou are trained not to submit to anyone, aren't they? Death first, captivity last — isn't that right?"

The man's lips pressed firmly together, an unpleasant expression crossing his odd features, but he did not speak, and Juushirou nudged the Hainawa rope tentatively with his foot, nodding in satisfaction as he realised it was strong enough to hold for the time being.

"Tsunemori," he turned to his subordinate, who stepped forward, glancing at his Captain quizzically.

"For now, the Hainawa will keep him quiet, but I'd like you to keep a watch over him, just in case. The slightest movement, I want you to use binding kidou — as strong as you need to to hold him, understand?"

"Yes, sir," Tsunemori's gaze burned with curiosity, but he nodded his head, obediently settling himself down on the ground a short distance from the prisoner. "What will you do, sir? Are we not taking this prisoner back to camp?"

"We will, but I want to be sure there aren't any accomplices lurking in the shadows," Juushirou replied. "Kirio, you come with me. Tsunemori should be more than enough for one bound rebel — and we'll cover more ground together."

"Yes, sir," Kirio nodded immediately, hurrying to her Captain's side. With a glance behind them, Juushirou turned towards the forest at large, gesturing for her to follow him into the thicket of trees that lay beyond, and Kirio did so, skipping over the fallen, singed remains of the branches that marked the scene of the confrontation.

"Taichou, that man... who was he?" Once out of earshot, the young shinigami voiced her question, and Juushirou grimaced, rubbing his temples.

"That will be a matter for Second Division to determine," he said at length. "We'll get him safely back there and hand him over to Kai as soon as we can... I'd rather let them handle the investigation if possible."

"You said... did you say... he was an Onmitsukidou?" Kirio asked, and Juushirou shrugged.

"That's a difficult question to answer," he admitted unwillingly. "I'd rather you didn't go back to Seireitei and begin discussing this idea with all and sundry, if you don't mind. His identity isn't yet confirmed... and it's not for us to speculate."

“I wouldn’t say anything, not if Taichou told me not to,” Kirio said frankly, “and nor will Tsukabishi-san, but we were both there and well, you said some odd things. It was like... you knew all about him, even though I don’t understand how you could. His arms... they bent right out of their sockets, and...”

She shivered involuntarily.

“Something about him seemed off,” she admitted. “Something creepy. When he said that the person you were hunting was dead, I felt like... maybe he was a dead man, standing there in the forest before us, even though I know that’s not possible. He... isn’t a ghost, is he? He’s not...”

“Don’t be foolish,” despite himself, Juushirou grinned, sending her a sidelong glance and receiving her sheepish one in return. “You know that there are no ghosts in Soul Society, and in the Real World there are only Plus souls which sometimes a spiritually attuned human misidentifies as something else. What we fought then was not a dead man — though I agree, he had an unpleasant aura, make no mistake. You’re not wrong, either — I was looking for a specific individual, and that individual was, indeed, once an Onmitsukidou. More than that, though, I can’t say. Suffice it to say that the person I think he is was meant to have died ten years ago, but there’s some doubts as to whether that was the case.”

“Well, if he wasn’t dead... what was he?” Kirio murmured. “I never saw... anyone do the things he did with his body.”

“Suzuki Naoto had certain abilities relating to camouflage and concealment,” Juushirou reflected absently. “You’re right, though, what we saw was beyond the normal realm of explanation. Still... he was in his own mind. I admit... in that respect, he wasn’t quite what I expected to find.”

“Taichou?”

“Never mind,” Juushirou patted her lightly on the shoulder. “Leave him to Tsunemori, now he’s tied down, and focus your reiatsu on picking up other signals, all right? I don’t know of any accomplices, but then I don’t not know of any, either. A creature like that raises more questions than answers, and it’s better to be thorough.”

“Yes, sir,” Kirio reddened, nodding her head. “I’m sorry, I’ll concentrate.”

“He said some offensive things, didn’t he?” Juushirou looked sympathetic, and Kirio grimaced.

“People do, sometimes, but the way he said them was what I hated most of all,” she admitted. “I don’t think he was a Clan person, either... which is what made it even worse. If it’s a Clan person who’s been miseducated, well, that can be fixed. It has been fixed, in fact, numerous times since I went to the Academy and since people like Tenichi-kun were able to transfer into Seventh without creating a revolt. But... to hear it from someone who’s probably as District as you or I are, sir... that rankled a lot. It’s as if he thought that he... was superior to all other District people, and that we... we were just...”

“Gotei slaves, perhaps?” Juushirou mused. “Yes, I felt it that way, too. Well, I suppose that’s one opinion, isn’t it? The Gotei are originally a Clan institution — we can’t escape from the thought that some District people might believe us to be Clan whipping boys who have betrayed our roots in search of power and status.”

“But that’s...”

“You and I know it’s not true, but the whole world isn’t within Inner Seireitei, nor the Academy,” Juushirou chided gently. “It’s hard to accept, I know, but I’m sure there are District people who hate us even more than the Clan elite who struggle to accept us.”

He smiled ruefully.

“Nobody ever said this life would be an easy one,” he concluded contemplatively, “but that’s what makes it important, all the same. Keep that in mind, Kirio — no matter how much of a family Thirteenth Division might be, it doesn’t mean that all of the Districts think the way we do.”

“Do you think there are people in the Districts with spirit power who would try to work against us, then?” Kirio looked hesitant. “People like that person we just caught... people who resent us?”

“I think we’d be foolish to rule it out,” Juushirou said honestly. “For now, though, the coast here looks clear, which makes me glad. Let’s go back to Tsunemori and take our prisoner back to base. I’ll be happiest when he’s in Kai’s hands and out of ours — captive interrogation isn’t my speciality and I’d rather not be involved in it if at all possible.”

“Yes, sir,” Kirio looked relieved, nodding her head. “Maybe at least, if Second Division can find out something from him, we’ll know what kind of people he’s working with and whether he was involved in Tenichi-kun’s abduction.”

“You made that connection too, huh?” As they made their way back to Tsunemori, Juushirou cast his companion a keen glance, and Kirio nodded.

“Someone took him right in front of our eyes, pretty much,” she said frankly, “and that someone had the power to hide even from the Gotei’s senior figures. Someone like that... that shadow... I think he could do it.”

“Well, perhaps Tenichi himself will be able to clear up that mystery, too.” Juushirou reflected. “For now, mission accomplished. Perhaps in this regard we’re one step closer to putting a stop to these random abductions.”

There was no report yet.

Hirata paced across his office, pausing momentarily to gaze out of the window of his barracks at the empty courtyard outside. Kikyue had left with her patrol some time earlier, and he had quickly readied and dispatched Souja’s usual squad unit, keeping only a skeleton team of shinigami at Seventh’s base in case of urgent need. He had done everything he could think of doing, and now all there was to do was wait. Much as he longed to head out into the field himself, he knew that if he were to let his heart rule his head, he would cause further panic to spread through his division, and the shackles of leadership had made him curse and rail under his breath more than once since he had secluded himself in his administrative haven, wearing a hole in the tatami mat floor with his restlessness.

It was not like Souja to disappear without any form of communication, but even the straggling residue of a Hell Butterfly had not made it to the Seventh Division’s gates and, when he had sent officers to inspect his eldest child’s quarters, they had been neat and tidy, as though they had not been touched since the previous day. You went somewhere, and didn’t come back, and somehow we managed not to notice.

Hirata’s eyes narrowed behind his glasses, the predatorial spirit surging up within him as he considered this.

I didn’t notice your absence. Well, why would I have? You often work late, and conduct patrols into the night hours. Why would this be considered different? You’ve never taken decisions into your own hands, not before, and...

He faltered, clenching his fists together as he remembered their conversation not so very many days before.

That day, you would have defied me. You wanted my consent, but if I’d not given it, you would have gone to Joumei anyway. Is that what's happened now? Did you go to meet him...? Is that where you are... but why would you not at least send me some kind of communication?

"You could cut the air in this place with a knife."

A voice from the doorway made him jump, swinging around to meet the concerned brown eyes of his former classmate, pink haori billowing around his shoulders and his long wavy dark hair tied in its usual lazy tail behind his head. "What's this about, Hirata-kun? I got your message — cryptic as it was — and I come here to find that half the division's missing and those that are here are scuttling around as if afraid you might swoop down and eat them at a moment's notice. What's happened?"

"Considering you live next door, you took your time," Hirata muttered, turning back towards the window, and Shunsui tut-tutted, moving to stand beside his friend.

"You really need to work on your manners," he scolded. "Last time you couldn't wait to be rid of me, this time I'm not here fast enough — it's enough to make someone stop coming to call, if this is the kind of welcome you lay out."

"This isn't a joke, Shunsui!" Hirata snapped, wheeling on his companion, and Shunsui caught sight of the expression in his friend's eyes, his own gaze becoming sombre.

"Something serious has happened, hasn't it?" he asked softly, and Hirata shrugged, helplessness in his gesture.

"I wish I knew," he said frustratedly. "What about Juushirou? I sent to Thirteenth as well — is he coming too?"

"I haven't been by there, but I think he was on another errand last night — not sure what time he got back, if he did, yet." Shunsui admitted. "I came as soon as Sora let me go, but I can't speak for another division. In his absence, though, if it's urgent, can I do anything?"

"I don't know," Hirata admitted. "Shunsui, tell me — have you happened to see Souja at all since yesterday?"

"Souja?" Shock glittered across Shunsui's dark eyes, and he shook his head. "No, I haven't. Wait... don't tell me that he's... like Tenichi..."

"Like I said, I don't know!" It was all Hirata could do to keep his voice from rising and, at the tremor in his tones, Shunsui rested a gentle hand on his shoulder.

"I'm sorry," he said contritely. "If I'd realised... I would've saved the annoying guest routine for later. When did he go missing?"

"I last saw him at breakfast yesterday," Hirata murmured. "I didn't join the squad for lunch, but I think he was there then, overseeing the mess hall. Then he had some errands of his own... and... nobody saw him around curfew or since. This morning, his room hasn't been slept in. I sent Kikyue out to scout for signs, but I've heard nothing from the patrol yet. I've spared as many men as possible to look, but if it's like Tenichi, I don't even know where to begin."

"I see," Shunsui scratched his chin, leaning up against one of the firm stone pillars that acted as a support for the bamboo panel walls. "There's not a chance he went off after some whim of his own and hasn't come back yet?"

"It's not in his character to defy me or slip around behind my back," Hirata responded wearily, "but in this case, I can't rule it out. We had one conversation recently when we disagreed... he came to me for consent, and I was reluctant to give it. In the end, I gave in — but he showed every indication of going against my wishes if need be. It was the night he went to fetch Tenichi... the night he went to meet with the Kitsune."

"Those foxes again, huh," Shunsui's eyes narrowed. "You trust them, though, not to hurt your son?"

"I trust them," Hirata nodded. "It's not for sure, though, that their location is secure or that they won't be attacked. If he did go there, and something was to go after them... he'd feel the need to become involved. He's far too soft-hearted for an Endou, sometimes, my son... it's his weakness, and it's easily played to."

"It might be that he just decided to pass the night there and is coming back to face your anger now," Shunsui suggested, and Hirata shrugged.

"Maybe, but I think he'd send me some kind of notice to let me know," he replied. "A Hell Butterfly, or some such thing."

"In order to make you over the worst of your angry outburst by the time he returns? I suppose that makes sense, given the atmosphere in this chamber," Shunsui sighed, rubbing his temples. "All right. Is there anything Eighth can do in the meantime? Send out patrols of our own — or do you want to keep this discreet?"

"I want to find my son," Hirata said flatly. "That's my priority —

I'm not concerned with anything else."

"Did you send a message to these Kitsune of yours, then?"

"Mm..." Hirata hesitated, then, slowly, he shook his head.

"If you think that's where he went, why not?" Shunsui was startled. "Surely that would be the first thing to do?"

Hirata didn't answer, and Shunsui sighed.

"I see," he murmured. "You're protecting them, too. Your position demands it — that's the nature of the arrangement you have with them, isn't it?"

"Yes," Hirata's response was no more than a whisper.

"So much so that you would risk your only son's life to keep that vow?"

"If I can't keep the promises I made as Head of the Clan — whether they were ones I made openly at the Endou court or ones I did not, I have no right to call myself Clan Leader," Hirata said grimly. "My family aren't like yours, and besides, like I told you before, there are still warrants out for members of those fallen clans. If it were to be discovered by the Urahara that we were shielding them and had done so continuously knowing what their alleged crimes were... it could at the very least provoke difficult diplomatic relations with District Three. Father's been negotiating certain trade agreements with Nagesu-sama's people for a while now on my request — a reestablishment of old trade links that were broken by Grandfather and allowed to fester."

"But Souja..?"

"He knows not to go there. I told him I didn't want him to," Hirata replied bleakly. "I let him go the last time only because he pointed out to me that retrieving Tenichi was his duty to Seventh Division and there was no other clear way to get my officer brought back here. This time, though, if that's what he's done... he's gone without a word to anyone. He's never done that before... and it makes me fear the worst."

"So either he slipped out without asking you first, knowing you'd refuse him, or he's met with some unknown calamity and it's prevented him from coming back," Shunsui ran his fingers absently through his messy hair. "Right, well, the first is the better option, even if it means you have to discipline him in classic Endou style when he finally shows his face. Meantime, though, there must be another way to get a message to these foxes of yours without creating suspicion around the barracks. If you can't send a Hell Butterfly, can I send one on your behalf?"

"I can't tell you where they are."

"Juushirou, then, when he returns?"

"Even he doesn't know precisely where to find them."

"Then what other options are open to us?" Shunsui looked helpless. "You've sent Kikyue and the others — you'll have to rely on them."

"Mm," Hirata's face became sombre, and he nodded.

"Waiting is a Captain's duty, but it's one I've grown to hate," he murmured. "Maybe that's the real reason I called you here... pathetic it might be, but I didn't like the thought of waiting on my own."

"I see," Shunsui's expression softened. "Well, if that's the case, I'll stick around, at least till the kid returns. And, speaking of returns, I think the cavalry just arrived. Juu's here — I guess he's come back from his trip to the back of beyond."

"Taichou, Ukitake-taichou has come!" The reedy voice of one of the Seventh Division recruits came piping through the door at that moment to confirm Shunsui's words, effectively preventing Hirata from making any kind of morose comment. Instead he sighed, turning his head towards the divide.

"Show him in," he raised his voice, weariness in his tones, "then return to your post. Report to me if anything new arises."

"Yes, sir!" the recruit responded quickly, half from eagerness, half from fear, and there was the sound of padding footsteps along the matted corridor before the door slid back to reveal the white-haired Captain of the thirteenth, the edges of his haori smudged with dirt and a tired look in his hazel eyes. He stifled a yawn, stepping into the chamber and pulling the divide shut behind him.

"You haven't slept, yet, have you?" Shunsui asked sharply, and Juushirou shook his head, running his fingers through his lank white hair and fumbling at his obi for a fresh tie to fasten it back.

"Just got back to find Hirata's message waiting for me," he admitted, turning a concerned gaze on his younger friend. "Naoko said it sounded urgent, so I came at once. What's happened? Why is Seventh so quiet — what's going on?"

"Souja is missing," Shunsui answered succinctly, as Hirata struggled to put the words together into a coherent sentence, and Juushirou's eyes widened with alarm.

"Missing?" he echoed. "How? Why? Since when? Hirata, what are you doing about it?"

"Kikyue's taken men and gone to search," Hirata said slowly, as his friend crossed the room towards him. "More than that I don't know. He's not here, and there's been no word... he didn't sleep here last night. That's all."

"Hirata thinks he might've gone off chasing foxes on his own whim," Shunsui added darkly. "He hasn't sent a message there, though, because he's afraid of the wider ramifications. I don't suppose you saw or heard anything of any use on your travels?"

"Mm," Juushirou's eyes narrowed slightly, and he shrugged his shoulders. "Not about Souja, and I'm sorry to delay my arrival here by so much, Hirata, I really didn't know that you were waiting for me. Kirio and Tsunemori and I went out to snare a shadow and we succeeded — he's currently enjoying Thirteenth penal hospitality and I left Enishi and Naoko to deal with the proper procedures."

"A shadow?" Shunsui chewed on his lip. "Let me guess — Kai's missing Onmitsukidou?"

"My best guess, yes — though I can't be totally sure," Juushirou admitted, stifling another yawn. "He wasn't quite like I expected, to be honest. I'm not sure if I should be glad or otherwise. We were expecting a dancing corpse — a puppet of some kind, maybe even of the scale of Onoe Tomoyuki, but this was... a strange individual fighting on his own impulses. He came after us and had plenty to say, particularly unpleasant things about District shinigami that got Kirio and Tsunemori both hot under the collar. We snared him, though — and I plan on sending him to Second so that Kai can decide for himself whether this is or isn't the missing Suzuki Naoto. Either way, the person we caught knows who Suzuki is, and that he's meant to be dead. Those are two facts not widely circulated, so I'd say that it's a pretty good guess he's it."

"Convenient, isn't it," Shunsui said thoughtfully.

"Convenient?" Hirata shot his friend a startled look, and Shunsui nodded.

"This Suzuki disappears for ten years," he agreed, "and then, suddenly, on the night that Hirata's son goes missing, he reappears. More, it sounds like he intended you to find him, Juu. Did you think that maybe he was there to distract you from something else?”

“Something involving Souja?” Hirata’s eyes widened in alarm, and Juushirou sighed.

“I did think it, and we combed the nearby area, but I’d have noticed if Souja’s reiatsu was anywhere around there,” he replied. “It’s not Seventh, there are no Sekkiseki caves on the Second/Third border and we went there to investigate the disappearances of Tenichi and the lower ranking officers. If this shadow-man did take them, he wasn’t involved in doing so tonight — meaning that if he was involved in that, and he was a decoy... he probably has accomplices who are operating elsewhere.”

“Such as in the area where the Kitsune are,” Shunsui shot Hirata a meaningful look. “I think you need to tell us where that is, Hirata-chan. Not to undermine your authority or anything, but it sounds possible to me that this Suzuki showed himself, maybe even let himself get caught for the sake of concealing some other happening and, if I’m right, that happening is somewhere in your District. Your son may already be there as the vanguard — I think it’s time you sent in the cavalry.”

“Meaning?” Hirata bristled, but before a dispute could begin, Juushirou put a hand on Hirata’s shoulder.

“I’ll go,” he said softly. “I know Seventh better than Shunsui, and even if I don’t know specifically where the Kitsune are, I have a good idea of the rough direction.”

“You haven’t slept yet,” Shunsui objected. “Not to be a nagging friend, or anything, but I’m sure that nobody wants you to push yourself and get another fever.”

“I’m fine,” Juushirou assured him. “A little tired, that’s all. I didn’t release my sword in the little skirmish earlier and I can always sleep when I get back. I’ll worry about Souja’s whereabouts if I don’t go, and Hirata’s already worried, so it makes sense. He can’t go without risking panicking the remainder of Seventh Division — but I can. I’ll follow the direction of Kikyue’s reiatsu and I’ll see what help I can be in keeping her from the Kitsune whilst tracking down her brother’s location.”

“You don’t mind?” Hirata looked doubtful, and Juushirou shook his head.

“I’ve known Souja almost as long as you have, considering,” he said with a rueful grin. “In the absence of my own kids, Hirata, I have no choice but to foist my fussing on other people's. I'll go, and I'll do what I can. You have my word — I'll do everything in my power to bring your son back home."

"If you're going, then, take someone with you," Shunsui sighed, but nodded, as if resigned to Juushirou's words. "If you're set on going then fine, I won't talk you out of it, but just in case you need it, take someone with you as backup. You don't know what you're going into — and you can always foist a junior off on Kikyue if the situation demands."

"I suppose that's true," Juushirou grimaced. "Not that I imagine there'll be any problem, but it's better to be safe than sorry. I'll go back to Thirteenth and reclaim Tsunemori or Kirio. It'll give them some good experience — and you have my word, Hirata, I won't let either of them near the Kitsune."

"I want to find my son," Hirata said simply. "Besides, the Hikifune girl flits around here sometimes. I sent Tenichi with Kikyue in the hope he'd remember something from his abduction that might help, but although he swore faithfully that he hadn't kept anything from me, I got the feeling it wasn't the whole truth. It was the Kitsune who returned him to us, and Souja almost certainly told Tenichi not to talk about it to anyone, which he's interpreted to mean me as well. I don't know how long that promise will hold out, though, under these conditions — that being the case, take Hikifune, if you can. She's a friend of his, if I'm not mistaken, and ample distraction if you need to make a detour into more restricted space."

"All right," Juushirou inclined his head. "I'll tell Tsunemori to go with the prisoner to Second and report on the details of the mission to Kai. He's conscientious and perfectly capable of defending himself if a problem should arise, so he won't question it. I already charged him with sentry duty once — he'll see it as a continuation of that duty, if I send him to Kai to debrief."

"Thank you," Hirata's eyes flickered slightly with gratitude, and Juushirou squeezed his friend briefly by the shoulders.

"I'll do my best," he said solemnly. "If it's like Tenichi, there may be no obvious clues but... if it's in my power... I'll bring him — and Kikyue — back to Inner Seireitei."

"The water's running dry in the stream again."

Eiraki pushed back the flap of Keitarou's small dwelling, pausing to gaze around the document-cluttered chamber before letting the divide fall back behind her. “Kei-sama, something needs to be done. Kurotsuchi’s brought no new supplies in the last few days, and try as I might to eke things out, it’s getting difficult. Some of the children are getting sick from lack of food, and all I can say is that I don’t know when there’ll next be supplies.”

“I’m sorry,” Keitarou set down his worn brush, offering his wife a weary smile. “It’s my fault, I haven’t been as attentive to those things in light of other information. Tenichi being here created a minor ripple, but you’re right — the people here rely on us and it’s negligent of me to overlook it. I’ll make arrangements as soon as possible — tonight, if I can, you have my word.”

“Thank you,” Eiraki smiled, padding across the dusty floor and pushing aside a couple of old volumes to make space for her to sit down. “I know you have other things to think of, but the people here are important too. We owe them a debt — and I promised that we wouldn’t abandon them.”

“I know, and we won’t,” Keitarou assured her. “I’ve been thinking about a clearer long-term solution to that problem, in fact — one we’ll have to discuss for the logistics between ourselves when the time is right. For now, though, tell me which children are sick? It’s not much, but I have some rice grain and dried seaweed in a chest in storage which hasn’t been opened yet. If you let me know which homes are the worst affected, I’ll send Koku with provisions to them before the sun goes down tonight. It will tide them over — and if it’s water they need, I understand Tenichi cracked open a new spring not far from Kohaku’s hut.”

“The villagers are mostly afraid of going near there,” Eiraki said sadly, “even though there’s water, only a few have braved it.”

“Then perhaps if you gathered it and took it to them, they’d drink it then?” Keitarou suggested. “They trust you more than everyone, and they know you wouldn’t give them something dangerous.”

“I could...” Eiraki paused for a moment, then, “providing you’re sure there is no risk of it being polluted? It’s far enough from the hut, true enough, but...”

“You believe Kohaku is poisoning the water supply?” Keitarou arched an eyebrow, and Eiraki snorted, shaking her head.

“Don’t be foolish, of course not,” she snapped. “What do you take me for? I wasn’t thinking of that or of him. I was thinking of other things kept inside that hut.”

“Such as the sword?” Keitarou’s eyes narrowed, and Eiraki nodded.

“Yes. That.”

“I don’t see that as being a problem,” Keitarou shook his head. “It’s tightly locked away, and besides, most of the village folk don’t know anything about it. Even Sakaki hasn’t been told... and though if the spring was closer to the hut, there might be problems, I think it’s outside the boundary hedge and therefore safe. Things aren’t as dangerous there as they used to be — thanks to Kohaku himself, in fact.”

“Mm,” Eiraki frowned, but made no further comment, and Keitarou reached for his brush once more, then paused, his gaze flitting to the entranceway of the hut.

“How long are you going to lurk in the shadows?” he asked softly, and Eiraki started, staring at her husband in confusion.

“Kei-sama?”

“Katsura, I know you’re there,” Keitarou held up his hand to indicate for his wife to stay silent, his gaze still fixed on the entrance flap of the small hut. “You can’t hide your reiatsu from me so easily — come in and explain yourself.”

For a moment there was nothing, then the flap of the heavy cloth door twitched and parted to reveal an apprehensive figure, tousled head dusty and unkempt as he came reluctantly into the chamber.

“Katsu-kun!” Eiraki was on her feet in a moment, but Keitarou moved between mother and son, shaking his head at his wife before turning to face his eldest child full on.

“Well?”

It was one word, dropped calmly and pleasantly into the conversation, but there was a cold glitter in his eyes and Katsura swallowed hard, gazing up at his father in obvious apprehension.

“O... tousama?”

“Edogawa Mitsuki,” Keitarou murmured the six syllables softly, reaching out to rest a hand on the young man’s shoulder. “Report, please.”

“I...”

“Mitsuki-neesama?” Eiraki’s eyes glittered with surprise, and she frowned, moving across the room to her husband’s side and grasping his wrist loosely between her fingers, shooting him a confused glance.

“Kei-nii, what is this about? What did you send Katsura to do — what about Mitsuki-neesama?”

“Nee... sama?” Katsura blinked at his mother, clearly floored by this unexpectedly affectionate epithet, and Keitarou’s features twitched into a look of irritation, gently but firmly detaching Eiraki’s hold on his arm before reaching up a long, pale finger to touch her cheek.

“This is business between my son and I, Eiraki-chan,” he said evenly. “Please, I would prefer it if you remained out of it.”

“Since when have I ever been out of anything you’ve been involved in?” indignation sparked in Eiraki’s pale eyes, and she swiped his hand away, putting her hands on her hips. “I’m not your little woman who you can push away into a corner when you think I’m not smart enough to follow your line of thought. I’m an Endou hime and I’m more than capable of understanding every twisted idea that flits through that science-obsessed brain of yours, so don’t think I’m not.”

“Kaa... chan.” Katsura’s eyes could not get any bigger now, his mouth gaping open with shock at the sharp words, and there was a moment of silence, before Keitarou let out a rueful chuckle, running his fingers through his messy sandy hair.

“I apologise,” he said wryly. “I admit, that might have sounded condescending.”

“It did,” Eiraki snapped, her glare that of a predator eying up a particularly obstinate object of prey. “Now, answer my question. When I chose to come with you, marry you and live this life with you, it was on the understanding that I’d be as much a part of it as you were, and I have been. I won’t be pushed out of it now, just because you can send our son off into the wilderness to be your legs, your hands and your eyes on your behalf. It doesn’t change the fact that I’m your wife and his mother and I went through far more than either of you will ever understand to ensure both of you lived through that first year we were in Rukongai, so don’t you dare think of pushing me out of the conversation again, understand?”

“Kaa-chan, I think... it’s not... I’m sure that Father...” Katsura, ever the peacemaker, attempted to smooth the situation down, but Eiraki wheeled on him, her eyes narrowing as she took in his shabby appearance.

“And why on earth are you here dressed like that?” she demanded in a low voice, incredulity lacing her tones. “What harebrained scheme have you been playing about in, Katsura? Tell me, because I’m sure your father won't — you've been to Seireitei again, haven't you? More, you've been to that place... where the Shinigami are."

Katsura hesitated, sending Keitarou a hesitant glance, and Keitarou sighed, burying his head in his hands.

"Eiraki-chan, while I understand that you're annoyed at being left in the dark, I would appreciate it if you would let me handle this," he said softly, no note of confrontation or blame in his tones. "I sent Katsura on a particular errand, and until I debrief him, I won't know whether or not he completed it."

"Dressed as a shinigami?" Eiraki arched an eyebrow. "That kind of mission only means one thing — that you've sent him into the heart of danger, where anyone might see him and raise the alarm! Kei-sama, I thought you and I had an agreement about things like that... things that might draw attention to us..."

"Your son was already seen by one of them," Keitarou cut across her, an unpleasant edge in his voice, and Katsura flinched back, hanging his head as he seemingly remembered the position he was in. "In the Spiritless Zone, he left a witness. I sent him to eradicate that witness... but from the timid way he skulked back here, I'm rather inclined to believe he failed to accomplish it."

He shot the unfortunate Katsura a suspicious look, and Katsura bit his lip, not even daring to try and raise his voice.

"He was seen?" Eiraki's face paled with alarm. "A shinigami went back to Seireitei having seen our son's face?"

"Yes, and so that's why..."

"And you sent him back there, where he could've been caught, dissected, or anything?" Eiraki's voice was raising now, and she grabbed Keitarou by the flaps of his worn hakamashita, giving him a little shake. "Sometimes I wonder what kind of a father you are, when you make decisions like that!"

"Okaasama, it's all right! Please... it was... it was my mistake!" Katsura's expression became one of horror, and he hurried to part his mother from his father, meeting her gaze with a beseeching one of his own. "Father was right to be cross with me — I slipped up and I let someone escape. Because of that... it was my mess to fix. That's why he sent me back."

"And the person you were sent to eradicate was Edogawa Mitsuki?" Eiraki asked, and Katsura lowered his head in a miserable nod.

“You didn’t succeed, though, did you?” Keitarou demanded, and, slowly, Katsura shook his head.

“I couldn’t find her,” he murmured. “Seireitei is full of security, and I was frightened of drawing attention to myself. I went to the Fourth, but she wasn’t there. And then... then people started... started making a fuss about sighting a former Onmitsukidou lurking around Seireitei the night Tenichi was abducted, and... I was afraid they might think it was... me. So... before they realised I was there... I left.”

“An Onmitsukidou?” Eiraki’s eyes became slits, and she glared at Keitarou accusingly. “It seems as though your pet corpse was a little more careless than usual. Sounds to me as though they’re more interested in Kurotsuchi than they are in our son — that is, if we believe they cared anything for his existence in the first place.”

“Kurotsuchi reported to me quite faithfully that he had overheard Gotei agents discussing Edogawa Mitsuki’s direct testimony from the Spiritless Zone,” Keitarou began patiently, but Eiraki snorted, shaking her head.

“A ruse — probably a lie — based on Kurotsuchi covering his own back at Katsura’s expense,” she said disparagingly. “What evidence have you other than his account to suggest that anyone is looking for Katsura? Maybe he was seen in the Spiritless Zone — but there are countless lost souls in that place. What makes you think anyone would consider him anything other than just another one? Perhaps Mitsuki-neesama did pick up specific reiatsu from him — it’s not impossible, she’s a sensitive healer. But even if she did, don’t you think sending our boy into enemy territory would be a confirmation of those suspicions, rather than a way of extinguishing them? Worse, killing a shinigami in their own territory — Kei-sama, are you trying to get Katsura killed?”

Keitarou’s brow creased, and he pursed his lips, considering his wife’s words carefully.

“Kurotsuchi is not a pleasant individual, but I believe what he told me,” he said quietly. “Katsura, also, is well aware that he was seen and he kept this information from me when first he reported back. However, there is also reason in what you say. Whilst I believe Kurotsuchi reported to me correctly, if someone saw him lurking around Seireitei and recognised him, it’s more than possible that the Gotei’s attention would swing towards him rather than a person with unknown characteristics about whom they can trace nothing.”

He shot Katsura a pensive look.

“You’re lucky your mother is so fond of you,” he said wearily. “It appears this time you’re off the hook — though I want you to tell me quite clearly what you heard and saw in Inner Seireitei. The clothes you wear belong to a shinigami, correct? Is he dead?”

“Yes, sir,” Katsura’s expression became troubled, but he nodded his head. “I... I kind of... set fire to him. I don’t know how... it just happened when I... was covering the body... but I don’t suppose he’ll be found or recognised quickly. They thought I was a squad shinigami at the gate and didn’t question me... but when... when there was such a fuss, I thought it better to leave. I know you told me not to come home without completing my mission, but... but in the circumstances...”

“So Edogawa Mitsuki still lives,” Keitarou clicked his tongue against the roof of his mouth. “That’s unexpectedly unfortunate. I had hoped to seal the problem of Ukitake Juushirou’s potential interest in us and our activities by dealing him a hefty emotional blow, but I suppose I shall have to think along new lines.”

“You shouldn’t conceive of missions like that, anyway,” Eiraki said reprovingly. “If I’d have known you were going to attack Mitsuki-neesama, I’d have spoken up against it.”

“You’d have spoken in defence of a girl who turned on you and probably reported on you back to her superiors the last time you met? A girl who all but threatened you with her healing sword?” Keitarou demanded, and Eiraki sniffed, folding her arms across her chest in a gesture reminiscent of one of Sakaki’s teenage sulks.

“She was kind to me, when nobody else understood,” she said simply. “I killed someone who was family to her, and she didn’t like that. We have different ideas on things — but killing Clan shinigami is difficult and dangerous and we’ve already had enough of the Kuchiki. Or have you forgotten Kuchiki Kinnya and the battle that left you with that limp? You were lucky to survive — and heaven only knows what you did to your body, drinking that potion so that we could escape.”

“I will never forget Kuchiki Kinnya, my dear, of that you have my word,” Keitarou said grimly. “Unfortunately, though, I have no particular way to deal with Clan fossils who retain far too much of their original power. Besides, the matter of Mitsuki appears to be academic. If the Gotei are onto Kurotsuchi, I must think of a different plan of action.”

“Does that mean... I don’t have to go back?” Katsura asked hesitantly, and Keitarou sighed.

“You are a stupidly lucky individual,” he said tiredly. “Your mother spoils you far too much, but I suppose in this instance there is reason to her argument, too. No, you need not go back. You can consider the matter shelved — for now.”

He cast Eiraki a questioning look.

“I wouldn’t know where that worm is,” Eiraki said expressively. “Here, there, six feet below the ground — it’s all the same to me. As for Koku...” she shrugged, “he’s never been the sociable kind, and he doesn’t generally come seeking my company. He’s probably in his shelter or by the river — those seem to be his favourite haunts.”

“He... hasn’t been so well, lately,” Katsura hazarded, and Keitarou rubbed his temples.

“You stay out of that,” he said frankly. “I might have let you off this particular task, but I’m still not entirely pleased with you. Instead of fussing over Koku, who does his duty and does it properly, I suggest you re-examine your position as my eldest son and work out how you can best become worthy of that position. I need you to be one hundred percent committed to this family and this project, Katsura — if that’s not the case, I don’t think you need me to spell out what the end result will be, for us and for you.”

“The boy understands, Kei-sama,” Eiraki put a reassuring hand on Katsura’s shoulder, shooting her husband a look. “He’s still young, and he’s been brought up in this godforsaken place. You can’t expect him to anticipate all the dangers we grew up with when to him visiting Seireitei is like a day at the park.”

“Maybe,” Keitarou acknowledged reluctantly, “but loopholes can sometimes become big enough for someone to fall through — as well you know. If... and it’s a slim chance, but if Kurotsuchi were to be connected back to here... if that were to happen... then it would become a serious situation for you and your waifs and strays just as much as it would be for us. We protect them, don’t forget... and...”

“Papa! Papa!”

Before Keitarou could finish his sentence, the flap of the hut was torn back to reveal a breathless Sakaki, her eyes wild and her cheeks stained with the traces of tears. At the sight of her, Keitarou stopped dead, staring at her in dismay, and she flung herself on him, hugging him tightly in an uncharacteristically frightened gesture of daughterly affection.

“Sakaki-chan?” Keitarou gently disentangled her grasp, gazing down at her with concerned eyes. “What’s wrong... what’s happened? This isn’t like you — what’s got you so upset?”

“She’s been fighting,” Katsura wrinkled up his nose, pulling a graphic face. “I can smell the blood on her from here, Otousama. Whatever it is, she’s been bleeding her blade on something or someone.”

“So I see,” Keitarou took Sakaki’s blood-splattered fingers gently in his, running his own worn hands over them before casting his youngest a quizzical look. “Sakaki-chan? Can you tell us what’s happened?”

“A shinigami, in the forest,” Sakaki swallowed hard, meeting her father’s gaze with a frightened, half-defiant look. “I killed him. I killed him, Papa. I had to kill him, didn’t I? That was what I was supposed to do, wasn’t it? It wasn’t like he was... he wasn’t that shinigami who was here before. He was a bad shinigami..he wanted to find you... hurt you...”

“A shinigami came here?” Keitarou’s gaze immediately shifted to Katsura, who put up his hands hurriedly in a gesture of surrender.

“I don’t know anything about it!” he protested. “I swear, Otousama, I didn’t bring anyone back with me! I just came... if there was a shinigami, it wasn’t... I didn’t...”

“He didn’t say anything about Katsu-nii,” Sakaki sniffed, shaking her head. “I don’t know why he was here, except he came l... looking for you, Papa.”

“I see.” Keitarou’s expression became grim. “Sakaki, have you seen Kurotsuchi at all of late?”

“No, sir,” Sakaki shook her head, looking confused. “I told you, he didn’t come about Kurotsuchi. He came... he came...”

“All right, I understand,” Keitarou rested a hand on her head, glancing at his wife, whose lips thinned in consternation. “Perhaps your fears were more grounded than I realised, Eiraki-chan. I apologise. If someone has already made a connection between a lost Onmitsukidou and the possibility of our being in Rukongai...”

“Maybe it was the Kotetsu boy,” Eiraki muttered. “I told you he shouldn’t have been brought back here.”

“I should have killed him when I had the chance,” Sakaki agreed tearfully. “I should have, but then Koku stopped me... and... and...”

Koku! Papa, Koku... he... he..."

"Koku?" Keitarou stared at the young girl in apprehension. "What about Koku, Sakaki? I know he stopped you from killing Tenichi — but... there's something else?"

"He attacked me, Papa!" fresh tears glittered on Sakaki's lashes. "He came at me and threatened me and talked a... about k... killing me, and I... I..."

"What did you do to Koku?" Suddenly Keitarou's tone had changed, grasping his daughter tightly by the shoulders and fixing her with an urgent look. "Tell me — what did you... with your blade... did you hurt him? Tell me the truth... what did you do to him?"

"Nothing!" Sakaki's expression became one of confusion and distress, and she shook her head, struggling to pull herself free of his hold. "Papa, stop it! Why are you cross with me? I didn't do anything wrong! It wasn't me! I killed the shinigami! It was Koku... Koku tried to stop me killing him. Koku drew a sword on me... and he said he... he ought to kill me... and he..."

"Koku..." Katsura's eyes clouded with consternation. "Sakaki, why would he attack you? Koku doesn't like violence, and he doesn't believe in fighting. Why would he do something like that?"

"I don't know!" Sakaki snapped back defiantly, wiping away her tears with the ragged hem of a bloody sleeve. "All I know is that he... he wasn't normal. He did things... the whole world seemed to go funny, and I... I couldn't fight back against him. All I did was kill a shinigami who invaded our territory, which was the right thing, wasn't it? But he came down on me like I'd done something awful, and the things he said... he wasn't normal. He wasn't normal!"

She buried her head in Keitarou's shoulder, and the scientist frowned, casting Katsura a glance.

"Go find Koku," he said softly. "Kurotsuchi too, if you can. Send them back to me at once. I'll hear this from them first-hand. First, though, there's the matter of the shinigami to deal with. If Sakaki did kill an intruder, we need to dispose of the body properly, before it's traced back here."

"I did, Papa," Sakaki raised her gaze at this, and Keitarou nodded.

"Can you take Katsura back to the scene and help him get rid of the evidence?" he asked softly, his tone still strained but more gentle than it had been moments before. Sakaki jerked her head into a hesitant nod, and Keitarou sighed.

“Koku won’t attack you again,” he promised. “Katsura will make sure of it — won’t you, Katsura?”

“Yes, sir,” Katsura’s expression was grave. “Come on, Saki-chan. Show me where you went, and we’ll fix the place up so nobody can find him.”

He held out a hand to his sister, who took it hesitantly, and Keitarou watched the siblings leave the small hut, the fabric flap falling folornly back behind them as if forming a divide between parent and child.

There was a long silence, then Eiraki spoke.

“Kei-sama, about Koku...”

“I know,” Keitarou pressed his lips together in displeasure. “I know, and I hope it’s not the case. I’ll deal with it though... so try not to worry.”

“Mm...” Eiraki frowned, “and the other thing? If a shinigami did come back here... what then?”

“If they did... I don’t think it was Tenichi who sent them.” Keitarou shook his head. “If he’d been inclined to betray us, it would’ve happened sooner... no, this is something else at work. Perhaps it’s to do with Kurotsuchi — now I think on it, it’s been several days together since I set eyes on him, and that’s unusual. Maybe he’s got himself into trouble somewhere, and perhaps this is the result. More likely, though...”

He rubbed his chin, then,

“You remember our conversation about the Kitsune?” he asked quietly. Eiraki started, then nodded, her eyes clouding.

“You think this relates to them?”

“I worry that it does, yes,” Keitarou admitted. “I may have taken a bigger risk than I thought, taking Tenichi back personally. I needed to establish the whereabouts of these people for myself — but maybe it allowed them to establish some awareness of me at the same time. Perhaps it runs in the family, Eiraki-chan — I’ve been chastising Katsura for being seen when perhaps there’s blame closer to home. If that’s the case, and a shinigami was sent here after us... his lack of return will soon spark further investigations. In which case...”

“We’re all in danger, aren’t we?” Eiraki’s voice was fearful. Keitarou rested his hands on his wife’s shoulders, gazing at her for a moment, then shaking his head.

“On the contrary, this could be seen as a positive situation,” he reflected. “I had been thinking along these lines already, but in light of the circumstances I think it better to act on them right away, especially if supplies are becoming problematic amongst your Rukon strays. There are no longer Shinigami spirits flitting around the Spiritless Zone, and if they’re hunting shadows, they won’t be paying it any particular attention. They’ve doubtless combed the entirety of that land for any sign of the killers of their shinigami, but to no avail. Since they’ve searched it, though, it’s the one place they won’t think to look for us, right under their noses in their own sacred space. There’s nowhere safer in the whole of Soul Society — and the resources there are far better than the ones here.”

“Meaning...” Eiraki’s eyes became huge, and Keitarou nodded.

“If Kurotsuchi’s in trouble, he’ll have to take care of himself,” he said matter-of-factly. “I don’t expect him to break his discipline and talk, even if he were to be captured — but he can’t leak what he doesn’t know. That being the case, you should gather the villagers together and explain that we’re relocating. When Katsura and Sakaki come back, I’ll deal with Koku and we’ll make preparations to move. Now there are no shinigami watching it, breaking the barrier should be easy. We’ll move into the Spiritless Zone, and we’ll coopt the people there to our cause, since the shinigami obviously can’t protect them any more. No, perhaps in the long run, this will prove a positive step.”

“Then you’ll stop picking on Katsura?” Eiraki demanded. “You’re just as much of an idiot as he was, so you’ll leave him alone?”

“I promise,” Keitarou kissed her gently on the forehead, offering her a smile. “He’s my son, too, don’t forget. I’m fond of him, even if he can be slow off the mark and naive at times. Since no harm seems to have come of his exploits, we’ll let it alone and move on.”

“And Koku?”

“Mm,” Keitarou’s eyes became clouded, and his gaze drifted towards the door.

“I’ll see what he has to say for himself,” he said at length. “That’s all I can do. Given his origins, given everything... I’ve done my best, but maybe it’s not been enough. I can’t work miracles, Eiraki, even though sometimes I try.”

He shrugged.

“I’ll talk to him, find out his side, and we’ll go from there,” he added. "Katsura's not wrong when he says the lad's not been well of late — perhaps that's all it is, and if so, maybe I can do something about it. If not... if not..."

He shook his head.

"Enough of this," he said firmly, holding up his hands. "First things first. We need to gather up everyone and everything and prepare to lay waste to this village before we move out. There must be no trace left that we were ever here, whether spiritual or physical, and that'll take some effort, so we might as well begin now. I'm going to Kohaku's hut. If the Gotei come here, there are things they must not get their hands on, starting with the contents of that place!"

There was a chill wind whistling through the trees of the forest as Kikyue and her patrol crossed through the provinces of Seventh District, barely pausing to acknowledge the few stray residents who had risen early for market. As they crossed the central river, however, into the land beyond, Kikyue called them to a halt, turning her attention on Tenichi who stood silent to one side. He was tense, his eyes strained and his features pale, yet as she beckoned to him to come forward, he did so, lowering his head more from habit than from genuine acknowledgement of her status. In the circumstances, though, Kikyue barely even noticed, fixing him with a penetrating stare instead.

"We've come this far, but we need to go further," she said softly. "Tenichi, you must remember more from the night Anie brought you back. You didn't use shunpo, I know, because you were still cuffed, weren't you? Maybe it was Anie who knew the route, but you must remember... something."

"A dense forest with lots of trees," Tenichi said slowly. "That's really all I remember clearly, Kikyue-dono. We went through trees for what seemed like forever. Then we came to the outskirts of a village, crossed this bridge... and headed back towards Seireitei."

"Forest, huh," Kikyue fought to keep the frustration out of her voice, lifting her hand to gesture at the landscape before them. "There's nothing but trees for a good few ri in that direction — are you telling me that the place Anie came to get you was somewhere inside all of that?"

"Yes, ma'am," Tenichi lowered his head again, looking apologetic. "I'm sorry. This part of Seventh District... I don't know very well at all."

“I thought you grew up here?” Nakata demanded, giving him a nudge. “Surely you remember more than that — you’re a District kid, you must know District land?”

“I grew up mostly in District Eight,” Tenichi shook his head. “We were refugees, my mother and brother and I, and we left Seventh when I was eight years old. A lot has changed since then, and I wasn’t part of Seventh Division when it was still based within the Clan lands. I’m sorry, Nakata-san. I might be able to tell you more clearly if it was in the area of my old village — but all I know is that it was not. It was a dense forest, all right, but... not the same one.”

“Then we’ll have to split and search the old-fashioned way,” Kikyue decided with a sigh. She turned to the patrol, raising her hand above her head and spreading her fingers to indicate her command. Immediately the group of shinigami saluted, dividing automatically into familiar groups of three and four that they operated in during training sessions, and one by one they melted into the forest, none of them wanting to hesitate and risk the sharp edge of Kikyue’s tongue on a day like today. Only Tenichi and Nakata remained, Tenichi uncertain and Nakata troubled, and Kikyue glanced between the two of them with a frown.

“You two are coming with me,” she said matter-of-factly. “Nakata, your family has land in these parts too, I think — or not far beyond the rise. Maybe you’ll recognise a useful landmark that’ll jog Tenichi’s memory. And you...” she swiped fingers against the sleeve of Tenichi’s hakamashita, “I want close by at all times. If you see even the smallest thing that looks like something you saw that night, then I want...”

Her words cut off mid sentence as, from somewhere in the surrounding area a rush of strange, disjointed spirit power surged across her senses, sending her momentarily out of her train of thought. A quick glance at her companions told her that they had sensed it too, and as she hurriedly gathered her wits, she realised what the sensation had most likely been.

“A Senkaimon!” It was Nakata who put the thought into words, grabbing Tenichi by the arm and gesturing towards the west. “You felt it too, right, Kotetsu? A Senkaimon, from over there. Do you remember anything about a gate... wasn’t it one of those through which you were first snatched?”

“I was taken through a gate in Inner Seireitei, outside of Twelfth Division,” Tenichi’s voice trembled, his eyes huge as they gazed out across the forest. “It wasn’t here... I don’t... surely there isn’t...”

“There isn’t a Senkaimon that I know of in that direction, but nonetheless, that’s what it felt like,” Kikyue shivered involuntarily, wrapping her arms around her slender body. “It’s more than possible if you were taken that way, then whoever it was dumped you back in the same manner, even if you don’t remember. It would explain why you suddenly showed up in a remote part of Seventh that doesn’t look like it’s been inhabited for over a century.”

“In which case, we should investigate, shouldn’t we?” Nakata cast his leader a quizzical glance, and Kikyue nodded, opening her lips to answer him, but as she did so, she felt a second rush of spiritual energy and she let out a little gasp, her fingers going to the hilt of her sword.

“Aniue’s reiatsu!” she exclaimed. “Follow me! Follow me, both of you! Aniue’s there, at the gate, I can feel him! Wherever he’s been, that’s where he is now!”

Without waiting to see if her companions obeyed her, she slipped into shunpo, racing through the trees towards the place where she could feel the pulsing presence of Souja’s reiatsu emanating from the heart of the woodland. As she dropped out of her flash-step, kicking, clawing and slashing her way through the thick vines and overhanging branches to reach her target, she could tell that her brother was not alone, but as she pushed back the greenery and stepped into the lush stretch of grassland for the first time, she stopped dead, horror flooding her young gaze as she took in the scene in front of her.

Lying on the ground, his clothing slashed and soaked through with blood was the pale, crumpled form of her beloved older brother, dark hair straggled across the ground like a halo around his head. At his side lay the discarded shape of his zanpakutou, as though the fine, elegant fingers had not been able to keep their hold on it, but despite the obvious severity of Souja’s wounds, it was something else which drove terror and indignation through Kikyue’s heart, raising the hunter’s spirit inside of her.

Bending over Souja, his hand at the Vice Captain’s throat was another individual, shabbily dressed and ragged, apparently oblivious to her appearance on the scene. To Kikyue, it appeared as though this stranger was attempting to kill her brother, and she leapt forward with a scream of rage, swinging her blade down as though to cleave the unwelcome stranger’s body clean in two. Reiatsu bubbled from the tip of her weapon, and at the last minute the stranger turned, alarm in his dark eyes as he raised his hands in a futile attempt to defend himself.

“Ki... ki...” The faint sound of Souja’s calling to her went unheeded, as, in a red rage now, Kikyue swung her sword again, slicing the silver tip savagely through the torso of the young man’s faded garments and through to the flesh and bone beneath. Blood spurted from the wound as the stranger gasped, dropping to the ground and grabbing at his midriff, but Kikyue was not done. All she could see in front of her was someone who had threatened her brother’s life, and that someone she would show no mercy. The soul of the hunting bird screamed through her blade, calling for her to release its power, and her lips parted, ready to shout the command which would release the sleek-winged kestrel from its bonds. On the ground, she was oblivious to the faint twitches of her brother’s fingers, or the strange expression that suddenly glittered in her victim’s eyes, half seeing her and half not as the unforgiving length of polished steel swept down to sever his body once and for all.

Within Kikyue’s heart, the sound of the kestrel’s beating wing span mirrored her heart beat, and the weapon glowed with energy as she bore down, hunter against prey, to strike out the stranger’s life.

27. Crossing Over

Chapter Twenty Six: Crossing Over

“Kikyue!”

As the young Endou shinigami raised her weapon to cast the fatal blow, someone was suddenly beside her, a hand grabbing at her wrist, and forcibly stopping her from moving her sword. Still half-crazed with anger, she struggled against the hold, but whoever it was held her fast, and, as a second arm wrapped itself around her middle, pulling her back from her victim, the first hand slid itself into her fist, removing the sword and setting it down out of her reach. Wrenching herself as much as she could from the firm hold, she swung her gaze around in frustration to meet the sombre, hazel gaze of the Thirteenth Division Captain and, as she read the seriousness in his expression, she felt the grip on her body tighten further.

“Whatever happened here, it’s for the Council to decide, not you and your sword,” he said reproachfully, though she saw his gaze flit momentarily towards the still form of her brother on the ground. “We came to find Souja and we succeeded. Now our job is to help him. Not begin individual battles of our own.”

“But... but that boy... he was...” Kikyue fought against the Captain’s hold, but again, it was to no avail, for though she managed to free her wrist, she was no longer in a position to attack. She had never encountered her father’s friend on the battlefield, but in that moment, she understood why Hirata respected him, for she realised that, no matter how much her hunting spirit screamed out for vengeance and blood, there was nothing she could do to shake Juushirou’s firm determination to hold her back.

“Where are your squad?” He continued to address her in soft tones, as though trying to soothe her, and Kikyue beat her fists frustratedly against his chest like a petulant child who had been deprived of completing some forbidden activity. “Hirata didn’t send you out alone, I know — where are the others?”

“We split to search,” Kikyue sank back against the man who had been an uncle figure to her and Souja growing up, letting out a sigh. “Tenichi and Nakata are behind me. I told them to follow me when we felt the gate open... Juushirou-dono, you felt it too?”

“I did,” Juushirou agreed, “in a place where there ought not be one, which sparked my curiosity. Kirio and I came to help with the search at Hirata’s behest — but it seems that another, more pressing need is upon us now. If I let you go, Kikyue, you must promise me not to try and attack that young man any more.”

“But he was standing over Anieue! He was hurting him! I had to!”

“If that’s true, then he needs to be properly questioned before the right authorities,” Juushirou shook his head, gently loosing his hold on her and getting to his feet. “If he’s guilty of hurting Souja, then we need to know how, why and where the assault took place. We need to know where he came from, and only some answers can be taken from a corpse.”

He moved down beside Souja’s pale body, putting a gentle finger to the man’s throat and, at the contact, Souja coughed, his body twitching slightly as if in acknowledgement of Juushirou’s presence. Juushirou hesitated for a moment, then, very gingerly, as though doing his best not to cause the young man more pain than was necessary, he slipped his arm behind Souja’s trembling shoulders, lifting him up so that it was easier for the Vice Captain to breathe. He mouthed something too quiet for Kikyue to make out, and Juushirou’s eyes clouded over.

“Kikyue, your brother’s conscious,” he murmured. “Come tend to him — I think he knows you’re here, and you can be more comfort to him than I can.”

“Anieue!” Vengeance on the fallen stray forgotten, Kikyue hurried down at her brother’s side, anxious blue eyes focused on his waxy, pale features as she reached out to brush his cheek. His lips were grey, but there was a smear of blood across one side of his mouth, indicating that his coughing had brought up blood from a deep internal injury, and fear raced through her like adrenaline. Only Juushirou’s grave presence prevented her from losing her wits and grabbing hold of his body to examine the severity of his wounds for herself. Even to her uneducated gaze, she could tell they were serious. As a young girl she had learned that skin that pale indicated a heavy loss of blood and for the first time she became aware that the ground where her brother lay was not as saturated with red as were his tattered robes. Was he bleeding inwardly? The smear at his lips suggested so, yet somehow she controlled her racing thoughts, forcing herself to turn her attention back to Souja himself.

Anieue is Anieue. He can't die. We'll get help. The healers will fix him — it will be all right. Endou are strong... Father's always said that. We're not designed to be easy to kill. Anieue will be fine. It just looks bad... surely... there's not enough blood for it to be serious?

"Anieue, can you hear me?" She murmured softly. "Speak... say something... tell us what happened! Tell me what that vagrant did to you — tell me, so I can finish him once and for all!"

"Kikyue, I already told you..."

"Juushirou-dono, if he hurt my brother, the Endou will speak for him before the Council do," Kikyue's eyes would've flashed fire at the Thirteenth Captain if she had not known that within his sleeping sword dwelled a spirit capable of disarming her and rendering her helpless without even the slightest amount of effort. "This is a Clan matter, first and foremost. The Clan will handle it. Father would say so too."

"That's not how the Gotei works," Juushirou shook his head slowly. "Besides, we don't know, yet, what happened here. The District boy is a witness... whether guilty or innocent, we don't yet know, but when you attacked him, he didn't raise a weapon at you."

"Meaning?" Kikyue's gaze burned with frustration, and Juushirou patted her sword hand gently.

"If he'd been armed, he would have tried to fight back," he said softly. "The only sword I see here is your brother's, and it's not blooded. We don't know what happened here. I hope the young lad is still alive — I find it difficult to believe that a District boy could hurt your brother so badly with just his bare hands."

"Ki... ki..."

Before Kikyue could respond, a bloodsoaked hand stretched desperately out to grasp the edges of her hakama, the pale fingers trembling with the effort, yet at the sound of the affectionate nickname, Kikyue faltered, turning her gaze back on her fallen brother. He tugged again, unable to move any more than a few inches from Juushirou's supportive grasp, but that faint, feeble movement had been enough to break the hunter's rage in the young woman's aura and tears glittered on her lashes, grabbing his shaking hand in hers.

"Anieue?"

"Helped... me." Souja's words were faint, and Kikyue could not make out more than the bare syllables, but her face changed colour and she turned, casting a stricken glance at the strange youth.

“He... helped you? The vagrant boy... he helped you?”

Souja shifted his head forward slightly in a feeble but determined nod and, at this, the tension seeped out of Kikyue’s shoulders, a sick, dull feeling flooding through her gut as she realised she had attacked someone who had tried to save her brother, not end his life. The real assailant was still out there, yet in her frustration Kikyue could not pick out any other distinctive reiatsu from Souja’s damaged body, and she turned, casting a distressed look in the direction of the fallen stray.

“I... but I...”

The words stuck in her throat, refusing to form as the true gravity of the situation washed over her, and Juushirou squeezed her sword arm reassuringly.

“Kirio, see to the District boy,” he said softly, raising his head to meet Kirio’s gaze over the top of Kikyue’s despondent shoulders. “What he was doing here and what he knows about Souja-dono’s attack may yet be useful to us, and if nothing else, it seems we owe him reparation.”

“Me, sir?” Kirio, who had lingered uncertainly at the edge of the clearing stepped hesitantly forward, gazing at the crumpled, blooded form of the stranger, then back at her Captain doubtfully. “But I... don’t know any healing spells. I never learned any... even Shikiki hasn’t...”

“You know basic first aid, and it will have to suffice,” Juushirou interrupted her quietly. “Time is of the essence... whatever attacked Souja could still be in the vicinity, and the young lad is our responsibility now. Kikyue, you’d want it that way too, I think?”

He cast his companion a glance, and Kikyue nodded almost automatically, her heart still numb.

“I didn’t mean to...” she whispered, and Juushirou nodded.

“Then we’ll say no more about it,” he said matter of factly. “Kirio, if you please. See if the boy’s alive, and if he is, do what you can to reassure him. Whatever happened, it happened before we got here, and we need to know more. That boy may be the key to it — so do whatever you’re able and keep him alive.”

“You know, I can’t believe that Koku would attack you just like that,”

As they hurried through the twisting pathways and dying scrubland of the Rukongai wasteland, Katsura shot his sister a glance, taking in once more the blood that spattered across her clothing and the strange, unearthly pallor of her features, two bright blue eyes darting apprehensively around her at each and every turn. In their short lives, Katsura had never seen Sakaki properly frightened, yet from the way she scoured the landscape he knew that something had definitely upset her, and his heart lurched in his chest as he contemplated the potential reasons for her behaviour.

“Something must’ve happened, Saki-chan — are you sure you don’t remember anything else?”

“I told you, didn’t I?” Sakaki stopped dead, putting her hands on her hips and sending him a wary, defensive glare. “I found the shinigami, poking around in our business. I fought him. I killed him. Koku appeared and waved a sword at me. I don’t know what happened after, but he told me to go, and dammit, I went. I went straight to Papa and I told him everything — what else is there to remember?”

“I don’t know,” Katsura admitted, his expression frustrated. “I don’t know, but there must be something. Koku doesn’t fight, and doesn’t believe in violence. You said yourself that he stopped you attacking the shinigami Father brought back here, right? So why would he suddenly...”

“He’s betraying us is why,” Sakaki snapped back, indignation bristling across her features at the thought. “He must be, it’s the only thing that makes sense. First he defends that Tenichi person, now this time... he’s working with them! He’s a spy... he’s probably been sent by them, and that’s why... that’s why...”

“That’s not possible, Saki-chan,” Katsura shook his head, taking his companion gently by the arm and leading her forward once again. “Koku comes from Rukongai. He’s not been to Seireitei, not once. Not ever. How could he be a spy, if he’s never left the village?”

“You only have his word for that,” Sakaki said impatiently, pulling her hand free and gesturing to the land up ahead. “In any case, it was around here. He’s not still there, is he? I can’t tell... but I figure you can, since you’re so fond of reading people’s minds all of the time.”

There was a note of bitterness in her voice, and Katsura sighed, resting his hands on her shoulders and meeting her gaze head on.

“I’ve known Koku longer than you,” he said quietly. “We were kids when I first met him. Unless you think he’s been spying on us since he was a tyke, your theory doesn't make sense. Besides, Koku's the one who never wants to go to Seireitei, or the Spiritless Zone, or anywhere else. He doesn't want to get involved in those things — and if he's not going to find out information, what kind of a spy would he make anyway? You're upset so you're jumping to conclusions, but there's no way he's a spy."

"I don't know about that," Sakaki kicked at the ground sullenly. "Katsu-nii, you didn't see how he was... and the way he spoke to me, too. I've never seen him that way, and I'm sure you haven't, either."

She brushed her fingers against her throat, then,

"For a moment he had a blade here. I really thought he would kill me... and I couldn't do a damn thing about it. I don't know what he did — whether it was that spirit power thing that people like you and Father have or some other kind of demonic power, but he wasn't normal. Maybe he was possessed by something — I dunno — but it was me he attacked."

"Did he tell you why?"

"I told you. Because of the shinigami."

"He actually said as much? He took the shinigami's side against you?" Katsura paused, looking confused. Sakaki nodded.

"Koku hates me. I hate him. It's how we've always been," she said frankly. "I never thought he had the guts to attack me, though... I only listened to him over that Tenichi because he threatened to get Papa involved and I knew he would, the little sneak. This time... the shinigami asked specifically about Papa. In that situation, wasn't I right to kill him? If he'd gone back with information about us..."

"Tell me exactly what happened," Katsura said softly. "Everything you remember, what he said, what the shinigami said, everything."

"Does it matter when he's dead?" Sakaki demanded, and Katsura nodded.

"If it explains Koku's behaviour, maybe," he said pensively. "Can you try, anyway? I know it shook you up, but if the shinigami asked specifically about Father, then..."

"He was an Endou," Sakaki said frankly, and Katsura faltered, staring at her in dismay.

"An Endou? As in...?"

"Mother's kin. Yes." Sakaki snorted in contempt. "He was full of it — and when he saw me, he knew I was Mother's child. I look too much like her — I guess he's seen pictures or something, because he drew the line between us right away. He kept asking about Father and stuff, and it was too dangerous just to let him escape. He asked about you, too."

"Me?" Katsura whitened, and Sakaki nodded.

"He wanted to know if I had an older brother about his age," she said derisively. "He thought Koku was it, but I told him that I'd rather die than be related to that idiot. So then he wanted to know about you, but I didn't tell him anything — not about you, or about Father or Mother. He asked about the Spiritless Zone, too, but I wasn't about to let him leave with any information."

"So you think he came here by chance and stumbled onto something about us?" Katsura's heart skipped a beat, and Sakaki nodded.

"Something like that. I think he found the demon's hut, because he was asking a lot of questions," she agreed. "I don't know what a shinigami would feel if he came here, spiritually and so on — but maybe it made him suspicious? I don't know. Just when he asked about Father, there was no way I was going to let him live. I killed him to protect everyone, Katsu-nii — it wasn't wrong to do that."

"Protecting us? No, I guess not," Katsura let out his breath in a rush. "Okay, so he appeared here by coincidence — not because of me, or because of Kurotsuchi, but just by chance and happened to catch on to Father's being here somehow?"

"I think so. Yes," Sakaki agreed. "If he'd known better, he'd have been more prepared. He didn't just give up and die, he tried to beat me — I guess I should expect an Endou to fight — but I got the better of him. Then, just as I was finishing him off, Koku appeared on the scene and..."

She shrugged helplessly.

"It's kinda blurry after that. Whatever Koku did, it made me feel weird."

She grabbed hold of her brother's arm, pulling him towards the clearing where the fight had occurred.

"You spend more time talking to the creep. You should know if he's done anything like that before."

"I've never heard of him attacking anyone... especially not an ally."

Katsura chewed his lip, allowing himself to be dragged between the dead trunks of two splintered trees and into the clearing beyond. “The shinigami said nothing else?”

“Only that he’d seen Koku, and somehow got away from him,” Sakaki shrugged. “Koku knew who he was, though. The shinigami, I mean — his name and everything.”

“I see,” Katsura’s eyes clouded. “All right. More we’re not going to get without talking to the guy himself — though I don’t think he’s still here. I can sense wisps of reiatsu and I know he was here, just as you said, but... not now.”

“Then it’s safe to clear up the corpse,” relief flooded Sakaki’s features and she bounced forward, scouring the grass for a sign of her crumpled prize. As Katsura followed her at a more reluctant pace, he glanced casually around him, focusing his spiritual energy on trying to make contact with the missing Rukongai vagrant.

Koku? Koku, dammit, where are you? Come out and talk to me — tell me what’s happened since Father sent me to Seireitei.

There was no reply, and Katsura’s brow creased as he caught sight of something glinting on the grass. He bent to pick it up, then paused, consternation flooding his expression as he registered what it was.

That sword... why on earth would it be out here like this?

“Katsu-nii, it’s gone!” Sakaki’s cry of dismay alerted him to a fresh problem, and he glanced up, seeing his sister flying towards him, panic and anger on her young face. “The body, it’s gone! It was right here, I swear, but now... there’s just blood and nothing else!”

“Are you sure he was dead?” Katsura’s stomach began to knot up inside of him as he contemplated this, and Sakaki nodded impatiently.

“He was. He was cut to pieces — there’s no way he could’ve survived, let alone run away. I kicked him pretty hard when Koku was here, and he didn’t even flinch.”

“But now he’s gone...” Katsura got to his feet, brushing the dust and dirt from his stolen hakama. “Maybe he wasn’t quite dead. Maybe he recovered consciousness and managed to crawl a few feet away from here. Maybe he got into a shelter nearby — in which case, he’s probably died there. I can’t sense the reiatsu of any living shinigami in the local area, so he’s definitely not about to spring a surprise attack on us.”

“You can tell those things, too?” Sakaki looked surprised, and Katsura nodded, running his fingers absently through the air.

"I can tell there was a confrontation here," he agreed. "I can sense something foreign — and I can sense Koku. I believe you, Sakaki. What you said happened... I believe you."

"You should do anyway. I'm your sister." Sakaki pouted, and Katsura sighed, lowering his hand.

"But Koku's actions, I can't account for," he murmured. "And we need to find the body of your victim. He can't have gone far — can you see any blood trails leading in a particular direction? If he did try to get to shelter, from what you've said, I imagine he couldn't do it without leaving a path of red for us to follow."

"There's nothing like that," Sakaki hopped back to the scene of the crime, bending to touch the blood-stained, bent blades of grass with a tentative finger. "He was here, all curled up and messy, and Koku was here..."

She raised her gaze.

"Koku's taken him somewhere!" she exclaimed. "The idiot, he's taken the shinigami somewhere to try to fix him!"

"Why would he do that?" Katsura looked bewildered. "Even if this shinigami was an Endou, why would Koku care about him living or dying? I would've thought it does him and us no good to have Endou sniffing around here, more than any other shinigami, and it isn't as though he knows any healing tricks that could patch up someone once you'd gutted them. He might not like you killing, but in this instance, I don't see why he would've gotten involved. It doesn't make any sense... and then there's that..."

He glanced back towards the sword, and Sakaki frowned, moving to pick it up.

"This?" She gazed at it, turning it over in her hands, then holding it out to him, and Katsura shook his head.

"I can't touch it," he said quickly. "It's not that kind of sword."

"Really?" Sakaki frowned, casting it a fresh glance as if seeing it anew. "But it's just an ugly old sword, isn't it? I don't get it? It's not as well made as mine, I don't think, and the hilt is oddly carved, but..."

"The hilt is coated in metal that burns my skin," Katsura explained. "People with spirit power... they can't touch it without getting a shock from it at best. At worst, it can cause actual harm. Father told me that — and I can feel it, just standing this close to it."

"Doesn't do anything to me," Sakaki reflected. "I guess not having spirit power means it can't hurt me, huh?"

She grinned faintly, swinging it half-heartedly in Katsura's direction, then pausing, a frown crossing her young features.

"Saki-chan?"

"This is the sword Koku was holding," the young girl murmured, brushing the index finger of her left hand over the hilt. "When he came at me, this is what he used. I'd never mistake such an ugly sword... it was this all right. But... if people with spirit power can't hold it, Katsu-nii — surely that means Koku doesn't have it, either? Otherwise, how could he hold it at all?"

"Koku attacked you with this?" Katsura's eyes widened with alarm, colour draining from his features. "This sword? You're absolutely sure? Koku came out here... wielding this?"

"I'm sure," Sakaki was taken aback. "Why? What about it?"

"Turn it over," Katsura instructed, and slowly Sakaki did, squinting at the characters embedded deep into the unwieldy hilt.

"Aizen... Kohaku?" she murmured, and Katsura nodded.

"Kohaku... as in... Father's pet demon? The one he locks in that hut?"

"It's not a demon," Katsura snapped. "But yes. That sword... came from that hut."

"The place nobody's allowed to go?" Sakaki's eyes became huge, her grip on the weapon tightening. "You're saying Koku broke into the hut, stole the sword, attacked me with it and then... what? Disappeared with the corpse of a shinigami to... what... practice some kind of voodoo to bring him back to life or something?"

"I don't know what I'm saying," Katsura swallowed hard, feeling the knot tighten in his stomach. "All I know is that I should've been here. If I had been... perhaps I would've been able to stop... maybe he would've told me whatever it was. It must've been something, but he didn't even tell Father, who he usually tells everything... and now..."

"Are people in Seireitei really hunting us, Katsu-nii?" Sakaki lowered the sword, and Katsura slowly nodded his head.

"They are," he said abruptly. "And if... if they found out about that..." he gestured to the weapon, "it would be even worse. If there's a demon locked in that hut, Sakaki, that sword is a big part of its existence. If there's a demon at all, it's what's locked inside there."

“A demon... inside the sword Koku used? A demon that possessed him, maybe?” Sakaki looked thoughtful. “Meaning that Father’s Kohaku is what’s in the sword, not a person at all? If that’s so, why is something written on it? What does it mean... Aizen Kohaku? It sounds like a name... but... can a sword have a name?”

“Father’s does,” Katsura reminded her, and Sakaki shrugged.

“True, but not a name like that,” she said pensively. “That sounds like a person’s name... but a sword can’t be a person... so it doesn’t make sense.”

“All I know is that that sword is bad news and it shouldn’t be out here roaming free where it can poison innocent people,” Katsura said darkly. “We need to take it and give it to Father... he’s the only one who knows what should be done with it.”

“Well, you can’t touch it,” Sakaki said pettily. “So I guess that leaves the job to me, doesn’t it? Even if it means I get poisoned on the way?”

“I think probably you’re immune to it, if you can hold it like that and not feel anything bad,” Katsura said slowly. “I’m sorry, Saki-chan, but it has to be you. I’ll keep scouting around here for the shinigami and for Koku, and if I can, I’ll bring him back to explain things for himself. If I find the corpse, I’ll dispose of it — taking that back is more important right now.”

“All right,” Sakaki shrugged. “I don’t mind. Burying corpses isn’t as much fun as cutting them to bits, and if it’s something only I can do, then I guess I’ll do it. But tell Koku, if you find him, that I won’t forget today. And I’ll get back at him, when he doesn’t have a demon in a sword to make him act like he’s some kind of hotshot.”

She swung the sword again as if to emphasise her point, then grinned.

“Without this, I guess he’s pretty useless after all,” she added, her eyes brightening. “It was the sword that attacked me, not Koku. He is still a wimp... I feel better knowing that.”

With that she slid the sword through the rough sash at her waist, skipping off towards the main village, and Katsura watched her go, pursing his lips as her figure disappeared into the distance.

If you’re happy with that explanation, I guess it will probably serve for now. I can’t explain why the sword should be out here or any of the other things you told me... but I’m more concerned by the fact Koku isn’t here. He was here... I can tell he was... but his motives... and after that...

His brows drew closer together in concentration and he held out his hands, closing his eyes as he tried to piece together the fragments of scattered reiatsu that littered the area. They were already dispersing, making the scene of the battle less and less tangible, but as he persevered, he found what he was looking for — a stray thread of spiritual energy that told him what had occurred after Sakaki's departure from the scene.

Senkaimon.

He frowned, opening his eyes.

Someone opened a gate. Them doing so destroyed the gate, but someone went through it. The shinigami? Did he make it home? Did he disarm you and take you with him as a hostage, Koku-kun? Or... is it the other way? Did you somehow open it... and take this Endou shinigami back? In which case... you must've had a reason. You didn't tell me what it was, though. Before I left, you didn't say anything... maybe you couldn't, or maybe you just didn't know. Still... taking that sword... Father will be cross when Sakaki returns it. He'll be cross that she's seen it and has begun asking questions. If she really understood what lives in that blade... but for now she's satisfied, and that's probably for the best.

He rubbed his temples, suddenly weary.

Somehow I think if she understood everything, life would be even more difficult. As it is, I'm going to have to go home and tell Father that Koku's not here. And he won't like that... he won't like that at all.

The youth's body had fallen not far from where Souja's crumpled form was still being cradled in Juushirou's arms, the Captain doing all he could to stabilise the young man in what Kirio knew would be a hurried mission to return him to Soul Society and the protective care of the Fourth Division's healers. He had charged her with a particular duty of her own, though, and, whilst the savaged state of a respected Vice Captain would linger in Kirio's young mind for a long time to come, for now she had to put it aside, focusing instead on the nameless youngster who, it seemed, had chanced his arrival at precisely the wrong time. As she knelt at his side, she swallowed hard at the oozing pool of blood that had darkened the ripped cloth of his rough robes, making them sticky against his skin, and she inwardly cursed herself for not having let Shikiki teach her even the most basic of healing spells. Whilst Juushirou had seen to it that all members of Thirteenth were versed in basic practical first aid skills, Kirio had never seen the need to learn the magic, joking that her friend would always be on standby should the need arise — but in that moment, she knew how naive that thought had been. There was no Shikiki, not here in the forests of District Seven. There was only her, and what happened next lay entirely in her unsteady hands.

She reached out a tentative finger to touch the youth's red-soaked shoulder, and at the unexpected contact he flinched, frightened brown eyes gazing hazily up at her as though wondering if he were about to be further damaged. Had he been able, Kirio felt certain that he would have scrambled back away from her like a feral animal cornered by an unwelcome predator, but from the slick pool of blood that was forming on the grass, she soon realised how little strength he had. Inwardly her heart clenched at the wary confusion in the youngster's gaze — he seemed to both see her and not see her, and Kirio remembered vaguely the warning signs of an injured soul going into deep shock.

"I won't hurt you," she spoke quietly, not wanting to frighten him any more, and his lips parted for a moment, as though he was about to form words. Before he could, though, he took a rasping breath of air, coughing violently and Kirio's hand drew back in alarm as blood dribbled from the boy's lips. He gasped, aspirating blood into lungs that, for all Kirio knew had been sliced right through, and before she knew what she was doing, she was taking firm hold of his upper body, lifting him in the way she had seen Juushirou tend to Souja and supporting his spasming body until his choking subsided into hoarse, rasping gasps of air. He was rigid with tension — fear, shock or pain, Kirio did not know which, perhaps a combination of all three making him unwilling to submit to her touch, but she resolutely held on, rubbing his back gently to soothe the panicked gasps into something closer to a normal breathing rhythm.

"Kirio?" Juushirou's voice alerted her to her Captain's attention, and she turned, seeing him getting carefully to his feet, Souja still cradled limply in his arms. "How does it look?"

"He's alive... I'll take care of him," Kirio saw the gravity in Juushirou's anxious gaze and made up her mind, swallowing her indecision and nodding her head. "I'll bring him back, Taichou. You can count on me."

"Good girl," A faint flicker of relief mingled with gratitude crossed the hazel eyes, then, "I'm taking Souja back — it's clear we can't wait here for help to arrive, and time is of the essence. Kikyue, I want you to come with me. Souja needs you — I'm sure he'd rather you stayed close."

"But... Nakata and..."

“They’ll have to take care of themselves,” Juushirou said briskly. “We’ll send someone to meet them and bring them back to base when we get back. Kirio, don’t you linger here any longer than you need, either. Take the lad to Thirteenth and report to Enishi. Send for Mitsuki from the Sixth if you can and do what you can to reassure him until she arrives. We can’t do more than that — do you understand?”

“Yes, sir,” Kirio nodded quickly, understanding from the look in Juushirou’s eyes how serious Souja’s condition really was. “It’s fine, sir. Really. I’ll manage.”

“I know you will,” Juushirou assured her, and then he was gone in a whoosh of shunpo, Kikyue’s reiatsu mingling with his and the wavering presence of Souja’s as they disappeared back towards Inner Seireitei. Left alone in the grove, Kirio turned her attention back to her own charge, adjusting her hold on his torso as a second round of coughing wracked through his thin frame. She could feel his bones through the thin fabric of his faded clothing, and she put her hand gingerly to his chest, feeling carefully for the exact location of the sword entry. At this, he raised feeble hands to push her back, but she knocked them down, registering the weakness of their effort. Was that his injury, or was he simply undernourished and weak, an impoverished local peasant who had stumbled onto Souja by accident and who had been cut down by Kikyue’s grief before any of them had understood the real circumstances?

“You’ve every right to be scared of us,” she told him with a sigh, tightening her hold on his upper body as a respite in the coughing allowed him to gasp air into his lungs. “I’m sorry. Kikyue-dono acted without realising — but we’re not your enemies, I promise. And I really won’t hurt you. Nobody will hurt you. We’ll get you help — I won’t leave you here to die, I swear I won’t.”

The dazed brown eyes shifted towards her, and for a moment Kirio thought she saw a glimmer of comprehension deep in their murky depths. Then he coughed again, his brow creasing in pain, and the young shinigami frowned.

“It will make you feel sicker, but the quickest way to get you to a healer is for me to take you through shunpo,” she decided. “I know it hurts, but it’s the fastest way and you’ll be able to rest more comfortably.”

There was no answer and, glancing at him, Kirio saw that he had slipped into unconsciousness, his breathing ragged and uneven, but, reassuringly still there. She slid a finger across his neck for a pulse, reassured by the strong beat of the young man’s heart. This at least was unharmed, then, and something in its resolute rhythm gave her the belief that, even alone, she would manage to get this wounded stray safely back to her home barracks.

She grasped his bleeding body more tightly in her arms, paying no attention to the smear of blood that stained the white of her obi, and instead focused all her energy on shifting both her particles and his to a safer location. Though she had shunpoed with other people many times before, she had never had sole charge of a wounded individual and it was with some relief when they dropped out of the flash step into the courtyard of her home division.

“Hikifune!”

That was Enishi’s voice, the heavy sound of his feet against the cobbles making Kirio look up, reassured by his presence. At the sight of her limp burden he let out an exclamation, and Kirio swallowed hard, remembering what Juushirou had said.

“He was hurt in the forest. Taichou said to send for Edogawa-san from the Sixth, that she’s to come at once if she can, since nobody else from Fourth will be spared,” she said quickly.

“Edogawa?” Enishi looked blank for a moment, but, as Kirio nodded, he raised his voice, gazing around the courtyard.

“Kayashima!” he bellowed, the sudden volume making Kirio jump. “You heard Hikifune. Snap to it! Go to Sixth, get Edogawa, pronto! Tell her there’s a kid bleeding all over our cobbles — that oughta get her attention!”

“Yes, sir!” The recruit scrambled to obey, hurrying out of the division gates, and Enishi grimaced, scratching his head as he surveyed the wounded youngster more closely.

“A District kid?”

“Yes, sir. That’s what we think, sir.”

“Looks like he’s been gashed about with a sword t’me. Do they play with those in the Districts too now?”

“No, sir. It’s not...” Kirio hesitated, then lowered her voice.

“Something’s happened, sir,” she said softly. “Taichou’s gone to Seventh — I don’t know when he’ll be back, but... they... we... found Souja-dono. He’s hurt — badly hurt, I think — and this District boy... he was with him.”

“Souja’s hurt, huh?” Enishi’s expression became grave. ‘Well, of course he is — a lad like that doesn't stop out all night with no contact unless someone's got the better of him in the dark. Damn nuisance, though, if it's not even safe to go through the lands at night. And this one? He bent to touch the stranger's brow. "What happened to him — how's he pulled into all this?"

"I'm not totally sure, but I think Souja-dono said that this boy had helped him in some way," Kirio said thoughtfully, brushing the straggly brown hair out of the stranger's face. "When we came upon them, though, Kikyue-dono misunderstood, and thought her brother was under attack. She drew her sword... and..."

"Ah," Enishi's face cleared, and he nodded. "I see. Then I'm with you. The baby hawk cut her claws on him without hearing the whole business, huh? Well, if that's how it is, there's no helping it. I guess Fourth will be preoccupied with Souja, if he's hurt as bad as you say, but if Taichou's asked for Edogawa, she'll do her best to patch this kid up. That's just like him, to have the lad sent back here out of the centre of the chaos — besides, if this one was with Souja, like as not he knows what happened. That might be useful."

He bent down, moving to take the injured youngster from Kirio's arms. "I'll carry him inside, we'll find a quiet room and Edogawa can see to him there. He's bloody as hell, make no mistake, but I can hear his breathing and feel his heart, so I dare say he won't expire in the meantime."

"He was coughing blood in the forest, then he passed out," Kirio responded. "I thought his lung might be hurt, but... now I don't know."

"More like his gut, judging by the direction of the blade," Enishi reflected. "Not nice for him, of course, and damn painful t'boot, but less dangerous, I'd wager, than a lung. Probably he'll knit up all right. Needs feeding up too, by the feel of him. Light as a feather — no wonder you were able to manage him on your own."

"We'll need to find his family," Relieved of her burden, Kirio stood, glancing ruefully at her stained shihakushou before following her broader companion within the confines of the division barracks. "They're probably worried about him."

"Mm, most like," Enishi agreed. "We got a name for the kid, or..?"

"No sir," Kirio shook her head. "He didn't say anything to me, so I don't know who he is. When we got near the scene, Taichou thought he sensed a Senkaimon closing, so like as not he's not local to where we found him, either."

“Well, then he’ll just have to be our problem till we find out who he belongs to,” Enishi hoisted the boy up more comfortably in his arms as though he weighed no more than a feather beadspread, offering Kirio a grin. “Taichou’s always had a soft spot for strays — but you know, it usually works out for him. You did a good job bringing him back, too — well done.”

“I’d like to stay with him, if you don’t mind, at least till Edogawa-san arrives,” Kirio admitted. “Taichou put him in my charge, and... well... he looked so frightened, when he saw my shihakushou. I didn’t like that... I want him to know I’m not going to hurt him, but I want to help.”

“Taichou’s orders, so I can’t see there being a problem with it,” Enishi responded simply. “At the very least you can help me get rid of these rags. Edogawa’ll be cross if we try to clean anything up without her say so, but we can clear a path to the wound by dealing with his hakamashita — if that’s what it is, hard to tell just by looking — and that’ll save time if the wound is bad.”

He pursed his lips, eying her seriously.

“Listen, Hikifune — about Souja — your honest opinion, so far as it goes...?”

“About his injuries?” Kirio frowned, and Enishi nodded.

“Yes. How bad do you think they were?”

“Bad,” Kirio grimaced. “Very bad. I... I don’t know anything about healing, but I didn’t like how he looked. He was very grey... and the blood was very red in contrast. Taichou’s expression... he was calm, but there was something in his expression that said something more. They went back before me — to Seventh or to Fourth, I guess, and I said I’d see to the boy but... looking like that, I don’t think Taichou believes Souja-dono will live.”

“I see,” Enishi pursed his lips. “If it’s that way, then I suppose the best thing we can do is rally round and do our jobs as best we can, so as he doesn’t need t’worry about us for a bit.”

The room was dark, the only light the faint flickering of subdued kidou lamps that stood in each corner of the chamber. Though the sun had risen in the sky beyond the barrack walls, the shutters in the small room had been pulled to keep prying eyes from peering in. In the halls beyond, Hirata was faintly aware of the frightened buzzing of his squad members, as they whispered and jostled among themselves.

Nobody had told them the full scale of the event, and all the highest ranked members of the Seventh Division were in and around the small chamber that belonged to the Vice Captain, but somehow the vibe had spread anyway, and where the courtyard had been empty, it had slowly begun to fill with curious, anxious men and women.

Hirata had meant to deal with them directly himself, take the lead as Captain and order them back to their posts now that their Vice Captain was found but, on seeing the state of his only son, his words had abandoned him, and he had only dimly registered the presence of his daughter clinging to his haori, burying her head in the white folds. Kikyue had never been the kind of child to show this sort of affection — a true Endou, she preferred to convey her fondness for her family through her strength and her deeds rather than emotional outpourings, but, just as Hirata was himself, Souja's crumpled form had broken her usual composure, and it was all he could do to guide her slowly within the room, stroking her hair numbly without even taking his eyes for one minute from the limp figure Juushirou had clasped in his arms.

Later, Hirata would be grateful to Juushirou and Shunsui for their foresight and presence. Later, when he was able to string coherent thought together, he would realise that it had been Juushirou who had barked out orders to the juniors to withdraw to their own quarters, sending two recruits scurrying to the Fourth Division while Shunsui, after taking one look at Souja's dishevelled state had taken it upon himself to police the halls of the Seventh, dispatching two lower seats to retrieve the still absent Nakata and Tenichi from their patrol, then calming the panic and ensuring that nobody who should not be there encroached into what was fast becoming an emergency sickroom. On the return of the two officers, Shunsui had coopted the Seventh Seated Clansman to help keep order among the more jittery lower seated officers, whilst Juushirou had taken charge of the sick room, ensuring Souja was laid as comfortably and safely on his bed as possible before directing a pale and shaking Tenichi to wait outside the door to explain to the healers when they came what had already been done. Later, Hirata would find words to thank his friends, but for now, all he could do was collapse down on his knees beside the low slung pallet, grasping desperately at Souja's pale fingers in an attempt to rouse his son back to consciousness.

"Souja..." the word had come with difficulty to his lips, his vocal chords half paralysed from the shock and dismay of his son's condition. Kikyue sank down at his side, sword discarded and tearstained face turned towards his, but he paid her no attention, instead raising a dazed gaze to meet Juushirou's grim hazel eyes. He could not find any words to voice his question, but Juushirou had known him a long time, and he sighed, resting a hand on Hirata's shoulder as if trying to take some of the burden into his own weary frame.

"Unohana-taichou will come herself, because I've requested that she does with utmost urgency," he said softly. "When she understands, she won't hesitate. I've asked for Shikiki as well — if she can be spared."

Hirata merely blinked at him, and Juushirou pressed his lips together, carefully lowering his thin frame down beside his friend.

"We don't know, exactly, what happened," he added. "A young boy was with him in the forest. Kikyue-chan mistook him for an assailant, but Souja managed to tell us himself that the boy had come to his aid. He's been taken to my division, and I'm sure we can question him for particulars later. Right now the most important thing is Souja — and the injuries he's sustained."

Hirata absorbed the gravity in the hazel eyes, and a lump began to form in his throat. He swallowed hard, jerking his head forward in a nod, before turning his gaze back to the still, pale-faced figure on the bed. The whiteness of his skin was in direct contrast to the blurs of red that covered his obi, his face and his uniform and Hirata, who had long considered himself immune to scenes of carnage and violence found a wave of nausea washing over his body as he contemplated the kind of assault his son had been subjected to. Seconds passed like hours as he waited for Retsu to arrive... seconds in which more of Souja's life blood slipped from his body and his complexion became ever more pale.

He squeezed the cool, dry fingers tightly, moving to brush strands of hair from his son's grimy face, and at his action Souja's eyelashes twitched, his eyelids fluttering open to meet his father's anxious gaze. At first they seemed dazed but, as Hirata let out an exclamation, they seemed to focus, relief glittering in the pale blue depths.

"Otou... sama," he whispered, no strength at all in his voice, and ripples of pain ran across his brow at the effort of forming words. "I... made it back. Somehow... I made it... back."

"Juushirou-dono brought you back," Hirata somehow managed to form words. "Report to me, Souja. Tell me what happened. Healers are coming, and they'll fix you up for sure, but in the meantime..."

"Koku?" A sudden flicker of anxiety gripped Souja's expression and he turned his head to look at Juushirou, coughing and flinching in pain as the effort jerked his wounds. “Juu... shirou... dono... what... of... Koku?”

“Koku?” Juushirou looked blank, then, “was that the boy? The young lad who was with you?”

“He... helped... me,” Souja jerked his head in a nod. “I promised... look after... he... in danger... he... helped me... Endou must... keep... promise.”

At his words, Kikyue let out a strangled sob, her grasp on her father’s robes tightening, and Juushirou frowned.

“We’ll keep that promise for you,” he said gravely. “It’s become a Gotei promise, if he helped to shelter a Vice Captain. Don’t worry, no further harm will come to him. I’ve sent Kirio with him to Thirteenth — he’ll be all right, and we won’t let him come to harm.”

“Thank... you,” some of the tension flowed from Souja’s body, and he managed a feeble smile. “I... promised. Didn’t... want to break... my word. He... for my sake...”

“Souja, who did this to you?” Hirata cut across his son’s faltering words, grasping the young man’s fingers more tightly. “Tell me and I’ll dispatch people right away. I’ll go... we’ll go, we’ll track them down...”

Souja’s expression darkened, and he closed his eyes briefly, seeming to compose himself before attempting to speak again.

“Eiraki... basama,” he whispered, and Kikyue let out a gasp, staring at her brother in complete disbelief.

“Eiraki... Anieue, what are you talking about? Are you saying... you can’t be saying...”

“She looked like... Obasama,” Souja slid his fingers free from Hirata’s grasp, moving them clumsily to his waist as if in search of his sword, before reaching out to grasp Hirata’s haori loosely by the sleeve. “Young... girl. Endou... blood. In her eyes... a predator.”

“Mm,” Souja jerked his head in another nod. “Called her... Saka... ki. And a hut... in the hut... the sword... said Aizen...”

“Aizen?” Despite himself, Hirata could not stop the flow of indignant, angry reiatsu from swirling up around his heart, and the shutters began to flap at the window as the wind-hawk within his soul howled out for vengeance. “This has something to do with Aizen Keitarou? This is his doing? His child...?”

“Then the child that Eiraki-hime was carrying when she fled from here was a girl,” Juushirou murmured softly. “More than that, they... and probably, Keitarou too... survived the encounter with my grandfather and have been hiding out somewhere ever since, waiting for an opportunity to strike. Kai was right — we were right. Putting distance between us and our paranoia was a bad thing — just because we had no proof, dismissing the concept was the wrong way to go.”

“You knew this was Keitarou? You knew he was here?” Hirata’s voice raised, but Juushirou shook his head, resting his hands on his friend’s shoulders.

“It’s hard on Souja, if you let your reiryoku flow here,” he chided gently, though Hirata could tell his friend’s calm was a forced front for his sake and nothing more. “I knew nothing at all, and so far all of my attempts to prove it had come to nothing. You knew that, Hirata. When I spoke to Kai, he thought we shouldn’t give up on the idea — but we had nothing to go on. Even the person we went out to capture this morning... didn’t turn out to be what I expected. With that... till now... Souja-kun, can you tell me how you found this information? Where did you see this hut... where was this sword?”

Souja took a laboured breath into protesting lungs, loosing his hold on Hirata’s haori and dropping his hand back down onto the bed as the effort to hold it proved too great. He mouthed three syllables, and Juushirou’s eyes widened with dismay.

“Rukongai? Did you just say... Rukongai?”

“You went to Rukongai?” Hirata demanded. “Souja, why would you do that and not tell me? Why would you...”

“Joumei... said... Keitarou... was...” Souja faltered, pausing to gather himself, then, “Not... tell Father... in case... wrong.”

“Joumei,” Hirata’s eyes darkened, and it took all of his effort to reign in his reiryoku as his anger surged through his body. “I knew it. This has something to do with them... with him. You went to see him without my permission, didn’t you? I told you not to go, yet you still went...”

“I’m sorry.” Souja’s features twisted into an expression of genuine contrition. “Joumei... thought Keitarou... in Rukongai. So... wanted to bring back... evidence.”

He coughed, pain wracking his features, and Juushirou rested a hand gently on the young man’s bloodsoaked body.

“I’m sure Hirata forgives you, in light of the information you’ve managed to bring back,” he said quietly, casting his friend a sidelong look, and at the expression in Juushirou’s hazel gaze, Hirata felt his temper fading. Slowly he nodded.

“We’ll talk about it more, later, but you’re not to worry about it for now,” he said at length, forcing himself to keep his tones even. “You had your reasons, and Juushirou’s right. I don’t say you should do it again, but this time we’ll overlook it. You promise not to do it again, and we’ll put it behind us and focus on what you saw, all right?”

Souja’s eyes became sad, and he moved his head in a feeble nod.

“Never again,” he promised, and there was something in his tone of voice that made Hirata eye him sharply, a dreamy, almost half-real tone that suggested the loss of blood was starting to affect his son’s coherence.

“Souja-kun?” he murmured, but Juushirou grasped his friend loosely by the arm, shaking his head slightly before turning to the injured Vice Captain.

“Rest,” he said gently. “Like Hirata said, we can discuss this more later. Unohana-taichou is at the gate, I can sense her reiatsu, and you need to be treated more than anything else right now. You’ve been brave, holding on as long as you have when you must be in a lot of pain, but help is here now. We need to tend to these wounds quickly, Souja-kun — there’ll be time to talk later about details and what you thought you were going to find.”

“Mm-m.” Souja shook his head, determination glittering once more in his pale gaze, as though Juushirou’s kindness had somehow rallied his failing spirit. “I... must tell... while I can... I must. Father... I’m sorry. I... disobeyed. I... let you... down. I...”

“We’ve already said it’s forgiven and forgotten,” Hirata said frankly, “so forget about it.”

“Mm.” Souja agreed, grateful relief flickering across his ashen features. “I wanted... proof... but...”

He coughed again, twisting against the bedcovers as he sent fresh waves of agony through his maltreated body, then, “Keitarou’s... child... not... daughter. Son. Is son.”

“But you just said...” Kikyue protested, and Souja shook his head impatiently.

“More... than one,” he murmured. “Sakaki. Sakaki and... Aizen... Ko... ha... ku. The... hut... people died. Kohaku... and the sword. Dangerous. Need to... find... find the... sword...”

He let out a little gasp, his eyes fluttering closed, and Hirata reached across tentatively to touch his brow, giving him a gentle, hesitant shake.

“Souja? Souja, dammit, open your eyes!”

“He’s lost too much blood,” Juushirou spoke grimly, gently reaching out a hand to pull Hirata’s back. “He’s lost consciousness, Hirata. He won’t be able to tell us any more right now. Let Unohana-taichou see him... let her do what she can for him. He’s told us everything he could — pushed himself to tell us. We have time to make sense of it later — for now, let him rest.”

“Who did Anie go to see, Father?” Kikyue swallowed hard, gazing at Hirata in confusion. “Who is ‘Joumei’? Why did you stop him from going?”

“That’s none of your business,” Hirata snapped, more harshly than he intended, but Kikyue recoiled from him as if struck, and he sighed, rubbing his temples as if trying to erase the tension that throbbed behind them.

“Taichou?”

The door slid back unevenly on its runners at that moment, preventing the Captain from speaking any more, and he turned impatiently, seeing a white-faced Tenichi, eyes huge in his face as he took in the sombre scene within. In his slipstream was the Fourth Division Captain, however, and Tenichi’s stricken expression was forgotten as the calm head of the Unohana Clan stepped over the threshold, her gleaming white haori shimmering slightly in the uneven glow of the lamps.

“I came as soon as I received your message, Endou-taichou,” she spoke softly, all her usual polite formality evident in her tone, but her gaze was already fixed on the patient in the bed, and from the solemnity of her features, Hirata knew she was concerned. “I am sorry, however, that I have come alone.”

She knelt beside the bed as Juushirou made way for her, placing a gentle hand against Souja’s brow, before moving to loosen the tattered uniform and pulling back the black fabric to expose the damage beneath. At the sight of the criss-crossed carving across his son's chest, Hirata let out an involuntary gasp, struck giddy with shock and horror by the obvious savagery of the attack, and only the awareness that his daughter still clung to him prevented him from losing his grip on his composure, the tears of anger and of fear hidden behind the lenses of his spectacles.

Across the room, Juushirou let out a soft curse.

"Unohana-taichou, how could such a thing happen?" he asked softly, and Retsu pursed her lips together, not answering to begin with as her delicate fingers gently probed their way across Souja's battered torso, glittering with light and energy as she carefully stemmed the flow of blood.

"I have seen such injuries before," she admitted at length with a sigh, reaching to take a clean cloth from beside the bed and wiping her hands on it briefly. "They are clean cuts, despite how vicious they appear, and they run deep, yet were applied in a frenzy. I would venture to guess that the original wound was this one, though," she touched a finger briefly to the base of Souja's ribcage. "It's the smallest by far, but probably the deepest."

She raised her gaze to Juushirou.

"Ukitake-taichou, I believe you were there when Souja-dono was found?"

"Yes," Juushirou agreed gravely.

"Is there anything you can tell me about the scene that might explain the wounds? Did Souja-dono himself say anything of his attacker?"

Juushirou hesitated, meeting Hirata's gaze for a moment, and Hirata sighed.

"He spoke of my sister, and of the demon who took her from my family," he said quietly, only just keeping his temper under control. "I think he was attacked by a girl with a sword, Unohana-taichou — but from what I understand, neither girl nor weapon were located at the scene."

"There was a young village boy with Souja when we found him," Juushirou added. "He was... injured by accident, but he's alive and I've had him sent to Thirteenth for the time being. Otherwise, we have no real clues. Souja seems badly hurt, but there wasn't as much blood at the scene as I would have expected... it made me think that he'd been moved from somewhere else, maybe by this boy, or maybe on

“Mm,” Retsu’s expression became one of comprehension, and she asked no further questions, spreading her hands across Souja’s body as a faint, golden haze of light enveloped the wounded shinigami.

“This fight depends on Souja-dono,” she admitted after what seemed to Hirata like an eternity. “I am, quite frankly, surprised he was able to speak to you. No... Hirata-dono, I must be even more plain with my words. I am surprised that he was returned here alive at all. The amount of bloodloss is beyond anything I have ever seen on a living shinigami — the others I have encountered with such severe mutilations have already left this world for the next.”

“What does that mean?” Hirata asked sharply, and Retsu sighed, shaking her head slowly.

“I cannot regenerate his blood for him,” she said reluctantly. “The only one of my officers capable of doing that is currently on patrol in Sixth District... I sent urgent summonses to call her back as soon as I received your message, but every second is precious. This injury is serious, and more, it occurred some time before Souja-dono was found. I would wager that he lay bleeding for a while before he was recovered by Ukitake-taichou and Kikyue-dono. More, his spiritual pressure is surprisingly unstable. I cannot fathom precisely what took place, but I would conjecture that Souja-dono continued to fight against his assailant until he could literally move no more.”

“He’s an Endou,” Kikyue murmured, tears still trickling down her cheeks. “That’s what we do, Unohana-taichou, we fight. We fight and we fight and we don’t give up. Anieue wouldn’t give up — he wanted to come back here alive, and he wanted to tell us what he knew. He wanted to be helped, so please, help him! Please make him get better — I know he’ll fight, so please, don’t give up on him!”

“A healer never does that, Kikyue-dono,” Retsu assured her gravely, as the hazy barrier of golden light strengthened beneath her touch. “I can restore and stabilise his lost reiatsu with my Kidou, and I can begin to knit together the wounds he’s suffered. However, the loss of blood... is his biggest problem at present. He has bled internally and externally, and his body requires a lot of strength to mend itself. That strength would normally be found in the reserves of spirit power, but Souja appears to have exhausted his own. I can try and replenish them — and hope it will be enough to stabilise his condition until Shikiki returns. She alone among my shinigami can restore a body to its pristine former condition.”

“But Shikiki is in Sixth District?” Juushirou asked anxiously. “Unohana-taichou, what if she doesn’t come back in time? What if she’s not back till, say, tomorrow, or the day after that?”

“Souja-dono will need all his Endou strength to fight this battle for himself,” Retsu said simply. “I will do everything I can do. As Kikyue-dono said, Souja-dono already won the first battle by returning here alive. I will mend what I can and encourage his body to do the rest.”

She moved her hand to the hilt of her sword, then sighed, shaking her head.

“Minazuki’s shikai is not designed for release in such close quarters, and with Souja’s condition so unstable, I believe my using her might kill him,” she admitted. “I have stopped his bleeding now, though. From my initial inspection, Hirata-dono, your son has suffered lacerations through his lungs, liver, spleen and gut, with the blade bruising the edge of his heart — though fortunately not penetrating it. Several of his ribs have been sliced through, and, most concerning of all is this thrust through the diaphragm which not only caused significant organ damage but also severed through several major arteries, causing heavy internal and external bleeding. The place where he was attacked should have been saturated in blood — that it was not indicates to me that Juushirou-dono’s hypothesis is correct, and Souja-dono was moved from the original scene of the attack, perhaps by the young man in his company.”

“You mean he really did save Anie? He really... took him from the danger... somehow?” Kikyue whispered, and Juushirou frowned.

“I thought I sensed a Senkaimon open, Unohana-taichou,” he admitted, and Kikyue nodded.

“I sensed it too,” she admitted, her words shaking. “It was Anie who opened it, I’m sure. I sensed his sword, just for a moment... that’s how I knew where he was.”

“I thought it was Souja-dono who opened it, too,” Juushirou owned. “In this condition, though — is that possible?”

“I wouldn’t have said it was,” Retsu responded pensively, “but then, the spirit of an Endou is not to be gainsaid easily. Perhaps that explains his dearth of spiritual energy — Souja-dono gambled his very life on being able to come home and report to his Captain what he had seen.”

“Meaning that if he hadn’t... if he’d not moved from where he was hurt... maybe he wouldn’t be so ill now?” Hirata asked bleakly. Retsu shook her head.

“Likely that place was just as dangerous, and, if he was found by a District boy, remote and far from Inner Seireitei,” she responded. “No, I think coming back was his only chance — I’m just amazed that he was able to do it with his body as damaged as this.”

“Then the young boy must have helped, somehow,” Juushirou pressed his lips together.

“And I tried to kill him,” Kikyue murmured.

“He’s not dead, though,” Juushirou reassured her. “I’ve trusted him to my squad and Mitsuki will come when she knows what’s happened. Even if she can’t use her sword, yet, she’ll know what to do to make him comfortable, and when Kirio held him, he didn’t seem so badly hurt as your brother. He’s hurt, but he’ll heal, and we’ll get the truth, I’m sure, when he’s had time to recover.”

Retsu cast a third barrier of golden energy over Souja’s body, then got to her feet.

“With your permission, Hirata-sama, I should like to clear this room and make it entirely quiet for Souja-dono’s respite,” she said softly. “I have brought a group of healers with me and I would ask your permission to allow them entry to your barracks in order that they may help me in treating your son. Your officers are under Kyouraku-taichou’s command, at present, I believe? They should also be dispersed to their quarters at once. Doubtless word has filtered through as to Souja-dono’s condition, and so I would not attempt to keep it from them. The best thing they can do for their Vice Captain now is go about their duties quietly and soberly and without creating a disturbance.”

“I should return to Thirteenth,” Juushirou decided. “Hirata, if you need me, send for me and I’ll come — but I have to ensure Tsunemori completed the errand I sent him on, and there’s nothing more I can do here for now.”

“I think that is wise,” Retsu agreed. “Kyouraku-taichou is better placed to help support the Seventh at present, with his barracks directly next door. I would like to request, though, that only yourself and your daughter enter here, Hirata-dono, and that you allow your son to sleep as long as is necessary. I cannot guarantee that his life will be saved at this moment... but I wish to give him every chance there is to fight back.”

“We’ll do as you ask,” Hirata said grimly. “Kikyue and I will follow your instructions to the letter, Unohana-taichou.”

“Then it’s settled,” Retsu nodded approvingly, though the Endou Captain could see sadness in her gentle eyes. “And I should like to send the red-haired officer hovering outside your door for fresh water to clean away some of the excess blood. He seemed particularly frightened by his Vice Captain’s appearance — and I believe it would be better for him to be somehow engaged.”

“Tenichi,” Juushirou’s brows knitted together in concern, and Hirata nodded.

“My men are at your disposal,” he said simply. “Do with them as you will. Do whatever you need to do, Unohana-taichou — but please, above all things, save my son’s life.”

28. Kirio's Resolve

Chapter Twenty Seven: Kirio's Resolve

"I go away from the division for a few hours and come back to this kind of reception."

Shihouin Midori rested her hands against the door of the confinement cell, peering through the one-way glass with thoughtful, feline eyes as she surveyed the chamber's solitary resident.

"Well, Kai, what's the story behind this? I understand from Saku that one of Ukitake's men brought him here — but I'm surprised that you'd offer him such secure hospitality if he's just a suspicious pickup from the Districts. Surely there are lower ranking officials you can assign this to — what's your personal interest and why are you reporting it to me so quickly?"

"That is a question I hope to be able to answer more fully later on today," Kai said grimly, leaning up against the wall of the long, dark hallway and folding his arms across his chest. "Midori-nee, I know you had a long ride from Second to get back here and I'm sorry that you found yourself met by a summons down to the penal cells, but I don't want to take any chances. I don't know for sure, but I think this is more than just a District pick-up. I think it connects to us — both the Shihouin and the Onmitsukidou — and possibly something more."

"Do tell?" Midori turned to gaze at her brother, her eyes slits of gold in the dim lighting. Midori was known across Seireitei for being one of the most beautiful Clan princesses, but there was never mistaking how closely that beauty was related to power and influence. Even for Kai, who undoubtedly knew her best of everyone else in the Gotei's inner conclave, she could appear more like a predator than a high-blooded Clan leader, and, on reading the faint ripples in her neatly suppressed reiatsu, he was relieved that he was her close kinsman and, as such, someone Midori would never harm.

He nodded now, pressing his lips together and casting his own gaze through the one way glass to the prisoner beyond.

He was a nondescript individual, dressed in nondescript black clothing and the rough sheath that had hidden beneath his cloak now hung empty, the plain District sword he had carried being confiscated and locked away. The Gotei as a whole were unaware of the full extent of the Shihouin's labyrinth of corridors and criss-crossing cell blocks, nor did they know how many weapons of varying kinds were fastened in secure boxes thick with dust, their owners no longer in a position to wield them. Some had been executed for the safety and protection of the Gotei, their corpses burned and the ashes discarded on the wind, their names unknown to any but the most high ranking members of the Second Division's administration. Others had been exiled, stripped of all they owned and warned that, if they ever came near civilisation again, there would be a black-bladed weapon waiting to cut them down. And, in the case of the third group, they had disappeared into the darkness underground before any formal sentence could be passed against them — beyond this mere holding cell to a place which was legend to most of the other divisions but to Kai was all too much a reality: the Deviant Confinement Facility, known in common parlance among his officers as "The Maggots' Nest."

Despite his position as Head of the Onmitsukidou, Kai did not take pleasure in the dispatching or confining of most captives, and rarely blooded his blade himself. The Maggots' Nest, however, had been partly his initiative, a suggestion made through which those members of Seireitei society who were perceived dangerous could be corralled, perhaps tamed, and even one day face release. The reality had taken a path different from the dream, however, for the majority of the seventeen current residents in the Maggots' Nest had shown no sign of improvement and, when two prisoners had managed to mutilate an officer on duty during what should have been a peaceful mealtime, Midori had put her foot down, declaring that any convict disturbed enough to be confined in the Maggots Nest would have an indefinite sentence which would likely never come under review.

It was there, in that place, that Kounou, the former adjutant of the Onmitsukidou had spent the previous ten years.

Kai sighed, turning his mind back ten years to the Suzuki incident and its aftermath. The depth and extent of Kounou's involvement in the deception still rankled with him, for he had trusted his second and the betrayal still left a bitter taste in his mouth. As for the case of Suzuki Naoto, even now he was unsure about what to think. The man in the cell was pale-faced, skinny and scarred, dirty and somehow twisted in such a way that, although he was a living man, Kai felt that when the prisoner glanced their way he was looking into the gaze of a corpse. A shiver ran down his spine, and he bit his lip. Was this the result of the poison that Kounou had used to pursue Suzuki, or something else? His conversation with Ukitake lingered in his thoughts and despite himself he could not force it away.

“Kai?” Midori’s voice brought him back to the present, and he frowned, turning apologetically.

“Sorry. I was thinking of something,” he said vaguely, his eyes becoming clouded. “Midori-nee, do you remember the incident ten years ago within the Onmitsukidou? When Kounou was in charge in my absence..?”

“I remember reading your report, and I remember signing the papers for him to be confined,” Midori’s expression twisted into an unpleasant grimace. “I dislike traitors from within the Clan more than any others. I trust he’s still firmly rotting away in the Maggot’s Nest?”

“He remains one of the six in permanent cell confinement,” Kai agreed. “I sent Saku to check on him this morning, and everything was as expected. He’s still as hostile and unrepentant as ever, but besides that, all is as it should be.”

“He should’ve been put to death,” Midori said frankly. “I never understood why you kept him alive.”

“Because there were things he wasn’t telling us — things I couldn’t quite settle in my mind and I hoped that he might choose to talk about them if we locked him up somewhere like that,” Kai admitted. “It hasn’t worked, not yet, but I wanted to leave the options open. I’ve never felt that, even when he was caught, Kounou told me the whole truth about everything. Particularly about Suzuki Naoto and his involvement. Kounou claimed to the end that Suzuki was involved, maybe a ringleader in the business, but something about it has always bothered me. And then... a little while ago, Ukitake came to me and started asking me questions about missing Onmitsukidou.”

“Ukitakedid?” Midori’s golden eyes widened, and Kai nodded, patting the door of the confinement cell lightly with the palm of his hand.

“Then, this morning, his officer shows up with this individual bound in Kidou bonds which, I’m fairly certain, were fired by Ukitake himself,” he agreed. “The officer didn’t seem to know an awful lot of details, which means the most of what Ukitake and I talked about has been kept in the realms of confidential, but he did say that Ukitake called this man Suzuki.”

“Suzuki Naoto,” Midori’s expression became thoughtful. “I remember the name, if not the officer. He belonged to you, and was District or thereabouts, was he not? I had little to do with him — I wouldn’t know him even if he stood before me.”

"I haven't ever forgotten him, or his letter to me claiming his innocence," Kai replied simply. "I'm not the kind of officer who automatically believes someone didn't do a crime simply because they say so, but there was something about this appeal that stuck with me. He wasn't asking me to pardon him, rather to come myself and hear his case. It was the writing of a desperate officer looking for justice, and I'm not sure that he got it. By the time I returned to my post, Kounou had taken matters into his own hands and, as far as I knew, Suzuki was dead."

"Then there's not much to be done about it, is there?" Midori sent him a quizzical look, and Kai sighed.

"We never found Suzuki's corpse," he owned. "I didn't report the full story to you back then because it was not long after Yashiko-hime was born, and I didn't want to make matters complicated. There's no way he should have survived the kind of poison dosage that Kounou's men inflicted on him with their arrows, and most of those reported the same story when I had them interrogated. Still, it's bothered me — and now this guy, who Ukitake clearly believes is the missing Suzuki..."

He paused, glancing once more through the glass.

"He might be right," he concluded at length. "Ten years isn't a long time in Seireitei, yet this man looks like a stranger to me. Even despite that, though, there's something... those eyes... that bother me. They're not the same eyes I remember, because for all his faults Suzuki was an active and busy officer, and that gaze is cold, and yet... I don't know. Maybe I'm clutching at straws, but..."

"You think he's your missing piece in the puzzle, even though you think it's impossible he should've survived the poison?" Midori asked softly. Kai nodded.

"The only time you find an Onmitsukidou who's trying to hide is if they're killed," he replied pragmatically. "I train them that way, to conceal themselves in every manner possible. Suzuki disappeared. He may have been hit by poison arrows, and he should have died, but without a corpse, there's no guarantee that he did. And, Ukitake, when he came, offered me another, more alarming hypothesis. He suggested that this might be another incident like the one with Tomoyuki... with the same puppetmaster pulling the strings."

"Aizen Keitarou," Midori's eyes darkened, and for a moment, Kai felt the surge of her reiryoku as if to echo her indignance. "You think this is his doing?"

“Well, whatever he is, this man isn’t a puppet like Tomoyuki was,” Kai shrugged. “He’s capable of independent response, and he doesn’t have the same aura about him as Tomoyuki did when Aizen was controlling him. Even so, though, I can’t rule out his involvement completely. Ukitake’s not a paranoid individual, and if he feels there’s some grounds to suspect Aizen, however flimsy, I trust his instincts. Thinking about it, Aizen is probably the only individual outside of Inner Seireitei knowledgeable enough about science and biology to save Suzuki’s life. I may be grasping at straws, but I felt that I should grasp them anyway, and see what happens when I pull them out.”

“I agree,” Midori ruminated on this for a moment, then nodded her head. “Interrogate him. Find out what you can.”

Kai nodded, opening his mouth to respond, but before he could, there was a suppressed flare of shunpo at his right hand and he turned, seeing Saku had materialised in the corridor beside him, her blue eyes even graver than usual as she lowered her head towards her superiors.

“I apologise for the interruption, Kai-dono, Midori-sama,” she said softly, “but a report of a disturbing nature has just reached my ears and I felt you should be notified of it immediately.”

“A... disturbing report?” Midori frowned, glancing at her brother, who shrugged his shoulders helplessly.

“Report, Saku,” he instructed. “Tell us what you know.”

“Yes, sir,” Saku bowed again, then, “It’s just that the Seventh Division Vice Captain was brought back from the Districts this morning in a severely mutilated state. Unohana-taichou is currently with him.”

“The Seventh...” Kai whitened, staring at Saku in shock. “Souja? Souja-dono was..?”

“Yes, sir,” Saku agreed soberly. “Shunsui-sama sent one of the Seventh Division recruits to ask if we could dispatch people to investigate the scene where he was found. I said I’d report to you straight away, and follow your instructions. I think Thirteenth Division are already investigating — it was Ukitake-taichou who found the injured officer.”

“Ukitake again,” Midori murmured. “What is that District boy up to now, Kai?”

“I wish I knew, but twice in one morning suggests he knows things we don’t, and I’d like to piece those together,” Kai rubbed his temples.

“All right — Saku, if Midori-nee is agreeable, I want you to take five or six officers and head to the Seventh. Find out from Kyouraku where Souja-dono was exactly and go to the scene. I want a detailed report of everything that is and isn’t on site, understand? If Thirteenth are already there, interrogate them too.”

“You can take the instruction as an order from me, if anyone queries your right to demand such information,” Midori added. “There shouldn’t be any problem if you use my name.”

“Yes, Midori-sama. Yes, sir,” Saku saluted sharply, then disappeared, and Midori sighed, casting Kai a quizzical look.

“Your old friend has his fingers in pies all over, and he’s going to put us to shame,” she murmured. “Interrogate your prisoner, Kai-kun. Find out who he is, and, most of all, why he was where Ukitake found him. It occurs to me that if this prisoner is your long lost Suzuki, that he wouldn’t be taken prisoner easily unless...”

“He was acting as a decoy for something else?” Kai asked heavily, and Midori nodded.

“Perhaps the assault on Souja-dono,” she agreed grimly. “Well, we’ll have to hear that report when it comes. I daresay something else will have been said, and Saku will find it out. Meanwhile, I have other matters to deal with, so I’ll leave this strange specimen to you to handle. Get what you can out of him, all right?”

“As ever,” Kai agreed frankly. “If an officer has been badly wounded, it raises the stakes yet again.”

“And if it proves to connect to the Spiritless Zone massacre?”

“Then it raises up yet another level,” Kai reflected, “and makes me even more sure that Ukitake’s concerns about Aizen are probably well founded. First things first, though. I’ll do as you say, Oneesama... and report back to you as soon as I know anything of note.”

“Do so,” Midori agreed. “I’ll hear from both you and Saku later, and we’ll see what conclusions we can draw from this latest turn of events.”

“Well?”

As Katsura made his way slowly down the winding path towards Keitarou’s hut, he found his father waiting for him, tattered grey cloak hung about his shoulders and the sheathed form of his tantou knife poked through the rough black sash at his waist. Though he had sent Sakaki back to report, there was nobody else around, and, as he paused a few feet from where the scientist stood, he could see the tension in the other man's body, a question glittering in his pale eyes. It was more than just anxiety, Katsura decided, but verging on desperation, and his heart lurched as he contemplated once again what news he had to bring.

First I let you down, Father, and lie to you — more than once, in fact. And now... this.

He sighed, slowly shaking his head.

"I searched the entire area," he said frankly. "I went over it once again after I sent Sakaki back to you... but I didn't find any sign."

"Sakaki brought the sword to me," Keitarou pressed his lips together until they had almost drained of colour. "I sent her to help Eiraki to gather the villagers for evacuation. The weapon is here, now, in my hut, and I will have to find a way to transport it myself — it's not something I want that child holding again, even if it doesn't have any effect on her. The risk is too high — and you should have known that, too."

"Yes, sir," Katsura bowed his head apologetically. "I wasn't thinking. She just picked it up as though it were nothing, so I assumed..."

"Well, I don't think any harm was done," Keitarou acknowledged, "but in future, Katsura, please be more careful. There are things which, as my eldest son, you have been trusted with. Things Sakaki doesn't know... that might even put her in danger. I need all of you — please understand that."

"Yes, sir," Katsura had the fleeting sense that his father was suppressing his emotions, trying not to show his son how rattled he really was. The uncharacteristic anxiety rippled against Katsura's sharp senses, making him ill at ease, and he grimaced.

"I don't know what happened," he admitted. "Everything I saw and felt seemed like Sakaki described. There was definitely a shinigami, and he's definitely not there now. From the amount of blood, I don't think he's survived... but he's not anywhere I can see. There are no bodies anywhere in the vicinity, and from Sakaki's description, he wouldn't have got much further alone. As for Koku..."

He trailed off, and Keitarou clenched his fist, his knuckles whitening.

"Sakaki seems to think Koku took the shinigami somewhere," he murmured, and Katsura nodded.

“The Senkaimon was disturbed,” he owned reluctantly. “I... didn’t try to open it, but even so, it didn’t feel like it would open. It felt... broken. Something had ruptured it, forcing it against itself. I don’t think that was Koku, but I can’t account for him not being there or for what Sakaki said about him using that sword. He usually won’t go anywhere near it, and yet...”

“He has been told firmly and in no uncertain terms that that sword is not for him to play with, especially without supervision,” Keitarou snapped. “There is no reason, no justification for his having taken it — even less for him to have wielded it in Sakaki’s face. The girl is confused and I’ve had to tell her all kinds of lies to put her mind at rest about where it came from, but it bothers me. It’s out of character for him, and I don’t like it.”

“Father...” Katsura paused, then, “Koku has been more unwell recently. You said I shouldn’t mention it, but I think... it’s important. I think... maybe... he’s been... doing too much.”

“You think I’m pushing him too hard?” Keitarou’s eyes became slits. “You really don’t understand what you’re talking about, if you think that’s even possible. Koku is not some fragile doll who might shatter at a moment’s pressure. And, unless you’ve forgotten the sorry state he was in when first you met him, it’s thanks to my work and my help that he’s reached this point. True, sometimes he reacts adversely, but even considering that...”

“I wonder,” Katsura bit his lip. “Sometimes, when I connect to his thoughts, I pick up fragments. Just bits and pieces, nothing clear — he likes to lock those things away from me. But... sometimes... he seems unsettled and upset. And this... is so out of character, something must have caused it.”

Keitarou was silent for a moment, then, at length, he nodded.

“Whilst I don’t believe it has any connection to my work with him, I have noticed a change in him lately, too,” he conceded. “Once recently, I found him beating his fists on a wall till they were blooded, and his spirit was very scattered. He was worried about you, but other than that, he wouldn’t tell me what was troubling him. He had that look in his eyes, but try as I might, I couldn’t elicit the information from him. He’s become frighteningly good at concealing his inner thoughts and feelings — far better than anyone else — and I can no longer read so clearly what’s on his mind. I don’t know if he’s been having... those kinds of episodes again... but given Sakaki’s account, it's possible that... he has."

"You think that he went to the hut, touched the sword and as a result, fell into a delusion which drove him to attack Sakaki?" Katsura asked sharply, and Keitarou shrugged.

"You have a better suggestion?" he asked, and Katsura hesitated, then shook his head.

"I don't know," he confessed, "but I do know Koku. He doesn't do anything rashly, and he's never risen to anything Sakaki's done in the past, no matter what she says or does. That he'd go deliberately to the hut to get the sword..."

"You think he did?" Keitarou was surprised. "I had assumed the shinigami, when infiltrating our territory, went there and found it."

"But a shinigami wouldn't be able to touch it easily, surely?"

"Perhaps not, and so dropped it, so when Koku appeared on the scene, it afflicted him," Keitarou reflected. "It's the best... the only explanation I have at present."

You don't think he wanted to save the Shinigami?

Katsura bit back the words that burned against his tongue, seeing again the whiteness of Keitarou's knuckles and the tension in his frame.

No, you don't want to think that that's what happened. You've absorbed the possibility that he deliberately took the sword and went to protect the shinigami against Sakaki's brutality, but it hurts you, so you won't voice it. That makes me all the more certain that's what happened. And, of everything Sakaki said, the thing that rings the most true is... that he didn't hurt her. He frightened her and sent her home, but he didn't try to kill her. And that, more than anything, indicates to me that he wasn't in any kind of delusion when he intervened. Whatever he did, he did it with purpose and intent. I don't know what that intent was, but I'm sure he was in his right mind, even if he was holding that blade at the time.

Still, though, of all people, if Koku betrayed you, it would hurt you the worst, wouldn't it, Father? If you knew I'd told Mitsuki about Kurotsuchi, even then, you'd not be as worried as you are right now.

A faint pang resonated against Katsura's heart at this realisation, but he pushed it back.

"Mother and Sakaki have gone, you said?" he asked, and Keitarou nodded.

"We will evacuate, and quickly," he said matter-of-factly. "I have been to the hut already and claimed what I could find. There's nothing of value left there, and I'll find a way to manage the sword. I stayed behind to wait for you, and, I hoped, Koku, but if it's just you, well, then we can't delay. Given the possibility that the shinigami escaped, our removal to the Spiritless Zone's abandoned territory is even more pressing. Sakaki let slip that the man she killed had connections to the Endou — that being the case, it's safer to assume that there will be some kind of reprisal."

"You don't think they'll come looking for us there, too?" Katsura was taken aback, and Keitarou shook his head.

"I intend on leaving a paper trail for them to follow in quite another direction, since I'm certain that, if Ukitake Juushirou and his companions get a scent of my name, they'll be here like hounds after a fox," he said simply. "I know the Endou-ke... intimately, as it happens. Their current leader is not like those who went before, which may be to our benefit, but it may not. Sakaki wasn't clear on the identity of the man she killed, just that he was an Endou — until I've ascertained what level of Endou, I think caution to be the better part of valour."

Katsura's brows knitted together for a moment, then,

"I don't know much about the Endou," he admitted at length, "but if they're that dangerous, are you sure we shouldn't be trying to leave Rukongai altogether? And what about Koku and Kurotsuchi? We've found no sign of either, and..."

"Those who aren't here will have to take care of themselves," Keitarou cut across him impatiently, and Keitarou felt his father's reiatsu flicker a little as though trying to control his temper yet again. "You said yourself that Kurotsuchi was now suspected — well, what he doesn't know, he can't be tortured into telling. I don't believe he'll talk, but just in case, it's safer that way. As for Koku, that's for me to consider, not you. As I already said, I know the Endou. If they have any clue at all to us being in Rukongai — and if somehow that shinigami made it back, even if he dropped dead on the spot as I think is most likely, we can't be too careful. They are a family of hunters, and wounded, they will hunt even more obsessively until they rake their claws through their prey. In this case, your family and the defenseless people of the village — do you want that to happen?"

"Of course not!" despite himself, Katsura paled, shaking his head hurriedly.

"Then stop wasting time here. Go find your mother and your sister, and help them with the evacuation. Make sure you leave no trace that this place was ever lived in — take everything that indicates it was.”

“...Even Koku’s books?” Katsura paused, and Keitarou faltered, then nodded.

“Them, too,” he agreed, and Katsura could hear the forced note in his voice. “Everything, Katsura. Don’t make me say it again.”

“Yes, sir,” Katsura knew not to push his father any further, and he nodded, casting a last look back at the hut before dropping into shunpo and heading off in search of his kin.

But Koku’s whereabouts is bothering you as much or more than it is me, and that in itself is cause for concern. You usually have an answer for everything, Father... but this time, even you’re lost. Koku, what the hell were you playing at? Did you help the Shinigami? If you did, why? And what does it mean, now, for you and for us?

He was so young.

Kirio stood at the foot of the low-slung pallet bed, a troubled look on her pretty features as she gazed down at the stranger they had brought in from the Seireitei border. He was clean of blood now, robed in fresh bedclothes with his wounds cleaned and patched with the best herbal antiseptics Mitsuki had been able to provide. All the available operatives Fourth had to spare were currently at Seventh, she knew, fighting to save the life of the Vice Captain, but Kirio had seen Souja’s wounds for herself and privately she doubted that the Endou heir would survive the night, no matter what they did to him. Shikiki was the only healer whose abilities might have an impact but news had already filtered back to Thirteenth that her friend had been dispatched to help clear up the aftermath of a serious Hollow attack on a village in District Six, and, as a result, she was not on duty in Seireitei that night. Though certain an urgent alert had already been sent out to retrieve her, Kirio was not sure her old Academy classmate would return in time.

She turned her gaze back to the patient in the bed. Who he was was still a mystery, as was where he had come from, or why. When examining the injuries Kikyue’s sword had inflicted, Mitsuki had commented on the dusty nature of his clothing and the tattered length of cloth that had held tousled hair in a ragged tail. He had seemed somehow older then, unkempt and spattered with Souja’s blood, but now, lying on fresh white bedding and with his long brown hair not only clean but combed and tied in a neat tail that fell over his shoulder, she saw for the first time that he was younger than she had imagined, younger even than Souja, she guessed, perhaps not even fully into his majority.

Juushirou had returned to the division a few hours earlier with little new to report, and had dispatched Naoko and Makoto to check the local villages in the area where Souja had been discovered, just in case anyone there had seen or heard anything, or knew who the mysterious young man was. So far nobody had come forward to claim the stray, and Naoko — after instructing her Captain in terse tones to ‘go to bed, get some rest and let others handle things’ had taken the decision to go further afield in search of clues. Kirio too had felt the jerk in spiritual energy that implied the use of a Senkaimon, and this coupled with the lack of information so far seemed confirmation that they had travelled away from the scene of attack, but from where was still unclear. How Naoko planned on tracking down the original crime scene, Kirio was not sure, but it was somehow comforting to know that her senior officer was trying. Though they were strangers, Kirio could not forget the fear that had flickered in the stray’s gaze in the moments before he had lost consciousness, and she badly wanted to find someone or something that would bring him reassurance that he had not fallen into enemy hands. A familiar face when he returned to consciousness would make all the difference and, although Naoko had warned her not to get emotionally involved until they knew all of the particulars, Kirio knew that she had already crossed that line. Juushirou trusting him to her care was a test of her rank and responsibility as sixth seat, but for Kirio, who had been abandoned by her own family and left to wander aimlessly around the Districts until taken pity on by a childless couple, the idea of this young man struck down and ferried far from everything and everyone he knew struck a chord with her.

“We know nothing about District people and even if he helped Souja-dono, it doesn’t necessarily mean he’s amenable to Shinigami help,” Naoko had advised her crisply, as she had prepared to leave the barracks. “Do what Taichou told you to do, but no more. If he wakes, report it. That’s all you need to worry about — given the stakes involved, it’s best you’re careful.”

“But he’s just a boy, Naoko-san,” Kirio had protested, and Naoko had grimaced, shooting her a wry look.

“Since he helped Souja-dono, he’s probably not a vigilante or an insurgent, but bringing a District individual back here is outside of normal protocol and it’ll create excitement when word spreads,” she had replied with a shrug. “I know that look, Kirio, and you probably won’t listen — but sometimes you have to think like a soldier rather than like a civilian. We don't know this lad, and while I have faith in Mitsuki's ministrings, we can't guarantee what state he'll be in when he wakes. Like as not he'll be angry — he might even try to lash out, and I don't want to see another officer hurt."

"Taichou trusted him to me," Kirio had responded firmly. "I won't do anything stupid, Naoko-san, and I won't get hurt. I don't think he's dangerous, anyway."

"Suit yourself," Naoko had responded simply, disappearing out into the night, and at the memory of her superior's expression, Kirio frowned, wondering what it had meant.

I don't understand why she should mind so much. He's hurt, and he tried to help Souja-dono... I don't see what harm he could be to me. The way she looked at me, though, it was like she was thinking of something different. Another officer hurt... I felt like she didn't mean Souja-dono at all, but someone else. Sometimes Naoko-san is so easy to understand, then other times she's not. Still, I think she's being over cautious. I know not every situation is how it seems... but...

She turned her gaze back towards the wounded boy.
Edogawa-san didn't seem to think you needed spirit cuffs, and she wasn't worried about a hostile reaction. I know Naoko-san's looking out for me, but we need to win your trust and we won't do that by treating you like a prisoner. You're the only other one who was there with Souja-dono, and whether that was coincidence or not, we need you to put together the missing clues in the puzzle of who or what could've committed such a horrific crime.

"Kirio-neesan?"

A voice at the doorway made her turn to see Ketsui shadowed in the light of the kidou lamp that illuminated the hallway beyond, his own pale eyes clouded with concern. As their gazes met, Kirio knew that the officer had brought news, and at the preoccupation she saw in his expression, she felt her heart clench.

"Ketsui...? What..."

"Ten-nii is here," Ketsui spoke slowly and evenly, turning to glance at the corridor behind him, and for the first time Kirio made out the taller, broader figure of her old school friend, his own expression an undisguised mask of distress. There were the unmistakable traces of tears glinting against his lashes, the sight of them making her heart lurch again and she hurried forwards, reaching out to grasp him by the hands.

“Tenichi-kun? Why are you... how...”

“Kyouraku-taichou sent me here from Seventh,” Tenichi’s words were low and uneven, as though he were trying to hold back a further flow of emotion. “He sent me here because he thought I was the best person to come. He wanted me... he told me to... report to the people here. I need to see... Ukitake-taichou. I need to... report.”

“Taichou’s sleeping, and we’ve been told not to wake him,” Kirio bit her lip. “He didn’t sleep any last night, and he started coughing when he came back here, so Naoko-san and Edogawa-san made him go to bed. Edogawa-san gave him something herbal — I think he’ll sleep for a little while.”

“Sleeping?” Tenichi looked stricken. “But I was ordered... Kyouraku-taichou ordered... I have to... I need to...”

He trailed off incoherently, apparently unable to complete the sentence in his agitation, and Kirio bit her lip, gazing at him in dismay.

“Tenichi-kun?”

“Taichou’s sleeping, but Fukutaichou’s here,” Ketsui suggested quickly, a quick glance up at his brother telling Kirio that the younger man was just as concerned as she was about their companion’s uncharacteristic behaviour. “Shall I go get him... would he do instead?”

“He’ll have to.” Kirio made up her mind, seeing that Tenichi was apparently beyond making any kind of decision. nodding her head in Ketsui’s direction. “Yes, Ketsui, go get him, as speedily as you’re able. Tell him it’s important — Taichou would delegate, so that’s what we’ll do, too.”

The Tenth Seated officer sent her a look of relief that someone had taken charge, ducking between the two older shinigami and disappearing off down the hallway. Tenichi and Kirio stood in troubled silence which stretched on for a few minutes, then Tenichi gulped, detaching his wrist from her grip and dashing away the glitter of fresh tears from his lashes.

“Its my fault,” he murmured, more than half to himself, and Kirio frowned, realising that her friend’s body was trembling.

“Come inside,” she decided, pushing back the door of the sick room and gesturing for him to follow her within. “Come in and sit down. If anyone sees you in the hallway, they’ll get worried — and though I’m worried, I don’t want to start a riot. Ketsui will be back with Fukutaichou soon... and nobody else is here except the young lad that was brought here. He's sedated and sleeping, so... we can talk."

"There's nothing to talk about," Tenichi shook his head numbly, but did not resist Kirio's gentle tug at his fingers, guiding him through the open doorway and into the small chamber. "It's my fault. You can't change that... it's because of me."

"What is?" Kirio gazed up at him, and the look in Tenichi's pale eyes almost broke her heart. "Tenichi-kun, what's happened? At Seventh... what did Kyouraku-taichou send you here to say?"

Tenichi drew a shaky breath into his lungs, and Kirio bit her lip.

"Souja... dono?"

Slowly Tenichi shook his head, and Kirio closed her eyes briefly.

"Then Shikiki..."

"She's not arrived back yet," Tenichi shook his head again, his words numb and somehow distant, yet the tears began to trickle soundlessly down his cheeks. "Apparently some people in Sixth District were badly hurt, including an officer. Unohana-taichou sent a message, but I don't know... if Shikiki got it yet, and even if she did... it... it doesn't... matter... now. Kyouraku-taichou s... said it was too late... anyway. He... was... too sick to save. Even Unohana-taichou s... said it... that he sh... should have been dead when you found him, only... he hung on. Unohana-taichou did everything she could, but... K... Kyouraku-taichou thinks Souja-dono only... held on... to report back. He thinks once that was done, S... Souja-dono didn't have any strength left. Not even Unohana-taichou could change it. He... was sleeping... and just... slipped away."

"I see."

Kirio turned to glance at the sleeping patient once more, then back to her friend.

"I'm sorry, Tenichi-kun. It must be horrible... your Vice Captain, and to be out there and not be able to do anything..."

"But you don't understand. It's my fault," Tenichi was agitated, pulling away from her once more. "I did this... it was me. Because of me... this happened because..."

He trailed off, his face paling suddenly, and Kirio frowned, following his gaze to the sleeping form in the bed.

"He's all right. He won't hear us," she repeated. "I can't leave him

— I promised I'd stay here while Edogawa-san went to fetch more herbal supplies from the Fourth, and in any case, Taichou entrusted him to me. I can't let anyone down — especially not now, not with what you've come to report.”

“Who... is he?” There was a strange trepidation in Tenichi's voice, and Kirio realised that her friend could not process any more unexpected surprises on top of the morning's events.

“We don't know,” she admitted with a sigh. “We know nothing about him or where he came from. He was with Souja-dono in the forest, that's all we know. He's probably from a District settlement, but aside from that...”

“A District boy...?” Tenichi echoed these words as if unable to comprehend them, then, “With Souja-dono?”

“It seems he was some kind of good samaritan,” Kirio agreed. “Souja-dono managed to tell Taichou and Kikyue-dono that much when I was there, so I'm pretty sure that's right. Otherwise...”

She shrugged her shoulders.

“How they met, who he is, what the connection was, where it happened... all of that's a mystery. Right now the only brief I have is to take care of him — till he wakes up, that's all any of us can do.”

Tenichi did not reply, his troubled gaze still fixed on the face of the sleeping stranger, and Kirio frowned, giving him a little shake.

“Stop it. Look at me,” she commanded, reaching up to forcibly turn his chin towards hers. “What happened to Souja-dono wasn't your fault. Stop saying crazy things as though it was, because we both know that's impossible. You tried your best — everyone did. Kikyue-dono, Taichou, me, your comrades... everyone tried. It's not your fault.”

“No...” Tenichi wetted his lips, glancing back at the bed uneasily for a moment before meeting her gaze with a clouded one of his own. “It's my fault. I don't even... I can't even put it into words how I feel, but I know... because of me...”

“I know it's a shock,” Kirio softened her voice, “but Tenichi-kun, stop and listen to how crazy you sound. Do you think for one moment that anyone in Seventh Division wanted Souja-dono to die? Don't you think everyone's wishing they could've done more to save him? Heck, I was there, I saw him... but the truth is, nobody could. Not even Unohana-Taichou — you can't blame yourself like this.”

“But I killed him,” Tenichi reiterated flatly. “Because of me... I killed him. I did this.”

“That’s stupid,” Kirio said bluntly, giving him a little shake as if trying to bring him back to his senses. “Of course you didn’t kill him, you idiot. Do you think I — or anyone else — is going to believe that?”

“They should,” Tenichi turned away, his voice becoming strange. “I can’t explain, Kirio, but I know. Here...” he patted his chest helplessly, “I feel it. I know. It’s like he’s there, haunting me... I know.”

“Listen to yourself,” Kirio begged. “You’re not capable of killing anyone, and you didn’t hurt Souja-dono. Someone did, something did, but it wasn’t you. Your blade didn’t do this. You didn’t do this. Stop saying that you did — we both know it’s crazy talk!”

“But it is because of me, all the same,” Tenichi swallowed hard, touching Kirio’s cheek briefly before lowering his hand. “Maybe it wasn’t my sword, but even so... you don’t understand. Its because I got taken away, and now...”

He faltered, fresh tears glittering on his lashes once more, and Kirio sighed, taking him to the side of the room and ushering him down on the bench.

“I’ve never seen you like this,” she murmured, sitting down next to him and resting her hand on his arm. “You respected Souja-dono, I know that. A lot of people did, and I can’t stop thinking about poor Kikyue-dono, her expression when she saw him... but listen, this has to stop. You’re upset, grieving — it’s natural. However, you can’t blame yourself for something beyond your power. You didn’t mean to get abducted. Yes, it happened, but you’re safe now and Souja-dono would have been the first one to tell you you were being foolish, reacting like this. He’d want you to be strong and look to catching the real culprits — he wouldn’t have blamed you and so you mustn’t, either.”

“But...”

“Endou-taichou hasn’t, has he?” Kirio questioned. “Kikyue-dono didn’t say anything, in a fit of emotion, that made you upset like this?”

“No...” Tenichi shook her head. “No, it’s just...”

He swallowed hard, lowering his tones.

“Souja-dono disappeared last night, and people... think he was looking for clues about what happened to me,” he said uneasily, burying his head in his hands in frustration. “I hesitated in telling Kikyue-dono something that Souja-dono told me not to tell anyone, but maybe because of that... and I didn’t want this. I didn’t, Kirio! I didn’t want Souja-dono hurt, I really didn’t!”

“Well of course you didn’t,” Kirio blinked, staring at him in confusion. “I know that. Everyone knows that. You shouldn’t even feel the need to say it.”

“I really never meant... I was just... so many confusing things are going through my mind,” Tenichi groaned, “and I can’t tell you any of them. You wouldn’t understand what I’m thinking at the moment... or how much I hate it. I can’t make sense of anything... but I know... this is somehow... because of me. Even if you say it’s not... I know it is and it won’t change. Some things can’t be forgiven... this is one of those times.”

“Shh,” Kirio reached out a reassuring arm to hug him, but he pushed her back.

“I don’t deserve sympathy from you,” he said bleakly. “From you, from Ketsui, from anyone. I’ll report to Houjou-fukutaichou and then I’ll go back. I should go back... and do what I can for my division. I don’t want to see him lying there, not again, but if that’s part of my penance, so be it.”

“Tenichi...”

“Tenichi, what’s up?” At that moment, Enishi strode into the room, effectively breaking up the conversation, and Kirio glanced up, relief flooding her features at the sight of the broad-built, matter-of-fact officer.

“Fukutaichou, Tenichi’s come from Seventh... from Kyouraku-taichou, and it’s not good news,” she said quietly, getting to her feet and bowing her head towards her superior officer. “He wanted the Taichou, but I told him that wasn’t possible, so he’d like to report to you instead. He’s... he’s very upset about it, and... I think... he needs to calm down. He’s blaming himself, and...”

“Don’t talk about me like I’m not here,” Tenichi got to his feet, pushing past her and moving to face the startled Enishi head on. “I’ve got a report to give and I’ll give it. If it’s all I can do right today, dammit, I’ll at the very least do that.”

“I see,” Enishi’s genial features became sober, and he clapped a thick paw down on Tenichi’s shoulder. “Fair enough, then. Come with me to my office. We'll talk there, and you can tell me everything Kyouraku told you to report. If it's as I think it is, I dare say Seventh'll want you back smartish, so sooner you discharge your duty and get your second wind the better."

He cast Kirio a glance.

"I sent Ketsui to help Kira oversee the juniors. They're flapping about all the comings and goings, and Shikibu and Atsudane still haven't returned from their factfinding mission, so for the time being you're the next highest ranking officer on duty here. If Tsukabishi comes back from Second before I'm done, tell him what's what, but I want you to stop with the young'un here and keep tabs on him like Edogawa and the Taichou asked you, all right? That seems like a pretty important duty — it looks like we're going to need him, and whatever it is he knows about this mess."

At these words, Kirio half-thought she saw Tenichi flinch, but he did not meet her eyes, and the moment was gone as quickly as it had come, for Enishi more or less frog-marched his former subordinate from the room, closing the door behind him with a reassuring bang that seemed to bring the world back into sudden clear focus.

Souja-dono is dead.

Kirio moved to sit down beside the bed, reaching delicate fingers to brush wisps of straggly brown hair out of the sleeping youngster's face.

I wonder if he was able to tell Endou-taichou anything before he died. I wonder if you know what happened, and whether you'll be able to wake and tell us how we can bring a murderer to justice.

She rested her hand briefly against the young man's shoulder, then withdrew it with a sigh.

Naoko-san is right about one thing, you have no reason to trust us and you might be angry or afraid, when you wake. Kikyue-dono went in with her blade before she knew what was what, and you must've been frightened. Souja-dono stopped her from killing you — but why should you trust people who hurt you when all you did was try to help a wounded man? You have nothing to do with our problems or our politics, yet here you are anyway, a victim of them all the same.

She rubbed her temples, suddenly tired.

You're so young... no older than our youngest recruits. Do you have family? Are they worried for you — are they looking for you right now? I wish I knew. I feel we need to make it up to you and prove we're not the bad guys... but it will be a miracle if you don't take a hate to us the moment you wake.

And then there's Tenichi...

She chewed on her lip.

I never saw him like that before. Not even when Irie-san died... not even then. Then he was the strong one — it was Ketsui-kun who needed reassurance, and it was Tenichi-kun who gave it. I didn't think it was possible to fluster him... but I guess given everything that's happened to him lately, it's just one burden too many. Perhaps Souja-dono was trying to find out what happened, and got too close to the truth, but even so, it doesn't make it Tenichi-kun's fault.

She folded her arms across her chest, picturing her friend's uncharacteristically unstable demeanour.

Would I be like that, if something happened to Fukutaichou?

She pressed her lips together, reflecting on her time in the Thirteenth, and the strong sense of trust and reassurance that Enishi's presence generally brought to the busy bustle of division life. For a moment she found herself trying to envisage the division without the broad-built Yamamoto's easy presence, but try as she might she could not picture his absence.

Maybe I would. No, almost certainly I would. I'd be angry. I'd cry. I'd be upset. And if, like Tenichi-kun, it was connected to something that happened to me, I'd feel guilty. I'd feel broken up and confused, and maybe I'd react in the same way. But... more than anything, I'd want to find the truth. And... perhaps that's what needs to happen here, too.

She cast a glance at the sleeping stranger, inwardly making up her mind.

Then it's decided. I'm going to win your trust, one way or another. I don't even know who you are yet, not even your name, but I'm going to find a way to do it regardless. For Tenichi-kun's sake and Souja-dono's justice, that's something I can do. Maybe, if I can piece together what really happened to Souja-dono and why, maybe then it will lay Tenichi-kun's fears to rest. Perhaps he'll be able to find closure and move on. At least... at least I really hope so, because I don't want to see him like that ever again. If you can help me do it, District stranger, then I'll find a way to convince you we're not your enemies. Taichou trusted you to me... and now, I'm going to make sure I don't let him down!

29. Manjushage

Chapter Twenty Eight: Manjushage

The day of Souja's funeral dawned grey and overcast, a thick layer of mourning cloud woven across the bright rays of the Seireitei sun as the mourners gathered to pay their last respects to a young man cut down in the prime of his life. They were many. Every Captain and Vice Captain of the Gotei had travelled to Seventh District's central manor for the ceremony, along with the entirety of the Seventh Division, their shihakushou neat and properly pressed, the obi at their waists not the usual white of their daily uniform but the dark red of the Endou Clan as a mark of respect for their deputy's passing. Though the urgency of the situation and the potential threat Souja's death had opened up against the Gotei were fresh on everyone's minds, there was nonetheless a sense of mutual grief and respect for an adjutant who, with his inoffensive courtesy and reasoned temperament, had been well respected by all he had met. Many had looked to him to continue the peaceful policies Hirata and his father had extended across the once war-torn region and now, with the body laid out in state before them, the hopes of not only one Clan but Seireitei as a whole seemed to be fragile, capable of crumbling into dust.

White was the colour of the dead, therefore Endou Clan custom forbade the wearing of it by any other at a Clan funeral, and as a result, no Captain had worn their haori to the proceedings, casting a muted tone over the gathering. Each Clan Captain had additionally chosen to wear an obi in subdued Clan colours in order to respect the Seventh District custom. Souja alone was robed in snow white, his injured body having been carefully and tenderly washed and dressed in expensive mulberry-silk weave cloth that was wrapped tightly around his damaged torso with a wide sash of deepest ruby. His thick dark hair had been brushed and pulled over his shoulder in a casual tail, fastened by a silver clasp engraved with the Clan emblem of the bird of prey surveying his domain. At a glance, his expression was one of serenity, as though reposed in sleep, but the unnatural ashiness of his skin gave away the fact that the lips, though parted, drew no breath, and that the spirit, once vibrant and full of promise had long since begun to scatter into the crisp District Seven ether. At his side lay his sword, sheathed in its ebony-carved scabbard to conceal the fragmenting blade that lay within, an identical wrap of ruby cloth swathing the hilt as though to indicate the passing of two noble spirits, not just the one. Souja had been a brave shinigami, a resolute fighter and a diligent swordsman — and Hirata had decreed that he would leave the world as such, with dignity and pride as a son of the Endou Clan.

He was reposed on a square board of polished wood, smooth and carefully carved for the occasion with a frame of bamboo slats supporting a thin mesh canopy to protect the corpse in the event of inclement weather. Beneath, tightly packed wadges of straw and wood formed the basis of the funeral pyre. Hirata had chosen to have his son cremated, ostensibly on account of the severe injury the boy had sustained against his untraced assailant, and, on consultation with the family, they too had agreed. Though nobody had voiced it, all had been painfully aware of the other reasons for Hirata's choice — although the Endou and Urahara shared distant blood, the Urahara Clan disdained cremation, and by choosing to put his only son's body to the flame, Hirata was making clear his desire to separate his family from the shackles of that biological connection. It was not Nagesu nor the people of Third District who had inspired this bitter decision, as all present knew, but the recognition of his sister's betrayal and of Keitarou's true heritage that had made him decide to revert to the traditional funerary rites of his own Clan instead of the usual compromise of ritual which had dominated the previous few generations. Souja would not be hidden in a coffin, nor bound in stone beneath the earth in the vaults of the Endou ancestors, but rather would be cast into the atmosphere as a spirit of smoke.

Now, for the first time since a generation before Shouichi had wrought havoc through the District and slaughtered his way to power, a solemn line of Clansfolk filed towards the pyre to offer prayers and lay flowers around the silent corpse. At the head of the procession was Hirata himself, who paused for a moment with distant, heavy eyes as he regarded his son's still features, reaching out a gloved hand towards his cheek before stopping, and pulling back. There was a moment of complete silence, as he gathered his emotions, then, very gently he reached down to place the single iris bloom against Souja's chalk-white sword hand. The bloom was a deep reddish purple, the hana-shoubu whose silhouette adorned the adjutant's badge that lay in state at Souja's feet, and the meaning of Hirata's gesture was not lost on any of those gathered. The flower was the traditional blossom of the Endou, its delicate petals the determined reddish hue that typified the warrior family, as well as being a symbol of Souja's position as adjutant of the Gotei squad. More than this, though, it was the name of the flower, the 'shoubu', which was engraved most deeply into the minds of the congregation. It was a challenge, a cry of war in a time of grief, a resolution that, no matter what the cost, Hirata intended to avenge his son's death.

He pressed his hands together, closing his eyes for a moment, then turned away from the pyre, his expression calm and settled, but his pale eyes glittering with something few had seen there before. A chill wind whipped around the grounds, causing more than one member of Seventh to shiver and wrap their arms more tightly around their bodies as they cast hesitant, anxious looks in the direction of their Captain. Though he seemed calm, he it was a dangerous kind of calm, and those who had worked with him for a long period of time knew that he was only just keeping the predator under wraps. The hawk wanted vengeance, and only the need for propriety held it in check.

From the heart of the cluster of Seventh Division members, Tenichi watched his Captain's actions in numb, detached silence. The sight of Souja's body, so serene and still atop the pyre had awakened both panic and remorse in his heart, reviving the memory of Masaya's warning words and then, that frantic moment when he had heard Kikyue's yell of grief and knew that his Vice Captain lay dead. Shunsui had sent him to report to Thirteenth, believing that he was in shock from the tragedy, but it ran deeper than that inside of him and, although he had tried to push it away and focus on his duty, it kept returning, eating away at him piece by piece until it disrupted his dreams and tortured his waking moments. More than anything he had not wanted to come to the funeral, but more than anyone he knew he could not avoid it. It was his fault, he kept reminding himself darkly. He hadn't chosen it to happen, nor had he ordered it, but he was responsible for it all the same. He had allowed himself to be snared by Masaya, taken to Keitarou, and then he had lied. Souja had asked him for the truth and he had not given it, and because of that... because of his deceit...

He shook his head as if to clear it, afraid his emotions would spill over once again. Souja's mother now stood at her son's side, a dark veil covering her face and concealing from view the tears that Tenichi felt certain were flowing copiously down the elegant, gentle woman's cheeks. Ai was a hime, not a soldier, and unused to the brutality of conflict so close to her door. Her hands shook as she laid her bundle of flowers beside Souja's head, then, very slowly, she bent down towards him, pushing back her veil just the slightest bit to brush her lips briefly against Souja's brow. At this heartfelt farewell from mother to child, Tenichi's heart spasmed with genuine grief, remembering his own mother's death and the night that Keitarou had called for them, bringing medicine and memories of a time long since left behind. He had not realised then, he told himself bitterly, that Keitarou's appearance would eventually bring him to this point.

As Ai turned from the pyre, she stumbled slightly as though her emotions had overwhelmed her, and Hirata took her arm gently, leading her away from the scene in solemn silence. Kikyue was next, dressed, unlike her mother, in the muted robes of a shinigami on duty, with only her Clan pendant about her throat to show her true connection to the dead man. Her eyes were red and her cheeks pale, but there was an angry defiance in her aura that had seemed lacking since the day of her brother's death, and as she reached Souja's side, she touched his free hand, taking his fingers in hers and squeezing them hard. Her lips moved, and though Tenichi could not hear what she was saying, he felt sure that she too was affirming her father's declaration and assuring her brother that they would find and destroy the people responsible.

Misashi was the next to pay his respects, leading the youngest member of Hirata's family by the hand as he gently guided her forwards. Sayuri was eight years old, Tenichi remembered with a stab of anguish, a very young, innocent eight, yet she too was robed in the mourning colours of her family, her dark hair properly fastened and her Clan pendant glittering around her neck. From there, though, the illusion of a Clan himewas shattered, for there was no concealing the grief in the young girl's eyes as she hurried forward, tears streaming down already stained cheeks.

"Oniisama," she sobbed, her words soft but loud enough for the crowd at large to hear them. "Oniisama, don't go! Don't leave Sayuri behind!"

From the side, there was a choked sob from Ai's direction at her daughter's plaintive words, and Kikyue grabbed her mother's other arm as if to give her reassurance.

Sayuri had reached the pyre by now, her petite form just tall enough to be able to see over the top, and as she stretched out small hands to lay her precious burden of crimson flowers at her brother's side, Misashi caught up with her, crouching at her side and putting his hand on her shoulder.

"It's time to say goodbye to Oniisama," he said quietly, his tones grave. "Say goodbye, Sayuri-chan... Souja will be sad, otherwise, if you don't say it properly."

Sayuri gulped, a fresh storm of tears in her pale bluish eyes, but at Misashi's urging she nodded bravely, standing up on tiptoes and, in imitation of her mother, planting a kiss on her brother's cheek.

“Sayuri will be good, Oniisama,” she murmured, her tones uneven and punctuated by catches in her breathing. “Sayuri will be good, so don’t worry. Sayuri will help Hahaue and Chichiue, I promise. Please go to a good place, Oniisama. Sl... sleep peacefully.”

“Good girl,” Tenichi heard Misashi murmur, and the older man rested a hand briefly on Souja’s shoulder before turning to lead the little girl away. Tenichi closed his eyes, swallowing hard as he tried to erase the image from his thoughts. More than one of his companions were also biting back tears — to his left, Nakata had an expensive silk handkerchief in his hand and was unashamedly mopping at his eyes. Sneaking a sidelong glance at his roommate, Tenichi envied the older man’s ability to let his emotions flow. If he released the floodgates on his, he knew that there would be no reeling it back in... and beneath his grief and his horror at what had happened, he could not escape that stifling, overwhelming sense of fear.

If I told someone, what would happen to me? If I did, what would happen to Ketsui? I can’t. I can’t say anything. Souja-dono is dead. He can’t tell anyone anything, either, if he even knew.

He swallowed hard, troubled by the brief flicker of relief that stirred in his heart.

I’m not glad he’s dead. I’m not! I didn’t want this! I’m not his enemy, not the Taichou’s, not anyone’s. I didn’t promise to become Keitarou-san’s ally, nor did I agree to any of this! I only wanted to help the people in the Districts... I’m not happy he’s dead and I’m not going to be relieved about it!

“Kotetsu, you all right?” Nakata murmured at this juncture, nudging his companion, and Tenichi started, staring at his roommate for a moment before hurriedly gathering his wits.

“As all right as anyone can be, given the circumstance,” he murmured, and Nakata nodded sombrely.

“We’ll get him, though,” he replied frankly. “We’ll get him, cut him down and make him wish he’d never crossed the Seventh. Mark my words, we will... nobody is going to get away with doing this to the Endou or to Seventh Division.”

Tenichi didn’t answer, his heart spasming once more as he found he had to look away. The Captains were now paying their respects, he realised with a jolt, led by Nagesu, as current Leader of the Council, with Juushirou bringing up the rear. Even he had chosen to obey the traditions of the Endou Clan, despite his District status, for his obi was a dull cobalt grey instead of its usual pristine white. His thin, pale features appeared worn and preoccupied, and Tenichi pressed his lips together, remembering that his former Captain had a long association with the Endou and had known Souja from infancy.

“Cremation is unusual,” he managed at last, realising that Nakata was expecting him to make some kind of response. “I didn’t think that happened in Seventh — I thought, because of their Urahara connections...”

“The one behind this is a damned Urahara, so like Hell would the Captain pander to those traditions,” Nakata muttered, and Tenichi flinched at the venom in his companion’s voice. “Ah, no offence to Nagesu-sama and his kind, of course, but as insults go, enough is enough. Besides, this is the true Endou way of seeing off a dead spirit. You’ve heard the stories, I s’pose? Being in Seventh, I guess you must’ve.”

“Stories?” Tenichi was jerked momentarily from his reverie, gazing at his friend in confusion, and Nakata sighed, shaking his head.

“Endou are a rough bunch. You know that bit for sure,” he said matter-of-factly. “In times past, there were lots of murders and struggles over power. It was tradition then, y’see, to cremate the spirit and send the ashes into the ether as smoke. Well, that was the spirit of the person, you see... leaving this plane and going to hunt down their enemies from the next. Instead of casing them in stone, which the Urahara brought to this District, they’d be set free to roam and bring down their foes.”

“Hunt... down...?” Tenichi visibly blanched, and Nakata nodded.

“That’s what they say,” he agreed, apparently oblivious to his roommate’s sudden change of colour. “The flowers, too. A shoubu is a challenge, right? A contest, win or lose, a battle to the death if need be. That’s why the hana-shoubu belongs to our squad, but it’s the Endou’s flower first and foremost. And the spider lilies, the manjushage that everyone else is laying down, that’s another thing. In Endou tradition, the manjushage has special powers to waken the spirit of the dead and send him out looking for vengeance. It’s because it’s the colour of blood... legend has it that Endou dead don’t rest till every one of their enemies lies in his grave.”

Tenichi swallowed hard, turning to glance back at the funeral pyre with new eyes. Though he was not normally given to superstition, suddenly the masses of red-blossomed spider lily flowers made him uneasy, surrounding Souja’s body like a protective aura of blood-red blooms. Did they really have the power to stir Souja from his sleep and send him hunting for vengeance? Could he know from beyond the grave..?

“None of that stuff is true, Nakata, it’s just legends,” the division’s Fifth seat put austere in before Tenichi’s mind could run away with itself. “Living people are the ones who hunt down enemies, not the dead.”

“Well, maybe so,” Nakata acknowledged, “but I’m just filling Kotetsu in on the cultural history. Figured he ought to know, since we’ll be up soon to lay our flowers and pay our respects to the Fuku.”

“We... will?” Tenichi looked uncertain, and Nakata nodded.

“S’why we’re here and in uniform like this,” he responded simply. “You’re white as a sheet, you know — pull yourself together a little, huh? He was a fine man and we’re all going to miss him — but it’s down to us, now, to take up where he left off. If the Fuku’s ghost isn’t going to haunt his enemies to death, well, we’ve gotta do it for him. We’re his agents of justice, if you like... our duty to him is to avenge him, no matter what.”

“You can’t honestly believe that you’ll settle Kotetsu’s nerves that way,” the Fifth seat snorted. “He’s not an Endou, Nakata, he can’t be expected to understand how our Clan works.”

Tenichi bit his lip, remembering Masaya’s clinical words about Souja once more.

“I think maybe I do,” he murmured. “To be his vengeance... is now our job?”

“Of course,” Nakata agreed solemnly. “He was our Fuku. He won’t rest easy till the one who killed him is sleeping just as soundly.”

“Seventh, pipe down and get into formation,” The hissed words of the division’s Fourth Seat prevented Tenichi from responding, casting them all a meaningful glare. “Remember where you are. We’re up next, and Taichou’s said anyone who disgraces the squad here today will answer to his sword for it after the ceremony, so let’s do things right.”

The flames licked high up into the sky, bending and dancing and making the air warp and haze with the heat and smoke of the inferno.

From his hidden location, far from the crowd of sombrely dressed shinigami and Clansfolk, a solitary figure watched the fire burn, his fists clenched tightly beneath the dark folds of the heavy cloak that concealed him. Deep beneath the cowed hood, two silver eyes glittered with the tell-tale sign of tears as he witnessed the Endou Clan Leader's sole son and heir being returned to the ether.

Everything he had tried to prevent... and yet it had ended like this.

The tears trickled down Joumei's ash-white cheeks, but they were tears of anger and frustration as much as they were grief, a swirl of uncharacteristic emotions filling his usually calm, composed heart. Death did not normally shake him — it was a normal, accepted part of life that the Kitsune had embraced in order to live in freedom, but then, this time was different. This was not a Kitsune being returned to the earth, but another, a man whose death Joumei had not been ready for, and therefore one which had hurt him twice as much. It was as though the flames of Souja's funeral pyre had set light to his own pride and spirit, for deep inside of him he felt a genuine swell of indignation that one he considered a friend had been so ill abused.

Keitarou.

His eyes narrowed to argent slits, hate filling his mind at the thought of the Kitsune's nemesis.

You did this, I know you did. Somehow, for some reason of your own, you took Souja-dono from us and from Hirata-sama. It won't be forgiven, or forgotten.

He leaned back against the trunk of a nearby tree, watching the dance of smoke mingling among the clouds, and his gaze hardened.

A very Endou funeral, and unlike anything our Clan would ever sanction, but in this instance, it seems appropriate. To think you were the one who once told me about your family's customs, Souja-dono, and the sending of the vengeful spirit into smoke to track down and slay their foes. Well, I'm a scientist and I don't believe in supernatural vengeance, but the message is loud and clear to me all the same. I was supposed to die before you, not mourn your passing — and I won't let Keitarou get away with stealing your life from you.

He glanced at his hands, the faint sheen of Sekkisekidust coating the whiteish skin and helping, he knew, to damp his presence from the gathered shinigami.

"The time for hiding in silence is obviously at an end," he murmured, tilting his palm so that the dim light of the overcast day caught the shards of stone, making them glitter ominously. "You wanted to flush us out, Keitarou, and I'll grant you your wish. Souja-dono's death is a grudge I intend to take up personally — and one I won't lay to rest until your life is also forfeit. I'll accept the message in that smoke and become my friend's vengeance instead. We'll find you, we'll track you down, steal what's precious from you... and maybe then I'll let the Endou burn what's left; let them desecrate your body in the same way your people desecrated Souja-dono's."

He pulled the cloak more tightly around his body, slipping into a cautious shunpo as he drew nearer the gathered congregation. Surrounding his body with Sekkiseki-enhanced kyokkou, he was all but invisible to them, and for a moment his gaze rested on the fair-haired leader of the Urahara Clan, reminding himself darkly that to reveal himself in front of his family's long time enemies would do nothing towards furthering his cause. As he contemplated his next move, however, his gaze fell on a thin figure to the side of the shinigami Captains, his lank white hair tied with a dark ribbon in a loose tail down his back.

He pursed his lips, a faint memory surfacing in his thoughts.

Ukitake Juushirou, surely? Well well. Perhaps there is a recourse for the Kitsune after all.

He stepped back, preparing to drop once more into shunpo, the flickering, dancing light of the flame burning itself into his thoughts. We will get even, Souja-dono. You have my word. Your fight might have ended, my friend, but ours... ours begins from here.

"The mood here today is oppressively sombre."

Kirio pushed open the door of the small, plainly furnished bed-chamber, a spare blanket draped over her shoulder and a vessel of water clutched in her other hand. As she did so, from across the far side of the room Mitsuki raised her gaze from her patient, placing her hand gently against his ribcage as she monitored the beating of his heart.

"It's to be expected," she murmured, gesturing for Kirio to put the water down behind the door and come to join her. "Thank you for doing that, Hikifune-san. I realise Thirteenth's numbers are depleted today, with it being Souja-dono's funeral... you probably have many other things to do besides helping me."

"Taichou told me before he left this morning that I was to do what I could and make our unexpected visitor my top priority," Kirio shook her head, nonetheless doing as she was bidden, taking the blanket in both hands and folding it in half before draping it over the patient's legs. "I don't know if he's worried about the boy's safety, or if it's just that he wants to ensure we're taking good care of him, but either way, that's what I was told to do and I intend to do it regardless."

"I see," Mitsuki's gaze softened and she sat back, reaching for a vial of ointment that stood on the small shelf beside the bed. "Can you pass me some of that gauze please? I'm going to re-dress the wound now, and I can't quite reach it from here."

"With pleasure," Kirio picked up the roll of gauze, passing it across. "And I know that there's every reason for gravity, when a Vice Captain just got killed. It's just... I didn't know Souja-dono very well, so I think the shock for me was that someone could cut down an officer like that and do it in such a brutal way. This morning, though, seeing Taichou and Fukutaichou readying themselves to leave to pay their respects at the ceremony, it hit home. Souja-dono was someone's son as well as just an adjutant. It has wide reaching complications in a political sense, but also in other ones, too. Taichou's not said much about it to me, but I can tell he's upset about it and not from a Gotei point of view. It's had an effect on lots of people... out of the blue like that, someone so young being slain..."

"Too young," Mitsuki agreed, tearing a strip of gauze from the roll and folding it, dipping it in the ointment before applying it to the wound. "He wasn't yet born when I left for Rukongai, so he can't have been much older than his early twenties at most. It's not even a life, and you're right. When someone young dies like that, it's somehow twice as shocking as if it were someone old and battle-scarred."

She frowned, and Kirio bit her lip.

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean to remind you of the Spiritless Zone."

"You didn't," Mitsuki managed a brief smile, shaking her head. "Death lives with us all, though, and that's a fact of our existences. We're shinigami. Death Gods. We deal with death all the time. Because of that, perhaps we imagine ourselves inured to it, or somehow immune. We're not, though. We're trained to be strong, but really we all have weak points. You're right, it's a sober atmosphere. If not for taking care of Koku, I might have gone to the funeral myself. Even though I didn't know Souja, I know his family and I would have paid my respects. Right now, though, this is my priority... as a healer, this is all I can do."

"Koku?"

Kirio glanced at her companion in surprise, who nodded her head, setting the vial down beside the window and wiping her hands on the towel that lay nearby.

“J... Ukitake-taichou said that Souja-dono called him by that name before he died,” she confirmed, a sad look in her soft grey eyes. “He was very insistant, and kept repeating over and over again how this ‘Koku’ had come to help him and that we shouldn’t treat him like an enemy. I don’t know any more details about what he might have told his father or his sister, but from my perspective, this is my patient and his recovery has to come before anything else in my mind.”

She offered Kirio a tired smile.

“You’ve been a really helpful assistant, Hikifune-san. Thank you.”

“Taichou and Fukutaichou both told me to report to them if and when he wakes up,” Kirio shrugged. “He’s an important witness, now, and the only one we have, so it’s part of my duty to be here as well. Because I was there at the scene and I know the circumstances, I’ve been here from the start, too — I’d sort of like to be here when he wakes. I feel that we’ve a lot to make up to him for, especially if we’re going to win his trust — I want to show him that shinigami aren’t the bad guys, and that he wasn’t wrong to try to help one.”

“Mm,” Mitsuki looked troubled. “Kikyue-dono’s reaction was entirely understandable, but unfortunate. Still, you’re right... and this is probably the right place to do it.”

She cast her companion a faint smile.

“I think you know that I went to school with your Captain, Vice Captain and Third Seat,” she added. “I know the kind of people they are and, even in the short time I’ve been back in Seireitei, I’ve come to realise that Thirteenth is a very friendly division. With so many people here who understand the Districts, I think that if this patient of mine is going to be convinced to open up to anyone, it will be people in this division. The gaps are not so wide... and it gives me something to do too, now, instead of just being useless.”

She patted her waist pensively.

“Yuuyugo isn’t at the stage yet where I could release her and not take harm from it,” she admitted regretfully, “but in this case, Kikyue-dono’s aim was fortunate and I was able to mend the wound without using spiritual techniques. He’s recovering and I’m happy with his progress — he’ll make a full recovery, and I don’t think it’ll be long before he’ll start to stir.”

She collected up the remains of the linctus and the used towels, folding them over her arm.

“I’ll go rid myself of these,” she added. “I’ll come back and check on him later — I trust someone will come relieve you of sentry duty so you can have a break and some food later on?”

“Tsunemori-san said he would,” Kirio nodded. “I’ll be fine, Edogawa-san — thank you.”

She grinned, though her eyes were sad.

“I’ve learned a little bit about healing from you these last few days,” she added, “and it takes my mind off the fact that Tenichi won’t answer my messages or see me.”

“Kotetsu... Tenichi?” Mitsuki frowned, as if trying to place the name, and Kirio nodded.

“Yes. He came here the night Souja-dono died to report to Fukutaichou, but he was really shaken up with grief and saying all kinds of crazy things about being to blame. Since then I haven’t seen him. I imagine Seventh is pretty busy — but he hasn’t come here, and I don’t understand why he wouldn’t even send a reply to tell me he’s buried under a pile of work.”

“Juushirou told me about him,” Mitsuki pondered, forgetting her usual attention to formality as she considered the point. “He said the same thing — that this Tenichi was very disturbed by Souja-dono’s death. In fact, Kyouraku-kun apparently asked Tenichi to report here to get him away from Seventh and give him some space — apparently he was quite worried too by the way in which this officer reacted.”

“Grief is a funny thing,” Kirio said soberly. “Edogawa-san, you and Taichou know each other well, don’t you?”

“Mm?” Mitsuki’s cheeks pinkened slightly, and Kirio’s eyes became wide as she interpreted the expression of sheepish guilt that crossed her companion’s fair features.

“I’m sorry... did I ask a bad question?”

“No... no,” Mitsuki shook her head with a wry smile. “I slipped, didn’t I, and called him by his given name? At school, that was how it was — I have to remember though that now we’re not classmates but shinigami and he’s a Captain to whom I need to show respect, especially in front of his subordinates. I’m sorry, Hikifune-san. I didn’t mean any informality.”

“I don’t mind,” Kirio shook her head. “I just... I think that, maybe, if you were close friends at school, you’d understand why I’m so worried about Tenichi as I am. He’s always been one of my best friends, maybe like my brother in a strange kind of way... he’s never been like this with me before. His brother, too. He's not spoken to Ketsui, either. I'm really worried about how this has affected him — and what I can do about it. I'm afraid of what he might do — I never thought I'd say it of him, but I'm worried he might do something... rash."

"Like try to avenge the murder himself?" Mitsuki questioned. Kirio nodded.

"He blames himself, and that would be the easiest way to assuage blame," she agreed heavily. "Tenichi's committed and takes duty seriously, even if he can be flippant and frivolous when there's time for that. I don't know... but he scared me, acting like that. It was like I was seeing a stranger... a stranger haunted by his Vice Captain's ghost."

"Death does change people, especially seeing it like that at close quarters," Mitsuki reflected. "I'll mention your concerns, though, to my Captain when I go there to report on my patient later today. If he's emotionally traumatised or exhausted from the effects of the ordeal, she'll find a way to settle it. And am I right that he was the young man abducted not long before I returned here? It may simply be that the stress of both incidents so close together have proven too much for him to handle on his own. It's no reflection on his ability, if that's the case — but it's usually the shinigami most in control who suffer the deepest mental injuries. They don't ask for help soon enough, you see — and this might be one of those cases."

"Thank you," Kirio was relieved. "I appreciate it. I know you've had a lot of your own troubles to deal with, Edogawa-san — it's kind of you to help us with so many of ours, too."

"On the contrary, this makes me feel useful," Mitsuki patted the vial with a rueful smile. "It's better, when there's something to do and you can do it. Until my healing abilities are recovered, I'm no use in any other capacity — so I'm grateful that I have something to occupy me while that happens. The Spiritless Zone wasn't a nice experience — but so long as I'm on my feet and involved with living people, it's easier to make my peace with the memories of the dead."

She inclined her head slightly, then withdrew from the room, sliding the door shut softly behind her.

"So your name is Koku, huh?" Kirio glanced over towards the sleeping patient, moving to draw the clean white blanket up over his body once more. "I guess it's nice to know who we've been looking after these past few days. Maybe it'll help us find your family, if we have a name to put about. Nobody's managed to work out where that Senkaimon opened from or even how to reactivate it, and everything we look into seems to be a dead end. You're all we have in the equation, Koku-kun — if we help you find your family, will you forgive us for mistaking your motives and help us find the killer of our officer?"

So, it was over.

Hirata stood before the charcoal remains of the pyre, watching the faint wisps of smoke that still drifted upwards towards the sky. It had been a fierce flame, he remembered absently, cast with his own Kidou and, with the help of the breeze it had spread evenly, engulfing the body in a ball of orange and red that reminded the Captain of the blood that had soaked his son's uniform the day he had been brought back.

Now, he reflected bitterly, he could do nothing but accept that Souja was gone. The son which he had raised with such pride and affection would never again come to his office late at night to discuss squad matters, nor act as such a reliable right-hand man in so many tricky Gotei tasks. The number of individuals present at the ceremony had been an overwhelming indication of how much Seireitei would have accepted and welcomed Souja's incumbency of the Clan in the future, but for Hirata, the future of his dynasty was the last concern on his mind. For him, the fire had consumed the last remnants of a child he had loved, and, as a father, the grief was almost beyond bearing. He had suffered sacrifices and faced death head on many times in the past, but this blow had been a personal one.

Many of the mourners had been solicitous in their greetings to him that morning. Guren had paused for a moment in particular to express his deep regret, and though the Kuchiki's words had rent fresh tears through Hirata's pain, he had not been able to rebuff consolation offered with such grave sincerity. Guren had been in the same position, and for the first time Hirata had felt a connection of sorts to his austere neighbour — but it was a connection he did not want.

Souja...

He raised his gaze up to the sky, watching the last drifting haze of grey dispersing in the air. When it cooled, what remained of the ashes would be scattered around the gardens of the Endou mausoleum, and, in keeping with family tradition, it would be done after dark. For now, though, he had time to think, and it was that time he feared most of all.

“Hirata..?”

The voice was soft-spoken and gentle, but at the sound of it the Endou Clan leader visibly started, swinging around to see Juushirou standing a short distance away. He was alone, his dark robes and equally muted obi in stark contrast to the white of his hair and the sallow colour of his skin, yet it was the expression in the older man’s eyes that made Hirata’s heart clench in his chest.

“Juushirou...” he managed, and the Thirteenth Division Captain frowned, crossing the grass quickly between them and standing at his side, gazing at the pyre with thoughtful, sober eyes. He did not speak at first, and Hirata found he was glad of his friend’s understanding. For a few minutes they just stood there in silence, each one deep in thought. Then, at length, Hirata broke the quiet.

“I suppose that, as an Endou, this is what I should expect.”

The words were soft, yet full of pain, and Juushirou’s dark brows knitted together as he slowly shook his head.

“No father should expect this,” he said gravely. “More, Hirata, no father should accept it. Souja was murdered, and that murderer must be brought to justice. You don’t have to stand and endure it. This isn’t a burden you ought to bear, and you needn’t bear it alone.”

“Juushirou?” Hirata cast his companion a wary glance, and Juushirou sighed, resting a hand on his friend’s thin shoulder.

“Today, as Clan Leader, you held your thoughts and feelings in check, but we still felt the Wind Hawk, screaming to get free,” he observed. “For the sake of Ai-dono and Kikyue and Sayuri, you held your calm. You were composed, as a Leader must be, but there’s nobody here now that you need to be strong for. Souja was your son and you loved him. Probably more than anyone else, if the truth be told. You can’t simply take it as a burden of leadership and pretend it doesn’t mean anything more. We know it does... and it will do you harm if you don’t acknowledge that.”

“As you said, I’m a Clan leader. A Captain, too,” Hirata bent to touch the charcoal, allowing the fine black dust to disintegrate in his hands. “If I fall apart, who else is there to hold together the pieces?”

Juushirou pressed his lips together thoughtfully for a moment, then he shook his head.

“Shunsui and I are here,” he said quietly. “Ryuu, Enishi and Kai, too. People who care for you, and people you can trust. We know the Endou, and we understand everything that you’ve faced better than most of your squad do. This is another unforgivable blow caused by an unforgivable enemy, and that enemy must be found and taken down — but in the meantime, it's you that we're worried about the most. Clan aside, Division aside, you're a father and your son has been taken from you. You have to let yourself face that too, Hirata — else you'll never be able to move forward."

"Forward?" Hirata let out a humourless snort. "How can I move forward? My son and heir is dead. I don't have another, and even if I did, Souja isn't someone I can replace. He was my only son, the one I trusted with everything. And, worst of all, if he was right... if this connects to Eiraki... how much more will they take from me, Juushirou? How much more will I be punished for lacking resolve that time in the forest? How many times will I regret not slicing through Keitarou's throat when he lay there helpless before me... not vapourising him with my sword's spirit? How much higher is the cost going to be?"

His words caught in his throat, trembling with emotion, and to his frustration and dismay, his vision began to blur as his eyes filled with the tears that he had so far suppressed.

"I can't move forward," he whispered. "You don't understand, Juushirou, because you're not a father and you haven't lost a child. You can't understand... no matter how much you try. Souja was everything to me... and now..."

He broke off, too choked to continue, and Juushirou reached across to put a reassuring arm around the younger man's shoulders.

"I understand that a good friend of mine is in pain," he said gently. "That's as much as I need. Nobody expects you to settle with this right away. On the contrary, you need to take time and space to deal with it in whatever way you can, and I know that, as an Endou, hunting down Keitarou and finding out the truth is as much a part of that process as sending your son into the next world as you did today. Souja was a fine young man. I will miss him too, and I won't forgive those who took his life. But he would be the first to tell you not to push folk away and try to cope on your own. Even as a Captain, even as a Clan Leader, you have friends who surpass those levels and will be there for you regardless."

Hirata swallowed hard, but there was no holding back the tears now, and he closed his eyes, allowing them to trickle soundlessly down his cheeks as his grief for his son engulfed his heart. Juushirou did not comment, allowing his friend's emotions to flow, and Hirata stumbled forward, kneeling down beside the remains of the pyre and resting his hands lightly against the charcoal remains of the wooden plinth.

“I thought that I had become immune to death, pain, things like that, when I raised and mastered Tsumi no Fuuhi,” he murmured, more to himself than to his companion. “I thought that, as an Endou, I’d become inured to it. But it’s not true, Juushirou. It’s not. Seeing my son, bloody and dying... will live with me, haunt my thoughts and dreams for a long time to come. The pain of it... I can’t even describe. It makes me sick to my stomach, angry yet unable to focus that anger... if I let these feelings free, I’m truly afraid of myself and what I might do. I want Keitarou, I want him dead... but even that won’t sate this hunger. I want my son back, Juushirou, and it’s the one thing that my sword, my haori, even my Clan Leadership can’t bring about!”

“No, Souja can’t be brought back,” Juushirou carefully knelt down at his friend’s side, patting him gently on the back, “and I won’t insult your feelings by making glib statements, but I will say this at least. Now, it hurts. Now it feels as though the pain won’t ever go. I’m not a father, but as a son, I’ve lost a parent — a parent to whom I never got to say a full goodbye. Father died whilst I was ill with fever, and I never... there were many things I didn’t get to say to him. Souja... at the very least... he came home. He came home, and you could say goodbye. Now, it means nothing — but as time passes, that will help. Souja... Souja knew he was going to die. It was in his eyes, in his words — he knew. Even knowing that, he exhausted the last of his strength to come back and speak to the person who mattered to him the most. He wanted your forgiveness for his actions, and to tell you what he had learned. Those things done, he was at peace. Because he was at peace, he let go and stopped fighting. He’s passed the baton over to you, and you will fight for his sake, I know that. What Souja went through in that last fight, only he knows — but what mattered the most to him was coming home to speak to his father.”

Hirata nodded slowly, reaching up to remove his glasses as he wiped away the still falling tears.

“I’m not the child I was when we first met, or became friends,” he whispered softly, “but even though that’s true, I feel... like... I’ve become him again. I’m afraid of myself, my family, what the path ahead might be. I’m unsettled and shaken... and once again, you’re here to put the pieces back together and reassure me. It can’t heal me yet, Juushirou, but I... I am grateful. I know you came here specifically for my sake, and that at least is a comfort. Before my wife and my daughters, I have to be strong. Before the Clan, I have to be resolute. But you’re right. Before you, before Shunsui, it’s different.”

“That’s what friends are for, and it’s why we’re here,” Juushirou said gravely. “We mourn Souja-kun too. We want justice for him too. We’re with you and we’ll do what we can to help.”

“Mm,” Hirata agreed, replacing his spectacles on his nose and getting unsteadily to his feet. “I should return to my family — they will be wondering where I am, and I didn’t mean to linger here as long as this. Before I do, though, what of the boy? The boy that came back with Souja — what of his condition — has he yet awoken?”

“Not yet, but Mitsuki and one of my officers are watching over him carefully,” Juushirou replied. “He’s not in a position yet to question, but when he is, we will talk to him.”

“I would like to speak to him myself,” Hirata reflected, but Juushirou shook his head.

“This Hirata is not someone I can unleash on an unsuspecting District boy whose only involvement in this is to have stumbled on your son in a bad situation,” he chided. “He was already cut down in error by Kikyue — I don’t want to terrify him even more and I don’t think you could handle that conversation without letting the Wind Hawk rail free. No, we will take care of the boy ourselves, but you have my word that anything we learn will be reported to you as soon as possible.”

“Souja wanted us to protect him,” Hirata objected. “I wouldn’t harm him.”

“No, I know, but you don’t realise how intimidating you can be when you’re angry or upset,” Juushirou said matter-of-factly. “This isn’t something you can deal with rationally yet, maybe not ever... no matter how much you pretend to your kinsfolk, you can’t fool Shunsui and you can’t fool me. Trust us where this one is concerned and leave the boy to me. I’ve taken on Souja’s promise for him, and I will make sure it is kept.”

Hirata was silent for a moment, then he nodded.

“I trust you,” he admitted. “Perhaps you’re right. Perhaps... you are right.”

He sighed, stretching his arms over his head, then,

“I will go to rejoin my kin now,” he added, “but thank you, Juushirou. My heart is a long way from being settled, but at least... I am not alone.”

“Of course not,” Juushirou agreed. “You’re never that, either in the Gotei or outside of it. Keep that in mind, Hirata. If you need to talk, we are here and we will always find time to listen. All right?”

Hirata inclined his head slightly, a faint, tragic smile touching his lips.

“I will remember,” he responded, “but for now... I have to ensure that the final preparations for my son’s ashes to be scattered are put into place. To be busy helps take my mind from things, so I will see to this myself.”

He bowed again, then turned his back on the still smouldering pyre, making his way slowly towards the main manor house. He did not want to face his kin again, but Juushirou’s words had at least given him reassurance that he was not fighting this battle alone, and, as he stepped through the door, he heard Kikyue call his name.

“Otousama? Otousama, Hahaue is looking for you... she really looks quite unwell.”

“Kikyue-chan...” Hirata paused to gather himself, meeting his daughter’s gaze with as much composure as he could muster, then he nodded his head.

“I will come directly,” he said evenly. “I’m sorry for taking so long... please, lead the way.”

It had been a long day.

Urahara Nagesu, Head of the Urahara Clan and Captain of the Third Division stepped into his office with a heavy sigh, closing the door behind him with a click and running his hand gently over the sensor to activate the kidou lamp. Outside, the sun was setting, yet in his mind’s eye he could still see the vivid colours of the dancing flames as the Endou Clan had committed their son and heir to the ether. It had not escaped the Urahara Clan leader’s notice that Hirata had chosen to revert to Endou tradition, rather than following on with the Urahara custom of burial that they had adopted in more recent years, and something about this shift in trust had rankled against Nagesu’s nerves.

It’s not that I don’t understand Hirata-dono’s feelings.

He removed his spectacles, dropping them down onto his desk and moving to the window to fasten the shutters for the night.

I know that it isn’t me that he’s angry at, nor is it my family that he’s sending a message out to. Or at least, not a member of my family I have any control over. I just felt it as a definite division between our two Clans that hasn't been there like this for a long time. Just when I thought relations had improved between us, too. I do dislike disquiet... I dislike murder and intrigue and this level of unrest.

He unlooped the shutter ties, pausing to glance out at the empty divisional courtyard before pulling the wooden slats closed and tying the cords in a firm knot.

Had I but killed you the last time we met, Kei-kun, none of this would have been allowed to happen. Had I had even one inch of Father's ruthlessness, I would have sliced you through — but I hesitated and you found a chance to escape. Where you are now, what you are planning... I don't know. I work hard, but my scientific knowledge cannot keep pace with yours and I know it all too well. It might have been my breakthrough that transformed purification of Hollow souls, but it was your science that grounded our Senkaimon technology, and your work that created the Hell Butterfly. All I can do is cling on to the scraps you leave me... it is an unenviable position when in the beginning you should have been the one here at my side.

He sank down behind his desk, burying his head in his hands.

How many more times are you going to shame my family, Keitarou? How many more times do you intend on punishing me and the rest of Seireitei for the death of your Father? Never mind that I loved Keitsunejiisama too. Never mind that other families lost loved ones then, and have never once spoken in resentment towards me or my wife or children. Only you carry this burden and you'll continue to carry it till you die, I'm sure of that. But if the rumours leaking out of Seventh Division are true, and Souja-dono was killed by a child of yours, it means your hatred can continue even beyond your lifespan. The problem grows ever graver... and somehow, I must find a way to pull it all together.

“Taichou?”

There was a soft knock at the door, and Nagesu glanced up, reaching for his spectacles as he raised his voice to call the visitor in. The door slid back to reveal his eldest son and Vice Captain, Shiketsu, and at the sight of the gleaming badge about the young man's upper arm, he bit his lip, once again reminded of the silent, white-shrouded corpse atop the funeral pyre.

I still have my son and heir, whilst Hirata-dono is cast into deepest mourning. My family are guilty in this, yet he feels the burden of it. The world is not a fair one, and it gets darker by the day.

“Otousama, are you all right?” At the sight of his father's expression, Shiketsu dropped the squad formality, approaching the desk and pausing a short way away from it. "I knocked two or three times, but you didn't reply — I wondered if you hadn't come back yet."

"There was no reason to outstay my welcome at a place no Urahara is wanted or needed," Nagesu said quietly. "I am fine, Shiketsu — I'm sorry. It pains me, that's all, knowing that we can't escape this association. The Council haven't met yet, and nothing formal has been said, but there are rumours and they are enough. This is Keitarou's work, make no mistake."

Shiketsu's expression darkened, and he frowned.

"Souja-dono was investigating the disappearance of his officer," he remembered gravely. "Kotetsu Tenichi. He chaired our last meeting, and he discussed it in some detail. He was talking about increasing security in Inner Seireitei, stuff we could do as Vice Captains to try and prevent any further incidents taking place. It's difficult to comprehend what's happened to him... even though I was there and I saw him cremated just as surely as you did, I can't really believe it. He was not an ostentatious officer, but he made his mark. I think... it will be some time before I forget him."

"He was very young for the duties ascribed him," Nagesu murmured. "But youth isn't always a reason to prevent a promising shinigami's promotion. Even if he was the Endou heir, I believe that many people thought well of him. I had begun to hope... perhaps for a future in which there would be a truly peaceful Seventh District. Hirata-dono has made such forward steps, but he is still... there are still moments when the hunter raises its head. Souja-dono, by all accounts, was different."

"Do you think Endou-taichou will do something rash?" Shiketsu looked anxious. "He seemed very composed at the funeral earlier, but then, I could sense it from him. The Hawk everyone talks about, but nobody wants to see... and I wondered."

"Let us all hope not," Nagesu pulled an expressive face. "Between you and I, Shiketsu, that's the last thing the Council needs. We don't know where Keitarou is, or what his modus operandi is. We don't know if he wants to lure people to him or whether he has a plan to kill other Clan individuals. Seireitei has lost a Vice Captain. It can ill afford to lose a Captain so soon after, particularly in the same division. There are no obvious contenders to succeed him, now. Misashi-sama might take control of the family, but the Division requires a shinigami, and Kikyue-hime is far, far too inexperienced to take command.”

“And Seventh must be an Endou,” Shiketsu murmured, sinking down on a cushion before his father’s desk and letting out a sigh. Nagesu nodded.

“There’s no other choice for it, not as we are at the moment,” he agreed. “I’m sorry, this really isn’t a weight I should place on your shoulders after such a heavy day. I just wish it hadn’t happened when I was Council incumbent — I can’t help but wonder if it occurred on my watch on purpose. Maybe it’s not just an attack on the Endou, but one on the Urahara as well.”

“We’ve expected an attack from Keitarou for a long time,” Shiketsu pointed out. “He’s never targeted the Urahara head on, though, even if he has attacked elsewhere.”

“The last time we met, he said he didn’t hate me — even though he wanted to,” Nagesu remembered. “Perhaps that’s why — but then I said many things then about Keitsune-jisama, things which upset him. We are even more strangers now than we were, and I decided once and for all after the death of Guren-sama’s son that I would have no further leniency where he was concerned. If he shows himself to me, Shiketsu, I will... no, I must kill him. There is no other recourse for the Head of the Urahara to take.”

His eyes narrowed.

“And if he should kill me, then the duty will fall to you,” he added matter-of-factly. “I am not so arrogant to believe I can defeat a genius with a blade he has already seen.”

“Keitarou hasn’t seen your sword since you attained Bankai, sir,” Shiketsu pointed out. “And he can’t fight with swords, so they say. I think you would kill him...”

He sighed, shrugging his shoulders.

“...but I will take the message to heart and be ready, should the duty fall to me,” he added reluctantly. “Although the Urahara-ke can ill afford to lose its Captain at the present time. I see you do so many things, Father, and I’ve been to the Council with you more than once — but I don’t think I’m remotely ready to step into your shoes. If Endou-taichou doesn’t act rashly... promise me you don’t intend to do anything like it, either?”

“I’m not rash, not usually,” Nagesu admitted. “Even if I wanted to, I imagine I wouldn’t manage. No, Shiketsu, you can rest assured that I will plod along methodically in my usual way, and make what I can of the circumstances as they present themselves to me. A little more impulsiveness wouldn't go amiss — but I'm a scientist and I'm a planner, and there's not much I can do about either one. It is difficult to know how to move when so much information is missing — even if that lapse leads to an unforgivable loss of life.”

“Father...” Shiketsu frowned, his brow drawing together thoughtfully, then, “Are you thinking of Shougo-dono?”

“Shou...?” Nagesu started, staring at his son as if he'd grown another head. “What do you mean, Shougo-dono? Why would I... what brought that subject out all of a sudden?”

“I don't know,” Shiketsu admitted. “Maybe just the funeral... everything that happened. It made me remember... and I wondered if you'd thought about it too. It was... the last time the Urahara were so heavily involved in something, and...”

“Shougo-dono died in the line of duty,” Nagesu sighed, removing his glasses once more and rubbing his temples as he felt the starts of a migraine digging into his skull. “His death was unfortunate, and could probably have been prevented with better data provision, but even so I consider it far different from the circumstances in this particular case. Yes, it was a messy affair, and no, I hadn't forgotten... but to align Souja-dono's death with Shougo-dono...”

“Maybe there's nothing similar about them at all,” Shiketsu sighed, shrugging his shoulders. “True enough that Shougo-dono was buried with all honour and respect, and Souja-dono's corpse was destroyed in the most savage of Endou heathen rituals when they cast it up into smoke like that. Souja-dono was murdered, whereas Shougo-dono was taken down by Hollows and I wasn't trying to say they were connected. I didn't mean the ceremonies were the same, either, or even that their deaths were all that similar. It's just... Shougo-dono died in the Rukon, that's all. And Souja-dono was attacked there, too — so I suppose it made me remember.”

“I see,” Nagesu stroked his chin pensively. “I suppose in that light, I understand. The Rukon isn't an area we enter very often. True, the Spiritless Zone project has changed the level of shinigami involvement over the divide, but that has fallen almost entirely to the Fourth Division and the majority of the work has been theirs. Now, since they pulled out, the Zone is devoid of supervision and Rukongai is once more something of a black hole. Perhaps it was a bad idea, withdrawing Eleventh and Twelfth from their duties outside of Seireitei — but then the Spiritless Zone was intended to try and counter that change, so that sacrifices like Shougo-dono's would not be repeated.”

“Maybe Keitarou killed the healers in the Rukon to get us out. Or rather, to get Unohana-taichou’s people out,” Shiketsu said darkly, and Nagesu nodded his head.

“The possibility exists, but the evidence as yet is not clear,” he said tiredly. “The Council meeting may reveal those details... I have already received word from Hirata-dono requesting that I summon Ukitake to give evidence in his absence, as he was present for Souja-dono’s last testimony. Ukitake is a level-headed Captain and not given to embellishment, so I greatly hope he will be able to provide us with firm data we can work with. At present we have nothing — just a grieving family and a cloud of ash and smoke drifting over the Seventh.”

He eyed his son keenly.

“I would rather you didn’t mention Shougo-dono amongst your peers, or even, outside of this office,” he added quietly. “To you, he was a name and a distant kinsman, but to others he was more than that. You understand that it would hurt to have those wounds reopened after so many years.”

“I know,” Shiketsu agreed. “I wasn’t going to bring the topic up. The Council decided back when it happened that it was better left alone, because of the number of people it impacted on. Putting Eleventh and Twelfth Divisions back into working order was more important — as well as addressing the risks the Rukon provided and the problems with tainted souls getting out of control. I wasn’t going to start gossiping about old kinsfolk who fell in battle more than twenty years ago now... don’t worry.”

“Good,” Nagesu looked relieved, but his expression was still clouded. “Then I’ll ask you to make sure all tonight’s patrols have dispatched with their usual efficiency and that nobody has decided to take advantage of the unusual timetable to slip away from their assigned posts. I would rather not appear before them till morning — but I can still sense Yunosuke’s roaming reiatsu and he should be able to help if you need an extra hand.”

“Yes, sir,” Shiketsu got slowly to his feet, and Nagesu could sense the reluctance in his son’s aura, yet the young man did not disobey the command. Instead he bowed his head in respect, then withdrew from the chamber, closing the door softly behind him with a click.

I’m sorry, Shiketsu. You wanted reassurance, and I gave you none.

Nagesu grimaced, resting his chin in his hands.

And I lied to you, also. I had thought of Shougo and the others, when I saw Souja-dono's wretched body lying there, silent as the grave. I remembered just as you did, a time when it was an Urahara whose body had been cleaned and dressed by the Fourth Division, and when the Captains assembled in mass mourning for officers felled in the line of duty.

His brow creased slightly at the recollection.

I'm sure we're not the only ones who remembered them today, even as we said goodbye to Souja-dono. Mareiko, Minaichi... I wonder what you were feeling, seeing that young boy's body consumed by flames. I hope it didn't rake through old memories for you too harshly... but even if it did, raising the subject would be a mistake. There is no time for grieving, or remembering past losses. We can only move forward. Keitarou already has a lead on us — we must catch up to him before we are forced to attend another memorial like the one today.

Author's Note

曼珠沙華 Manjushage (the red spider lily) is a flower with historic associations with death and funerary rites in Japanese (and I think, Chinese) culture. I do not know of any tradition of it waking the dead, that was my artistic licence for the benefit of the Endou. As for the Iris, or 花菖蒲 Hana-shoubu (also known simply as shoubu), this flower is the emblem of the Seventh Division as chosen by Kubo. The Japanese word shoubu, as Nakata explained and as I've referenced before, can also mean a battle or a competition, only written with different characters. Therefore Hirata is issuing a challenge as much as he is venerating his Clan and honouring his son with his gesture. The hana-shoubu is usually considered to be a purple flower, but it also exists in a deep reddish colour — which is also a colour belonging to the Endou Clan.

Also, mulberry-thread woven cloth is white, not mulberry. I don't know why, but yay for Classical Japanese class for teaching me this random and fairly useless piece of information.

...You people have no idea how hard this chapter was to write :(.

To end this on a slightly less sober note, I was flicking back through the Meifu chapters earlier this week (a necessity for continuity on a certain zanpakutou, because my brain is small and highly leaky, LOL) and rereading some of the reviews and I realised how much some of the comments made then have helped me (I think) improve my writing to now. There are a lot of things in 2nd Manuscript that make me go whoops now, in terms of style and redundant words... yet everyone was so supportive then and I'd like to think that Sukuse is a better written story for that fact. Thank you, minna, for helping my writing evolve. I know it has much, much further to go, but it's nice to feel I'm going in the right direction :). I think it merits cake... especially after a chapter like this one, which two, three years ago I would probably not have managed to write at all

Chapter Twenty Nine: Stray Fox

“This Council session will now come to order.”

In the high ceilinged, ornate central chamber of the new Council complex, the low murmurs of the assembled representatives faded into silence, all gazes turning towards the most elevated of the throne-like seats which, with the opening of each year passed from one Clan’s responsibility to the next. Today, Juushirou reflected, it was Nagesu, the fair-haired, bespectacled Head of the Urahara Clan who took the floor, eyes full of consternation behind glittering lenses and his straw-like hair already escaping from the rigid black clasp with which he had attempted to tame it. Tall and lean, Nagesu possessed a far more conservative nature than his immediate predecessor, and, under his cautious, neutral guidance, the Urahara Clan had managed to bury many of its more scandalous skeletons, establishing themselves once more as the prime Noble family for scientific research within Seireitei. Nagesu himself had learned both scientific and shinigami skills from an early age, and was renowned throughout Soul Society as a man of significant intelligence. He was not arrogant, however, and on many occasions he had pointed out that his skills were often the result more of hard work than any spark of genius nestling inside of him. Geniuses, he would say with a dark smile, only happened at most once in each generation, and in his, that talent had fallen somewhere else.

The name was as yet unspoken, but it hung heavily over the entire gathering nonetheless.

Aizen Keitarou, formerly Urahara Keitarou, Nagesu’s blood cousin, exiled scientist, and one of the most ruthlessly intelligent individuals to come out of the Urahara Clan in several centuries.

Unfortunately for Nagesu, who had spent so much of his life trying to present the peaceful, rational face of the Urahara, Keitarou had always chosen to apply his genius to the dark side, and, as the pale-eyed, fair haired Clan Leader prepared to open the meeting, more than one of the delegates present felt certain that this latest event weighed once more on Nagesu’s considerably active conscience.

From his position at the side of the room, Juushirou watched Nagesu’s formal opening of the meeting, his eyes narrowing as he absorbed the tension in the older man’s thin frame. It was not usual for a Captain who was not an official Council representative to be summoned to a meeting of this nature, much less for Juushirou himself to attend, as, despite his blood connection to the Kuchiki Clan, he had clung proudly to his status as ‘District’ and as such, had no real business interfering in one of Soul Society’s more ancient expressions of democratic rule. Still, though, this was not an ordinary meeting. The Endou Clan’s seat remained empty, draped with a black cloth to indicate that the family were in mourning for Souja’s untimely death. Glancing at it now, Juushirou felt a tug on his own heart, remembering the many times he had observed Souja as a youngster, his skills and his personality becoming more and more vivid with each passing year. He would have made a good Clan leader, one day, he realised, a sudden swell of anger welling up inside of him at the unfairness of the situation.

He was too young. Too young to die. Too young for any of these things to happen. If it was Keitarou or if it wasn’t, we need to get to the bottom of it. We need to get them, and quickly — not just for the sake of any other potential victims, but for the sake of the Endou. Misashi-sama and Hirata worked so hard to bring their family forward and reestablish themselves as a respectable Clan worthy of recognition. They’ve had more than their share of tragedy.

“Ukitake-taichou, please, step forward,” Nagesu’s voice penetrated Juushirou’s fierce inner thoughts, damping his ire like a wave over flame, and he got to his feet, bowing hastily towards the Clan Leader before obediently coming forward to stand where the other man had indicated. In a Captain’s meeting, Nagesu was Juushirou’s equal — but here, in a grander setting, the District Captain was vividly aware of the gulf of status that really lay between them.

Still, nobody raised even the faintest murmur as he moved between the seats, inclining his head respectfully to each of the present Clan leaders as he passed. There was Yuuichi, son of Hashihiko and head of the Yamamoto since his father’s death three years previously. He was stubborn and strong-willed, but skilled with a sword and known for his decisive judgement. Next was Midori, the Princess of the Shihouin, whose lithe, graceful figure had changed not at all since the first time Juushirou had met her almost thirty years before. Nagesu’s seat was empty, on account of his position as Leader of the Council, then came Retsu, robed for once in the colours of the Unohana and with a ceremonial haori across her shoulders rather than the more utilitarian white robe she sported when on duty. Her eyes were sad and her aura was grave, and Juushirou knew that no matter how impossible the asking, she regretted not being able to save Souja’s life.

On the other side was Sora's mother, the redoubtable Kyouki, her green eyes as vivid as ever and not a single streak of grey in her wild dark hair. To her side sat Guren, perfectly turned out in the colours of the Kuchiki, the white scarf about his throat and the folds of the kenseiken against his ebony mane singling him out as the Head of the Kuchiki. He sat perfectly still, poised and apparently calm, the picture of Kuchiki serenity, but Juushirou could see the dark storm clouds in the other's austere gaze, and he frowned, remembering the murder of Guren's own sole son Ribari. That had been Keitarou's handiwork, too, and Juushirou's gut lurched at the thought that history may have easily repeated itself to his close friend's cost.

The final member of the gathering was Tokutarou, Shunsui's older brother and head of the Kyouraku. Though once the staunchest enemy of the Endou across the whole of Seireitei, Tokutarou's Clan had, in more recent years forged significant trade and diplomatic relations with their neighbours, and Juushirou knew Tokutarou well enough to recognise that he considered this murder almost as seriously as he would the assassination of one of his own kin. Tokutarou had always taken a keen interest in Shunsui's friends, supporting and acknowledging Hirata even when shunning the rest of the Endou, and Juushirou knew that Tokutarou's message of support and condolence to District Seven had been one of the first and the most sincere to arrive.

It was a sombre, tense gathering, and it gave Juushirou no comfort at all to dwell on the thoughts in the minds of these elevated Clan individuals.

"I apologise for summoning you here in such peremptory fashion, Ukitake," Nagesu spoke softly, his words grave. "I believe you understand the reasons for my doing so."

"Yes, sir," Juushirou agreed sombrely. "Hirata sent a message to Thirteenth Division by way of Nakata asking that I report on his behalf at this meeting. When your message reached me, Nagesu-sama, I assumed you had received similar communication. Hirata felt that, with my neutrality, I was the best choice, and I consulted with S... with Kyouraku-taichou before I came, to ensure I had a full and complete report to give. I had therefore been prepared to come today — and will be of as much help as I can in whatever the Council wishes to know."

"It's beyond belief," Midori's voice, shaking and full of anger, cut through the atmosphere before Nagesu could respond in his usual, circumspect way. "A young man like Souja-dono cut down in such a savage way. Juushirou, you were there, weren't you, when the lad spoke to Hirata? You heard what his last words were? There are unhealthy rumours circulating around the barracks and the common areas and I'd like to know the truth of it from someone who heard it first hand."

"Rumours, Midori-sama?" Juushirou glanced at her, and Midori nodded impatiently.

"Keitarou," she said emphatically. "Aizen Keitarou."

At the mention of the name, Nagesu visibly flinched, and Midori shot her neighbour an apologetic look.

"I'm sorry, Nagesu-dono. I don't mean to dig up old wounds, but we need to know and if young folk like Souja are being killed, we don't have time for individual sensitivities."

"You may ignore my feelings on this matter as you see fit, Midori-dono," Nagesu said wearily. "My Clan have long since disowned any connection to Keitarou, and with good cause. My personal thoughts are as one betrayed many times over, not as one who has sympathy for Keitarou's actions. Speak as you see fit. I too have heard the rumours and will not pretend otherwise. If there is proof of his involvement, I will hear it with the rest of you. He is no longer a man that I consider family."

"Proof..." As the man's pale eyes turned towards him, Juushirou's brows knitted together. "I don't know whether there's that. Not yet, at least."

"But Souja-dono did say Keitarou's name?" Guren interjected, and Juushirou nodded.

"He told Hirata and I that he'd received a report from one of the Endou agents that Keitarou was active, and he went to find out if there was truth in the story," he said simply. "He was... not very coherent at the end, Guren-sama. He had lost a good deal of blood, which I'm sure Unohana-taichou can attest to with more accuracy than I can. Even so, though, he was adamant that he'd seen a sword of some kind with the name Aizen on it, and also that the person who had attacked him had been a young girl who resembled Hirata's sister, Eiraki."

"The girl who killed my son," Guren muttered, and Juushirou inwardly flinched, berating himself for speaking the woman's name so easily. Slowly, he nodded.

"Yes, sir. I'm sorry. I did not mean..."

“You have nothing for which to apologise, Ukitake. On the contrary, if Nagesu-dono can allow us to run roughshod over his feelings, I must allow the same where mine are concerned,” Guren rubbed his temples. “My burden is not so heavy as his — my son was the victim, not the mastermind.”

“As you say,” Nagesu said bitterly, “though I believe there is scarce one individual in Seireitei’s Clan heirarchy who can claim to remain untainted by Keitarou’s actions in some way or another.”

“In the Districts too,” Tokutarou put in frankly. “Though Misashi-dono and Hirata-dono and I have worked hard to repatriate all the people displaced from Seventh District during Shouichi-sama’s incumbency, time and time again we’ve come up against similar stories of individuals being slaughtered to feed illegal experiments — even of families forced or bullied into betraying or selling loved ones in order to promulgate some kind of underground research. There’s no direct thread tying Keitarou to these deaths — but plenty of circumstantial evidence to suggest that the common folk of Seventh District paid a heavy price.”

“I may have witnessed one such individual first hand,” Juushirou admitted. “In the time when Keitarou held me hostage in the underground cell in District Seven, there was a person there who had been more than half-turned to Hollow. I’m sure, thinking back, that this person was one of Keitarou’s experiments.”

“Almost certainly,” Midori sighed heavily. “But he’s been quiet for so long, and now, out of the blue, to strike down Souja-dono?”

“It isn’t as though we can say it’s the first time he’s committed this kind of atrocity, though,” Guren said bitterly. “First Shouichi-dono, then my own son and heir, now the young Endou boy. It strikes me that this is a continuation of that wretched man’s war against the Seireitei Clans — and no matter how much blood is spilt or tears are shed, it’s never enough to sate his appetite.”

“You think he might be planning on attacking other Clan descendants?” Yuuichi looked troubled, and Guren shrugged.

“The evidence of his contempt for Clan speaks for itself,” he said bleakly. “Aside from those cases I have already cited, there have been other Clan individuals who have died at his hand. Retsu-dono, I believe you lost a kinswoman some several years ago on account of her being simply in the wrong place at the wrong time. Keitarou also tried his best to destroy my brother — it is only by the grace of the Gods that Seiren’s will to live is stronger than his constitution and has allowed him to still remain alive — though the consequences of that experience remain with him and he is not as physically active as he once was. And, of course, we must not forget the manner in which Ukitake here was used to set upon your brother, Tokutarou-dono — I think it matters not to Keitarou who he attacks, so long as in the end Clan blood is spilled.”

“We are speculating about things for which we have no proof,” Tokutarou said frankly, seeing Juushirou’s clear flinch at the memory of a battle in the snow during his second year at the Academy. “As you say, Keitarou has killed many, and has attacked far more. I haven’t forgotten how those events you mention affected Shunsui, but I also recall that Keitarou was attacked by Kinnya-sama’s blade and — though I’m no expert on zanpakutou, I believe it to be quite an exceptional weapon.”

“It is so,” Guren confirmed, a faint flicker of Clan pride surfacing to damp his anger as he inclined his head in Tokutarou’s direction. “Of the great elemental swords, it is, like my late Father’s, one of those powerful spirits that come around once in a few generations.”

“However, we did not find a corpse,” Midori reminded him acidly, “and I believe Kinnya-sama himself, when called to report before this body regarding what occurred, expressed some doubt that his attack had killed Keitarou.”

“Hirata saw him after he had fallen,” Juushirou agreed regretfully. “Spoke to him, too, but he and Eiraki-hime both escaped into a Senkaimon. Hirata was the last person to see Keitarou or Eiraki-hime — and he told me himself that he’d failed to stop them on account of his sister’s interruption. At the time we told him that it was no bad thing that he had not been able to follow through on a ruthless Endou impulse, but...”

“If that failure has now precipitated this, it was a costly error from which I imagine he will take significant time to recover,” Guren said gravely, and despite the criticism his words suggested, Juushirou heard only sympathetic sadness in the Kuchiki Clansman’s tones. “More than any here present, I understand Hirata-dono’s current state of mind... and regret that neither my kinsman nor I myself were able to avenge Ribari when we had the opportunity.”

“Keitarou is not a foolish man,” Kyouki observed. “Therein lies our problem. We are dealing with a chaotic genius — a mastermind of mischief to the most extreme degree possible.”

“I fear Kyouki-sama is correct,” Nagesu rubbed his temples, his expression pained. “I believe he is alive, and that he has somehow recovered from the injuries dealt him by Kinnya-sama’s blade. What state of physical body he is in at present I do not know — but I imagine that his mind is intact, and, if he has Eiraki-hime and also, others to support him... that is probably enough to wreak havoc on us once again.”

“That’s true. We’ve seen from earlier examples that his methodology isn’t haphazard and there must be a master-plan behind it,” Tokutarou acknowledged. “If this is his work, we need to establish the pattern and act on it before he can create more trouble... ideally by finding and bringing into custody the man himself.”

“More than that,” Midori shook her head. “I apologise for saying this, Nagesu-sama, but Keitarou has proven himself an enemy who will only stop when he no longer has life — and the Council should focus on eradicating him rather than bringing him into custody.”

“Well, we have to find him first,” Tokutarou pointed out.

He sent Juushirou a glance.

“At the very least, the Council summoned Juushirou here to hear about Souja-dono’s last words, did it not? We should begin by analysing those... and also, I want to ask about the young lad that was brought back with him. I understand Kikyue-dono gave him some nasty scars — I trust that he will live?”

“He is doing well, but still hasn’t regained consciousness,” Juushirou nodded. “Mi... Edogawa-san has been looking after him, with support from some of my people, and she’s assured me his injuries aren’t life threatening. What his involvement in this is still unknown, but I can say with confidence that he was not involved in the assault on Souja-dono in any respect.”

“Your evidence for this?” Midori asked softly, and Juushirou frowned.

“Firstly, he was unarmed at the scene,” he said frankly. “Secondly, Souja-dono pretty much begged Hirata and I to make sure he was taken care of. He said to us, and to Kikyue-dono that the boy — whose name is, I believe, Koku — had come to help him and that he’d promised to help the lad in return. I took that promise on for him and have done what I can — Souja-dono was adamant, and so for me that seals Koku’s innocence.”

“I suppose in this regard Souja-dono can be considered the most reliable witness,” Tokutarou pursed his lips, “and I think we can trust

Juushirou's testimony as being unembellished."

"There is also the matter of the young girl which Souja-dono claimed to have assaulted him," Retsu put in quietly at this juncture. "I realise that it is a highly unlikely probability, but something in his description reminded me of reports I received from my Third Seated officer about the individual who attacked them in the Spiritless Zone. When I heard that Souja-dono had been attacked by a girl wielding a sword, I did some specific tests on his body during autopsy. There were two significant findings — if I might report these to the Council as a whole?"

"Please, go ahead," Nagesu nodded in her direction, and Retsu bowed her thanks, turning to face the rest of the room.

"Firstly, there was no evidence of foreign reiatsu on Souja-dono's body," she said evenly, "with the exception of that belonging to the young stray currently in Thirteenth Division's care. Following careful examination of Souja-dono's injuries, however, I must concur with Ukitake-taichou's account. This Koku's reiatsu is only present in areas of Souja-dono's body which would suggest that at some point he provided support — most likely after Souja-dono was already hurt. Souja-dono's body was also crudely bound with a peasant's obi, suggesting that someone attempted to stem the flow of his blood by using it as a tourniquet — although whoever did so clearly had no medical knowledge, and was unsuccessful in his attempts. This correlates with the idea that the District boy helped Souja-dono after he was attacked, but played no part in the encounter himself. I have heard from Mitsuki-san since that the youth was missing his obi when he was brought to her attention, and as she cleaned and treated his wounds on arrival at Thirteenth, I believe her account accurate."

"But there was no other foreign reiatsu on the body?" Nagesu asked sharply, and Retsu shook her head.

"Secondly, I examined the marks left by the sword," she continued pensively. "It was not easy to be entirely conclusive, due to the extreme brutality inflicted and the damage sustained by Souja-dono during the attack. However, in some of the more clear cuts, it seemed as though the same kind of weapon was utilised in the slaying of Souja-dono as in the murder of my subordinates."

"In short, one assassin, two crime scenes?" Midori's eyes became glittering slits of gold. "And Souja-dono identified this assassin as looking like Eiraki-hime — so far it doesn't look good for Keitarou's camp, does it?"

“We have no conclusive evidence, particularly to explain motive or opportunity in either one of these crimes,” Retsu cautioned, “but yes, I would agree. My first impulse was that these were carried out by the same individual — a young woman with no reiatsu but an extremely powerful killing instinct which is not easily abated.”

“Strong enough to kill a Vice Captain of Clan birth?” Guren looked alarmed, and Juushirou wondered if his mind had flown to Shirogane. Retsu sighed, shrugging her shoulders.

“I cannot explain the evidence, I can only describe my findings and what logically makes sense,” she said apologetically. “I do not understand, either, Guren-sama, but still, that is my conclusion. I believe Souja-dono called her “Sakaki” — Ukitake-taichou, is that correct?”

“If memory serves, yes,” Juushirou agreed pensively. “But since we have no way to verify it or even pursue it, I don’t suppose any of us have spent much time dwelling on her name.”

“Indeed,” Retsu looked grave. “I imagine there are many more pressing matters to be settled first, but it is well to have that recorded, just in case it becomes useful at a later date.”

“How long before the boy awakes, Juushirou?” Kyouki cast Juushirou a glance, and Juushirou frowned.

“I don’t know,” he admitted. “I have left it to Mi... Edogawa-san’s discretion to report to me when he shows signs of waking. I understand the importance of his testimony, but it can’t be rushed. He is the only person who may shed any light on what happened to Souja and therefore I think it’s important that he is not mishandled. Demanding information from him might be counter-productive. When we found them, Kikyue-dono unleashed her sword on him, and the subordinate I charged with taking Koku back to Inner Seireitei reported to me that he seemed afraid of her uniform when she went to help him.”

“We may not have time to kid-glove him,” Yuuichi pointed out. “One Vice Captain and eight healers lie dead. How many more will we lose before we get to the bottom of this?”

“Two others, too,” Kyouki said grimly. “Two men from Tenth Division died in strange circumstances not far from the Inner Seireitei perimeter. It appeared to be a Hollow kill. Normally I’d leave such matters to Hakubei and Tenth to handle, but it bothered me, since according to the Inner Seireitei gate records, one of the dead men entered Seireitei, purporting to come to find healers to help his comrade. No visit was made to the Fourth Division, though, when I checked with Eriko-dono...?”

She paused, glancing at Retsu, who shook her head.

“Eriko-san asked me about it, and I checked personally. No such log was made with our people,” she agreed gravely. “This shinigami did not come to us for any reason. More, I must disagree with you on one point, Kyouki-sama, if you will allow it. One dead officer from Tenth Division died from Hollow-inflicted wounds. The other was covered in Kidou burns — to a horrific degree. In fact, if not for his zanpakutou at the scene, we would not have been able to make an identification.”

“Kidou... burns?” Nagesu’s eyes widened, and Retsu nodded.

“Crude Kidou, but yes, I believe so,” she agreed. “I would say... a spell went out of control and exploded, engulfing him in it. I do not think he fired the spell himself, however. I rather believe... he was already dead. That may have been the Hollow, also, but the death was made to look like something else — or an attempt was made to cover his identity so that it could be used for some further purpose. I do not know which, but he was not robed in shihakushou at the scene.”

“Yes, yes. I’d forgotten that,” Kyouki nodded eagerly. “The gate guard reported a man wearing dishevelled shihakushou entering the gate and giving the dead officer’s name... but described a man who did not fit the profile of Hakubei’s lad.”

“Do we have a clear description?” Juushirou asked softly, and Kyouki frowned, eying him keenly.

“You have a suspect?” she enquired, and Juushirou frowned.

“Well, there is an individual in Second Division custody, so perhaps,” he agreed cautiously, meeting Midori’s gaze for a moment. Midori nodded.

“That individual was apprehended the morning Souja-dono was brought back injured. He may have been acting as a distraction — but for now, we’d rather investigate that ourselves and see what we come up with. No useful information has come from him, yet,” she said crisply. “I’ve left it to my brother — when there’s something to report here, I’ll make sure it’s known.”

“At the very least, though, does your suspect have dark hair, Midori?” Kyouki asked, and Midori nodded.

“He does,” she said cautiously, “but so do many people.”

“Blue eyes?”

“Blue?” Juushirou’s gaze became one of disbelief, and the assembled Clan leaders turned to state at his sudden outburst.

“Juushirou?” Tokutarou looked concerned, and Juushirou reddened, bowing his head hastily in apology.

“I’m sorry, that was out of place of me and impolite. Please, forgive me,” he said slowly. “I just... I was involved in the snaring of Midori-sama’s prisoner, and he does not have blue eyes. However, a young man who helped Mitsuki across the Spiritless Zone with Aomori-san apparently did.”

“You think this to be a connection?” Guren looked sceptical. “There are just as many individuals in Seireitei with blue eyes. Probably even more in the Districts, if the truth be told. I have heard Mitsuki’s story, too, but I cannot see a link between that and this. The young man in the Spiritless Zone has no way of getting here without help from someone like the man we seek. However, if he were an agent of Keitarou’s, he would not have helped Mitsuki nor risked being captured by taking the time to carry Aomori across a large stretch of territory. Yes, perhaps he had spirit power, but he clearly was contaminated and had no idea what to do with it.”

“Guren-sama is probably right,” Nagesu murmured. “There is very little likelihood that someone from the Spiritless Zone could cross into Seireitei without access to secure codes for Senkaimon which have not been disturbed by any but those in authority either before or since the tragedy that occurred over there.”

Juushirou’s eyes narrowed as he remembered Kai’s words.

Not between the Spiritless Zone and Inner Seireitei, perhaps, but if you took a different route...?

He opened his mouth to speak, but Nagesu held up his hand to indicate for him to stop.

“We cannot pursue something with so little evidence, Ukitake,” he said simply. “Guren-sama is correct. This young man with blue eyes rescued Edogawa-hime and allowed her to treat and return Aomori to the main camp, as well as summoning help from Seireitei which undoubtedly resulted in the saving of three lives. There is no scientific evidence to show a way of crossing from Rukongai to Seireitei without being detected. We are grateful for his interference in the case of Edogawa-hime and Aomori Seri, but he is not a person of interest to the Council now the name of Aizen Keitarou has come to light.”

“But...” Juushirou began, and Midori frowned.

“Juushirou, you know who we believe the man in Kai’s custody to be, don’t you?” she said quietly, and slowly Juushirou nodded. “We suspect that he is involved in the abduction of Kotetsu Tenichi, and perhaps others as well. We suspect he might have an alliance with Aizen Keitarou, though right now we can prove neither one. Most importantly, though, his ability to activate a Senkaimonis explained by his previous connections to the Onmitsukidou. However, those rules apply to a very limited number of individuals, and it is extremely rare for an Onmitsukidou to go rogue, let alone go rogue and manage to survive. I am very sure that there are no other individuals who fit that description anywhere in Seireitei at the current time. Therefore, you should take note of Nagesu-sama’s opinion. Scientifically, it is not possible. Therefore it is not possible. We should be looking for Keitarou, not trying to tie the guilt of ending lives to someone who ended up saving people we were not there to save.”

There was a particularly pointed edge to her last words, and Juushirou bit his lip, half-wondering what Kai might have said to his perceptive sister about Mitsuki and their close relationship. He said nothing, however, and, taking his silence as acquiescence, Nagesu turned his attention back to the matter at hand.

“So, if the young boy who currently sleeps in Thirteenth is not yet ready for our questions, we must return to Souja-dono,” he mused. “Ukitake, did you mention a sword bearing the name of Aizen?”

“Souja-dono said something about finding a sword,” Juushirou sighed, but nodded his head as he realised the angle of conversation had irreversibly shifted in a new direction. “Additionally, he made it very clear that, whilst he thought the girl who had attacked him was the daughter of Eiraki-hime, he felt certain that Keitarou and Eiraki-hime also had a son. He said the name Kohaku... but not much more. He was not very coherent in describing either thing. He said that we... or he... or someone should find this sword, but whether it connects to this Kohaku person is unclear. I got the impression that the name was somehow engraved on the sword — but I’m certain that Souja didn’t mean the sword was called Kohaku.”

“But why would you write such a giveaway set of characters on a weapon of any kind?” Yuuichi demanded. “If you’re a madman in hiding, do you go to the trouble of neatly labelling all your toys for public viewing?”

“There must be a reason. Keitarou doesn’t do anything for no reason,” Nagesu said wearily. “That is all you can tell us, Ukitake?”

“More would be speculative,” Juushirou was apologetic. “That was all Souja-dono really said, sir. As I mentioned, he was incoherent due to loss of blood.”

“Perhaps the name was on the sword to give the impression of Aizen’s presence in a place where it was not,” Guren rubbed his chin. “He has acted in that way before, using decoys and lures to make us look stupid. What if this Aizen sword was another such ruse — a distraction away from the genuine article?”

“Such as the son, Kohaku?” Kyouki asked, and Guren nodded.

“It seems possible,” he agreed. “If we assume that Keitarou is no longer as physically sound as he was, thanks to my uncle’s attack, he must rely on this son a great deal. Surely, then, it makes sense to set up a situation in which everything points to him, whilst in fact concealing him in an entirely different location. Then if, as Souja-dono apparently did, someone stumbles onto the base, he returns none the wiser.”

“That does sound like something Keitarou would do,” Tokutarou admitted. “But in the same vein, Guren-sama, it might mean that Kohaku doesn’t actually exist. Maybe there is just the illusion of his existing... the sword... and so on. Perhaps the only living child is the girl.”

“I must beg to differ on this matter,” Retsu put in softly. “Madeki-kun’s report to me clearly described a young girl in her late teens. I am quite sure that the likelihood of her being the killer of Souja-dono is quite high. Yet Eiraki-hime was already with child, I believe, when she and Keitarou-dono first fled from this place. That implies that there is an older child — which seems likely to be the son, Kohaku.”

“Either way, the elder son is someone we know nothing about, yet, and that’s a gap we need to fill in,” Midori remarked. “Whether he exists or not, we need to find out, and more, what his role in all this is. I can’t imagine that kid sis does all the blood and guts work whilst oniichan sits on the sidelines and waits it out.”

“Maybe Keitarou is incapacitated. Perhaps the mastermind is his son,” Yuuichi suggested.

“That possibility also exists,” Guren nodded. He clenched his fists. “There are too many avenues and not enough certainty!”

“Well, one certainty we do have,” Nagesu said grimly. “In the message from Hirata-dono, I received an intimation that Souja-dono had been to Rukongai. I do not know the exact coordinates, and I do not believe investigations around the area he was found have so far indicated a particular location on the other side. We have traced residue that indicates a Senkaimon, but nothing more than that... an old test gate no longer in active service that was barely safe when we decommissioned it. I believe it suggests Keitarou — or agents of his — have been lurking in the wasteland surrounding the Spiritless Zone. Since Kai-dono has already had his men search the Spiritless Zone to no avail for any sign of those who killed Retsu-dono's officers, I believe that an area of the wasteland Rukon is the most likely site for a base. We no longer patrol it, as it does not house individuals, therefore it could be considered a judicial black hole. Likely the killer of the healers penetrated the Spiritless Zone to carry out her crime and then withdrew to a place we did not consider... a place where resources are so depleted that life for one as spiritually able as Keitarou ought to be impossible. By crossing over there, Souja-dono too became a victim — but the wasteland Rukon remains an extremely wide area of land to investigate. The business with the Tenth members cannot be resolved for now and should be set aside in light of that fact. For the time being, preparing a mission to Rukongai ought to be our first priority. The Council should now vote on further action to take — Ukitake, you may stand down."

"Yes, sir," Juushirou bowed his head, obediently withdrawing from the chamber but, as the guards on duty closed the big heavy doors behind him, he glanced back at them, frustration welling up in his heart.

You can see that a Senkaimon was opened then without you knowing about it, yet you can't see that one might have been used in another way by another individual. Perhaps there is no connection and I'm paranoid, but I know Keitarou and I know how he works. I know people think that I'm only bothered about this blue eyed dark haired young man because he saved Mitsuki at a time I wasn't able to be there for her, but it's not just about that. It bothers me... most of all, it bothers me that Mitsuki has stopped talking about it. Even if I raise it, she brushes it off as irrelevant. The man in custody in Second is not the blue eyed man — but Mitsuki is acting as though the danger is over. Is it really over? She escaped with her life once, but that doesn't mean she's safe. Souja is proof of that... and there's no way I can let anything happen to anyone else, least of all Mitsuki.

"Taichou?"

As he stepped out into the main courtyard, Enishi's voice made him start out of his reverie, glancing up to meet the concerned gaze of his Vice Captain.

"Enishi-kun?" He frowned, brows knitting together in confusion.

“Why are you... did I ask you to come meet me here?”

“No, you didn’t, but I felt it important I came myself,” Enishi said brusquely. “There’s a visitor at Thirteenth, says he needs to speak to you. Won’t tell me his name, or anything about him, just says that he’s known to you and wants to speak to you face to face.”

“A visitor?” Juushirou’s eyes widened, all thoughts of Mitsuki and her blue eyed rescuer flying from his thoughts at this surprising turn of events. “What kind of visitor? He wouldn’t give you his name? What did you do?”

“Told him he could damn well stay outside and wait, then, since I wasn’t about to let him in without knowing what he was about,” Enishi said matter-of-factly. “You weren’t there to ask, and there are young’uns inside Thirteenth, as well as that waif of yours and Edogawa besides. I’ve left Shikibu watching over the place just in case, but it didn’t look like he was going to put up a fight.”

He scratched his head, clearly perplexed.

“That said, he didn’t seem inclined to give up and go, either,” he admitted. “Sat himself down on the grass, in the shadows away towards Ugendou, and told me he’d wait. Seemed as though he was going to stay there all night and day if need be, so I decided I’d come get you and tell you about it personally.”

“And he told you nothing about who he was or why he wanted to speak to me?” Juushirou frowned, and Enishi shrugged.

“Not a jot,” he owned. “I thought about arresting him, but then, I figured, he might well be on the level. Strange looking youngster, though. Silver through and through. Eyes, hair, the lot. Never seen one as uncanny as him before, I’m sure of it. I thought he might attract a crowd, but he settled himself in the shade and... well, before he became a tourist attraction...”

“Silver?” Juushirou’s eyes narrowed, a vague, hazy memory surfacing briefly in the back of his mind. His more recent conversations with Hirata flitted through his head, and he pressed his lips together thoughtfully, nodding.

“All right, Enishi, I’m coming,” he said, making up his mind. “I’ll come meet with this strange silver apparition of yours, and see what it is he has to say.”

As Juushirou and his adjutant returned to the Thirteenth barracks, there was no sign of the mysterious visitor, and Enishi frowned, clearly perturbed as he glanced around him, looking for any sign of the cloaked figure he had left behind.

“He was here, I swear,” he murmured, then, “Shikibu! Are you here?”

“I’m exactly where you left me, Fukutaichou,” Naoko emerged from beneath one of the drooping willow trees, folding her arms impatiently across her chest. “You took your time coming back.”

“It’s probably my fault, Naoko — I was detained at length by the Council,” Juushirou interjected, before Enishi could respond. “In the meantime, I understand that there’s someone who’s here to see me? I can sense a reiatsu around this place that I don’t know, but...”

“I sent him to wait in a less prominent location, where he wouldn’t disturb the rest of the Division, or our neighbours,” Naoko said matter-of-factly. “I told him that if he wanted to see our Captain, he should follow our terms and do as I say. He seemed amenable, especially when I explained to him that Dokusou Houshi isn’t a nice weapon, and I’m not a friendly border guard.”

“You threatened him?” Juushirou’s eyes widened, and Naoko’s lips thinned.

“I’m concerned that people are stalking around this Division lately,” she said flatly. “I don’t like that there’s an unknown District kid suddenly foisted upon us without us knowing a jot of information about him — not even confirmation of his name. I don’t like that Mitsuki was followed in the barracks garden and nobody tracked whoever it was... and now, someone appears out of the blue and expects to be granted an audience with the Captain at a moment’s notice. It’s a lot too much activity for me, and it’s never a bad thing to be wary of strangers.”

“Mm,” Juushirou’s eyes softened as he glanced at her, reading the expression in her obstinate greenish gaze. Her mind had gone to the death of a close kinswoman during their final year at the Academy, and, though Juushirou would never raise Suzuno’s name or ask insensitive questions about his Third Seat’s motivation, he understood her line of thought all the same. She had not been able to protect Suzuno from Keitarou’s murderous intent, but she would do what she could to protect Mitsuki, and the fact Keitarou’s name had risen in the investigation had spurred his Unohana subordinate to triple her usual vigilance.

He nodded, gesturing to Enishi to follow him.

“I’ll wait in Ugendou,” he said evenly. “Naoko, if you can find this visitor — providing he’s still here — I’d appreciate it if you’d escort him through the rear gate directly to my quarters. I agree that it would be better if he and the rest of the Division remain strangers, given what Enishi’s told me, and I understand your concerns for security, too.”

“You’re going to meet him?” Naoko said doubtfully, and Juushirou nodded again.

“I think I ought to,” he agreed. “Don’t look like that — if it turns out to be dangerous, I’m sure I’ll be able to defend myself. I don’t think it will, though — I have a hunch that this person is known to me, and if I’m right, he’s someone I need to speak to without fail.”

“I’ll come with you,” Enishi decided, meeting Naoko’s gaze, and jerking his head forward in a gruff confirmation of her unspoken question. “It’s my job to back up the Captain, and even though I know you can take care of yourself, Taichou, I’d be happier, just in case it gets violent. I don’t like judging on appearances, but given what’s happened lately, I’d rather be on my guard.”

Juushirou hesitated for a moment, pressing his lips together, then he sighed, nodding his head.

“Very well,” he acquiesced reluctantly. “I can see you’re both determined, so I won’t insult that resolve by dismissing it. Naoko, you go fetch the visitor from whatever place you sent him, please. Enishi, you come with me to Ugendou. We’ll soon settle this matter one way or another.”

“Yes, sir,” Naoko looked relieved, saluting and disappearing into shunpo, and Enishi grinned, striding forward to open the gate. The narrow pathway led to the small plank bridge that crossed the channel of water which flanked the Captain’s private chamber. It was not used very often, for most members of the division accessed Juushirou’s quarters via the wooden walkway that had been carefully constructed — as Shunsui had once joked — to bear the weight of the entirety of the Gotei should they all decide they needed Juushirou’s advice at the same exact moment. In contrast, the bridge was no more than a makeshift affair, requiring a hop and a jump to make it safely to the other side of the koi lake. Juushirou negotiated with ease, and, as Enishi thudded down beside him, he pushed open the sliding divide, stepping within the office-cum-sleeping area which had become his Inner Seireitei home.

“You’re sure about meeting this guy?” Enishi settled himself on the floor, casting his Captain a final, quizzical glance, and Juushirou nodded.

“Like I said, I think it might matter that I do,” he agreed gravely. “It’s all right, Enishi. This is my decision as a Captain. If it’s how I think it is, well, I might be the only person who can hold this conversation, so, if possible, I mean to do it.”

Enishi’s expression became perplexed, but before he could put his confusion into words, Ugendou’s door slid back, and a figure entered, robed in dark blue fabric with the distinctive pattern of white vines woven deeply into the cloth. He moved silently, the cowl of his cloak pulled up over his head, and at his approach, Enishi cast Juushirou a sidelong glance, clearly poised and prepped to move should this strange, unexpected guest prove to be dangerous. Juushirou shook his head slightly, fixing solemn eyes on the newcomer, who paused a foot or so away from the two Gotei officers, lowering himself gracefully to the floor and bowing his head forward in a gesture of sombre respect. At length he lifted his head, reaching up a hand to push back the hood of the cloak, and Juushirou found himself face to face with a silver-haired apparition, a long tail of fine argent hair falling down over his shoulder, and the light glittering in his eyes made their delicate blue colour appear almost the same metallic shade. He was young, maybe in his early or middle twenties, but there was a gravity to his expression that made Juushirou feel he was not unused to hardship or burden.

There was something distinctive in the young man’s features that made him certain that his hunch had been correct, and he sat back, indicating for his guest to speak.

“Thank you for agreeing to see me,” the man’s words were low and soft, their phrasing proper and deferential, yet somehow full of suppressed emotion that did not reflect clearly through the mask of composure on his face. “I realise that you have no reason to — particularly with so much uproar among your fellow officers. It’s not usually my policy to risk making such things worse... but in the circumstances... I don’t feel that I can remain quiet.”

“You did not give a name to my adjutants,” Juushirou chided softly. “I realise you’ve had a less than warm welcome from my Third Seat, but in the circumstances...”

“It was no less than I expected from a well disciplined shinigami squad representative,” the youth shook his head. “I have suffered no offence from it. As you say, the fault is mine for not correctly identifying myself before demanding to see you. It was impertinent, though I hope you may understand my reasons for being so circumspect.”

“I believe so,” Juushirou’s eyes narrowed for a moment, then, “We have not met before, but all the same, I am reminded of past encounters, and believe that I must be speaking to Joumei-kun, correct?”

Enishi started, staring at his Captain in surprise at this quick and apparently random identification, but the silver haired ghost nodded his head, a wry smile touching his lips for the briefest of instants.

“As you say,” he confirmed softly. “I am Ichimaru Joumei, son of Ichimaru Shunmei, who claimed an acquaintance with you some twenty years or so ago. My coming was a gamble, being that we had not formally been introduced, but I remembered that Hirata-sama has trusted you with the truth of our existence in the past. I remember Father speaking well of you, and I felt you might be willing to hear what I had to say without jumping to conclusions or misconstruing my presence here. There is nobody else in Inner Seireitei to whom I dared come.”

“I will listen to you,” Juushirou agreed, “but I have one question. Why come to me? Why not Hirata? Surely, in the circumstances...”

“Precisely because of the circumstances, I dare not show my face before the Endou,” Joumei shook his head slowly. “I would also not trouble Hirata-sama directly at a time like this. I... have no right to stand before a Clan in mourning, not even to offer my respects to a man I considered my friend. All I can do is face one he trusts and hope that I can make him trust me... or at least, my word, so that the culprit in this crime can be brought firmly to justice.”

“In that respect, I think we feel the same,” Juushirou said grimly. “Enishi, it’s all right. You can sit back. I don’t believe we’re in any danger from our visitor — even though his origins are unknown to you. I did indeed know Joumei’s father, from the time we worked in Seventh — it’s possible he might have important information to tell us about Souja-dono and his actions before his death.”

“About Souja-dono, huh?” Enishi obediently relaxed his stance, rubbing his chin absently as he re-examined Joumei’s features for himself. “Is that true? You know something about that? It’s a messy business... if you can help, please, tell us what you know.”

“Souja-dono was a friend of mine,” Joumei shifted his position, crossing his legs and folding his hands in his lap, “from when we were small boys. Father and Hirata-sama ensured it was that way, so that we would both grow to form a strong bond of mutual trust for the time we would inherit our respective families. We are... were... about the same age, but I... had always expected to be the one to die first. My people... our life expectancies aren't long, and I never anticipated..."

He faltered, shaking his head, and Juushirou felt certain he saw the glitter of genuine grief in the other's eyes before it vanished once more behind the silvery mask of composure.

"In any case, the night before he died, he came to see you, did he not?" he asked gently, and Joumei nodded his head.

"He did," he agreed sadly. "I sent a message to him asking him to come. In hindsight, I wish I had not — but I didn't expect him to act on my information in the way that he did. In our years of acquaintance, he never seemed to be the type foolish enough to dive through an unknown Senkaimon chasing ghosts. I thought he'd ruminate on it, try and gather some hard evidence and keep a close eye on those he considered important to him. More, I hoped he'd take care of himself — but it seems he decided to do the absolute opposite."

"Did you think... he was in danger, then?" Enishi asked abruptly, and Joumei shrugged.

"I thought there was a chance, and told him to be careful," he admitted with a sigh. "Maybe that very thing drove him to act impulsively. I'll probably never know, but until I know how weighty the burden of our guilt is in his death, I want to make sure I do what I can to resolve it."

Juushirou sighed, extending a pale hand and resting it gently on Joumei's shoulder.

"You are not to blame," he said simply. "A lot of people seem to feel they are... but the only one who is is the one who held the blade. We won't refuse your help, though. Seeing Hirata so upset... is not nice for a friend. More, seeing a young boy I've known since birth savaged and hurt in such a vicious way... it will live with me for a long time. You're right when you say it needs resolution — even if that doesn't seem enough."

"Mm," Joumei agreed. "In which case, I'll tell you what I told Souja-dono, and trust you to do with it what you can."

He slid his fingers into his obi, pulling out a scrap of worn paper and pushing it across the floor between them.

“It’s not the neatest,” he said apologetically. “My sister is a brilliant scientist, but her script is somewhat unintelligible in places. I’ve tried to make it clearer, but maybe I’ve made it worse.”

“Let me see,” Juushirou scooped up the sheet, glancing at it and then frowning, casting Joumei a surprised look.

“This relates to Tenichi?”

“To his abduction, at least,” Joumei agreed. “You know, I think, that we were the ones who located and returned Tenichi-dono to Seventh Division?”

“You were?” Enishi’s eyes almost popped out of his head. “How on earth did you manage that?”

“My people have ways and means, and besides, someone conveniently dropped him on the grass outside our dwelling,” Joumei responded dryly. “There’s no doubt he was placed there to entice us out, which worked — so Izumi did tests on Tenichi’s damaged obi, and she picked up evidence that suggested he was taken out of Seireitei. We believe that the location he was taken to was a place within the Rukon, though we can’t be more specific. Our records are old and out of date, but Izumi did find a mineral match with an element unique to the Rukon. We think that the kidnappers took him through a spirit gate and that’s why you found no trace of him.”

“I... see.” Juushirou’s eyes narrowed thoughtfully. “Souja himself said something about Rukongai... but he wasn’t specific as to where, either.”

“That was what I was afraid of,” Joumei chewed down on his lip. “When I heard what had happened, my immediate thought was that he’d fallen foul of the people we were trying to thwart.”

He paused, eying Juushirou for a moment, then, “You know the name Aizen Keitarou, don’t you?”

“Too well,” Juushirou said darkly. “Souja mentioned him as well — and that he got that information from you. Can you be more specific as to why you made that connection? Was it just because of the ransom note Hirata received, or...”

“Hirata received a note?” Enishi blinked, and Juushirou nodded.

“A note for Tenichi, demanding Joumei and his people in return for his officer’s life,” he said blackly. “Not the kind of note Hirata was about to grace with an answer. Then Tenichi was released, and was returned here.”

“The only reason that would happen would be if it was a trap,” Joumei agreed. “Keitarou is the most likely one to be hunting us, even though those who betrayed his father are long since dead and buried. However, the real reason for our suspicion was more scientific than supposition. Izumi sensed Kidou at the scene where she found Tenichi and brought him back. Concealing Kidou, faint but just about within her grasp. It was Urahara reiatsu — and that, coupled with some unknown Rukongai location and the ransom note suggested to us that this was probably Keitarou’s doing. The spirit cuffs Tenichi wore and his apparent lack of memory suggested someone with intelligence and forethought covering their tracks... as far as we could see, all the leads fed back to one origin.”

“Tenichi was used, in fact, to draw you people out?” Anger flickered in Juushirou’s hazel eyes. “Then, because Souja followed up the investigation by himself, he became caught up in something and wound up losing his life as a result.”

“Have people been sent to Rukongai?”

“Not yet, but they will be,” Juushirou shook his head. “The Council were discussing preparations for a covert search, but we’re still reeling from the events in the Spiritless Zone and there’s a significant lack of personnel to deal with that and the Hollows here given the fact that Seventh Division are currently in deep mourning and Fourth are hardly much better. The rest of us are stretched quite thinly — and if Keitarou is the enemy, we can’t go in unprepared. We know, some of us, what he can do first hand. Souja’s death is a warning to everyone else... this can’t be taken lightly.”

“I agree,” Joumei nodded. “I also think, though, that Keitarou will attack the Kitsune at some point in the not so distant future. I’ve been evacuating as many people as possible to safer space in small groups, and now there are only a few left. I’ll remain, of course, because so long as I’m there, nobody will believe we’ve moved — but I’d like to send my sister away from there if at all possible. If anything happens to me, she’s the only other survivor of our direct line, and the only one who can currently take my place.”

“You want us to offer her safe conduct here?” Juushirou asked, and Joumei shook his head.

“You mistake me,” he said matter-of-factly. “I wouldn’t ask you to protect an outsider who carries no individual value or worth to the Gotei simply as a refugee. No, Juushirou-dono, that isn’t my meaning at all. I would like to offer Izumi to you as an aid to your investigation. I’ve come here to explain to you the situation, but the paperwork is all hers. I think, given her prior knowledge, she might be able to earn her shelter by assisting in a scientific capacity. Remember, she's also the one who sensed the foreign reiatsu near our home. If anyone is well placed to provide evidence, I believe it's my sister."

"Thirteenth Division is becoming a haven for strays," Enishi reflected with a rueful grin. "Well, Taichou, what do you think? I'll go with whatever you decide, of course, but we've already got Edogawa moonlighting in and out, and then there's the young lad Hikifune brought back here on your orders... now we're to take in someone else?"

"If it's inconvenient..." Joumei pressed his lips together, but Juushirou shook his head.

"The Kitsune are a secret, and that secret must also be protected," he said gravely. "Izumi-hime can come here, and I will find some explanation for her presence among us. I believe she's younger than you?" this last to Joumei, who nodded.

"About the same age as Souja-dono's sister, Kikyue-hime," he agreed.

"Then maybe I can get away with telling people she's a new recruit sent by Genryuusai-sensei from the Academy early on account of her particular skills," Juushirou gazed at his hands pensively. "I'm not good at lying, but I think that might work. She can observe what she needs to and report to Enishi or I in secret when the time is appropriate — that seems safest, if it's only to one of the two of us. Nobody need know that she's a member of your people, since few know they actually exist. Enishi, I'll fill you in on the necessary details afterwards, but I know you won't share them with anyone unless I give you leave."

"Damn straight," Enishi said gravely, "but what about Shikibu? Are you going to keep this from her, too? It'll be hard, if that's the case... she's sharp, and with this being a girl and all..."

"Most female recruits encounter training with my third seated officer at some point or another," Juushirou explained, casting Joumei a weary smile. "As I believe you've already seen, she's a woman of some considerable personality and will. It began that way in Seventh, when the Endou were loath to let their hime join our squad and even less happy about the idea of them being trained by men — but Naoko's good at training, and Enishi's right, with a new recruit, she'll ask. We'll include her in this as well, I think — but absolutely nobody else within the Thirteenth and nobody from outside, save, of course, Hirata if he should ask, must know who Izumi-hime is or why she's with us."

"Can be done," Enishi seemed relieved, nodding his head. "I'll brief Shikibu, if you like — she'll probably pick up the important bits quicker than me in any case."

"It's comforting to me that you have officers willing to trust in your word with so few questions," Joumei observed. "From what Father told me, I shouldn't be surprised — but I am grateful for it, too. I'm an unknown, and my word carries no guarantees... yet you're listening to me and more, your officers will too. That comforts me... it makes me think Izumi will be safe here."

"She will be fine, you have my word," Juushirou agreed. "With Hirata and his family in the state they're in, your Kitsune only have us to turn to for help, and in this instance, I think we must provide it. Whatever the Urahara or Keitarou still think of your people, sins die with those who commit them — younger generations should not be tainted by the past."

"In our case, it's a fact we've accepted in order to live on at all," Joumei reflected, "But thank you. I'll tell Izumi to prepare and I'll send her here as soon and as subtly as I can."

"In the meantime, how much can you tell us about Rukongai?" Juushirou asked quizzically. "The Onmitsukidou have already searched the Spiritless Zone from top to bottom following the assassination of our officers, but they found no perpetrator anywhere and all our leads have gone dead. We captured an individual but he refuses to talk, and nobody can connect him with Rukongai anyway. Souja went to Rukongai, but what happened to him there is still a little unclear. We believe he was attacked by a child of Keitarou's, but..."

"A male child?" Joumei asked sharply, and Juushirou shook his head.

"A young girl," he replied, "but Souja was quite definite about there being a son as well. He said the name Kohaku, and something about a sword that he thought we should find. He was incoherent by this point, though, and it wasn't completely clear what he wanted to tell us."

"I warned Souja about this because it occurred to me that Keitarou's child, if born, might have been a son," Joumei's expression darkened, making his strange eyes seem all the more spectral. "He probably went chasing after it for that reason, because he realised that if Keitarou had a son, it might be a problem for his family. I imagine he went to protect them, and in doing so, caused the exact circumstance I hoped to prevent by warning him. Now Hirata-sama has lost his son, he has no heir. And whether it's considered honourable or not, Keitarou's wife is Hirata-sama's sister, Eiraki-hime. That being so..."

"You think Keitarou had Souja killed so he could use his own son to claim the Endou line?" Juushirou was aghast, and Joumei shrugged.

"It's a possibility," he admitted. "So long as the Endou refuse to disown Eiraki-hime and remove her from the family line completely, that risk remains there. Misashi-sama told Father that he wouldn't do that, because Eiraki-hime's actions acted as a reminder to the Clan of how precarious their situation was and how much they had to rebuild. Also, as her father, I believe he found it painful to cut ties with one he had raised — but because of it, the Endou have not disowned Eiraki-hime. She has parted from them, but, even through a female line, a son of Keitarou's could, in the absence of another male heir, claim the Clan legitimately."

"But Aizen is a wanted criminal," Enishi protested. "Surely in those circumstances, nobody would..."

"Keitarou is. His son, however, is not," Joumei said simply. "Unless Seireitei can find, and implicate this son in a crime against the Gotei or the people of Soul Society, there's no reason for him not to emerge as a claimant. The Endou still have succession by combat as legitimate form of power transition, providing the claimant is within the required degrees of the Clan. As I understand it, as Hirata-sama's sister, Eiraki-hime's bloodline belongs to the main house, therefore any son of hers, no matter how unsavoury his sire, could potentially challenge Hirata-sama for power in District Seven. More, if the Council could not find a crime to lay against his name, should this son succeed in killing Hirata-sama, the Clan would be his by right. I think it impossible that Keitarou does not know all of this from the time he spent in Seventh — and even if he didn't, Eiraki-hime could not have been ignorant of it. A son through a female line cannot inherit the Endou Clan, but he can still claim it by defeating Hirata-sama and rendering him powerless in fair combat."

"That's why you asked whether a male killed Souja," Juushirou looked troubled. "Keitarou's possibly out-thought everyone yet again. If he fielded his daughter to kill people, then it means he's keeping his son for bigger and better things — that's what you're saying, isn't it?"

Keitarou took and married Eiraki-hime for her Clan connections, and now he might exploit them through legitimate loopholes only the Endou can do anything about?”

“I don’t know, but the possibility is there. I imagine, given the way Hirata-sama reacts when Keitarou’s name is mentioned, that the idea of someone sending a killer after Souja-dono is not unlikely.”

“In which case, we need the young lad to remember something about the attack, don’t we?” Enishi glanced at his Captain, who nodded.

“Young lad?” Joumei looked quizzical, and Juushirou sighed.

“He was with Souja when we found him. Souja said that this lad — this Koku — tried to help him, but his actions were misinterpreted as aggression by Kikyue and he was struck down,” he said wearily. “He’s currently within our barracks receiving treatment, but his life isn’t in any danger. We believe him to be from one of the District villages — but we haven’t yet discovered which one. He’s in the care of a healer I trust, and she believes he may rouse soon, but he hasn’t been able to tell us anything himself, yet.”

“I see,” Joumei frowned, and for a moment he was silent. Then his head snapped up, silver eyes gleaming.

“From the Districts?”

“Yes. Probably Seventh — Souja-dono was found in Seventh.”

“But Souja-dono went to Rukongai,” Joumei pointed out. “You told me that yourself, didn’t you?”

“Well, yes, but...”

“Did you think that maybe this stray also came from there?”

“From Rukongai?” Enishi’s brow furrowed. “But the lad has reiryoku. True, he’s skin and bone, but...”

“Not the Spiritless Zone,” Joumei continued patiently, ‘but the wasteland Rukon. Oh, you don’t really think it’s abandoned?’ as Juushirou and Enishi exchanged looks. “Izumi’s test results indicate that individuals with reiryoku have been living outside of the Spiritless Zone confines for some time, and you’d be foolish not to chase that up. Just because your officers found no trace of Keitarou and his people in Gotei governed space doesn’t eliminate the possibility of them lying low in the areas your Seireitei has disdained and written off, now does it? Regular shinigami patrols to that area may have ceased twenty or more years ago, but just because the Senkaimon were sealed, it doesn't eradicate the possibility of spiritually tainted residents stuck on the other side."

"I suppose that's true," Juushirou acknowledged. "It makes for unpleasant thinking, but if Izumi-hime's science indicates that Tenichi was held somewhere outside of the Spiritless Zone then the huge expanse of land we thought we'd evacuated may not be as empty as we thought. Searching it for individuals good at hiding will take time, effort and manpower... but the way you put it makes it seem imperative that we try. If Keitarou was hiding in the wasteland Rukon, then it would explain why the same sword killed Souja and the people in the Spiritless Zone. I don't suppose he has an easy stream of weapons on the other side of the divide — but he probably does have access to Plus souls who he can brainwash and send to do his bidding on Shinigami land, even if he can't cross into it himself."

"Well, I can't speak for all the particulars in this case, and I have no knowledge of the Spiritless Zone, but I'm fairly certain the Gate used to drop Tenichi on our doorstep was one of those decommissioned by the Urahara big-wigs when they decided to stop sending shinigami over the divide," Joumei observed acidly. "It's not a huge leap of faith to assume that other discarded Senkaimon between Seireitei and the Rukon — and even between regions of the Rukon — are being similarly manipulated by Keitarou or his allies."

"That's true, too," Juushirou chewed on his lip. "The Gate we believe was used to abduct Tenichi was on an old Senkaimon network plan but not one of the more recent ones. It was deactivated not that many years ago, but it's possible there are even older ones which were switched off before that and which don't even show up on the grids I've looked at. I don't remember a time when regular shinigami patrols were dispatched into the Rukon — before it was handed over to Fourth and the Spiritless Zone project began to take shape — and I've never been there myself — but I suppose if they happened, there must've been ways and means to get easily in and out."

"I only know what's been handed down from previous generations," Joumei admitted, "but I do think I heard once that in ancient times — or at least, before the Gotei squads were formed — First and Third District took charge of business in the Rukon. That was when Senkaimon first began to be developed, so it wouldn't surprise me if prototype Gates were littered all over the place in a supposed deactivated state. Senkaimon were an Urahara invention — my family have some of the notes pertaining to it, though I believe most of the work to have been Keitsune-sama's, and therefore the data is probably in Keitarou's hands. I don't know what else he might've dabbled in over the years, but it stands to reason that he'd pursue his father's science to its natural conclusion."

"Keitarou has a competent knowledge of Senkaimon," Juushirou agreed. "And I did know that it was Urahara science and tied up with that part of the Clan. Our current Senkaimon technology was harvested from notes he left behind after Nagesu-sama chased him out of Seventh District, so if there were to be dead Gates lurking around the place, it isn't surprising that he'd use them. Furthermore, he wouldn't be averse to using local people if he thought he could gain an advantage. I've heard about the 'dead blades' some of the Pluses carry... one of these could well be the murder weapon Unohana-taichou was discussing in the meeting earlier. If the girl who attacked Souja was Keitarou's daughter, perhaps it's not that she has no reiatsu, but just is good at concealing it and utilised a weapon that was spiritually dead. Given that shinigami use spiritual methods of investigation, it seems probable that he'd arm her with one of these blades to fox our judgement and throw us off their scent."

"I'd keep thinking along those lines, if I were you," Joumei said frankly, "and I would be grateful if you shared any answers you happened to come up with. Keitarou's desire to kill us doesn't just run one way... I would like to see him eliminated, too, both for Souja-dono's sake and in order that the young ones among my people had a chance to live their lives without actively being persecuted."

His eyes narrowed.

"Out of interest, how old is this young lad of yours? Is he as old as Souja-dono, for example?"

"Younger," Juushirou mused. "Barely twenty, I'd say, certainly not much more. I see where your thoughts are going, Joumei-kun, but it won't work in this case. Koku might be from Rukongai — I admit, it's a possibility I hadn't considered, but I will, now. If so, it makes sense that Souja-dono asked so emphatically for us to protect him. If he's been eking out a living in a dangerous world where Keitarou's lurking, I imagine Souja probably didn't want him to be sent back. Whether Koku knows or doesn't know of Keitarou, it's not impossible that he could face punishment for helping a shinigami. We don't know enough about this yet, but we'll have to handle everything carefully. I'm quite sure he's not the child you're thinking of, however. If Keitarou does have a son — and Souja seemed certain that he did — it's not this boy. Souja would've said as much, and anyhow, he's too young."

"Mmm. Pity," Joumei clicked his tongue against his teeth. "Oh well.

I suppose that would've been far too easy, wouldn't it?"

He bowed his head.

"I've imposed on you for long enough," he reflected, getting to his feet and bowing again towards the Captain and his adjutant. "Thank you for seeing me under such circumstances. I'll make arrangements for Izumi to come here as soon as I'm able."

"Will you be all right, going back by yourself?" Juushirou wondered, and Joumei offered a wry smile.

"I'll be just fine," he replied lightly. "Really, you have enough to worry about without concerning yourself over a few stray foxes."

With that he was gone, and Juushirou and Enishi exchanged looks.

"What do you think?" Juushirou was the one who broke the silence, and Enishi frowned, rubbing his chin.

"I don't know who that was, but if you do, I'll go along with what you decided," he said at length. "I trust you, so that's enough for me — if it's something you can't discuss in detail, I won't press it. I wonder about the boy, though. Koku, I mean. Do you think that silver-haired young'un is right — is he from Rukongai, and not District Seireitei at all?"

Juushirou pressed his lips together pensively.

"For now, we're going to keep that idea to ourselves," he said softly. "Rukongai citizens are not allowed to enter Seireitei under any circumstances, and if it was to become widely known that the boy we had here could have come from there, it will create panic. More than that, what Joumei said about the area outside of the Spiritless Zone bothers me. If he's right — and he may well be — Seireitei might have bigger issues to face than just the escape of one local vagabond."

"You intend to protect the lad?" Enishi asked astutely, and Juushirou nodded.

"Koku tried to help one of our men, and came here because of that," he said matter-of-factly. "He wasn't trying to break through the border; he came on Souja's account, not his own. When I think about it, we were slow not to draw the same conclusion Joumei did. Souja had no reason to be so emphatic about protecting a District boy — there are ways and means in place for us to do that without him needing to press it so hard. A Rukongai citizen, though, that's different. Souja was a smart lad and he would've known there was no recourse for support for someone who'd broken through the divide...

someone who as far as the Council are concerned, shouldn't even exist. Crossing from Rukongai into Seireitei is still potentially a capital offence, and Souja-dono would've realised that, too. It troubles me to consider the full ramifications, but I think Joumei's probably right."

He sighed, shrugging his shoulders in resignation.

"As far as I'm concerned, digging too deeply into his background is less important at the moment than gaining his trust and finding out what he knows," he added wearily. "If it comes out later, we'll deal with it when we can. I'll keep Souja's promise. I gave my word. That means it stays between you and I and nobody else, Enishi. Not even Naoko and not Mitsuki either, not yet. I don't want her to be connected to this Rukongai business... it would hurt her if she found out that all the work they did over there didn't include all of the needy population, and she's got enough to deal with without us adding burdens to her. No, we'll keep it quiet and see how things pan out. He's a District boy until someone proves it to the contrary — it's just simpler that way. If we're breaking Seireitei law, the fewer people who know about it the better."

"Does that information blackout include Kyouraku?" Enishi was surprised, and Juushirou hesitated, then nodded.

"For now," he agreed, "until we know more. Do you mind?"

"It's unusual, but if that's the order, that's good enough for me," Enishi assured his companion, and Juushirou grinned, clapping his friend on the shoulder.

"It's times like this I'm glad you're my adjutant," he said, relief in his gaze, "though I'm sorry to drag you into my deception."

"Part of the job. Comes with the badge," Enishi patted his Vice Captain's insignia nonchalantly. "What the Captain says, goes. That's how I was taught, and it's seen me fine so far."

"Lucky for me," Juushirou chuckled. "Right, then. I need to tell you a little more about Joumei and his people. It's complicated, but if Izumi-hime is going to be among us, it's only fair I tell you what I can. It relates to the Endou, and is their secret business really — but Joumei's coming to me makes it ours too, from now. He showed himself to you, so that means he's willing to let me trust you — and I will."

"I'm listening," Enishi sat back against the wall of the chamber, folding thick arms across his broad chest. "If it goes some way towards putting this whole business to rest, I'm game to do my part!"

31. Hirata's Return

Chapter Thirty: Hirata's Return

“All official patrol duties are off till the end of the week, far as I can gather,”

Nakata pushed open the door of the small bed chamber, casting its sole occupant a grim look as he moved across the room towards his bunk. “Latest word according to Hajime-dono, who seems to have all the answers on everything at the moment. Kikyue-dono's here, but she's been locked in Souja-dono's office since dawn and nobody dare disturb her. Nobody's going near the Captain's office, so I couldn't tell you if he's back yet or not. There was a Council meeting this morning, but Taichou didn't go, and nor did anyone else from the Clan... and that's the latest word as far as it stands.”

From the corner of the chamber, curled up against the wall in the shadow cast by the blinds half covering the window, Tenichi raised his head, turning to glance absently in the direction of his roommate. He made no attempt to speak, however, and Nakata groaned, tossing his sword down on his own bunk before making his way purposefully to the District boy's side, grabbing him firmly by the shoulders of his shihakushou and giving him a short, violent shake.

“Hey!” This seemed to wake Tenichi from his reverie. “What are you doing? I was listening!”

“Answer a guy when he speaks to you, and then he won't try and wake you up by force,” Nakata snapped back, releasing his hold and Tenichi flopped back against the wall, hunching his body defensively against any further attacks. “Right now, the whole division is in chaos, and Hajime-dono's doing his damndest to hold things together, but he's only Fourth Seat and he's not from the direct line of the Clan, so there's only so much he can do. In the circs, he needs everyone who's fit and able to be backing him up. You should be right at the front of the queue, not mooching around in here. You're not an Endou — this affects you less than everyone else, so for heaven's sake get off your backside and go do something useful! You've been half in a daze since the funeral — no, since before it, since the night he died, and I really thought you had more spine than that.”

“Fukutaichou is dead,” Tenichi said flatly, “I don't have to be blood kin to care about that.”

“No, you don’t. We all care. We’re all angry, we’re all grieving, we’re all ripped apart over it,” Nakata retorted gruffly. “Those of us who have blood ties, however feeble, we feel it too. However, we’re soldiers. We have a squad to hold together and we need everyone on board. We have no Vice Captain, and right now, it doesn’t seem likely anyone’s going to step up to fill that role. In the meantime, those of us who can should get out there and make sure discipline doesn’t fall apart. You’re Eighth Seat. Pull yourself together. Getting all emotional over this is what the enemy wants.”

“You don’t know what the enemy wants,” Tenichi pushed Nakata away from his bunk, swinging his feet over the side and getting languidly to his feet, padding barefooted across the small, square room to the window to gaze out at the training yard that lay beyond. It was more or less deserted, only a few recruits half-heartedly playing with bokken in a space normally filled by rank and file shinigami and the sound of someone calling drill, and he bit his lip, a sudden memory of his first day in Seventh assailing his senses. It had been Souja who had greeted him then, he remembered, taken him around the division and then handed him over to Kikyue and Nakata for briefing and training drill, and as he dwelled on this, Souja’s voice seemed to ring loud and clear through his head.

“Things are probably different here from Thirteenth,” the Vice Captain had said, “but we have our own sense of solidarity, and if you work as hard as Juushirou-dono’s said, you’ll fit right in with the rest of the squad very quickly. We’re expecting a lot of you, Tenichi — Seventh prides itself on its military skill, but also on its loyalty to each other and to the Gotei.”

“Those values suit me, too, sir,” Tenichi had replied earnestly. “I intend to work hard and earn my rank, as well as Ukitake-taichou’s praise.”

Tenichi closed his eyes briefly, forcing the recollection away, but it was soon replaced by another. A dust-dishevelled, preoccupied Souja, pale eyes penetrating his as they hurried through the night, back towards the safety of the division barracks.

“That area of Seventh is high risk, and I would rather not lose you again. I’m sorry, since it’s obviously a place of pilgrimage for you, but as your Vice Captain, I have no choice. You must not go back there — and you certainly must not try to tell your brother or take him there. It would be seriously frowned on if you were to disobey that instruction — and if I’m more lenient in my judgements, the Captain would not be. I’m sorry that it means taking your father from you again when you’ve just found him, but I must give priority to the living, and not the dead."

"To the living, and not the dead," softly Tenichi echoed the Vice Captain's words, feeling them resonate inside of him far more now than they had done at the time. The image of the still form lying in state on the plinth as the first licks of amber flame teased away at the edges of the white funeral robe crossed his thoughts briefly, and he swallowed hard.

I am the living and you are the dead now, Fukutaichou. You just didn't know then that this would be how it would turn out, and nor did I. Was that shadow Kurotsuchi right? Was this all a consequence of that?

"Kotetsu?" Nakata came to stand beside him, casting him a quizzical look. "What are you muttering to yourself about?"

"Something Fukutaichou said to me, when he brought me back after I was found in Seventh District," Tenichi sighed, turning away from the window to face his older companion. "It doesn't matter. None of it does, now."

"You're still blaming yourself for all of this, aren't you?" Nakata's eyes became slits, and before Tenichi knew what was going on, strong arms had taken him by the shoulders once more, propelling him across the room and shoving him hard so he fell backwards onto his bunk. "Of all the idiot things. If the Fuku did go looking for clues as to what happened to you, well, then he got caught off guard and the worst happened. It doesn't lead back to you in the slightest. Even Kikyue-dono hasn't said so, and she's none to stable about anything right at the moment, poor lass. You've taken it far too deep inside of you to be of any use to anyone — either snap out of it or someone will have to poke you out of it with the sharp end of their sword. Fuku'd be the first one to be cross that he'd created such disarray... not going on with your duty is disrespectful to him and you know it."

Tenichi started, glancing up at his older companion in surprise, and Nakata nodded resolutely.

"There, that got through, didn't it?" he said, evidently satisfied. "If you understand that, then get yourself together and come with me. Hajime-dono told me to get a hold of you, and if I have to go back and tell him you're mooning like a girl in your room, he'll probably come here and slash sense into you himself. We've a job to do and we'll do it. Grieving is for after hours, in private time, when the lights go out. While we're awake, we're on active duty — the Taichou's relying on us to hold it together, so come on."

Tenichi paused for a moment, then, slowly, he nodded his head.

"You're right," he said softly. "I'm sorry, Nakata-san. I guess, coming from Thirteenth, I'm not used to this. Seventh is... different. I'm not an Endou, and perhaps that makes it harder for me to understand what the right way is to behave. I just keep seeing him, as he was when he died, and then, on the pyre..."

He trailed off, swallowing hard, and Nakata clapped him on the back.

"Like I said, you're from outside. I guess the shock hit you harder, but it'll fade quicker, no doubt," he reflected. "Come on, though. Working will take your mind off it, and there's a lot of work to be done. The juniors rely on folk like us — if we fall apart, the whole division is doomed."

"That's true, too," Tenichi managed a weak smile. "All anyone can do for Fukutaichou now is that, isn't it?"

"Well, however calm he was, he was an Endou too, make no mistake," Nakata said pensively. "I wouldn't put it past him to come after us from beyond the grave if we let the squad collapse over a little thing like his being killed. He was a brave man, you know, coming back here with that grave an injury to make report to the Captain about what he'd found. I admire him for that. You probably never saw him with the hunter's sword in his hand, and he didn't show his claws in the same way Kikyue-dono does, but he was capable of it, there's no question about that. Whether the old tales about the smoke from the funeral pyre are true or not, I'm not waiting to find out. Fukutaichou left the squad in our hands, so we'll do our best by it. That's why we wear this uniform — so snap to it."

"I'm coming," Tenichi nodded, sliding his sandals onto his feet and lifting his sword from its resting place beside his bed, sliding the scabbard through the white fabric of his obi. "Did Hajime-dono say what exactly he wanted me to do?"

"That's more like it," Nakata nodded approvingly. "And no, he didn't. Looked run off his feet, and just grabbed hold of me on his way to the mess hall. Said I should unearth you and bring you downstairs smartish... so that's what I intend to do. Like as not he'll rail into you for shirking in the dorm when everything's so chaotic, so prepare to bow your head and take whatever he says to you, all right? S'quicker that way."

"Mm," Tenichi frowned, but did not argue, and Nakata grabbed up his own weapon once more, moving to throw open the door and leading the way purposefully down the long, narrow hallway that led from the Seventh Division dormitories to the core complex of the barracks proper. As they walked, Tenichi was aware of snippets of conversation from this room or that, and the occasional silhouette of someone passing a doorway, clearly so bent on an errand of their own that they didn't even have time to stop and exchange greetings, and despite himself, a dull ache settled in the pit of his stomach.

What am I doing? This is my division, and I need to pull myself together. Nakata's right. If I blame myself... well, that doesn't change anything. If this was my fault, then I more than anyone should be working to the bone to keep things going. If even a tiny bit of penance can be done by that, then I should be the first to offer myself to oversee recruits, or clean barracks, or file papers, or anything my superiors send me to do. Whether Fukutaichou's ghost is or isn't glaring down at me, it doesn't change anything. He's not here, and that's at least in part due to me, so I ought to do whatever I can in return. Since he came back, nobody's said anything about my abduction, so it's safe to assume that whatever Fukutaichou discovered, none of it was linked back to me. That being the case... maybe all will be well. I didn't wish for Fukutaichou to die, but I can't reverse it, and... well... the best thing I can do is try and move on.

"Kotetsu!" As they entered the mess hall, a relieved voice called out his name, and Tenichi's head jerked up, seeing the tall, lean figure of the Seventh Division's Fourth officer coming towards him. Kitabata Hajime was a shinigami approaching middle age, the first streaks of grey beginning to show through his dark hair and his thin, hooked features giving him the visual impression of a hunting bird waiting to swoop down and pounce on any unsuspecting individual he had singled out to be his prey. He was a third degree member of the Endou Clan through the female line, and therefore politically quite insignificant, yet Hirata had seen promise in his efficiency and his loyalty, and so had given him preferment over others of higher blood rank, allowing him to rise to the highest rank in the division not held by a member of the first degree family themselves. Tenichi knew, because Nakata had told him, that there had been some rumblings about his appointment to Fourth Seat, but he had proven a good choice and had operated as second in command to Souja's patrols since Hirata's son had been old and qualified enough to take up the Vice Captain's badge. Looking at Hajime now, Tenichi could see the strain of the previous few days reflected on the senior officer's face, and he berated himself once again. Souja's death had affected everyone, just as Nakata had said. Souja's quiet authority and firm trust in his father's choice of Fourth seat had helped to quell any rebellion towards his position, but now, with Hirata apparently still attending to his family in Seventh and the Vice Captain dead, Hajime's own position was likely to become tenuous.

But I'm District, so he feels he can command me without fear of me talking back. And, dammit, that's my duty, too. To me, Hajime-dono is my superior officer and that's all. I don't care about degrees of Clan.

"I'm sorry for taking so long, Hajime-dono," Tenichi said now, bowing his head apologetically as the officer approached. "I hadn't realised you were looking for me till Nakata-san came to alert me."

"Well, you're here now, thank the skies," Hajime said heavily, clapping the younger man on the shoulder. "I need all the help I can get, so don't be expecting to go to bed early tonight... maybe not at all. Kikyue-dono's dealing with Souja-dono's papers and clearing his office of anything that should go back to Seventh District, and though I've asked if she wants help, she's determined to do it on her own. My own patrol — Souja-dono's patrol, I should say — they've been set to mundane tasks around the division since we're running no active patrols till the Captain says so. Yours, though, is all over the place at the moment. Some of the recruits are in the yard, but the rest..."

"Mutiny on the horizon?" Nakata asked clinically, and Hajime sighed, nodding his head.

"Without Kikyue-dono to hold them firm, that's what it seems," he said tiredly. "The problem's with Ohara, of course... he won't take orders from me, and being Kikyue-dono's second, he's got considerable authority over some of the juniors in your patrol. I need you to go straighten the young'uns out. You can't do anything about Ohara — he outranks you in seating and all of us by birth, damn him, but between the two of you, I hope you'll be able to pull the juniors together and knock some sense into them. I need messengers to send out to various divisions, and I also have to compile a report for Misashi-sama before the sun sets, so my workload is too full to start chasing inexperienced Clansfolk around the barracks."

"Damn Ohara," Nakata muttered with feeling, and Tenichi frowned, reflecting on Kikyue's appointed second-in-command, Ohara Masayuki. In contrast to Hajime, he was a second degree Endou of about Tenichi's own age, and, though born through a female line, the eldest son of a particularly influential member of the current Endou administration. His father, out of favour under the previous regime had been actively involved in Misashi's rebuilding of Seventh's economy following Seimaru's downfall, and had continued to provide sound counsel to Hirata once the transfer of power had taken place. Tenichi had not met the elder Ohara, though he knew that he was considered a wise, reasoned individual and was much respected.

Unfortunately, his son was more of a hothead, and, though it had never been voiced in polite circles, Tenichi knew that the young man had ambitions above his station. Shunned in his attempts to wrest Fourth seat from Hajime, he had settled at Fifth, entered Kikyue's patrol by his own will and, as many members of that group commonly believed, had aspirations of marrying Hirata's eldest daughter in order to consolidate his position in the Clan. Kikyue had never given any indication of being interested in Ohara as anything other than as a subordinate, and Tenichi did not believe Ohara's interest went beyond the material but, with the death of Kikyue's only brother, it was almost certain that the young man would begin to throw his weight around once more.

"If his father wasn't such a good man, I'd slice the lad's head off and send it back to Seventh District in a box," Hajime agreed grimly, "but as it is, all I can do is focus on those who are likely to flock around him. You two are sensible and you have your heads on right. Kikyue-dono relies on you both a lot, I know, so I'm going to, too. Let Ohara do as he likes, but round up the others and find something useful to do with them. Run a drill session, if you like. The yard's more or less empty, and it wouldn't hurt to take people's minds off everything. Not that that's really possible — but it's better than watching that poser strut up and down the halls days after the Clan heir has been laid to rest."

"Yes, sir," Tenichi said gravely, saluting, and Nakata nodded, following suit.

"Will do," he agreed frankly. "Ohara only ever listens to Kikyue-dono, but there's more than a few of us who'd run a rapier through him just to stop his tongue flapping. Second degree or not, this is squad, and he should treat you with more respect."

"Well, it's just till the Captain comes back," Hajime offered them a wry smile. "Kikyue-dono received a message from him that he expected to return later this evening, so it's not so long. If Ohara continues to flap and waste time, he might find himself the next object of a Clan funeral, and it won't be a moment too soon — but in the meantime, let's do what we can to get things back to a sense of discipline. Kyouraku-taichou told Kikyue-dono that he'd send people to help if we needed it in Taichou's absence, but I don't want to have to send out to our neighbours for help. That would be shame on the Endou, and there's been enough of that already with Souja-dono cut down in such a way."

"Agreed," Nakata nodded. "C'mon, Kotetsu. We've work to do — let's get to it right away. Your sword's sharp enough — I dare say you can strike idiocy out of some of the juniors with it if need be."

He grabbed his companion by the arm, hauling him off in the direction of the training arena, and Tenichi allowed himself to be taken, glancing back thoughtfully at Hajime before he disappeared out of their sight.

"It's tough in a Clan squad," he murmured, more than half to himself. "Rank is about more than just ability. I guess I knew that... but hadn't really perceived it till now."

No kidding, "Nakata clicked his tongue against the roof of his mouth." I've never had much time for Ohara... or the airs and graces he puts on to try and be impressive. Well, I might call him Masayuki-dono in front of his face, but that's only because form demands it and I don't want to show disrespect to his Pa. Be glad you're not a part of all of this, Kotetsu — at times like this, it's a headache for all."

Tenichi's lips thinned, but he made no response, instead following his companion out into the training yard. The few recruits were still there, and their expressions brightened at the appearance of two seated officers as they hurried over eagerly.

"Is the Captain back?" one asked anxiously, and Nakata cuffed him lightly across the back of the head, letting out a snort.

"If he was, d'you think we'd be out here amusing you whelps?" he asked gruffly. "No, not yet. We've been instructed to run drill in the yard, though, and that's what we'll do. You, and you, go round up the rest of Kikyue-dono's patrol. Masayuki-dono is probably engaged with some other important business, so you needn't bother about him, and Kikyue-dono's not to be disturbed, but everyone else. Tell them it's a direct order and there'll be consequences for any who don't bother to show — all right?"

"Yes, sir!" The recruits snapped to attention, before hurrying off towards the main door of the barracks, and Tenichi sighed, glancing at the three remaining individuals pensively.

"Better put the bokken back where they belong," he said lightly. "We're running sword drills, since it's clear that this division's defences need to step up a gear. Go on, hurry up! We're not going to wait till sundown!"

The trio exchanged glances, hesitating for a moment, and Tenichi's eyes narrowed.

"Is there a problem?" he asked softly, and the oldest of the three stepped forward, lowering his bokkenso that it rested against his leg.

“Ohara-dono told us to practice with bokken out here,” he said slowly. “We weren’t to play with swords, he said, since there was nobody of authority on hand.”

“There wasn’t. Now there is,” Nakata said crisply, reaching to grab the bokken and pulling it forcibly from the youth’s hand and glancing at it. “Kotetsu gave you an order, and you’re expected to obey it.”

“But... Ohara-dono...” the recruit prevaricated, and Nakata sighed, swinging the bokken around until it made contact with the back of the young man’s knees. The force of the swing was not as strong as it might have been, but it was enough to make the recruit stumble, and his companions let out yells of dismay, hurrying to help him to regain his balance.

“Ohara-dono told you not to spar with swords unsupervised, and quite right too, given the aim some of you have, but you’re not unsupervised now,” Nakata tossed the bokken aside, glaring at the youngsters with a look that Tenichi knew meant trouble would follow if they didn’t obey with speed. ‘That being the case, Kotetsu gave you an instruction. I’ll give you one chance further to do as he bade you, or I will be using this,’ he patted the hilt of his sword, “and parting some hands from wrists, bokken still attached.”

“I would sooner you didn’t maim any division members in my absence, Nakata, however trying they might be.”

A fresh voice prevented anyone from finding out whether Nakata intended to make good on his threat, as with a whoosh of shunpo, Hirata himself materialised in the middle of the yard, his dark red Endou cloak wrapped around his shoulders in place of his usual white haori. Beneath it, however, he wore the black and white of a shinigami on duty, and as Tenichi gazed at him, he saw that the older man’s pale eyes were guarded and closed, preventing anyone from seeing into his thoughts. His words had been calmly spoken, but a chill breeze whipped around the ground, indicating once again that his control was only on the surface. At the sight of him, the recruits took several steps back, the two younger ones releasing their bokken as they scrambled into a position of proper respect towards their Clan Leader, and, as Tenichi bowed his own head, he felt his heart thumping in his chest.

“Taichou!” Nakata was the only one who seemed unperturbed by the sudden arrival, making his regulation obeisance before striding over to where the other stood. In physical build, Nakata was both broad and taller than the Endou Leader, yet he kept a respectful distance from Hirata's sword arm, turning to gesture to the recruits.

"We were going to begin drill, and were waiting for the others to arrive, sir," he explained evenly. "These children seemed rather too fond of their wood sticks, so I was inducing them to exchange them for swords. That's all."

"I see," Hirata did not seem to be particularly listening, and as Tenichi raised his head slowly, he felt the pale eyes turn towards him, meeting his gaze thoughtfully yet impassively. A long moment of silence passed between them, then Hirata nodded his head.

"Very well," he murmured. "Nakata, remain here and do as you've been ordered. I imagine my daughter is still busy with sorting the Vice Captain's office, so I won't disturb her. Tenichi, I want you to come with me. You seem as good a person as anyone to make report."

"Me, sir? Yes, sir, of course," Tenichi's heart skipped a beat, but he nodded his head. "We were told not to expect you till this evening, or we would have been..."

"I intended to come then, but there was little for me to do except stand around and wait for the sun to set," Hirata cut across him, gesturing towards the main building. "I therefore came back more quickly, and will attend to whatever has accrued in my absence. Tenichi, I'll hear your report first, I think. Where is Ohara in all of this?"

"We don't really know, sir," Nakata said honestly. "Neither Kotetsu nor I have seen him — we received instruction from Hajime-dono."

"I see," Hirata's eyes narrowed slightly, but he nodded. "All right. If Ohara joins your drill, he is to take charge on my orders. If he does not, I'll hear his reasons why later on. You might send a recruit to report to Hajime that I've returned, since I won't have time to track him down myself. There's far too much to do without an adjutant to delegate to."

With that clinical statement, he swept away across the cobbles, cloak billowing in the wind his sword had undoubtedly produced, and Tenichi swallowed hard, meeting Nakata's gaze for a moment then setting his teeth, heading quickly in the direction his Captain had already gone. Though Hirata had spoken in detached, neutral tones, there was a tension prickling about his aura that told Tenichi his Captain was less rational about the absence of his Vice Captain than he was trying to make his division believe, and that, on the contrary, this detached, cold manner of speech was almost certainly the only way Hirata could hold his composure before his men. Tenichi's mind flashed back to the memorial ceremony, and the brief glimpse he had had of his Captain following the cremation of Souja's body. It had only been a glance, the most fleeting moment imaginable, but Tenichi had been almost certain that the glitter against Hirata's lashes had not been the feeble sun glinting off his spectacles but a sign of real emotion showing itself at last. There was no indication of that now, of course, but in some ways that awareness made the Captain a more forbidding prospect.

Still, to disobey his instruction was unthinkable, and so he quickened his pace, finding that, by the time he caught his commander up, the latter was already unlocking the Captain's office, pulling the door back and ushering the District man inside. Tenichi bowed his head, doing as he was told, and Hirata shut the door, fastening the latch before moving across the room towards the window. He made no attempt to sit down, instead leaning up against the glass, his back to the world outside and his sharp, hawk-like gaze once more searching deep into Tenichi's own.

"Well, Kotetsu Tenichi. Your report, please."

Six words, softly spoken, yet a chill ran down Tenichi's spine, and he nodded his head hastily.

"Yes, sir. As you said, Kikyue-dono has been busy in S... Fukutaichou's office, and Hajime-dono has been taking charge of everyone else. His patrol have been busy with chores around the division, and he summoned Nakata and I to lead a drill, which we were about to begin when you returned, and..."

"If I wanted to hear the mundane, I would have taken a recruit," Hirata's cool tones sliced through Tenichi's babbled response, cutting him dead mid-sentence. "If I wanted an educated, insightful rundown of everything I'd missed, I'd speak to Hajime, since he's doubtless the one who's holding the ropes together. I didn't call you here to try my patience — which I warn you, is running extremely thin at the present time."

"I'm sorry, sir, I'm not sure I understand?" Tenichi's face drained of colour, as he stared at his Captain uncertainly. "If you didn't want me to... what did you... what kind of report...?"

"I have been thinking very hard about the night my son disappeared from Seireitei," Hirata said softly, and the shutters at the window rattled slightly as a sudden wind howled through them, circling around the office and causing several of the papers on the desk to scatter from their neat pile. "Very hard, indeed. I'm sure I've done nothing else, in the brief spaces of time that have been my own."

"Sir..?" Now Tenichi could feel the sweat against his palms, hoping against hope that Hirata could not sense the fear in his aura or hear it in his voice.

"When I sent Kikyue out to search, I asked you a question," Hirata's eyes narrowed, and Tenichi once more had the impression of being hunted by the hawk that lived within his Captain's blade. "I asked if there was anything you remembered that you had omitted to tell me. Do you recall that question?"

"Yes, sir, I do, but..."

"You told me there was nothing you had not reported to me," Hirata cut across him again, and before Tenichi knew what was happening, his Captain was right in front of him, pale eyes gleaming with something more terrifying than the cold stone impassiveness he had shown outside, two thin, gloved hands digging into his shoulders and forcing him to meet the Clan leader's gaze head on.

"That was a lie." Hirata's words were no more than a whisper, but the rattle of the shutters indicated that the man's temper was rising, "wasn't it?"

"Tai... chou?" Tenichi swallowed hard, and Hirata's eyes became slits behind the lenses of his glasses.

"Kikyue reported to me that you had had a conversation with my son — information that he had made you conceal," he continued, still in the same low tones. "Information she had to pry from you — information about where you had been with Souja the night he brought you back to base. Kikyue said that you'd promised him not to go back there... nor to speak of it. To her, perhaps, that was appropriate... but to lie before me, your Captain, about anything that could have lead to finding him more quickly..."

"I'm sorry, sir," Tenichi bit his lip, wanting to take a step back from the prickling aura that now seemed to encircle him, but it was impossible, for, even had Hirata's fingers not still been digging into his shoulder-blades, the sheer force of the other's suppressed reiatsu was enough to render him unable to move. "I didn't know... I didn't think... I thought Souja-dono would have reported everything to you. He... he gave me the impression that it wasn't to be spoken... in front of anyone else and... and that if I did..you... would be... cross. When you asked me, we were... in front of... everyone. Therefore..."

“You chose to hold your tongue,” Hirata seemed to calm himself a little at the wavering note in Tenichi’s tones, releasing his hold and stepping back as though realising the threatening nature of his behaviour. “I see. Then will you tell me now, Tenichi, what promise it was my son extracted from you? What secret, exactly, was he trying to protect?”

“I don’t really know very much, sir,” Tenichi took a deep breath into his lungs as the pressure surrounding his body abated. “Just, Souja-dono said that the people who found me... I shouldn’t ever mention having seen them. He said where they were was dangerous land and I should keep it a secret. I didn’t... want to disobey Fukutaichou, and I didn’t know who or what they were, so I didn’t think I should tell Kikyue-dono... only... because Fukutaichou was missing...”

“I see,” Hirata folded his arms across his chest, leaning back against the window once more with a heavy sigh. “So it was the people Souja collected you from that he had you keep a secret?”

“Yes, sir.” Tenichi agreed, relief in his expression. “I don’t really know enough about them to even call it a secret, but one of them said... bad things would happen if I wondered too much about them, and then Souja-dono... so... I decided... it would be best to do as I was told.”

“Then I will ask you to maintain that promise,” Hirata reflected at length. “Those words are good ones to remember, and you should hold onto them. The people who retrieved you work for me and they are trusted agents, but their existence is a secret guarded only by a very few... even Kikyue knows nothing of their presence. Your knowing of them could become problematic... if you were to discuss their existence with anyone without the proper clearance, then...”

He stopped, pressing his lips together slightly as though cutting himself off before finishing what promised to be an unpleasant sentence, and Tenichi felt another shiver run down his spine.

“I have no intention of discussing it with anyone, sir. You have my word, I would rather forget it ever happened,” he said quickly, and Hirata nodded.

“And that was all? My son never mentioned anything else to you after that time?”

“No, sir,” Tenichi shook his head. “I act within Kikyue-dono’s patrol, and so my time with Fukutaichou was not as great as some others. We had no particularly close relationship... I respected him a lot, but... it wasn't as though he took me into his confidence about anything, if that's what you mean. He didn't ever expand on what happened that night, and never spoke to me of it again... not even of my abduction."

"Ah yes. That," Hirata's eyes glittered briefly, putting Tenichi back on his guard. "That is something else I need to review with you. I understand you came back to Seventh in a confused state, but I wondered if you had remembered any more about what happened to you when you were in someone's custody?"

"Taichou?" Tenichi blinked, and Hirata nodded.

"Anything, no matter how small, I wish to hear it," he said quietly. "I know that you reported being dragged into a Senkaimon — but otherwise, gave nothing of use. Where that Senkaimon led... is now of significant interest to me, given the circumstances in which my son was found. If you remember anything... I want to know."

Tenichi faltered, memory of Keitarou and the promise made in Rukongai momentarily choking his vocal chords, and Hirata arched an eyebrow.

"Well?" The single word held a warning, and slowly and wordlessly Tenichi shook his head.

"You still remember nothing?"

"I was trying to piece it together, but no, sir, I do not," at length Tenichi forced the lie from his lips, hoping that his deception was not written all over his face. "I have thought on it much, too, though Fukutaichou told me to put it behind me... but even so..."

"It seems highly likely my son was killed investigating the incident," Hirata said bluntly, and Tenichi flinched, dropping his head.

"Yes... sir."

"He brought back some information, and we will investigate it, but if you remember nothing, there's no sense in my questioning you further," Hirata removed his glasses with a sigh, rubbing his temples wearily, and in that simple gesture, the flow of spiritual energy in the chamber dropped to a dull hum, indicating that for now, the Captain had fought back his hawk's spirit and re-established control over his emotions. "I will have to turn my attention to other leads instead. If the promise you made with my son only related to the Kitsune, then..."

He paused, frowning as he realised he had let the name slip, shaking his head as if berating himself for his carelessness.

"You should not concern yourself with that or them, however," he said at length. "For now, I want you to return to your duties and do your job. We will get to the bottom of your abduction and Souja's murder and, if they be connected, we will find that link as well. You shouldn't concern yourself too much with that, though. If you remember nothing, then you have no further part to play in the investigation and should leave it to others."

"Yes, sir," Tenichi let out his breath in a rush, then, as something else occurred to him, "Taichou, is it true that... someone came back with Souja-dono that night? A... District boy? Someone who... helped him back?"

"As I understand it, though the boy is tight in Thirteenth's custody and I haven't had a chance to pursue that lead myself," Hirata nodded. "I believe he hasn't yet regained consciousness after a run-in with Kikyue's sword. Why? Is there something you think I should know about him?"

The boy is called Koku, and I met him in Rukongai. He's an associate of Urahara Keitarou, the man you want to kill... and a man who might... who might... have been involved in the murder of your son.

Tenichi frowned, pushing the thoughts away.

"No, sir. I have not met with him either," he lied simply. "Just, a close friend of mine has been put in charge of his care, and I was concerned for his well-being. With Souja-dono so injured, if that boy is our only lead..."

"I understand he will live, and shows signs of rousing from his sleep soon, so I dare say we will soon know all we need to from him," Hirata reflected. "Ukitake-taichou is a persuasive man... I have faith that he will get whatever truth the District boy knows and then, maybe, we will know how to tie together all the loose ends my son left me with."

"I see," Tenichi's heart spasmed, and he lowered his head again, not wanting Hirata to see the stricken expression in his eyes. "Then may I ask to be dismissed? I would like to return to help Nakata-san, and..."

"Yes, you can go," Hirata agreed, flicking his hand towards the door, and Tenichi bowed a third time, this time more fervently, before hurrying to carry out his Captain's instruction before the man could change his mind.

Once out in the hallway, however, he dropped back against the wall, closing his eyes and putting his hand to his chest.

Koku. I forgot about Koku. If he talks... to anyone... the game is up. While he's unconscious, there's no problem, but if he were to wake up, that's another matter. Ukitake-taichou is persuasive and disarming when he wants to be... he might just convince the lad to open up. It's not like Koku seemed to care all that much about Keitarou-san, and, even though he took care of me and protected me from that girl's blade, he didn't seem involved with things — certainly not die hard loyal like that creature Kurotsuchi. He might be persuaded to turn witness if it proves to be to his advantage and if he does... if Koku talks about Rukongai, about Keitarou-san... about me...

He opened his eyes, clenching his fists.

I can't let that happen. If something happens to me, then that's one thing, but what if that Kurotsuchi was right and it spreads to Ketsui as well? Kirio, even? I didn't make promises with Keitarou-san to end up like this... but now it's gone this far, I can only protect the people close to me. I can't bring Fukutaichou back, so all I can do... is make sure... that nobody ever gets a chance to talk to Koku about what happened in Rukongai.

Author's Note

Sorry about the confusing AN last chapter. It has zero to do with this story and everything to do with my feelings about the latest chapter of manga. I just didn't want to spoiler for those who hadn't read. Byakuya won't be making any appearances in this story, though. xD He's a descendent of Shirogane's, but Shirogane is not his father, nor his grandfather — as we already know, those are Soujun and Ginrei — so there are some levels between this Kuchiki and that.

Shorter chapter this week. I don't design chapters to be long or short, it just depends on how they flow and where the right cut off seems to be. A Seventh Division orientated chapter. I quite like Nakata ;)

I'm currently writing chapter 39 (this is chapter 30, regardless of what Ffnet calls it xD) so you guys are catching up with me and it may be that updates slow down when I get towards Chapter 40. I am still finalising my Dissertation for my MA, and obviously that takes priority over the writing of anything else right now. For everyone who wished me luck in my exams, too — thank you =D I passed everything just fine =D.

32. Alien World

Chapter Thirty One: Alien World

The room was light, and the faint scent of herbs pervaded air which seemed clearer and more pure than the claustrophobic, dusty atmosphere he was used to in the wilds of the Rukon. There had been voices, too, flecks of unfamiliar spiritual presences darting across his thought patterns like interference across radio waves, but now all was quiet and still.

Images flashed briefly through his mind, hazy and grey as they blurred one atop another. A fight on the outskirts of the village. Sakaki, her blade dripping blood. A fallen shinigami, the cry of a wounded bird of prey circling before falling to shatter like a stone against the ground. The unsteady pulsing of a heart, skipping and jumping so much that to begin with he could not identify it as his own and, overriding it all, the mesh of spiritual presences that had fogged his senses, rendering him helpless as the claws of the kestrel had swooped down...

No, that was wrong. Though to his befuddled wits it had seemed as though he had been attacked by a bird of prey, in fact it had been a young woman, a woman with a sword and as resolute a killer instinct as Sakaki's. Although he tried to picture her, all he could see was a blur of black and white, the glint of silver slashing down towards him, and all around her body, glowing as though lit by the sun itself the aura of a predator's reiryoku. Had she been real or an illusion? Dazzled by the unfamiliar bright light of Seireitei's sun, it was hard to be sure.

Koku opened his eyes, staring up at the plain slatted ceiling of the Thirteenth Division barracks chamber. For a moment he lay completely still, allowing the slithers of his consciousness to slide back into place. His last clear recollection was stepping into the Senkaimon with Souja, he remembered dully, clutching the shaking, bloodsoaked body of the dying Vice Captain through the empty expanse, his heart pounding loud enough to render any conversation between them useless. Though he had done his utmost to keep his word to the injured man, on their emergence into Seireitei he had been sent reeling by the morass of spiritual matter in the ether. The following moments were a muddle of colours and lights, and, though he remembered Souja's battered body crumpling and sinking to the ground, he did not remember clearly when or how the shinigami had come on the scene or what had happened to him following the Kestrel-woman's strike. Nonetheless, one thing was definitely missing from his awareness. Though he had been in close enough contact with Souja to be able to pick up his spirit presence, even at a distance, it was conspicuously absent. Perhaps it was the morass of reiatsu that was foxing his usually sharp senses, he told himself, but the empty feeling in the pit of his stomach told a different tale. He had seen Souja's injuries and he had known his companion to be beyond help. He had tried... he had had to... but his common sense had told him it would be a futile gesture and, as he lay there in the strange room on foreign soil, he wondered what had really driven him to make such a desperate, hopeless gamble. His life and everyone else's were now intertwined with a world he neither knew or understood... and yet he felt as though he had seen it before, its multitude of vibrant presences criss-crossing one another, and the bright light that glittered in through the slats in the window blinds all new yet all familiar just the same.

His heart felt heavy.

He had tried to fight against the tide, but had found himself washed out to sea regardless. Souja's death and everything that would follow had been mapped out like the pages of a book by a malign force for which even Keitarou was no match.

Aizen Kohaku. How I hate everything that name stands for, everything it's come to mean. And more, how I hate that we're all trapped by the tendrils of that creature's words... no matter how hard I try to fight against it, it always manages to prevail. The villagers in Rukongai are right... only a demon could have the power to manipulate every missing piece into its rightful place and then string us along after it according to its whims. Souja-dono's life, my life, maybe even Keitarou-san's... we're all at its mercy, and my being here like this is the proof.

He glanced down at his body, registering the thin blanket that covered him and, beneath that, the clean white robes that felt soft and unfamiliar against his skin. His own clothing was nowhere to be seen and, as he moved a hand cautiously to touch the fabric, he paused, sensing the reiatsu of one, no, perhaps two separate shinigami against its surface. His body felt numb and heavy, as though he had been drugged with some unknown substance and, as he drew his mind back towards the unsheathed blade of the kestrel, he remembered the sensation of metal clawing through flesh and blood pulsing from the wound, spilling onto the ground.

Had he felt pain? He couldn't remember, but as his fingers shifted across his torso he could tell that someone had tried to repair some kind of damage, bandaging his wounds with fresh white wrappings before dressing him and laying him to rest in this room.

He sighed, closing his eyes once more.

Souja-dono's shinigami. Even though I knew he couldn't be saved, and he knew it too... I still made a decision, raised a weapon to Sakaki and ended up here. I wonder whether Keitarou-san or the shinigami would punish me more harshly for skipping from Rukongai into Seireitei without permission. Keitarou-san is probably... no, almost certainly looking for me. Sakaki will have told him... everything, most likely. He'll be worried... maybe confused... probably angry. Still, I couldn't do anything else. I didn't want to see someone else die.

He opened his eyes again, glancing cautiously around him as he tried to read the surrounding atmosphere for any sign of spiritual energy. It was hard, he realised with a jolt, for, as Katsura had often said, Seireitei's atmosphere was far purer and cleaner than that of the abandoned Rukon, yet it was also rich with reishito to a degree that Koku had never before had to face. That moment of intoxication upon first entering Seireitei's atmosphere had fogged his wits long enough for him to be cut down by one unwelcome blade — now he knew that if he was going to escape from here without the shinigami finding him, he would have to acclimatise to his new environment with some speed.

People had been in and out of his chamber whilst he had been sleeping — the people who had helped to bandage and dress him, as well as other distinct spiritual patterns of those who had merely stopped to check in on him without making direct contact with his body. Cautiously extending his senses, Koku counted at least eight different spiritual presences that had entered his immediate surrounds. Seven belonged to strangers, but the eighth, he noted with some consternation, was that of one he knew — Kotetsu Tenichi, the shinigami Keitarou had had brought to the Rukon.

I wonder if he recognised me... and if he did, what he's said.

His eyes became thoughtful slits.

Though talking about it would do him no good, either. Probably he's said nothing... and for me, that's for the best.

Some of the reiatsu traces, including Tenichi's, were old, at least two or three days, he reasoned, whilst others were much more recent, and one in particular had left the room less than five minutes before his rousing. That person was probably assigned to watch him, he realised, and would doubtless be back soon from whatever errand had called him away. That meant that, if he was going to attempt an escape, he needed to do it now — for he had no way of knowing whether if he feigned sleep and waited till nightfall the shinigami would sense his deception and watch over him more stringently.

I don't know what Souja-dono may have told them about me, or where we met. I have to assume the worst for now and reckon that he told them we met in Rukongai and about what he saw there. I only hope that he didn't tell anyone that I knew the woman who attacked him. He promised to protect me if I came with him, but a dead man can't protect anyone. The only way he could keep that promise would be to omit reporting that information... I'll just have to hope that shinigami can be more honourable than Keitarou-san believes and he took that information with him to his grave.

He pushed back the blanket, gingerly shunting his body into a more upright position and wincing as a jolt of pain rippled suddenly through his ripped torso. Clenching his fists, it was all he could do not to cry out at the suddenness of the sensation, and he put a hand to his stomach, fighting to suppress the flickers of panic that the impulse had triggered within him.

What did she do to me? A minute ago I felt fine, but the instant I moved...

He pulled back the folds of the robe, running his fingers over the bandages, but the wound was hidden from view and to his consternation he found that putting any kind of pressure against the white wrapping sent further jolts of pain through his skinny body.

I'm hurt badly. Someone's treated me and whatever they did must have worked, but I didn't imagine the blade or the blood. That was my blood, not just Souja-dono's. The kestrel was real, too... I didn't imagine her. I wonder if I'm going to be able to get up... but I have to, so that's a moot question. I can't stay here, in the middle of a shinigami's nest. Even if I don't know my way around Seireitei, I'll have to trust my instincts and find somewhere more secure to hide. If Katsura's here, maybe I can find him and get his help — if not, well, I'll just have to manage as best I can. After eking a living in Rukongai, I'm sure that I can cobble together enough food or water to survive on while this wound heals... and once it does, I'll find a way to get back by myself.

He swallowed hard, pushing out of his mind the fact that he had never been to Seireitei before and, as such, had no idea how to open a Senkaimonto Rukongai or even where one could be found.

That's all I can do now. Try to get back. Staying with shinigami is a bad idea for all concerned... I have to leave here. I have to go back.

You can't go back.

The voice was so faint Koku half-thought he had imagined it, but from the chill that ran down his spine he knew he hadn't, the mocking, derisive words like drops of ice sending shivers through his body.

You'll never go back. Don't lie to yourself, fool. The door is closed and you know it. You knew it when you stepped into it, and you know it now.

For the briefest of instants, a cold, piercing gaze bored into his, empty and amused at his plight, but then, like a desert mirage it was gone, leaving him once more alone.

His eyes narrowed.

Go away. Nobody asked your opinion on anything.

There was no spoken response, but, from that distant, unreachable place, he felt sure he heard the sound of muffled laughter. Defiance surged through him and he grabbed hold of the wooden bed-head, using it to forcibly pull his injured body into a more upright position. The world twisted dangerously, the throbbing pain through his gut suddenly intensifying until he felt certain he must cry out. Sliding down to his knees, he doubled over, screwing his eyes fiercely shut to prevent the tears of pain from rolling down his cheeks. His panic impulses were flaring all the more now, and his pulse was pounding in his ears again, just as it had in the forest. He had never been hurt like this before — life in Rukongai had been barren and impoverished, but it had been secluded and, with Sakaki prohibited from harming him, relatively safe. In contrast, he had been in Seireitei the shortest of times, but already he was hurt who knew how badly, without any clue of how to get back. Though he had never particularly thought fondly of Rukongai, in that instant a wave of bitter homesickness flooded over him, as he realised how lost and alone he really was in this strange world. His shelter, his books, everything that had formed his entire world for the past twenty one years now seemed so very far away and, had the urgency of escape not been pressing on him, he felt certain that he might've given in to his melancholy and broken down in sobs.

And Katsura says that it would be so much better to live here.

Koku snorted at this sudden recollection, allowing his derision to override the fear and pain. Making a tremendous effort, he uncurled his body, stretching one cautious hand in front of the other as he dragged his heavy form forward. It took four or five ginger movements before he reached the door of the chamber and, using it as a support, he hauled his body upright once more, leaning heavily on the bamboo wood slats and using his meagre body weight to force the sliding divide back just enough to allow him to slip through.

The sound of voices drifted down the hallway, making him freeze in alarm, for he felt certain he would be discovered, but they passed and faded away, indicating their owners had taken a different turning, and he let out a sigh of relief, forcing his scattered wits to focus. Though he didn't know how he had come to enter the barracks, by concentrating his full attention on the fragments of spirit matter adhering to the walls, he found himself able to follow the tracks of others who had passed this way, half-stumbling, half falling along the short walkway towards the source of light and fresh air. Katsura had often talked about the purity of the atmosphere in Seireitei, but the light of the sun was too much for Koku's gaze, and he shielded his eyes, gripping tightly to the wood panels to prevent himself from tumbling headlong.

The sensation of something soft beneath his bare feet told him that he had made it out into the bright daylight, the unfamiliar harmony of birdsong and insect humming filling his ears. The air was cool and clean, a soft scent of something Koku could not identify tinging each inhalation. Had he but known it, the perfume had wafted onto the wind from the bright flowers that bloomed around the Thirteenth Division garden in which Juushirou took so much pride, but, though he had seen fresh flowers many times in Katsura's memories and in his own dreams, he had never before encountered them in real life. Glancing down, he saw that the carpet of grass beneath his feet was emerald green instead of the dying yellow brown of the patchy clumps that struggled for survival over the border, and for a moment he forgot his pain and his fear, fascinated and bewitched by the overwhelming tapestry of colours. His first steps from the Senkaimon had not allowed him the time to really appreciate the peaceful plenty of his new environment, but, though Katsura had tried many times to describe it to him, none of the accounts matched up to experiencing it. A world of life, not of death. For the first time ever, I'm not surrounded by decay.

He took a few hesitant, stumbling paces forwards, still dizzy and unsteady on his feet, but suddenly drawn to see and feel more of this living world. The birds above his head were real ones, not the dusky images of his nightmares, their song vibrant and cheerful as they circled in the broad blue sky. A butterfly hovered briefly in and out of his line of sight, its blue and gold wings glittering like jewel dust in the sunlight. Captivated by the vivacity all around him, Koku momentarily forgot where he was and what he had originally intended, wanting only to see more of this strange, technicolour world that reached out and grabbed at his soul as though waking it from a deep, dark dream.

A sudden exclamation drew him back to himself, however, and he swung around, alarm flooding his young features as he realised he was not alone. A male shinigami, robed in the all too familiar black and white of office was coming towards him, and, in his slipstream was another, more petite figure, who had been the one to give the alert. Flowers and nature forgotten, Koku's panic instincts flew into overload and before he knew what he was doing he took off running, desperate to put space between him and his captors — as he perceived them — before they could pin him down. It was a futile endeavour, however, for his wounded, weakened body would only allow him to go a few steps before pain and giddiness drove him to his knees, his surroundings such a morass of swirling colour that he could no longer determine which way was up and which down. Breathing heavily, with the sound of his heartbeat ricocheting through his skull, he forced shaking limbs to push forward, crawling where he was unable to walk as he sought to escape. The sound of footsteps was growing closer and closer and, as it did, Koku's scrambled senses identified the reiatsu of one of the individuals as someone who had been in his room earlier that day. He tried to evade her, but a shadow fell long over his body as the looming figure of the man reached his side, a strong, determined hand grabbing him by the shoulder and hauling him back.

“Ryuu, don't hurt him! He's injured and probably confused,” that was the woman's voice, growing closer now, but Koku was beyond trying to escape the man's hold, and, as she reached his side, his stomach twisted and spasmed, causing him to cough up scalding blood and bile onto the grass. The man — whose name was Ryuu — muttered something in low tones under his breath, but he did not release his hold, preventing the wounded boy from pitching forward, and the next minute gentle hands were looping themselves around his battered body, carefully taking over from her rougher companion. Carefully she wiped his lips clean of blood with a length of white cloth, then laid him down on the ground, her touch soothing and reassuring and completely unlike the military presence that Koku had interpreted shinigami to be.

“What are you doing out here, huh?” she asked softly, and Koku raised eyes to her concerned grey ones, only just preventing himself from crying out loud as her features came into focus.

“Edo... gawa... Mi... tsuki,” he murmured, his words barely above a whisper, but at the sound of them, the gentle gaze clouded slightly, her lips thinning as though trying to discern whether she had heard him correctly. Koku's wits were beyond reasoning this out, however, for all he saw was the girl Katsura had shown him by accident, the girl he had failed to kill in the Spiritless Zone. And, judging by her presence here, he had failed to kill her the second time too. Absently Koku wondered what had become of his ally, but his brain was too scattered to properly process the thought. Though he knew he was surrounded, he could not do a thing to move his own body, and his pulse began to race once again as he realised he was completely at their mercy.

As though she could sense his fear, Mitsuki sighed, resting her hand lightly against his chest. She was careful about where she placed it, Koku realised dimly, avoiding the bandaging that concealed the burning slash across his gut and instead running her fingers gently over his ribs, feeling the beat of his speeding heart.

"You have every reason to be scared of us, but I promise, you're in no danger here," she said at length. "We're trying to help you — though I suppose I shouldn't be surprised that you'd try to run away. You're probably miles from your home and your family, injured and confused... still, I thought someone was with you. How did you manage to get this far without anyone setting off the alarm?"

"This is the waif and stray that belongs to Ukitake, is it?" The man's tones, austere and cultured, yet not unkind, broke through the soothing calm, and Mitsuki nodded.

"Right now he's my patient, first and foremost, and he shouldn't be out here, not running around when he's not fit to even stand," she replied, and Koku felt certain he hadn't imagined the concern in her tones. "Will you help me take him back to his room, Ryuu-kun? I don't know how he came to get this far, but until his wound has knitted a little more firmly, he shouldn't be moving about. He's not currently in danger of his life, but I don't want to push it."

This was the last thing Koku heard for, as the man nodded his acquiescence, reaching strong arms to scoop the waif up in his grip, the mix of pain and fear became too much for his traumatised brain and he slipped back into darkness, the scent of the garden blossoms still lingering at the back of his mind.

"You know, I came here to ensure that you were in no immediate danger," Ryuu stood back from the bed, eying the unconscious form of the young invalid with a heavy sigh. "I should have learned long ago that a visit to Thirteenth Division is never quiet or logical, whatever the errand, but I did not expect to be carrying around injured District children this afternoon.”

“No, I know, and I’m sorry for it,” Mitsuki adjusted the snow white blankets over Koku’s body, pausing for a moment to glance at him before nodding her head. “He’ll sleep a while, now. I can’t use Kidou at present, so I’m not able to do a more permanent fix, but I really don’t think he’ll be running around anywhere again for a while. He pushed himself, but I don’t think he’s done any permanent harm. Hopefully his adventures this morning will dissuade him from any further romps — but I’ll suggest to Juushirou that we lock the door, for his safety as much as anything else.”

She sighed, folding her arms across her chest.

“I’m a little frustrated, to tell you the truth,” she admitted. “While I don’t mind being his primary carer, his injuries could be more easily healed with kidou. However, nobody will authorise anyone else from Fourth to come here and heal him. I sent a message to Unohana-taichou, but she’s up to her eyebrows in paperwork relating to the deaths in the Spiritless Zone and now the autopsy results from poor Souja-dono... in any case, she hasn’t sent a reply, and I get the distinct feeling that people in general don’t consider this boy important enough to help.”

“That’s foolish of them,” Ryuu snorted. “Is this not the young man who returned with Souja-dono? He may be the only witness... and his injury was caused by one of our officers. That being the case...”

“I know, and it’s not that I think people are actively blocking his treatment as such,” Mitsuki ran her fingers through her thick dark hair. “I know Fourth are flat out, so I don’t even blame them — like as not they haven’t even had a moment to think about a random District boy nobody knows anything about. Just, Juushirou’s provided him with shelter here, and he sent for me almost as if he knew things would be this way. Everyone is flapping about the death of a Clan lord — but as you say, this boy may be the one who holds the key to that puzzle, and shouldn’t be particularly disregarded. It’s as though they know his life isn’t in danger, so they’re not hurrying to save him — like whatever I can manage will have to do. Never mind his discomfort or his obvious fear at being here... it’s as though we’re meant to patch him up then leave him in a room and forget about him till he’s needed for the investigation. If not for Juushirou and his Thirteenth, that might’ve happened — as it is, I’m here, and Hikifunesan and Tsukabishi-kun have been helping watch over him. Hikifunesan in particular has proven very adept with changing dressings and so on — so we’ve managed. If I was still in Rukongai, though...”

She trailed off, and Ryuu pressed his lips tightly together at her words.

“It is a sign of the times, and the times are uncertain,” he said candidly. “Your stay in Rukongai has made you forget how things are in a Clan dominated society, which in some sectors are still reluctant to acknowledge the value of District participation. Ukitake has worked hard to establish Thirteenth as a respectable force and has largely succeeded, but even he comes in for direct criticism or derision from a couple of the more traditional Clan Captains. Though things are changing, Seireitei evolves slowly. Although there are no bars on District individuals entering any Gotei squads, most still come to Thirteenth. Cross-Clan membership is increasing, but so far as the Districts go, the Kotetsu boy in Seventh and the handful that exist in the Fourth and Eighth are the exception and not the rule. And, if I may say it, Ukitake, despite his own personal charisma, benefits among the less enlightened nobility by having two Clan-born adjutants to support his regime.”

“What about Sixth?” Mitsuki eyed him quizzically, and a wry smile touched Ryuu’s lips.

“We have no prejudice against it,” he said slowly, “but it seems that most District Academy graduates are too frightened of the Kuchiki reputation to apply to us at recruitment.”

“Well, I suppose that’s understandable,” despite herself, Mitsuki was amused. “Still, I’m glad to hear they’re not one of the Divisions operating with prejudice. If they were, I’d be taking Shirogane-senpai to task about it.”

“Surprisingly, Shirogane-senpai is of the opinion that a few District individuals would be good for the Sixth ranks, and has been diligent in his protection of compensation rights to displaced District shinigami in an attempt to prove the Kuchiki are not indifferent,” Ryuu mused. “As I’ve mentioned before, he has active agents among the traders that travel between Districts, and as Guren-sama leaves the majority of the squad decisions to Senpai and I, I trust that it won’t be long before we number District shinigami among our ranks.”

“Senpai is?” Mitsuki looked surprised, and Ryuu nodded.
